Tov's teachings into a cosmic philosophy, in which God and the divine word were the only true reality, corporeality serving as a veil that keeps us from fully knowing God's truth. The cultivation of da'at (mindfulness), the chief goal of religious training, leads to the ability to see through that veil and to redeem oneself from the prison of falsehood. This mindfulness is most fully realized by the tsaddiqim (see TSADDIQ), a network of spiritual illuminati who are the rulers of each generation on the spiritual plane. Other Jews may seek intimacy with God through them, each Jew finding the particular tsaddiq to whose spiritual root his own soul belongs by its very nature. Thus Hasidism, which stood on one level for equalization, on another level insinuated a claim for a new elite, the tsaddiq, who stood on the highest rung and held the keys to divine blessing. Dov Ber was the great movement builder of Hasidism; he scattered his group of remarkable disciples throughout the Polish-Jewish world. By the time of his death in 1772, Hasidism had entered the public arena as a new religious movement, challenging the complacent authority of the wealthy and learned oligarchy that dominated Jewish life and calling forth a wave of bitter denunciation and opposition. The bans against Hasidism, mostly emanating from *Eliyyahu ben Shelomoh Zalman of Vilna (the Vilna Ga'on) and his disciples, first pronounced in 1772 and renewed throughout the closing decades of the eighteenth century, accused the Hasidim of being religious innovators, destroyers of tradition, madmen, fomenters of civic strife, and revolutionaries. While specific violations of law, either civil or religious, were hard to find, Hasidic disregard for venerable local custom was very much at issue. Hasidim had adopted certain practices as distinguishing badges of special piety. These, including the use of the Sephardi prayer rite, disregard for precise times of prayer, and the extra sharpening of knives for ritual slaughter, now became battle cries in the struggle against the new movement. In some places, especially in Lithuania, Hasidism was utterly defeated, but in most areas it was Hasidim who won the day, and by the opening decade of the nineteenth century Hasidism had taken deep root in the Ukraine, Belorussia, and Galicia. Large numbers of Jews were praying in the many Hasidic prayer rooms that had sprung up, traveling to obtain the blessings of Hasidic masters, and listening to the teachings and tales that were starting to constitute the growing body of Hasidic literature. The third generation of Hasidic leaders lived into the Napoleonic era. Hasidism by this time had taken on varied hues because of regional differences and because of the different personalities and emphases of the various masters. From the time of the Maggid's death in 1772, there was no central authority in the movement. Special mention should be made of the emergence of the *Habad and Bratslav (see NAHMAN OF BRATSLAV) schools, both of which took shape in this period.

1816–1881. As Hasidic leadership passed to the fourth generation, the movement neared the height of its powers. The *Mitnaggedim had at least formally ended their war on Hasidism, and the movement was free to grow and move into such new areas as Congress Poland and northeastern Hungary without organized opposition. The pattern of dynastic succession was firmly in place, ensuring some regularity in the passing of authority. The tsaddiqim were widely venerated, and their books were being published in increasing numbers. But the Maskilim (Enlighteners; see MASKIL) began their own war against Hasidism, which they depicted as backward, superstitious, and the source of Polish Jews' resistance to attempts to ameliorate their conditions through education or westernization. Rulers and government agencies supported most of these claims, and this set Hasidism and its leaders on a course of direct opposition to various governmental policies. As the Haskalah's influence began to be felt in Hasidic areas, a new conservatism and concern with support for both study and punctilious observance of the law became more commonplace in Hasidic circles. Leaders such as Tsevi Elimelekh of Dynów (1786–1841) and Menaḥem Mendel Schneersohn (see SCHNEERSOHN FAMILY) of Lubavich (1789–1866) wrote mystical justifications of the commandments, something that seemed unnecessary in earlier times. As Hasidic communities built and supported yeshivot, there appeared on the scene masters such as Hayyim *Halberstam of Sanz (1797–1876) and Yitsḥaq Me'ir Rothenberg Alter of *Ger (1799–1866), who were better known for their halakhic writings than for their Hasidic teachings. In some areas, Hasidism assumed a militant posture in defense of orthodoxy; such was the position of the *Maḥzike ha-Das, organized by the *Belz Ḥasidim in Galicia, and the tsaddiqim of Hungary in the battle against Reform. Varieties of Hasidism continued to grow and flourish, such as the intellectualist camp of Polish Hasidism, defined by the elitist circles of Przysucha and Kotsk and their later offshoots in Ger and *Izbica. The Ḥasidim of Zhidachov and Komarno made an attempt to appropriate kabbalistic learning that earlier Ḥasidim had ignored.

1882–1945. This was the period of Hasidism's decline and near obliteration. The pogroms of 1881 and the following years, economic changes, and finally war destroyed the shtetl, which had been the natural home of Hasidic piety. Immigration to the West as well as urbanization, industrialization, and secularization within eastern Europe placed masses of Jews in new and unfamiliar situations. New ideologies, including those of organized labor, socialist idealism, and Zionism spoke to the children of Ḥasidim more powerfully than did the rebbeis. Still, there remained some important and creative figures on the Hasidic scene, particularly in Poland; for example, R. Yehudah Leib Alter of Ger (1847–1904) and R. *Tsadoq ha-Kohen of Lublin (1823–1900). Developments following World War I, including the pogroms in the Ukraine, and the establishment of Soviet rule, had destructive effects on Hasidic life. During the interwar period, much of the remaining energy within the movement was focused on politics, centering on *Agudat Israel in Poland and on opposition to Zionism both in Europe and in Erets Yisra'el, where Hasidism had established an important presence. The Holocaust destroyed the remains of Hasidism almost completely, including thousands of Hasidic masters and their faithful disciples.

1946–Present. The few "brands plucked from the fire" of Hasidic life, as they called themselves, began to reorganize immediately after the war. Hasidic writings were published in the displaced-persons camps as early as 1946. Attempts were made to explain the calamity, with blame often assigned to assimilated Jewry, religious reform, or Zionism. Hungarian Ḥasidim, whose survival rate was somewhat higher than elsewhere, organized around R. Yo'el Teitelbaum (1888–1979) of *Satmar, who by 1947 had reestablished his court in the Williamsburg section of Brooklyn, New York, and had begun a vast private social service network for the rescue and resettlement of his followers. Rabbi Yo'el's preaching and writing continued the extreme anti-Zionism and uncompromising ultra-Orthodoxy of prewar Hungary, now taking the form of controversial active opposition to the Jewish state. Lubavitch Hasidism, established in the United States in 1940 by R. Yosef Yitsḥaq Schneersohn, began to create a far-flung educational system that included many thousands of Jews not from Lubavitch homes, some of whom joined the fast-growing movement. Under the leadership of R. Menaḥem Mendel Schneerson, beginning in 1950, Lubavitch became a tremendous international movement, reaching out to all Jews and seeking to make them more observant and committed to traditional Jewish life. In the last years of R. Menaḥem Mendel's life, there was an outburst of messianic fervor in Lubavitch Hasidism, many claiming that the rebbe himself was about to be revealed as the Messiah. The Lubavitch movement was denounced in other Orthodox circles. In the postwar period other Hasidic groups achieved prominence: Bobov, reorganized in Brooklyn by R. Shelomoh Halberstam; Belz and Ger, both centered in Jerusalem; and *Vizhnitz, centered in Bene Beraq. The Hasidic community has grown significantly in recent decades and has attracted outsiders, not a few of Sephardi descent, as well as some Jews from nonobservant backgrounds (see BA'AL TESHUVAH). At the same time, *Neo-Hasidism, in its various manifestations, has brought aspects of the Hasidic heritage to many who live outside the Hasidic world.

Hasidic Literature. Hasidism was not initially a literary movement, and its teachings were spread first by word of mouth rather than by writing. Nevertheless, perhaps as many as ten thousand works have been published, from the first book in 1780 to the present. Hasidic literature may be divided into three types, each of which has its origins in the early oral teachings of the masters.

Teachings and homilies are the classic holy books, most of which take the form of homilies on the weekly Torah portions, passages from Psalms and the Five Scrolls, and selected Talmudic legends. The first to be published was Toledot Ya'aqov Yosef by R. Ya'aqov Yosef ha-Kohen of Polonnoye. Many collections of homilies were published posthumously by students or descendants after their masters' deaths. Though the homilies were always delivered in Yiddish, they were published in Hebrew, based on notes written by the master or summaries written by students. A small group were originally written as books in Hebrew and not culled from oral sermons. Classic among these is the Tanya by *Shneur Zalman of Lyady. The Habad school also is the source of many such writings.

From its earliest period, Hasidism cultivated the oral tale as an important vehicle for conveying its teachings. The Ba'al Shem Tov himself was a master storyteller, and the desire of Hasidism to bring its message to the uneducated masses of Ukrainian Jewry made this vessel a natural one. The body of Hasidic tales includes original stories, many based on actual events or conversations between masters and disciples; reworkings of older Jewish tales, now placed in a Hasidic setting; and tales based on folk motifs. The first printed collection of these tales is Shivhei ha-Besht*, published in Kopyś in 1814. Many of the most important collections were published only after 1900; their late publication dates as well as their fantastic content have led to much controversy among scholars as to their historical reliability.

Counsels, ethical wills, and spiritual "recipes," sometimes published as discreet units and sometimes appended to more formal teachings or tales, contain some of the most powerful Hasidic statements. Prayer, inward devotion, and the constant service of God are among their key themes.

HASKALAH (הַשְׂקָלָה; Enlightenment), movement among the Jews of central and eastern Europe in the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries to acquire modern European culture and secular knowledge. The Haskalah opposed the dominance of rabbinic Orthodoxy in Jewish life and culture and the restriction of education to Talmudic studies. Spreading eastward from Berlin (see MENDELSSOHN, MOSES), the Haskalah shared many of the values of the European Enlightenment and attempted to steer a middle course between unbending Orthodoxy and radical *assimilation. Through an emphasis on the importance of pure (Biblical) Hebrew as a literary medium, the Haskalah hoped to foster a specifically Jewish cultural consciousness. The character of Haskalah activity differed in various countries (Germany, Russia, Galicia, Lithuania). In eastern Europe, the Haskalah was tantamount to westernization, and its efforts to substitute modern schools for the traditional heder were violently resisted by the Orthodox; Haskalah writers in Galicia countered with bitter satires, attacking the obscurantism, fanaticism, and superstitions of the Hasidim and the Talmudists (for example, Isaac Erter's satire Mo'znei Mishqal), but these writers also advanced historical research considerably in their scholarly periodicals (Bikkurei ha-'Ittim, 1820–1831; He-Ḥaluts, 1852–1889; Kerem Ḥemed, 1853–1857). To counteract excessive devotion to the Talmud and rabbinic theology, secular schools were founded and new pedagogic manuals of instructions written (by Hartwig Wessely in Berlin and Naphtali Herz Homberg in Galicia). Their severe rationalism notwithstanding, the Maskilim (proponents of the Haskalah) were animated by a romantic desire to return to nature (Y. L. Gordon) and by a high regard for manual labor (schools of arts and crafts were opened at Tarnopol in 1819 and in Odessa in 1826). Maskilim advocated an esthetic reform of the synagogue service and in literature exhibited both a particular interest in ancient heroes (Saul, Samson) and an inclination to romanticism and hedonism (translations of the pastoral poetry of Haller, Gessner, Kleist as well as verses in honor of wine, women, and love appeared in Me'assef, the first literary periodical [1784–1811] of the Maskilim). The opponents of the Haskalah feared that the movement would lead to the diminishment of historical Judaism; that it had too little regard for Jewish sentiment, tradition, and piety; and that its critical scholarship would undermine Orthodoxy and serve the purposes of Reform. By the end of the nineteenth century, the Haskalah had run its course. Some of its ideas and achievements were firmly established; others, however, became anachronisms. On the one hand, full cultural emancipation rendered a Hebrew Haskalah unrealistic; on the other hand, it became obvious that social emancipation had failed and that cultural reform would not stem the rising tide of antisemitism. Writers began to denounce the Haskalah as a betrayal of Jewish identity, but the growing awareness of Jewish nationhood as expressed in *Zionism was in many ways a result of the influence of the Haskalah, which had created a secular middle class faithful to historic tradition and Hebrew culture, yet alive to Western ideas.

HASMONEANS, family name of the Hasmonean, or Maccabean, priestly dynasty. The Hasmonean name came to the fore when Mattathias, the elderly priest, escalated the revolt against the Seleucid ruler of Syria, *Antiochus IV Epiphanes, in 166 BCE. Upon the death of Mattathias, the revolt was led by his son, *Judah the Maccabee, who succeeded in capturing parts of Jerusalem and purifying the Temple. When Judah died in battle in 161 BCE, his brother Jonathan assumed the leadership of the anti-Seleucid forces, and proved an able military and political leader, utilizing conflicts within the Seleucid court in Antioch to enhance his power in Judah. In addition to his military position, Jonathan was appointed, in 152 BCE, high priest of the Jerusalem Temple, a post that seemed to have remained vacant since the death of *Alcimus, some seven years earlier. In 143 BCE, Jonathan was murdered by his opponents, and his place was assumed by his brother Simon. Simon's political maneuvers soon brought further gains, and Judah was exempted from paying tribute to the Seleucids, a de facto recognition of the Jews' independence. Simon continued to make military conquests in the regions around Judah and dislodged Seleucid supporters from their last stronghold in Jerusalem. Simon was succeeded in 135 BCE by his son John Hyrcanus I, who embarked upon further territorial conquests, forcing the non-Jewish populations of the conquered regions to adopt the Jewish way of life and destroying the Samaritan temple on Mount Gerizim. Hyrcanus was the first Hasmonean to issue coinage, a sign of full political independence, and his son Aristobulus I (died 103 CE), was the first to declare himself not only a high priest and head of the Jewish nation but also king. Upon Aristobulus's death, his powers were assumed by his brother Alexander Yannai (died 76 BCE), whose reign saw not only the expansion of the Hasmonean kingdom to its largest extent ever but also the eruption of a full-scale civil war between Yannai and his numerous opponents, who objected to his rule for religious, moral, and economic reasons. Following Yannai's death, his wife, Salome Alexandra, ruled, and her own death, in 67 BCE, brought about a fierce struggle between their two sons, Aristobulus II and Hyrcanus II, which ended in the conquest of Judah by the Romans (63 BCE). The period from 40 to 37 saw the brief reign of the Hasmonean Antigonus II, son of Aristobulus II, but Herod, having been nominated by the Roman king of Judaea (as the province was now called), soon took charge of his realm and eventually destroyed the remnants of the Hasmonean dynasty.

The Hasmonean period was a formative one in Jewish history. What began as a rebellion against the anti-Jewish measures of a Seleucid king soon turned into a war for political independence, and the war for independence led to the establishment of an expansionist Jewish state. Moreover, this period witnessed several major socio-religious developments: the transfer of high priestly power from its hereditary holders, the sons of Zadok, to a previously obscure priestly family, the Hasmoneans; the rapid Hellenization of the very dynasty whose forefathers had fought against the Jewish Hellenizers; and the forced conversions of the non-Jewish populations of Erets Yisra'el and their partial incorporation into Jewish society. Jewish independence brought with it much internal strife, and the Hasmonean period saw recurrent inner Jewish conflicts and massacres, as well as the emergence of the three main Jewish sects—the *Saducees, *Pharisees, and *Essenes—sects that remained active on the Jewish scene long after the Hasmonean dynasty had ceased to exist.

HASSAGAT GEVUL (הַסָּגַת גְּבוּל; overstepping of bounds), prohibition against encroachment on another's land or upon other economic and property rights.

The biblical prohibition is derived from the verse "You shall not remove your neighbor's landmark, which they of old time have set, in your inheritance which you shall inherit, in the land that the Lord your God gives you to possess" (Dt. 19.14). It applies to the fraudulent removal of boundary markers dividing adjoining parcels of land in Erets Yisra'el with the intent of enlarging one's own parcel by encroaching upon that of a neighbor. While such improper conduct would constitute a transgression of the more general prohibition against theft even in the absence of the concept of hassagat gevul, the sages interpreted the above verse as imposing an additional, particular prohibition intended to preserve the integrity of land ownership in Erets Yisra'el.

The reference to landmarks "which they of old time have set" was understood to mean that the prohibition was applicable not only to boundaries between individual parcels but also to boundaries between the territories of the various tribes of Israel: any readjustment of the boundaries between the tribes not in accord with the boundaries fixed by Joshua would be prohibited.

With the transitions that took place in the late Talmudic and post-Talmudic social and economic environment from an agrarian, land-based economy to a commercial, capital-based economy, in which income-producing opportunities for Jews were severely restricted, the rabbis expanded the prohibition to encompass other forms of improper economic encroachments. While Talmudic sources defended the overriding principles of free enterprise against attempts to impose protectionist restraints upon free competition (as evidenced by rulings such as that of R. Huna' [B. B. 21b] that an artisan already operating in a particular courtyard could not prevent the entry of an additional artisan into the courtyard, even though such competition would certainly impact negatively upon his income), the codes adopt a more receptive approach to such restraints, in areas that were considered particularly worthy of protection. These included monopolies purchased from the authorities at considerable expense; the employment contracts of teachers, rabbis, and ritual slaughterers; residential leases; and copyright.

HASSAGOT (חֲסָאוֹת; criticisms), a genre of Jewish literature in which one author criticizes the work of another. Hassagot are generally directed to Jewish legal codes, although some critique writings on Jewish beliefs and philosophy.

Jewish legal codes claim to state the normative law that, theoretically, should apply to all observant Jews wherever they may live. In fact, Jewish communities in different locales often had their own regional practices and authorities. When a code ruled against these, hassagot were often written in defense of local tradition. Sometimes the code's format itself was the source of criticism. This was especially true in the case of Maimonides' Mishneh Torah. Maimonides consciously omitted the sources of the legal decisions in his code. This generated the heated criticism of Avraham ben David of Posquières, who stated that failure to provide such sources meant that no one could determine the accuracy or authority of Maimonides' views. He went on to point out what he considered flawed decisions throughout Maimonides' code. He is, therefore, called Ba'al ha-Hassagot (Master of Criticisms).

Other famous hassagot are those of R. Zerahyah ben Yitsḥaq ha-Levi Gerondi on Yitsḥaq Alfasi's code and Nahmanides' critique of Maimonides' Sefer ha-Mitsvot.

HATAN TORAH AND HATAN BE-RE'SHIT (חֲתָן תּוֹרָה; חֲתָן בְּרֵאשִׁית; bridegroom of the Torah and bridegroom of Genesis), titles of honor accorded two members of the congregation during the synagogue service on *Simḥat Torah (which in Israel coincides with *Shemini 'Atseret). At this service, the annual cycle of the reading of the Pentateuch is concluded and a new one immediately begun. The person called up to the reading of the last section of Deuteronomy (33.27–34.12) is called the hatan Torah, the person who is called up to the reading of the first section of Genesis (1.1–2.3) is called the hatan Be-Re'shit. Until the Middle Ages, one person read the two sections from a single scroll (as is still the Yemenite custom); today the portions of the two "bridegrooms" are read from separate scrolls. At one time the coveted honors of bridegroom were bestowed upon the rabbi and parnas*, but now any worthy congregant may be honored (and in some congregations, women may be honored as kallot ha-Torah [brides of the Torah]). In certain places (such as Italy), the "bridegrooms" would be conducted to the synagogue to the accompaniment of flares and an orchestra, while in some Sephardi synagogues, the "bridegrooms" sit on special chairs of honor. In Sephardi congregations in England and the United States, the choice was made by election; the exposure involved sometimes made the chosen "bridegrooms" refuse the honor, for which they might be fined by the synagogue elders. The two "bridegrooms" usually entertain the congregation in celebration of the occasion.

HATIMAH (חֲטִימָה; sealing). *Benedictions begin either with the petiḥah, the full benediction formula, which includes the divine name and the affirmation of the divine kingship: "Blessed are You, O Lord our God, Sovereign of the universe"; or they begin with the hatimah, a shortened formula: "Blessed are You, O Lord." Both formulas then conclude with the mention of the activity for which the deity is being praised or thanked. The hatimah is derived from Psalms 119.12; the petiḥah is ascribed by the Talmud to the Men of the Keneset ha-Gedolah. Often prayers open with the petiḥah and conclude with the hatimah, which summarizes the content of the prayer. Sometimes the petiḥah is omitted.

HATRA'AH. See WARNING.

HATRED. The Bible commands "You shall not hate your brother in your heart" (Lev. 19.17). Any hostile feeling amounts to hatred. Hatred of evildoers or of the enemies of God, which often finds eloquent expression in the Bible (e.g., Ps. 139.21–22), is considerably toned down by the rabbis, who emphasize the duty of hating not the sinner but the sin; hence the ideal course is to prevail upon the evildoer to repent. Groundless hatred is considered by the rabbis to be the greatest of all social vices. "The First Temple is said to have been destroyed because of the commission of the three cardinal sins of Judaism—idolatry, immorality, and murder—but the Second Temple because of the prevalence of groundless hatred" (Yoma 9b). Hatred will ruin one's life (Avot 2.16) and is even equated with murder (Derekh Erets Rabbah 11).

HAVDALAH (הַבְּדִילָה; Differentiation [Between the Holy and Secular]), prayer recited at mo'tsa'ei (conclusion) Shabbat and festivals to indicate the distinction between the sacred day that has ended and the weekday that is beginning. Havdalah corresponds to *Qiddush, which proclaims the sanctity of the Sabbath day at its beginning. According to halakhah, no work should be done and no food consumed after nightfall until Havdalah has been recited. One form of Havdalah is incorporated as part of the fourth benediction of the *Amidah of Ma'ariv; but Havdalah is recited again over a cup of wine (or, in its absence, over another liquid) as a separate benediction at the end of the Ma'ariv service and then at home (it is unclear whether Havdalah originated in the home or the synagogue). According to the Talmud, Havdalah was instituted by the Men of the *Keneset ha-Gedolah, but scholars have suggested that it was initiated as part of dining practices in the Greco-Roman period (Ber. 33b). The prayer enumerates the differences between "holy and profane," between "light and darkness," between "Israel and the gentiles," and between the Sabbath and the weekdays. As part of the ceremony, it is customary also to recite a benediction over *spices (in a special spice box) and over the light of a candle (Ber. 8.5–6, 52a). If a festival follows directly upon the Sabbath, a special form of Havdalah is combined with the Qiddush (see YAQNEHAZ). In several versions of the Havdalah service *Elijah is mentioned prominently; according to a belief that originated after the Crusades, Elijah's advent as harbinger of the Messiah (see Mal. 3.23) would occur on a Saturday evening after the conclusion of the Sabbath. In certain communities, such as Morocco and Syria, participants would place drops of wine from the cup over which Havdalah was recited on the backs of their necks and in their pockets for good luck in the coming week.

HAVER (חָוֵר; companion), term or title used to denote a scholar or pious man. A disciple who reached a standard of scholarship almost equal to that of his master was referred to as a talmid haver (Ber. 27b). During the Second Temple era, the term was bestowed upon members of a Pharisaic association that observed the Levitical rules prescribed for the handling of sacred food and that was punctilious in the matter of tithes and ritual purity; the opposite of haver in this context is am ha-'arets*. In amoraic times, haver became synonymous with talmid hakham* (B. B. 75a). In Babylonia the title haver was given to each of three rabbis who sat in the front row of sages in the academy, but at the end of the geonic period the title was extended to sages outside the academy; the title was also given to scholars in the Arabic-speaking world. In the sixteenth century the title haver was conferred upon young scholars. According to R. Mosheh Sofer (1762–1839), it was customary in Germany to confer the title haver on learned individuals who were not ordained rabbis. He states that in Moravia, however, a rabbi with fewer than ten students in his college could not confer the title of haver without the permission of his district rabbi. In eastern Europe, outstanding scholars were called haver and entitled to special privileges. The conferment of the title haver was in vogue in Germany up to the 1930s and is still in use in various communities of German Jews in the United States.

HAVURAH (חֲבוּרָה; company or society), a small group of Jews who meet together in religious fellowship. The concept originated in Second Temple times among Pharisees and Essenes. In the United States in the late 1960s havurot arose as gatherings for worship, study, and fellowship. Havurot initially served as alternatives to the established Jewish modes of worship in America and came about in reaction to what their members conceived of as the formal, cold, unegalitarian atmosphere of synagogues at the time. Havurot Shalom, the first havurah, was founded in Somerville, Massachusetts, in 1968; among its founders were Zalman Schachter, a leader in the Renewal movement, of which the havurah was one manifestation, and Arthur Green, who later served as president of the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College. The second havurah was started in New York in 1970. Other havurot soon emerged in other cities, usually in university communities. The havurot did not employ rabbis; they emphasized equality of participants, experimented in worship, and strove toward spirituality and meaning in Jewish practice. In the 1980s havurot entered the mainstream. Hundreds of havurot were established throughout the United States and other countries. Many of them are not intended for worship but rather for study and socializing and often operate in conjunction with established synagogues. The rise of havurot was part of a larger movement of revival within American Judaism that manifested, among other things, a quest for more knowledge of Judaism as well as for experiencing the spiritual dimensions of religious life.

HAYON, NEHEMYAH (c.1655–1730), kabbalist with strong Shabbatean tendencies. A descendant of a Sephardi family from Bosnia, Hayon was born in Sarajevo and brought up in Jerusalem, and he later traveled in the Balkans and Italy. Having received the pamphlet Raza' Mehemanuta (The Secret of Faith) attributed to *Shabbetai Tsevi, he changed its name to Mehemanuta' de-Khula (The Secret of All), on which he wrote his commentary Oz le-Elohim (Berlin, 1713). Hayon criticized both Avraham *Cohen de Herrera and Avraham Miguel Cardoso (see CARDOSO FAMILY) for their metaphorical interpretations of Yitsḥaq Luria's doctrine of tsimtsum (contraction), accusing them of introducing Platonic concepts into Lurianic Kabbalah. Hayon's doctrine concerning the three partsufim (faces) of the deity was adjudged by his opponents to be Shabbatean. In Amsterdam he at first enjoyed the patronage of the Sephardi hakham Shelomoh ben Ya'aqov *Ayllon (who was also accused of being a Shabbatean) but was persecuted by Tsevi Hirsch *Ashkenazi, the rabbi of the Ashkenazi congregation. The controversy developed into an Ashkenazi-Sephardi dispute, in which other communities (London, Leghorn, Hamburg, Smyrna, and Constantinople) became involved. Finally losing Ayllon's support, Hayon was forced to leave for North Africa, where he wandered for the rest of his life.

HAYYAT, YEHUDAH (c.1450–1510), a leading kabbalist in the age of the expulsion of the Jews from Spain, when the Kabbalah ceased to be studied only in closed, esoteric circles and became a central component of Jewish culture. Hayyat's best-known work is Minhat Yehudah, which is a commentary on Ma'arekhet ha-'Elohut*. It was printed, together with the text, in Ferrara in 1557, and again in Mantua in 1558. Hayyat wrote the commentary at the request of R. Yosef Ya'beth, one of the leaders of Spanish Jewry, who settled in Italy after the expulsion and wrote treatises indicating his belief in imminent messianic redemption. Hayyat's system is based on the Zohar and the teachings of R. Menahem Recanati. Reflecting the ideological norms of the age of the expulsion, Hayyat opposes philosophical presentations of Judaism, and his long quotations from the Zohar present a concept of Jewish theosophy that is intended to replace medieval rationalism. Ma'arekhet ha-'Elohut with Hayyat's commentary became one in the minds of many readers, and together they influenced subsequent kabbalists, as well as nonkabbalists who used the work as a source for the basic concepts of the Kabbalah.

HAYYIM AL-HAKHAM. See YOSEF HAYYIM BEN ELIYAHU AL-HAKHAM.

HAYYIM BEN BETSAL'EL (c.1520–1588), Talmudic scholar, halakhist, and grammarian. He was born in Poznań and was the older brother of R. *Yehudah Liva' ben Betsal'el. He studied with R. Yitshaq ha-Sefardi, who greatly influenced him, with R. Shelomoh Luria, with R. Shalom Shakna of Lublin, and with R. Mosheh Isserles, and he served as rabbi of Worms and Friedberg.

His best-known work, Vikkuah Mayim Hayyim (Amsterdam, 1712), contains a strong critique of the writings of both R. Yosef Karo and R. Mosheh Isserles. The former claimed (in the introduction to his Beit Yosef) that he was not great enough to decide between the earlier authorities but then proceeded to do just that. Rabbi Hayyim criticized Isserles's Torat Hattat (which dealt with the dietary laws) for unintentionally leading people astray, maintaining that it should have been restricted to the use of qualified scholars (a strategy that he had apparently adopted himself in regard to a similar kind of work that he had written). He also chided Isserles for not sufficiently delineating the weight of German custom, which was particularly authoritative; for introducing a new category of leniency; and for setting aside well-based legal practices in favor of custom.

Rabbi Hayyim composed a work on Jewish ethics entitled Sefer ha-Hayyim (Kraków, 1593) and a work on Hebrew grammar called 'Ets Hayyim. In a comment, which accords with his brother's views, R. Hayyim attributes the relative neglect of the study of Hebrew grammar to the fact that even the most pious Ashkenazi scholars confined themselves to the study of the Talmud. Like his brother, R. Hayyim wrote a supercommentary, Be'er Mayim Hayyim, on Rashi's commentary to the Torah. His ethical works were popular in Hasidic circles.

HAYYIM BEN YITSHAQ OF VIENNA (13th cent.), rabbinic scholar, tosafist, and legal authority; son of *Yitshaq ben Mosheh of Vienna. He is often referred to as R. Hayyim Or Zaru'a after his father's well-known halakhic work. Rabbi Hayyim composed an abridged version of that work entitled Qitsur Or Zaru'a or Simmanei Or Zaru'a. He studied with R. Me'ir ben Barukh of Rothenburg and later with R. Asher ben Yehi'el. He lived in several German cities, including Regensburg, Neustadt, and Cologne. A collection of his responsa (Leipzig, 1865) has survived. In it, he describes aspects of the curriculum and travel practices of yeshivah students in his day. He based his legal decisions on the teachings of leading rabbinic scholars in northern France and Germany. Rabbi Hayyim also composed homilies on the halakhic regulations of festivals.

HAZAL (חֲזָ"ל), word formed by the initials of the phrase hakameinu zikhronam li-verakhah, "our sages of blessed memory." Like razal (rabboteinu zikhronam li-verakhah, "our masters of blessed memory"), it refers to the teachers of the Talmudic period.

HAZAQ (חֲזָק; "Be strong!"), exclamation (usually hazaq hazaq ve-nithazzeq, "be strong and encouraged!") made by the congregation to the reader at the completion of the synagogal reading of the Torah; to someone for a successful achievement; and among Ashkenazim, to a bar mitsvah* after his reading of the haftarah*. The term hazaq was inspired by the congratulation hazaq ve'emats, "be strong and courageous," found in Deuteronomy 31.7, 23, and Joshua 1.6–9. Sephardim and Eastern Jews congratulate one who has performed a mitsvah* in the synagogue with the phrase hazaq u-varukh, "be strong and blessed."

HAZAQAH (חֲזָקָה; taking hold), the presumptive right of one in possession of property to retain ownership until such right is disproved (usucapion). Hazaqah is an important principle of Jewish law and is one of the bases for the Jewish legal theory of ownership and possession as well as personal and ritual status. The state of a thing or person as it is known to have last existed forms the presumption in law for all questions involving present status. For example, the undisturbed possession of land for a period of three years creates the presumption of a legal title. The transfer of land is effected by means of an act of *acquisition (qinyan), also called hazaqah. In the course of time, the right of hazaqah had many applications in Jewish law, such as the right to a certain seat in a synagogue. In Italy, the term jus gazaga (from Latin jus [law], and hazaqah) was applied during the ghetto period to the rights of Jewish tenants in houses they were not permitted to own. Throughout the ages, the rabbis have been stringent in their rulings concerning hazaqah to protect internal communal order and to regulate relations with non-Jews.

HAZZAN, YISRA'EL MOSHEH (1807–1863), rabbinical authority. Born in İzmir, he was taken in 1811 by his father to Jerusalem, where he studied in the yeshivah of his grandfather, the noted scholar Yosef Refa'el Hazzan. He soon won a reputation for his scholarship and eventually became a member of the beit din of R. Ya'akov Finzi. However, he became involved in disagreements with Finzi, which was one of the reasons he was sent abroad on missions to Sephardi communities in western Europe (spending some time in London, where he wrote against the Reform movement) and North America. From 1847 to 1862, he served as av beit din in Rome, Corfu, and Alexandria. His interests included philosophy and the works of the geonic period. Hazzan strongly opposed stringent practices and decisions that were unsupported in the Bible and rabbinic literature. In his various community appointments, he emphasized the importance of the Hebrew language.

HEALTH. The Talmud derives the obligation to preserve one's health from the biblical mandate "to take heed and preserve your soul" (Dt. 4.9). A number of unhygienic and dangerous activities, including the drinking of contaminated water and entering unsafe buildings, are proscribed on the basis of this mandate (Maimonides, Hilkhot Rotseah 12.4–15). It is, however, permitted to engage in dangerous activities for the sake of earning a living (B. M. 112a). The biblical verse "And you shall keep my statutes and judgments which a man will do and live by them" (Lv. 18.5) is the source for the principle that the preservation of life overrides the performance of the mitsvot (Yoma 85b). Hence, it is forbidden to desist from a lifesaving activity on the grounds that it involves a breach of Jewish law, with the exception of the three cardinal offenses of homicide, idolatry, and forbidden sexual relations (San. 4a). In all other cases, the saving of life takes precedence over the mitsvot, and an individual who insists on fasting on Yom Kippur against medical advice or refuses vital medical therapy on the Sabbath is considered a "pious fool," whose deeds are without any religious merit. Indeed, it is permitted to force an individual to receive lifesaving medical therapy, provided that it is not medically uncertain, highly risky, or unlikely to be of any benefit if administered in a coercive manner. Many biblical and Talmudic laws deal directly with the preservation of life and health, for example, isolation of lepers and quarantine (Lv. 12–15); military hygiene (Dt. 23.10–15); bodily cleanliness (A. Z. 20b); and exercise (Ket. 111a). Other laws are commonly understood as measures designed in part to enhance health. Thus, the separation imposed by the laws of niddah ensures that a woman has fully recovered from her menstruation and regained her vitality before renewing intercourse. Circumcision, observance of the dietary laws, washing the hands before meals, various ablutions and instructions regarding personal habits, as well as a general insistence upon moderation in all things were seen as contributing to the physical well-being of those who performed them. The rabbis legislated in the area of public health and imposed restrictions upon building and the raising of certain types of livestock in order to protect the health of the community. Under Talmudic law, "matters prohibited because of danger to life and health are treated more stringently than things merely forbidden by the law" (Hul. 10a). Modern issues such as smoking and drug abuse figure in the contemporary halakhic literature on the preservation of health, and mental health is taken into account in decisions on matters ranging from abortion to plastic surgery.

HEART (Heb. lev), a word used frequently in a figurative sense in scriptures; rarely does it refer to the bodily organ (2 Sm. 18.14). Lev may mean good cheer (Ps. 22.27); may be the site of the feeling of fear (Ps. 27.3) or courage (Ez. 22.14); or it may be considered the organ of thought (Jer. 3.16) or memory (Ps. 31.13). It is thus a collective concept for the human condition and character. When Saul is anointed ruler, he is said to receive another heart so that he can carry out his duties (1 Sm. 10.9). An individual in want, distress, or burdened with guilt is spoken of as having a broken heart healed by God. In rabbinic thought, the heart is also the organ to which all the manifestations of reason and emotion are ascribed. In Ecclesiastes Rabbah 1.16 there is an extensive catalog of all aspects of the heart's activities, both positive and negative: "the heart rejoices, the heart weeps, the heart loves, the heart hates (cf. Pesiqta' de-Rav Kahana 16). HEAVEN (Heb. shamayim), the upper region of the universe according to traditional *cosmology. "In the beginning the Lord created the heavens and the earth" (Gn. 1.1), but "the heavens are the heavens of the Lord and the earth he has given to the sons of man" (Ps. 115.16). Heaven is thus the abode of God and the celestial beings, while man has been given the earth for his habitation. The only specific mention made in the Bible of an ascension to heaven is that of Elijah (2 Kgs. 2.11); otherwise the Bible is geocentric in its outlook. During the Second Temple and Talmudic periods, the idea developed of heaven as the abode of the righteous after death. Not infrequently descriptions of this heaven of the souls are influenced by descriptions of the post-messianic, eschatological "world to come" (see 'OLAM HA-ZEH AND 'OLAM HA-BA'), but ultimately the celestial abode of the souls was identified with the heavenly garden of *Eden (or *paradise). Later Midrashic and kabbalistic literature depicted in great detail the life of the righteous in heaven, which has always been the popular symbol of immortality. Modernist thinking (including Reform theology) tends to the philosophical view that heaven refers to a spiritual state rather than a specific place. See also AFTERLIFE.

HEAVE OFFERING. See TERUMAH.

HEBREW LANGUAGE (Heb. 'Ivrit), a branch of the Canaanite group of Semitic languages, possibly adopted by the Israelites after their settlement in Erets Yisra'el. The designation Hebrew for the language is late, and in biblical times the language was known as Yehudit ([Jewish] 2 Kgs. 18.26). Different forms of Hebrew developed at various periods (Biblical Hebrew, Mishnaic Hebrew, etc.), and the language, even when used for liturgical and literary purposes only, continually absorbed outside influences, particularly from vernaculars currently in use among Jews (Aramaic, Greek, Arabic, etc.). As the language in which the Bible was written, Hebrew became for the rabbis leshon ha-qodesh (the holy tongue) and is commonly known by this name in rabbinic literature, which is often extravagant in its praise of the language

(for example, Hebrew is "the language spoken by the angels," Hag. 16a). Many rabbinic statements on the importance of teaching Hebrew as a language (for example, "When the child begins to speak, his father should speak to him in the holy tongue . . . and if he does not speak to him in the holy tongue . . . it is as though he had buried him," Sifrei on Dt. "Ekev" 46; or, "He who dwells in the Land of Israel permanently, eats his food in a state of ritual purity, speaks in the holy tongue, and reads the Shema' morning and evening is certain of the life of the World to Come," Y., Shab. 1) were clearly meant to counteract tendencies to neglect Hebrew in favor of the current vernacular. To the rabbis, the language was invested with a special sanctity. As a result, the tendency developed, especially during the Middle Ages, to confine its use to sacred purposes, such as prayer, study, or correspondence of a religious nature. This tendency manifested itself again in the bitter opposition of some religious elements in Erets Yisra'el to the activities of Eli'ezer Ben-Yehudah (1858–1922), whose aim was to make Hebrew the vehicle of ordinary communication. The value of Hebrew was further enhanced by certain Midrashic and mystical traditions, as a result of which a mystical theology of the Hebrew language developed and proved of great importance in kabbalistic speculation and practice (see ALPHABET, HEBREW). Although Hebrew continued to be used by medieval Jewry and, indeed, served as the Jewish lingua franca, significant differences in the attitude to the language developed among different groups. Medieval Spanish Jews preferred Arabic not only for oral communication but also for philosophical, theological, and at times even halakhic writing; Hebrew served as a purely literary medium, mostly for poetry, and Spanish writers insisted on purity of diction and rigid adherence to the forms and syntax of classical Biblical Hebrew and grammar, opposing innovations and the introduction of post-biblical terms. The Franco-German scholars, on the other hand, were never averse to allowing Mishnaic Hebrew and even Aramaic into their vocabulary and regarded Hebrew as the sole medium for written communication and literature. Hebrew became established as the only language acceptable for liturgical purposes, although Talmudic law (Sot. 7.1) explicitly permits the use of the vernacular for prayer (including the Shema' and the 'Amidah). In modern times the vernacular has reappeared in the synagogue both for the sermon and, to greater or lesser degrees, in Reform and Conservative services. Under the impact of Ben-Yehudah and others, Hebrew became the language of the yishuv (the modern Jewish community in Erets Yisra'el) and of the State of Israel. Since the time of the *Haskalah, Hebrew has been the language of a secular literature. It is widely studied as a living language in the Diaspora, and only a small group of Haredim refuse to use it for everyday speech because of its holiness. Variant pronunciations of Hebrew developed regionally. Yemenite pronunciations (they pronounce the letter vav as "w" and taf as "th") are probably the closest to the spoken Hebrew of Bible times. Sharp differences can be distinguished between the Hebrew of the Ashkenazim and the Hebrew of the Sephardim. In modern Erets Yisra'el, the Sephardi pronunciation was adopted as standard, and, as a result, some Ashkenazi synagogues in the West now pray using Sephardi pronunciation.

HEBREWS (Heb. Ivrim), term describing the children of Israel, used when the Israelites refer to themselves when addressing others (e.g., Jon. 1.9), when others refer to the Israelites (e.g. Gn. 39.14, 17), and when the Israelites are differentiated from other ethnic groups (e.g., Gn. 14.13; Ex. 2.11). Some have derived the origin of the name from Eber, the grandson of Shem, one of the ancestors of Abraham, while others trace it to the Hebrew word 'ever (the other side), referring to the district on the other side of the Jordan or, perhaps, the Euphrates. It also has been suggested that the term is connected with the diverse group of people with an inferior social status known throughout the ancient Near East in the second millennium BCE as the Hab(p)iru or 'Apiru. Although Israelite and, later, Jew* became the usual terms, in popular parlance Jews are still sometimes referred to as Hebrews.

HEBREW THEOLOGICAL COLLEGE, educational institution located in Skokie, Illinois. It was founded in 1921 and serves over five hundred students. The College offers academic and professional educational programs to advance scholarship in Jewish law and culture in accordance with the principles of Orthodox Judaism. Bet Midrash students focus on intensive Talmud study as well as courses in Bible, Jewish history, Jewish philosophy, and Hebrew. The Anne M. Blitstein Institute for Women similarly provides opportunities for women to develop advanced skills as Jewish scholars. Hebrew Theological College also offers courses in the liberal arts and sciences, allowing students to combine their Jewish studies with a general education leading to a bachelor's degree in Judaic studies. Rabbinic ordination and professional certification in selected areas are options for qualified students.

HEBREW UNION COLLEGE-JEWISH INSTITUTE OF RELIGION, Reform religious seminary with campuses in Cincinnati, New York, Los Angeles, and Jerusalem. Hebrew Union College (HUC) was founded in 1875 by Isaac Mayer *Wise in the basement of a Cincinnati temple with a student body of fourteen. By 1881 a building had been acquired, but expansion was rapid, and in 1913 an eighteen-acre campus was dedicated. A dormitory was opened in 1924; the library building in 1931 (both of these were largely expanded in the 1960s; a manuscripts and rare books wing was added to the library). In 1988 the campus was further expanded by the addition of a conference hall and museum exhibit space.

In New York City, independent of HUC, Stephen S. *Wise, established another Reform rabbinical seminary, in 1922, the Jewish Institute of Religion (JIR). Situated on West 68th Street, it adjoined Wise's Free Synagogue. In 1950, the year after Wise's death, HUC and JIR merged. A building was constructed in the New York University area and dedicated in 1979.

The post-World War II growth of the Jewish community on the West Coast led to the establishment by HUC in 1947 of a college of Jewish Studies in Los Angeles, and by 1954 a pre-rabbinic program had been inaugurated. A campus was dedicated in 1971.

In Jerusalem, a two-acre site was acquired in 1954, but construction on the property was delayed by various problems, including opposition from Orthodox circles in Israel. The campus was dedicated in 1963. It was made obligatory for rabbinical students on the American campuses to spend a year in Israel. A further two acres were acquired in 1983, and additional buildings erected.

Since its establishment, HUC-JIR has graduated some two thousand rabbis—since the 1970s, many of them women. In recent decades, women have also made up a large proportion of students in the School of Sacred Music, founded in 1948 in New York City, from which almost three hundred cantors have been graduated.

Among the other activities on the campuses are the Schools of Education for the training of educators; the School of Communal Service, on the Los Angeles campus; a School for Graduate Study, for both Jewish and Christian clergy, founded in 1947 in Cincinnati; the School of Biblical Archaeology in Jerusalem; the American Jewish Archives in Cincinnati; and museums and libraries on all campuses.

Wise served as president until 1900. He was succeeded by Moses Mielziner (acting president, 1900–1903), Kauffmann Kohler (1903–1921), Julian Morgenstern (1921–1947), Nelson Glueck (1947–1971), Alfred Gottschalk (1971–1994, Chancellor, 1994), and Sheldon Zimmerman (1995–). See also REFORM JUDAISM.

HEBRON (Heb. Hevron), town, also called Kirjath-arba in the Bible (Jos. 14.15), in the Judean hills, south of Jerusalem; a Levitical city and a city of refuge (Jos. 21.13; 1 Chr. 6.42). Hebron is the place where *Sarah died (Gn. 23.1–2); the cave of *Machpelah was located nearby. Hebron was visited by the spies sent by Moses to the land of Canaan (Nm. 13.22) and given to Caleb son of Jephunneh (Jos. 15.13; Jgs. 1.20). Hebron was David's original royal city, where he was anointed king of Judah (2 Sm. 2.1–4) and, later, king over all Israel (2 Sm. 5.1–3). Around the time of the Babylonian exile, the city was conquered by the Edomites (Idumeans) but in the time of the Hasmoneans it was again Jewish. Thereafter Jewish settlement in the city was continuous for most of the period up to the time of the Crusaders. The cave of Machpelah, which under the Arabs had been a mosque—with an adjoining synagogue—became a church. Jewish settlement was renewed in the thirteenth century although Jews were barred from entering Machpelah until 1967. The Jewish community was small until the Ottoman conquest, when it was augmented by the arrival of refugees from Spain. During subsequent centuries Hebron was a noted spiritual center, with distinguished rabbinical authorities and scholars, many of them influenced by mysticism. In the nineteenth century it became a home to a significant community of *Ḥabad Ḥasidim. In recent centuries Hebron—along with Jerusalem, Safed and Tiberias—has come to be regarded as one of the four *holy cities. In the early twentieth century, distinguished yeshivot were founded there, including in 1925 the *Slobodka Yeshivah from Lithuania. Arab riots in 1929 and 1936 led to the demise of the community. After 1967, a small number of Jews settled in Hebron.

ḤEDER (חֶדֶר; room), name popularly applied to an elementary religious school of the type prevalent in eastern Europe from the seventeenth century until World War II, often situated in a single room in the teacher's house. Education in a heder was limited to males. Similar schools were found in Sephardi and Eastern communities. A frequent Talmudic appellation for school-children, "children of the house of their teacher" (tinot shel bet rabban), suggests that a similar system existed in Talmudic times. Study hours in the heder were long, and the teacher rarely had any pedagogical training. A minor official connected with the system was the belfer (from behelfer [assistant]), who conducted the children from their homes to the heder. Students would study in a heder from as early as three years old until the age of thirteen, at which time those with the ability to continue their studies would proceed to a yeshivah*, while the rest would start to work. Much of the study in the heder, especially in the case of the younger students, was by rote. In eastern Europe instruction was in Yiddish. The youngest students were primarily taught reading, with the prayer book as their basic text; the aim was to enable them to recite the prayers by themselves. Older students would be taught the Torah with Rashi's commentary, while the oldest students might study the Mishnah and the Talmud. Under the influence of the Haskalah movement in the nineteenth century, an attempt was made to modernize the heder system by the institution of the heder metuqqan (improved heder). In Western countries, compulsory secular elementary education relegated Jewish studies for boys and girls to afternoon and Sunday "Hebrew schools." The tendency now is toward other forms of Jewish *education for children (day schools), and the traditional heder is to be found only in strictly Orthodox circles. In England and South Africa, the supplementary afternoon Hebrew school is still known as a heder. See also TALMUD TORAH.

ḤEFETS BEN YATSLIAH (c.11th cent.), Babylonian scholar, a native of Mosul. His Arabic-language Sefer ha-Mitsvot was one of the most important works on the commandments. The precepts were divided into some thirty-six thematic sections or chapters, each of which was further divided into positive and negative commandments. Biblical and rabbinic sources were quoted in order to characterize and define each commandment in turn. This book served to a considerable extent as the basis of Maimonides' Book of the Commandments (Maimonides avers that this youthful work contains errors that he attributes to having been unduly influenced by Ḥefets). Only fragments of Sefer ha-Mitsvot are known. Several scholars attributed to Ḥefets another work, cited by medieval European scholars under the title Sefer Ḥefets, but this attribution appears to be mistaken.

HEFOER (הֶפְקֵר; unclaimed property), a term designating ownerless property. *Property may become ownerless by voluntary formal renunciation on the part of the owner in the presence of three persons; by compulsory renunciation by the owner of his right to the property, as ordered by a court; by the death of a proselyte who leaves property but no Jewish heirs; or by being lost by its owner who despairs of recovering it. Property found in deserts or at sea is treated as ownerless. Hefqer becomes the property of the first person to acquire it by the usual means (see ACQUISITION). Hefqer is not subject to the law of tithing, nor is it subject to the laws benefitting the poor. In Israel, ownerless property belongs to the state.

HEIKHAL. See ARON HA-QODESH; TEMPLE.

HEIKHALOT (הֵיכָלוֹת; temples, palaces, halls), term designating a type of esotericism, also known as Merkavah mysticism (see MA'ASEH MERKAVAH), as well as the literature in which it is found. The main theme is the ecstatic ascent to the celestial realms and palaces, climaxing with the vision of the *throne of God. In addition to these visionary accounts, Heikhalot literature also contains magic (e.g., "The Sword of Moses," "The Havdalah of Rabbi 'Aqiva'") and cosmological (Seder Rabba' de-Ve-Re'shit) texts. Because of certain similarities with contemporary phenomena in the Hellenistic world, this literature has sometimes been labeled as "gnostic." The extant texts were probably composed in Babylonia between the third century and the seventh century. Among the texts that can be classified as mystical are the "Lesser Heikhalot," in which the ascension of R 'Aqiva' plays a central role; the "Greater Heikhalot," which contains the story of the Ten Martyrs and the ascension of R. Yishma'e'l; the Shi'ur Qomah, with its highly anthropomorphic description of the dimensions of the Creator God; and the Sefer Heikhalot, also known as 3 Enoch*, with its description of the elevation of Enoch and his transformation into *Metatron. These treatises exhibit features not found elsewhere, such as the use of the term heikhalot for the celestial and divine halls and realms, the interpretation of the Song of Songs in terms of Shi'ur Qomah notions, the ecstatic ascent and descent, and the emphasis on direct individual experience rather than on the exegesis of canonical texts. The texts show a concern for the "perils of the soul" that attend the mystical vision and are replete with instructions on how to avoid the dangers represented by the angelic guardians and celestial gatekeepers. The texts also report the hymns sung by the celestial choirs and heard by the visionary. Some of these Heikhalot hymns were later included in the prayer book.

HEIR. See INHERITANCE.

HEKHSHER (הֶקְשֶׁר; approbation), document signed by an authorized rabbi asserting that a product, usually food, is kasher (ritually fit). The main foods requiring such certification are poultry or meat or their derivatives, the preparation of which is supervised by a mashgia'h*. After ensuring that the meat has been properly slaughtered and its organs inspected, the mashgia'h affixes a sign, usually a lead seal, to the animal's foot. Before Pesah a variety of foods is given a hekhsher (usually printed on the packaging), to show that they have been properly prepared. Today hekhsherim are also given to dairy products, fruits and vegetables (signifying that the laws of orlah* and shemittah* have been properly observed), and flour products (having to do with the law of hadash*). Certificates of hekhsher issued by the rabbinate are also issued to and displayed in kosher restaurants. The term hekhsher is used popularly to refer to any seal of approval.

HELEV (חֵלֵב; fat), in biblical usage certain portions of the intestinal fat of oxen, sheep, and goats offered upon the altar (Lv. 3.3–17). Like *blood, helev was forbidden to the Israelites (Lv. 7.23). Maimonides (Hilkhot Ma'akhalot Asurot 7.5) explains the distinction between intestinal fat (helev), which is forbidden to be eaten, and animal fat (shuman), which is part of the sinews and is permitted to be eaten.

HELL. See GEIHINOM.

HELLENISM. While there is little reason to believe that Alexander the Great or his successors, such as the Ptolemies in Egypt or the Seleucids in Syria–Babylonia, deliberately sought to Hellenize the indigenous populations under their control, they nevertheless contributed greatly to the process. The founding of new cities, built entirely on a Greek model (Alexandria, Antioch, and many more), the encouragement of Greek immigration to the newly conquered lands, and the tendency to conduct official businesses in the conquerors' language all contributed greatly to the spread of Greek culture in regions far outside the Greek homeland. The Jews, like all their neighbors, were exposed to a culture that was not unknown to them—contacts with Greece had preceded Alexander by several centuries—but that now loomed larger than ever before. Chronologically, the first to be Hellenized were communities in the Diaspora, such as Egypt, in which the Jews quickly abandoned their ancestral language and adopted Greek as their main means of expression. From the third century BCE onwards, Egyptian Jews conducted not only their everyday business but also their religious life in Greek, including the use of a Greek translation of the Torah (see SEPTUAGINT). However, abandoning the ancestral language did not necessarily mean abandoning ancestral behavior, beliefs, and identity. No doubt many chose to abandon the traditional way of life and to leave the community, but others continued to maintain their Jewish identity and to observe their unique customs. In Judea, densely populated by Jews and, due to its geographical location and character, relatively unattractive to Greek settlers, the process of Hellenization seems to have been much slower than in Egypt or the cities of the Mediterranean coast. Nevertheless, Judea was not immune to Hellenistic influences, and this tension was one of the leading factors behind the events that led to the Maccabean Revolt. However, the success of the revolt only served to increase the pace of Hellenization, since the victorious *Hasmoneans quickly adopted many of the trappings of neighboring Hellenistic dynasties. The Roman conquest of Jerusalem in 63 BCE, the reign of Herod (37–4) and his descendants, and the direct Roman rule that followed, all contributed to the further spread of Hellenism among the Jews of Erets Yisra'el. Greek-speaking communities were to be found throughout the Roman empire, while in Erets Yisra'el itself, many Jews seem to have been bilingual, and even trilingual, using Greek, Aramaic, and Hebrew. The impact of Hellenism on Hebrew can be gauged from the vocabulary in rabbinic literature: numerous Greek words entered the Hebrew language (and many are still commonly used in modern Hebrew), as did many concepts, legends, and theories, whose Hellenistic origin is indisputable. At the same time the rabbis opposed too close an acquaintance with, and study of, Greek culture, which they saw as pagan and idolatrous, by definition the antithesis of Judaism. The upper classes, however, adopted a thoroughgoing Hellenistic style of life, which was often assimilationist. The impact of Hellenistic culture on Greek-speaking Jewry is even more marked (see LETTER OF ARISTEAS; PHILO; WISDOM OF SOLOMON). Gentile Hellenism, which regarded Jewish monotheism and the worship of an invisible God as tantamount to atheism, also produced the first historic expressions of both literary and practical (anti-Jewish riots) antisemitism. As a result much Jewish Hellenistic writing, whether philosophical (see PHILO) or historical (see JOSEPHUS FLAVIUS), was apologetic and propagandist in character, attempting to demonstrate the excellence and even superiority of Jewish laws and teachings. This literature, however, does not seem to have made an impression on the Greeks. The Judeo-Greek culture of the Diaspora eventually died out, for reasons that are not entirely clear, and its fruits were preserved solely by the Christian church.

HELLER, MESHULLAM FEIBUSH (died 1795), Galician Hasidic master and author. A descendant of Yom Tov Lipmann Heller, his major teachers were the early Hasidic masters Menaḥem Mendel of Peremyshlany and Yehi'el Mikha'el of Zloczów. In two important pastoral letters written in 1777, he interpreted the teachings of Dov Ber of Mezhibezh, whose radical practices he restricted to great masters alone. Ordinary Hasidim, he believed, should follow a path of humility, sincerity, and faith in the powers of the masters. First published in the Hasidic anthology Liqqutim Yeqarim (Lwów, 1792), his letters have been frequently reprinted and issued under several titles, including Yosher Divrei Emet (Mukachevo, 1905).

HELLER, YOM TOV LIPMANN (1579–1654), rabbi and communal leader. Born in Wallerstein, Bavaria, Heller studied under *Yehudah Liva' ben Betsal'el of Prague. Heller's rabbinic career was turbulent. While in Prague, he was accused by his enemies of unfairly imposing taxes upon the poor to satisfy the government's demand that Bohemian Jewry help defray expenses incurred during the Thirty Years' War. Heller was also accused by some Jews of defaming Christianity, and a death sentence, later commuted to imprisonment and a heavy fine, was imposed upon him by the gentile authorities. Later in his career, while at Vladimir-Volynski, he became embroiled in controversy arising from his strong stand against those rabbis guilty of obtaining their rabbinic positions by illegal means.

Heller was a prolific and versatile writer. His principle work, Tosafot Yom Tov (Prague, 1614–1617), a commentary to the Mishnah, elucidated the earlier commentary of 'Ovadyah of *Bertinoro and sought to correct texts, supply sources, and provide halakhic analyses and conclusions. Heller also wrote kabbalistic commentaries, a three-volume commentary to the code of *Asher ben Yehi'el (Ma'adanei ha-Melekh [Prague, 1619, 1628]), responsa, sermons, and several liturgical poems mourning the persecutions suffered by the Jews of Prague in 1618 and by the Jews of the Ukraine in 1648 at the hands of anti-Jewish mobs. Heller's autobiography, Megillat Eivah (Breslau, 1818), has been translated into German and Yiddish.

HEMDAT YAMIM, eighteenth-century anonymous ethical work dealing with the practices and behavior required of a pious Jew during the holy days of the religious year. The book consists of sermons that offer interpretations of biblical and rabbinic citations for inspiration and instruction. Indicating the influence of Lurianic Kabbalah, pious deeds are viewed as a reflection of events in the divine realm; some scholars have found Shabbatean allusions in Hemdut Yamim. The work has had a strong influence on modern Hebrew literature, especially the style of S. Y. Agnon. The first edition appeared in Smyrna in 1731 and 1732.

HEMEROBAPTISTS (Gr.; Daily Bathers), a Jewish sect, mentioned by the church fathers as late as the third century CE, observing ritual immersion (see MIQVEH) every morning. Daily *ablutions were practiced by several Jewish groups (including the *Essenes), and the Hemerobaptists may be identical with one of them, possibly with the tovelei shaharit (dawn bathers) mentioned in the Talmud (Ber. 22a).

HEQDESH (הִקְדֵּשׁ; consecrated property), property dedicated to the Temple. In post-Talmudic times the term setam heqdes came to mean any property set aside for charitable purposes or for the fulfillment of a mitsvah.

Property could be imbued with different degrees of sanctity: intrinsic sanctity (qedushat ha-guf) for objects dedicated to the altar and ritually fit for sacrifice and which could not be redeemed; and monetary sanctity (qedushat damim) for objects consecrated to the Temple treasury for the Temple upkeep. Into a third category fell objects dedicated to the altar but unfit for sacrifice because of blemish. These could be redeemed, and when they were redeemed, they returned to their secular status. According to a special ruling, an oral statement was sufficient to effect a transfer of property from an individual to Temple ownership (Qid. 1.6, 28b, 29a).

HEREM. See EXCOMMUNICATION.

HEREM BEIT DIN (חֵרֶם בֵּית דִּין), legal term used to denote an *excommunication, ostracism, or shunning authorized by a Jewish court of law as a form of deterrence or punishment against a member of the Jewish community who violates the ordinances of the community. Jewish law recognizes three different levels of herem beit din (niddui, shamta, and herem), each denoting a particular form of exclusion from the Jewish community. There was significant dispute among later commentators regarding the nature of herem beit din. Some argued that herem was a form of judicial punishment mandated for a violation of Jewish law; most argued that herem was a form of deterrence designed to prevent prospective violations of Jewish law. For example, R. Moshe Isserles (Shulhan 'Arukh, Yoreh De'ah 334.1) permitted an innocent party to be placed in herem to deter an ongoing violation of Jewish law by one close to the innocent party. In pre-Emancipation Jewish communities, herem was a very effective device for enforcing communal unity and suppressing dissent. Herem is no longer an effective method of preventing improper conduct but is used as a means of expressing communal disdain for a person's behavior.

HEREM DE-RABBENU GERSHOM. See GERSHOM BEN YEHUDAH; POLYGAMY.

HEREM HA-YISHUV (חֵרֶם הַיִּשּׁוּב; ban on settlement), ban on Jews joining an existing community. In the Middle Ages, when Jewish settlement and employment were severely restricted, many Ashkenazi Jewish communities enacted regulations forbidding any outsider from living in their communities without obtaining prior permission. On the other hand, there were clear criteria whereby one who was not a resident could become one; for example, by buying, renting, or inheriting property in the town. Similarly, one who had been permitted to remain temporarily in a particular community could after a certain period of time claim permanent residence. Underlying these regulations was the premise that the community belonged to its residents, and that as such they could make decisions necessary to maintain their livelihoods. The herem ha-yishuv was opposed by leading rabbinic authorities, who said it was unethical to deny aid to fellow Jews, except, according to rabbinic authorities, to those Jews who had failed to pay community taxes. The ban disappeared in the eighteenth century.

HERESY, a term defined as a departure from orthodox belief. Various appellations are used for heretics. The generic name is minim* (sectarians), and refers to those who depart in their conduct and beliefs from the norms of Judaism; the term covers a multitude of sinners and in specific context can refer to Gnostics, Judeo-Christians, Sadducees, and others. Alternate names for heretics are apiqorsim (Epicureans; see APIQOROS), koferim be-'iqqar (deniers of the root)—which originally referred to those who denied God and later to a principle of faith—and mumarim (those who have changed; see APOSTASY). The usual and practically only punishment foretold for heretics is that they "forfeit their share in the world to come," that is, their punishment is in the hands of God and comes after their death, not by human courts during their lifetime. Thus, the Mishnah (San. 10.1) enumerates among those who forfeit their share in the world to come those who deny the doctrine of resurrection, or the divine origin of the Torah, while R. El'azar ha-Moda'i specifies he "who profanes sacred things, puts his fellow to shame in public, despises the festivals, nullifies the covenant of Abraham, and makes the Torah bear a meaning other than its true one" (San. 3.15). Rabbinic authorities have never set up courts comparable to the Inquisition for trying heretics, though severe sanctions such as the herem were applied at certain periods to deviants whose doctrines and behavior might bring internal or external harm to the Jewish community. Outstanding victims of such sanctions in the seventeenth century were Baruch *Spinoza and Uriel *Acosta in Amsterdam. Writings belonging to heretics were not to be rescued from a conflagration on the Sabbath, and R. *Tarfon went so far as to declare that he would deliberately commit them to the flames (Shab. 116b). Whereas norms of behavior were spelled out in detail by the halakhah, matters of faith were not sufficiently systematized to permit the establishment of generally accepted categories of heresy (see CREED). In this respect, the attempt of Maimonides to lay down the *Thirteen Principles of Faith, the denial of which would place those who rejected them outside the pale of Judaism, represented a departure from the Jewish norm and was not allowed to go unchallenged.

HERMAPHRODITE. See ANDEROGINOS.

HERMENEUTICS (Heb. middot), rules for interpreting the biblical text for halakhic and aggadic purposes. The rules of hermeneutics are traditionally held to be as old as the text itself. Their origin is unknown, but they were first classified by *Hillel, who formulated seven exegetical principles by which the Bible is to be expounded (T., San., end of chap. 7): qal va-ḥomer, an inference that permits deductions from a minor to a major case; gezerah shavah, an inference based on word analogy (if two biblical passages contain words with similar or identical meanings, both laws, although different in themselves, are subject to the same application); binyan av mi-katuv eḥad, principles derived from a single verse and applied to a group of biblical passages; binyan av mi-shenei ketuvim, principles derived from two verses and applied to a group of biblical passages; kelal u-ferat u-ferat u-kelal, limitations of a general principle derived from a particular principle, and vice versa; ka-yotse' bo be-maqom aḥer, principles derived by virtue of similar passages; and davar ha-lamed me-'inyano, deduction from context.

Rabbi Yishma'e'l ben Elisha' expanded these principles to thirteen (Sifra; Zev. 50a–51a; also included in the Shaharit service) and R. Eli'ezer ben Yosei ha-Galili (according to post-Talmudic literature) expanded them to thirty-two. Most of R. Eli'ezer's principles are intended for aggadic interpretation, but some are valid for halakhic interpretation and appear also in the rules of Hillel and Yishma'e'l. Other methods of biblical hermeneutics applied at different times included gimatriyyah*, notariqon*, and interpretations of apparently superfluous words, prefixes, and suffixes. This last method characterized the approach of R. 'Aqiva', who derived halakhic rules from formal details of the biblical text, such as seemingly superfluous letters or the meaningless word et (Pes. 22b). This approach was opposed by R. Yishma'e'l, who held that "the Bible speaks in the language of men"; that is, the biblical text uses human speech and cannot form the basis of legal deductions. Rabbi Yishma'e'l's viewpoint generally prevailed, and later rabbis taught that "nothing can override the plain meaning of the text" (Shab. 63a). Me'ir Leibush *Malbim, in the introduction to his commentary on the Sifra, suggested that all the rules of interpretation are implied in the text and can be deduced from the unique logical syntax of the Hebrew language.

HERTZ, JOSEPH HERMAN (1872–1946), chief rabbi of the United Hebrew Congregations of the British empire. Born in Slovakia, Hertz grew up in New York City, where he was the Jewish Theological Seminary of America's first graduate in 1894. He served as rabbi of Johannesburg, South Africa from 1896 to 1911, before being elected Great Britain's chief rabbi in 1913 in succession to Hermann Adler (see ADLER FAMILY). A religious champion of Zionism, Hertz played a notable part in securing the Balfour Declaration in 1917 and was an incisive critic of British government policy under the Mandate. Between the two world wars, he also opposed the growth of Liberal Judaism, helped eliminate a calendar reform threat to Sabbath observance, fought antisemitism at home and abroad, and organized the rescue of Jews from Nazi persecution. An influential popularizer of Jewish knowledge, his publications include A Book of Jewish Thoughts (London, 1917), The Pentateuch and Haftorahs (Oxford, 1929–1936), Sermons, Addresses, and Studies (Surrey, 1938), and The Authorised Daily Prayer Book with Commentary (London, 1942–1945).

HERZOG, ISAAC (1888–1959), rabbinic scholar; chief rabbi of Israel from 1937 through 1959. Born in Łomża, Poland, Isaac Herzog immigrated to England at the age of nine. He was rabbi of Belfast from 1916 to 1919, served as chief rabbi of the Irish Free State between 1922 and 1937, succeeded R. Avraham Yitshaq ha-Kohen Kook as chief rabbi of Palestine, and became the first chief rabbi of the State of Israel. He was recognized as one of the great rabbinical authorities of his time, and he wrote many books and articles dealing with halakhic problems surrounding the Torah and the state. Herzog's writings helped shape the attitude of the Religious Zionist movement toward the State of Israel. He was the author of Main Institutions of Jewish Law (1965–1967), Heikhal Yitshaq (1960–1972), Tekhuqah le-Yisra'el 'al pi ha-Torah (1989), Pesaqim u-Ketavim (1989–1991), and The Royal Purple and the Biblical Blue (1987).

HESCHEL, ABRAHAM JOSHUA (1907–1972), religious philosopher. Born in Poland into a distinguished Hasidic family, he studied at the University of Berlin and taught Talmud at the Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums. In 1939 he escaped to England and then moved to the United States, where he taught first at Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati and from 1946 at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America in New York. Heschel's books cover a wide range of thought, philosophic and mystic. He wrote The Prophets (1962) on a biblical theme, Maimonides (German, 1935; English, 1982) on the famous medieval philosopher, A Passion for Truth (1973) on the Hasidic thinker Menahem Mendel of Kotsk, and The Earth Is the Lord's (1949) on the lost legacy of Polish Jewry. He is best known for his theological writings, often written in a poetic style with strong mystical influences, which include Man Is Not Alone (1951), Man's Quest for God (1954), God in Search of Man (1955), The Sabbath (1951), and Israel: An Echo of Eternity (1969). Heschel became deeply involved in the civil rights movement in the United States. He was also a leading figure in the growing Jewish-Christian interfaith movement and was active behind the scenes during the Second Vatican Council.

In his major work, God in Search of Man, Heschel asserts that the religious life of contemporary Jews is without fervor and inner conviction, a form of religious behaviorism. There is a need to rediscover the paths that lead to an awareness of God's presence in the world and in one's own life. The paths to such awareness are not those of rational argument but of existential decision making. Reason, however, can function to clarify the alternatives among which we must choose.

According to Heschel, the first of the three such paths is that of reawakened religious emotions, the experiences of awe and reverence. These lead to an awareness of the grandeur of natural and human existence, of their mystery, and of their allusiveness to an ineffable reality. The second path to God is through the Torah: God's voice can be heard addressing us in the words of the Torah. The Torah is written not in descriptive language but in evocative language, proclaiming mysteries rather than explaining facts. There is a human element as well as a divine element in the revelatory experience: the words of Torah are the prophets' own in response to the initiative of God. We must put aside preconceptions and open ourselves to the actual content of the biblical message: that God's omnipotence is restrained; that God needs humans as much as they need to be needed; that without human cooperation the goals of redemption cannot be achieved; and that God, too, experiences emotions. The pathos of God is God's loving concern for creatures, God's suffering together with creatures who are in pain, and God's anger at the moral failures of human beings.

The third path to the awareness of the presence of God is through the life of mitsvot, which begins as an experiment in living. The mitsvot can evoke experiences of the sublimity and mystery of existence. Moreover, the discipline of the mitsvot enables people to control their darker impulses. We can become God's proxy in bringing redemption to the world by ridding the world of violence and oppression.

HESHBON HA-NEFESH (הֶשְׁבֹּן הַנֶּפֶשׁ; accounting of the soul), an individual's examination of conscience concerning obligations to God and to other humans. The concept is prevalent in the ethical literature of the Middle Ages, and it is the subject of the eighth section of Hovot ha-Levavot by *Bahya ben Yosef ibn Paquda'. This reckoning should be made every day, but especially during the month of Elul and the *Aseret Yemei Teshuvah as a prerequisite to genuine repentance and self-improvement. The wedding day is also a time for heshbon ha-nefesh, and the bride and groom traditionally fast until the ceremony.

HESHVAN (חֶשְׁוֹן), second month of the religious calendar, eighth month of the civil calendar, also referred to as Marheshvan; known in the Bible as Bul. It has twenty-nine or thirty days, and its zodiac sign is Scorpio. Ashkenazim outside Erets Yisra'el incorporate a daily prayer for rain into the 'Amidah from 7 Heshvan until Pesah; elsewhere the prayer is recited from immediately after Sukkot. Heshvan is the only month in the Jewish calendar that does not contain any festival or fast observance. The name Marheshvan in Babylonian means eighth month, but mar also means both drop, which relates to the fact that it is the beginning of the rainy season, and bitter, because it is a month with no observances.

HESSAH HA-DA'AT (הֶסֶח הַדַּא'ת; "removal of one's mind"), phrase used in Jewish religious law to convey the idea of a lack of attentiveness during the performance of religious duties, which because of their importance demand special mental awareness. As a result of hessah ha-da'at, such actions become invalid, that is, if the person performing them allows his attention to wander. Typical examples include the need to keep one's mind alert in the separation of heave offerings, in the rituals appertaining to ritual uncleanness, and in the preparation of the ashes of the *red heifer. Different aspects of hessah ha-da'at are combined in a statement of

R. Ze'ira' (San. 97a): "A lost article, the Messiah, and [the bite of] a scorpion appear with hessah ha-da'at." The first instance merely means "absent-mindedness"; the other two mean that they come when least expected.

HESTER PANIM (הֶסְתֵּר פָּנִים), the hiddenness of God. The phrase hester panim is used with reference to the question of theodicy. In the biblical context, God's hiddenness can be a manifestation of divine judgment in response to human sinfulness or a test of worthiness, or it can be used liturgically as supplication on the part of suffering innocents lamenting their abandonment by God. In the twentieth century, God's silence in the Holocaust has prompted discussion of the meaning of such silence (see HOLOCAUST THEOLOGY). The term suggests a dialectic between God's presence and absence, and that the return of his presence is ultimately hoped for.

HEVRAH (הֶבְרָה; association), society for the performance of a religious, educational, or philanthropic function within the Jewish *community. Since the fourteenth century such societies have played an essential role within the autonomous Jewish community, and some of them continued to exist within the voluntary community after autonomy ended. The hevrah qaddisha', concerned with the care and burial of the dead, remains an essential institution. Other associations included groups for the upkeep of the synagogue, caring for the sick (biqqur holim), dowering poor brides, and ransoming captives. Educational societies provided talmud Torah* classes for younger children, and others met for Talmud study and the recitation of psalms.

HEVRAH QADDISHA' (Heb. and Aram.; הֶבְרָה קַדִּישָׁא; holy society), referred originally to the Jewish community as a whole (as in the Sabbath morning Ye-qum Purqan* prayer) or to different Jewish community organizations that assumed responsibility for various communal needs. In the fourteenth century, five such societies existed in the French city of Perpignan, dealing respectively with the school, the sick, lighting in the synagogue, general welfare needs, and burial of the dead. Subsequently, however, the term hevrah qaddisha' came to be applied almost exclusively to the "brotherhood" and "sisterhood" that undertook to perform the religious task of burying the dead in accordance with Jewish law. The respect due to the dead and the strict prohibition against deriving any material benefit from a dead body combined to make this a sacred, voluntary duty. Although there are references to such groups in earlier times (Mo'ed Q. 27b), R. Yehudah Liva' ben Betsal'el of Prague is credited with founding the first formal hevrah qaddisha'; by the seventeenth century it had become a recognized institution. Members were often present to hear deathbed confessions, to provide the funeral repast, and to comfort the mourners. The hevrah qaddisha' held an annual banquet, either on 7 Adar or on 15 or 20 Kisle, preceded by a service at which special selihot (penitential prayers) were recited, asking for forgiveness if the members had been remiss in showing proper respect for the dead. Among Sephardim, the hevrah qaddisha' is called the Society of Lavadores ("those who wash," i.e., the body), or hevrah qaddisha' hesed ve-emet, "burial society of loving kindness and truth." In many Western countries, the role assumed by the voluntary hevrah qaddisha' has been either augmented or replaced by commercial funeral directors. Religious persons, though, always seek to have a hevrah qaddisha' take care of the religious preparations and the funeral itself.

HEZEKIAH (Heb. Hizqiyah), king of Judah (r. 727-698), described by the biblical books as a righteous king, who, with the encouragement of the prophet Isaiah, instituted a religious reform that included the eradication of all idolatrous elements from Israelite worship (some of which Hezekiah's father, Ahaz, had introduced even into the Temple in Jerusalem), the cleansing and sanctifying of the Temple, and the restoration of the Temple cult (2 Kgs. 18.3-4, 2 Chr. 29-30). In his zeal to eradicate all idols, he also destroyed the brazen serpent (Nehush-tan*) of Moses (2 Kgs. 18.4; cf. Nm. 21.4-9). Proverbs makes reference to the period of Hezekiah as one of royally sponsored literary activity (Prov. 25.1). In order to gain political independence, in 701 BCE he rebelled against Sennacherib, king of Assyria, who thereupon besieged Jerusalem. Preparing for the upcoming assault, Hezekiah had a tunnel (still existent) constructed to bring the waters of the Gihon spring into the walls of the city to ensure adequate water supply (2 Kgs. 20.20; 2 Chr. 22.30; Is. 22.9-11). The famous Siloam inscription, discovered carved into the rock inside the tunnel, describes the digging of the tunnel by two teams starting at opposite ends and meeting in the middle. According to the biblical account, Jerusalem was spared when a plague broke out in the Assyrian army and the siege was lifted (2 Kgs. 18.35; 2 Chr. 32.21; Is. 37.36). Nevertheless the Assyrian king did exact a high tribute from Hezekiah (2 Kgs. 18.13-16), who was described as a "bird in a cage" in Sennacherib's own inscription recording the siege. The Talmud depicts Hezekiah as an ideal king, originally destined to be the Messiah (San. 94a; Sg. Rab. 4.8). Ac-according to one rabbinic opinion, the books of Isaiah, Proverbs, Song of Songs, and Ecclesiastes were written (probably meaning edited or published) by Hezekiah and his colleagues (B. B. 15a).

HIBBUT 'ARAVAH. See HOSHA'NA' RABBAH.

HIBBUT HA-QEVER (הַבּוּט הַקֶּבֶר; torture of the grave), a folk belief that people are judged in the grave during the first three days after burial by being tortured by the *angel of death or other demonic beings unless they remember their names. That is why people were encouraged to memorize biblical verses beginning and ending with the initial and final letters of their names. The idea occurs in early eschatological aggadah (in Hibbut ha-Qever, also known as Midrash Rabbi Yitshaq ben Parnaq) and was developed by the kabbalists, notably Yitshaq *Luria in his Sefer ha-Kavvanot. Those who practice charity, hospitality, and devotion in prayer are said to be exempt from the test, as are those who live in Erets Yisra'el and those who die on the Sabbath eve. Others who are spared this torture include sages and those who have lived in penury or affliction (e.g., Yesha'yahu Horowitz, Shenei Luhot ha-Berit II 146a).

HIDDUSHIM (הִדּוּשִׁים), a genre of rabbinic literature, also referred to as novellae, usually devoted to the discussion of Talmudic materials, although the term is also used to describe biblical commentary (by Moses *Nahmanides, for example). Broadly speaking, hiddushim proceed beyond the commentary of *Rashi, who provides a running exposition of the Talmudic text, to consider problems that arise from a study of the pericope as a whole or other, related, Talmudic materials. The solutions offered often posit new legal doctrine, contributing to the history of halakhic ideas as well as to the process of halakhic decision making. The twelfth-century tosafists of Germany and France (see TOSAFOT) were among the pioneers of the genre, as were Yosef ben Me'ir *ibn Migash of Spain and *Avraham ben David of Posquières of Spain. The tosafist method was further refined in thirteenth- and fourteenth-century Spain by Nahmanides, Shelomoh ben Avraham *Adret, *Yom Tov ben Avraham Ishbili, and others. In its earliest stages, the term novellae was often not attached to the work in question but was appended later, when it became clear that the material, in fact, belonged to the genre. Hiddushim were not devoted to Talmudic halakhah alone; classic novellae were written on Talmudic aggadah (see EDELS, SHEMU'EL ELI'EZER) and on Moses *Maimonides' Mishneh Torah. Indeed this genre has thrived even in the twentieth century in the work of Hayyim Soloveichik (see SOLOVEICHIK FAMILY) and R. Me'ir Simhah of Dvinsk, who composed major novellae on the Mishneh

Torah. Moreover, novellae are often found in other genres of rabbinic literature such as responsa and commentary, for example, the Sha'agat Aryeh of Aryeh Leib ben Asher *Gunzburg. Both the Urim ve-Tummim (Yonatan *Eybeschuetz), and Ketsot ha-Hoshen (Aryeh Leib ha-Kohen), ostensibly commentaries on the Shulhan 'Arukh, are in essence novellae on topics of civil law appended to Hoshen Mishpat.

Despite the medieval origins of the genre, the term hiddushim and the concept behind it are firmly anchored in the early Talmudic worldview, which frequently asserts that "there is no study house without a new idea [hiddush]," and which describes various laws as "novellae of the sages" (hiddush . . . soferim). Nahmanides introduced his Milhamot by claiming that it fulfilled the "obligation . . . of searching . . . the Torah . . . and revealing its secrets. . . . This book does not say anything new which had not been said before . . . but merely explains the words of its predecessors." In modern times, R. Yosef Baer Soloveichik has placed the hiddush at the heart of his description of the creative halakhic personality. See also PILPUL.

HIGH PLACE (Heb. bamah), cultic installation existing in biblical times, used by Canaanites in the worship of their gods as well as by Israelites in their worship. A high place was probably a raised platform of earth and stones, specially constructed for sacrifice, and not necessarily located on a naturally high spot. It was not a temple or shrine; it did not have any of the features of an abode for the deity, any symbols of the divine presence, or an official priesthood. Rather it consisted of a platform, an altar, and a nearby facility, probably a small chamber, in which the sacrificial meal was held (1 Sm. 9). Thus it stands somewhere between the local houses of God, or shrines, and field altars, but closer to the latter. Several possible high places have been identified in archeological excavations in Israel. The Bible speaks approvingly of the high places that existed before the Temple was built (1 Kgs. 3.4) but thereafter, in accord with Deuteronomy, views all worship at high places, and indeed their very existence, as sinful. The Book of Kings connects the prolonged failure to centralize the cult as a cause of the eventual fall of the kingdom and, therefore, views with favor only those kings of Judah who destroyed the high places: Hezekiah and Josiah (2 Kgs. 18.3–4, 22.1ff.). The Mishnah (Zev. 14.4–8) devised an elaborate historical theory, according to which high places were originally permitted, prohibited during the wilderness wanderings, permitted again when the Israelites arrived in Canaan, banned again when the Tabernacle was set up in Shiloh, permitted after it was destroyed, and prohibited for all time when the Temple was built.

HIGH PRIEST (Heb. ha-kohen ha-gadol; Nm. 35.25, 28; Jos. 20.6), chief officiant in the Temple in ancient Israel. The name parallels the Ugaritic rb khnm. Short for "the highest priest among his brothers" (Lv. 21.10), he is also called ha-kohen ha-mashiah (the anointed priest; Lv. 4.3, 6.15), since he alone has the anointing oil poured on his head (Ex. 29.7; Lv. 8.12, 21.10), and [ha]-jkohen ha-ro'sh (the head priest; e.g., 2 Kgs. 25.18). *Aaron, the brother of Moses, was ordained at God's command as the first high priest (Ex. 28.1ff.); upon his death God appointed his son Eleazar in his place (Nm. 20.22–29). Later, Eleazar's son Phinehas, in recognition of his zealousness on God's behalf (see Nm. 25.1–9), was given a divine "promise of eternal priesthood" (Nm. 25.13). Since Phinehas served later as high priest (Jos. 22.13ff.; Jgs. 20.28), this may mean that the high priesthood was thenceforth to remain among his descendants. This interpretation is reflected in 1 Chronicles 5.29 and following, according to which David and Solomon's chief priest Zadok, from whom the high priests of First Temple times were descended, was a descendant of Phinehas. This may be a late tradition, however, since the high priesthood is said to have been given to Zadok after having been taken away from the house of Eli (1 Kgs. 2.27).

In the Torah the high priest is pictured not as a public official, nor as a teacher or leader, but rather as a divinely designated, sacred representative of the Israelite people. Virtually his entire function is ceremonial. Dressed in the *priestly vestments, he embodies the body politic, serving in God's earthly abode, paying uninterrupted homage to the enshrined deity on behalf of the Israelite tribes, and calling his attention to their needs in the daily tamid sacrifice. He is consecrated for this task by investiture (Lv. 8), having the priestly vestments placed upon him. In addition, he is responsible for the purgation of sins and impurities that penetrate the Tabernacle and its inner sanctum (Lv. 4.3–21), which means he is the sole officiant in the annual Yom Kippur ceremonies, purifying the Tabernacle and driving away Israel's sins. On this occasion he enters the Holy of Holies (see TEMPLE), the only time this is permitted, which constitutes the climax of the ritual year (Lv. 16). He also administers the divine oracle, the Urim and Thummim (see ORACLES). Because he belonged to the innermost sphere of sanctity, the high priest was subject to a greater number of restrictions than other priests; he had to marry a woman not previously married and was forbidden to come into contact with the corpses of even his own closest relatives (see IMPURITY) or to mourn the dead (Lv. 21).

Some of the high priests who served in First Temple times are mentioned by name, such as Jehoiada (2 Kgs. 11.4ff.) and Hilkiah (2 Kgs. 22.4ff.). High priests took on more administrative tasks in the Temple, and occasionally the position became one of political influence. In early Second Temple times, the high priest was the religious and political head of the nation and was recognized as such by foreign rulers; later he also served as head of the *Sanhedrin. Eventually the high priesthood was taken over by the *Hasmoneans, who combined the office with that of king, to the dismay of the *Pharisees. Under Roman rule, from the time of Herod, appointments were made at the whim of the ruler, and there is evidence that in the disputes dividing religious sects in early rabbinic Judaism the high priests were often of the Sadducean faction. HILDESHEIMER, EZRIEL (1820–1899), scholar and leader of Orthodox Jewry in Germany. He officiated as rabbi in Eisenstadt (Hungary, now Austria), where he founded a rabbinical school that was the first yeshivah to combine secular with religious studies and to teach not in Yiddish but in the vernacular languages (German and Hungarian). For these innovations, Hildesheimer found himself the object of bitter attacks by most Orthodox Hungarian rabbis, especially among the Hasidim. In 1869 he moved to Berlin to head the *Adass Jisroel congregation, where he founded a modern religious school for boys and girls. He was one of the foremost opponents of Reform, especially of the activities of Abraham Geiger. In 1873 he founded, and directed until his death, the *Berlin Rabbinical Seminary (long known in popular parlance as the Hildesheimerseminar) for the training of modern Orthodox rabbis, prompted in part by the need to counter the Reform *Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums. In 1870 he founded the weekly Orthodox journal Jüdische Presse and was an active supporter of renewed Jewish settlement in Erets Yisra'el. His most notable work, Halakhot Gedolot*, was a translation of a Vatican manuscript. His collected essays, Gesammelte Aufsätze were published in German (1923) and his responsa were published in Hebrew (1969, 1976).

HILLAZON (חִלְזָזִין), conchiferous marine animal, the blue blood of which was used for dyeing the blue cord of the tsitsit* as prescribed in Numbers 15.38 (Men. 44a). The hillazon was very scarce and supposedly appeared only once every seventy years. For this reason the rabbis allowed its use to be dispensed with. According to Sanhedrin 91a, the hillazon snail was also found in the mountains, but the ritually prescribed species was caught near the coast in territory held by the tribe of Zebulun (Meg. 6a). Rabbi Yosef described the hillazon fishing area as extending from Tyre in Phoenicia down to the Bay of Haifa. According to the Zohar, the hillazon could also be found in the Sea of Galilee. It was identified by Gershon Hanokh Leiner with the cuttlefish, by Isaac Herzog with the snails Janthina pallida and Janthina bicolor, and by other researchers with the Murex snails found along the eastern Mediterranean littoral.

HILLEL (1st cent. BCE), early tanna', rabbinic authority, and Pharisaic leader. He and his colleague Shamm'ai are the last of the "pairs" (of scholars) presented in Avot 1. He is the first of the patriarchs, a line of moderate Pharisaic sages who presided over the Sanhedrin and represented Palestinian Jewry to the Roman authorities. The added appellation "the Elder" (ha-Zaqen) attests to his importance.

Hillel came from Babylonia and was appointed nasi' around 30 BCE, probably by Herod. He earned the position, according to the Talmud, by interpreting biblical verses about the paschal sacrifice, thereby solving a halakhic problem. Hillel is elsewhere presented as an early expositor of the scriptures and a founder of the Midrashic method; he is credited with "seven rules of hermeneutics" (middot). His famous dictum to the prospective proselyte, "What is detestable to you do not inflict upon your fellow man," is a midrash of the verse "Love thy neighbor as thyself" (Lev. 19:18). He also used the Midrashic technique of the parable.

Hillel differed with Shamm'ai on three or four issues of law, but the number of halakhic disputes widened among their disciples, called the House of Hillel (Beit Hillel) and the House of Shamm'ai (Beit Shamm'ai). Hillel comes across from the sources as both modest and tolerant; Shamm'ai is presented as fastidious and strict in presenting the Law. Thus, Hillel was prepared to teach the proselyte who demanded to know the entire Torah "while standing on one leg," while Shamm'ai banished him.

Mishnaic sources record two regulations (taqqanot) that Hillel instituted: the "perozbol", a legal instrument to prevent the cancellation of debts during the sabbatical year, thereby encouraging people to lend money to the poor (Shevi'it 10:3); and a regulation allowing one who sold his home to redeem it (Lev. 25:30) by depositing the purchase price with the Temple authorities when the buyer was not available ('Arakh. 9:4). Both regulations are evidence of the ability to adapt the law to prevailing economic circumstances.

Hillel taught, "Be among the disciples of Aaron—love peace and pursue it, love all men and draw them close to the Torah" (Avot 1:12). Possibly a democratic view of who could study Torah emerges from here, as opposed to a more elitist concept associated with the Sadducees. The mention of Aaron, the high priest, in this context, when that office was often identified as an elite position controlled by the Sadducees, is not without significance. He also taught, "He who wishes to raise his name lowers it; he who does not seek the law does not deserve to live. He who uses the crown of the Torah for his own ends, perishes" (Avot 1:13). His personal exemplary behavior, his role as innovator in biblical interpretation and as a teacher of Torah who founded a school, and his position as nasi' all mark him as a central figure in the history of halakhah. Indeed, it is said of Hillel that like Ezra, who also came from Babylonia to Jerusalem, he restored the Torah, which had been neglected. See also BEIT HILLEL AND BEIT SHAMM'AI.

HILLEL (4th cent. CE), known as Hillel II, patriarch of Palestinian Jewry. According to a tradition cited by Nahmanides, in the year 358 Hillel II abolished the proclamation of a new month by observation of the new moon (see RO'SH HODESH) and substituted for it a permanent *calendar based on complicated but very exact calculations. After adopting this calendar, Diaspora Jews no longer had to depend on Erets Yisra'el for the fixing of dates; it remains the standard Jewish calendar to this day. Hillel II corresponded with the Roman emperor Julian (later called "the Apostate" by the church), who addressed him with particular affection.

HILLEL BEN SHEMU'EL (c.1220–1295), physician and Talmudist; the first Jewish philosopher in Italy. He translated many treatises on medicine from Latin into Hebrew. Hillel took an important part in the counter-attack of the supporters of Maimonides against their opponents during the years 1289 and 1290 (see MAIMONIDEAN CONTROVERSY) and sought to harmonize Neoplatonic philosophical concepts with the standard religious ideas on the immortality of the individual soul, personal reward and punishment, and the literal acceptance of miracles. His book Tagmulei ha-Nefesh, completed in 1291, shows the strong influence of Christian scholasticism. He also wrote a commentary on the twenty-five Aristotelian propositions postulated in Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed and three dissertations on the question of free will, the relation of death to Adam's fall, and fallen angels.

HILLULA' (Aram.: ܠܗܠܘܠ; festivity), a pilgrimage to and celebration at the tomb of a saintly and charismatic rabbi on the anniversary of his death. Local, regional and even national pilgrimages brought masses of Jews to venerated gravesites, especially in southern Morocco. The tombs of R. Ya'aqov Abi-Hasira, R. Amram ben-Diwan, and R. David u-Mosheh were frequented by Muslims as well as by Jews. Some "saints," like the aforementioned, were historic personalities. Others were legendary. The hillula' celebration was marked by ecstatic prayer, feasting, and entertainment and formed an integral part of Moroccan Jewish folk religion. In Israel a hillula' is observed annually for R. *Me'ir Ba'al ha-Nes and, on Lag ba-Omer, at the reputed grave of R. Shim'on bar Yoh'ai on Mount Meron. In Kabbalistic and Hasidic literature, the death of a tsaddiq is called a hillula', because his soul enters before God like a bride enters under the wedding canopy (in Aramaic the term means a wedding celebration). The Zohar (Devarim 296) relates that when Shim'on bar Yoh'ai died, a voice was heard saying "ascend and gather" at R. Shim'on's hillula'.

HILLUL HA-SHEM (חילול השם; profanation of the [divine] Name), an action or remark that brings disgrace upon the Jewish community, and, hence, upon God (cf. Lv. 22.32). The special emphasis placed upon hillul ha-Shem in Jewish thought derives from the concept that the honor of God is so bound up with the Jewish people that any praiseworthy act on the part of a Jew adds to the glory of God (see QIDDUSH HA-SHEM), and any unworthy or dishonorable act detracts from that glory and causes a profanation, not only of the good name of the Jew, but of God himself. This is particularly serious when the transgression is committed publicly (Qid. 40a). Consequently hillul ha-Shem is usually associated with a disreputable act by a Jew against a non-Jew. If a Jew steals from a non-Jew, it is regarded as a more heinous offense than if a Jew steals from a fellow Jew, since it brings upon him the added sin of hillul ha-Shem. In some instances hillul ha-Shem was punished by excommunication. A person publicly regarded as a representative of the Jewish people must be particularly careful to ensure that his conduct is above reproach. Thus, Rav said that were he to purchase meat and not pay the butcher immediately (that is, use his rabbinic reputation to buy on credit), he would be guilty of hillul ha-Shem (Yoma' 86a). According to one Talmudic view, the sin was so grave that it could not be expiated by atonement or repentance but only by death (Yoma' 86a).

HILLUL SHABBAT (חילול שבת), desecration or profanation of the *Sabbath. Observance of the Sabbath is considered so fundamental that its profanation is compared to transgression of the entire Torah. Some authorities ruled that wine touched by a desecrator of the Sabbath is regarded as if it were touched by a non-Jew and is, therefore, unfit for Jewish use. In biblical law, the desecration of the Sabbath was punishable by death. If unintentional, the offender had to bring a sin offering to the Temple. The deliberate performance of one of the thirty-nine types of work prohibited on the Sabbath constituted hillul Shabbat. The duty of saving human life, however, overrides the prescription of Sabbath observance.

It explains the role of the sheliaḥ tsibbur and his responsibility in spite of his inadequacies. HIRING (Heb. sekhirut), transactions by which an interested party contracts for the use of property or the labor power and skill of an individual. The hiring of a laborer is governed by the general considerate relationship between master and servant, employer and employee, outlined in the Talmud and based on biblical legislation (e.g., Lv. 25.43). Hiring and the letting of property are subject to the laws of sale (B. M. 56b), in regard to the manner of acquisition and concerns about deceit or overcharge. The liability of the lessee extends only to neglect but not to damage incurred in the normal use of the property hired. If no definite date has been agreed upon for termination of the lease, the type of property hired, the season of the year, and local custom (B. M. 101b) are taken into consideration.

HIRSCH, SAMSON RAPHAEL (1808–1888), German rabbi and author; leading exponent of *Neo-Orthodoxy. Born and educated in Hamburg, where his religious outlook was greatly influenced by Isaac *Bernays and Ya'aqov *Ettlinger, he also studied at the University of Bonn prior to becoming Landesrabbiner of Oldenburg in 1830. It was there, over the next eleven years, that Hirsch formulated his own traditionalist response to modernity, writing the two works that constituted the basis of his ideology, Neunzehn Briefe über Judentum (Altona, 1836) and Choreb, oder Versuche über Jissroels Pflichten in der Zerstreuung (Altona, 1837). Unlike the advocates of *Reform Judaism, he took a literalist approach to the biblical narrative and divine revelation, insisting that the written and oral law are eternally authoritative for all Jews and not subject to the dictates of convenience or fashion. At the same time, however, Hirsch differed with the traditionalist Orthodox leaders, such as Mosheh Sofer (see SOFER FAMILY) of Pressburg, in his readiness to harmonize traditional Judaism with modern life in dress, speech, forms of worship, and a positive attitude toward the society and culture of nineteenth-century Europe.

After occupying posts in Emden and Nikolsburg, Moravia (1841–1851), Hirsch was invited to head the Israelitische Religionsgesellschaft, a small group of like-minded Orthodox Jews who rejected the Reform-dominated community in Frankfurt am Main. As a gifted writer, educator, and preacher, he devoted the rest of his life to making the new-style *Orthodoxy respectable, to expanding the membership and ramiform activities of his independent congregation, and to fostering the growth of similar (*Adass Jisroel) communities outside Frankfurt.

Hirsch devised a new meaning for the rabbinic concept of Torah im derekh erets (Avot 2.2): Torah Judaism in harmony with secular culture. This became the watchword of his Orthodox modernism. Hirsch developed these ideas further in his monthly Jeschurun (1854–1870), as well as in his annotated Pentateuch (Frankfurt am Main, 1867–1878; translated by Isaac Levy [London, 1956–1962]), Psalms (Frankfurt am Main, 1883; translated by Gertrude Hirschler, 2 vols. [Jerusalem and New York, 1960–1966]), and daily prayer book entitled Siddur Tefillot Yisra'el: Israels Gebete übersetzt und erläutert (Frankfurt am Main, 1895). Hirsch divided the biblical laws into six categories: torot, or doctrines, namely, the principles of Jewish faith that have been historically revealed; mishpatim, or principles of justice between individuals; huqqim, or statutes, a category defined by the rabbis as laws whose motivation is not apparent to human reasoning and that, according to Hirsch, ensure justice to all creatures; edot, or testimonials, the symbolic actions, such as ceremonials, festivals, and fasts meant to train Israel; mitsvot, or commandments, such as family and communal obligations and penitence; and avodah, or worship, which embraces all aspects of worship. The Torah was given in the wilderness to show that Jewish nationhood does not depend on a particular land and that the Jewish mission can be accomplished in exile. Nothing matters but the Torah, which is meant to teach the observance of religious law and not philosophical truths. The ideal individual is the Mensch-Jisroel (that is, the Torah-observant Jew).

Thanks to the prolonged efforts of Eduard Lasker, a Jewish deputy in the Prussian Landtag (parliament), an Austrittsgesetz (law of secession) was passed in 1876, enabling Hirsch's congregation and others like it to become self-supporting, with no legal or financial obligations to the Reform-controlled communities that denied them a budget. This measure plunged Hirsch into an ideological dispute with those Orthodox leaders (such as Seligmann Baer *Bamberger) who felt that the interests of traditional Judaism should be defended within—not outside—the general communal framework. It also created a rift within the Neo-Orthodox camp, between militant separatists and their more tolerant, nonisolationist opponents.

Hirsch was criticized in his later years for giving too little weight to Jewish national solidarity and too much to Diaspora-centered universalism. He was highly legalistic, hostile toward modern Jewish scholarship, and inspired the inward-looking Austrittsgemeinde* mentality of his *Breuer family descendants. On the other hand, he made it possible for Orthodox Jews to play a constructive role in general society. His collected works were published in six volumes as Gesammelte Schriften (Frankfurt am Main, 1902–1912).

HIRSCH FAMILY, leading Reformers in Germany and the United States in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

Samuel Hirsch (1815–1889), Reform rabbi and philosopher of Judaism. Born in Prussia, he studied at the Universities of Berlin, Bonn, and Leipzig. He served as a rabbi in Dessau before becoming chief rabbi of Luxembourg from 1843 to 1866. Subsequently he immigrated to the United States, where he succeeded David *Einhorn as rabbi of Temple Keneseth Israel in Philadelphia. Prominent in the Reform movement both in Germany and in the United States, he presided over the first American rabbinical conference in Philadelphia in 1869 and was an influential voice in the formulation of the *Pittsburgh platform of 1885. In 1842, he published Die Religionsphilosophie der Juden, in which he contrasted Judaism with Christianity. Although influenced by Hegel, Hirsch rejected his view that Judaism was a less-elevated religion than Christianity, arguing instead that both should be regarded as "absolute religion." The mission of Christianity was to proclaim the one true God to the pagan world, while Judaism was an "intensive" religiosity—a way of living centered on God. Hirsch stressed the importance of human freedom in confronting the world of nature, and he interpreted the aqedah* story as Abraham's conscious rejection of child sacrifice. In his own ministry, Hirsch was totally committed to the ideal of social justice.

Emil Gustave Hirsch (1851–1923), Reform rabbi; son of Samuel Hirsch. Emil served as a rabbi in Baltimore, in Louisville, and, from 1880 until his death, in Chicago, at Temple Sinai. A leader of radical Reform, he emphasized the ethical message of Judaism, especially social justice. He put his theories into practice in public life in Chicago, where he worked for laws protecting women and guaranteeing workers' compensation. He edited the Bible section of the Jewish Encyclopedia.

HISDA' (c.217–310), Babylonian amora'. He and his colleague R. *Huna—both disciples of *Rav—were called "the pious men of Babylonia" or "the Elders of *Sura" and increased the prestige of the Sura academy, which Hsida' was instrumental in rebuilding in the year 293. Many of his aggadic and halakhic dicta are quoted in both the Talmud Yerushalmi and the Talmud Bavli. The prayer recited on setting out on a journey (Ber. 29b), Tefillat ha-Derekh*, is ascribed to him. He excelled in penetrating analysis, while his colleague R. Sheshet was famed for the breadth of his knowledge ('Eruv. 67b). Hsida' was extremely orderly in his study (Sot. 39b) and used mnemonic devices to aid memorization ('Eruv. 54b); many of these mnemonic devices have survived in editions of the Talmud. Hsida' believed that the destruction of the Temple altered nature and that climate and wind directions were adversely affected (Ber. 79a).

HISTORICAL MOVEMENT, a school of religious thought in nineteenth-century Germany which sought to take a middle path between the *Reform and the *Orthodox, preserving the authority of Jewish law and tradition while recognizing its ongoing development throughout history and its consequent need to be open to change. It arose in response to the challenge of modernity and the substantial changes in Jewish practice advocated by the Reformers. Also known as the "Positive-Historical School," the movement was allied with emerging trends in modern Jewish scholarship (see WISSENSCHAFT DES JUDENTUMS). Instead of understanding Jewish tradition solely as it understood itself, as reflected in traditional commentaries, the new approach sought to place Jewish texts in their historical context through applying the tools of critical research—cross-cultural studies, linguistic analysis, archaeology, and so forth. The authority of Jewish law, then, derived primarily from the Jewish community's adherence to it, as it evolved in response to changing historical circumstances. This orientation made historical study and historical identity central in defining and motivating Jewish commitment. It was intended that these innovations would lead, in the words of Zacharias *Frankel, the prime founder of this movement, to "moderate reform." This position gradually became the dominant one in Germany, where it also came to be known as Liberal Judaism. In the United States, it formed the ideological foundation for the *Conservative movement. In Israel, it is known as the Masorti movement.

HISTORIOGRAPHY. The history of Judaism commences and receives its most sweeping articulation not in post-biblical interpretation but in the Bible itself. The Bible is both the foundational text of Judaism and the originating point of Jewish historical writing. One of the defining features of biblical historiography is the ascription of divine meaning to historical acts rather than simply the recording of past deeds and events. Thus, the Pentateuch describes the role of God in shaping the historical experience of the Israelites. Moreover, with varying degrees of specificity, the Hebrew Bible records the chief events in ancient Jewish memory: the emergence of the Israelite patriarchs, settlement in and Exodus from Egypt, Sinaitic revelation, conquest of and settlement in Canaan/Erets Yisra'el, the rise and fall of kingship in Erets Yisra'el, and the causes and consequences of exile to Babylonia. The cumulative effect is a grand historical narrative describing the birth and transformation of a major world religion, as well as of a fledgling nation. In Samuel*, Kings*, and Chronicles*, this narrative rests on a rather detailed political history, replete with succession struggles, court intrigues, and military victories and defeats.

This kind of history largely disappeared from post-Biblical Jewish writing. The most important ancient exception was the first-century Jewish soldier and writer, *Josephus, whose historical works, Antiquities of the Jews and The Jewish War, demonstrate a grasp of political and social context reminiscent of contemporaneous Greco-Roman historians. However, after Josephus, Jewish writers spent little time chronicling the political travails of their people. After the fall of the Second Temple, Jews no longer possessed political and territorial sovereignty, and were increasingly subject to geographic dispersion. In this post-Second Temple age, Jewish scholars devoted much effort to the elaboration of enduring legal norms and precepts. The need to fashion a new religious-legal authority and the lack of territorial sovereignty dampened the impulse to write history. That is not to suggest that Jews in late antiquity and medieval times lacked a sense of historical consciousness. They remained highly cognizant of the world around them and developed new "sites of memory"—rituals, liturgy, fast and feast days—to recall past events of religious import.

The specific work of historical chronicling, however, was not commonplace. One of the few works of history to circulate in medieval European Jewish circles was the Sefer Yosippon, a Hebrew account of the Second Temple period attributed to Josephus but probably written by a tenth-century Italian Jew. Other sources of Jewish historical writing in the Middle Ages were the Hebrew "chains of tradition" (shalshelot ha-qabbalah), containing lists of rabbinic luminaries responsible for the transmission of Jewish law over the ages. An impressive example of this genre was Sefer ha-Qabbalah, written by the twelfth-century Spanish philosopher Avraham 'ibn Daud.

An important stimulus to Jewish historical writing in pre-modern times, where it existed, was persecution and tragedy. For example, the devastating effect of the Crusades on central European Jewry prompted a number of Jews to write Hebrew chronicles detailing the extent of destruction and sanctifying the suffering of their coreligionists (12th cent.). Similarly, the expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492 impelled various Jews in the sixteenth century to write accounts of Jewish history leading up to the Spanish expulsion. These include Solomon ibn Verga's Shevet Yehudah, Samuel Usque's Portuguese volume Consolaçam as tribulaçoens de Israel, and Yosef Ha-Kohen's 'Emeq ha-Bakha'. In addition to these books, several other important works of Jewish historiography were produced in the sixteenth century that bore the traces of contemporaneous non-Jewish intellectual currents, in particular an incipient Renaissance historicism. Among the most notable of these were 'Azaryah ben Mosheh dei 'Rossi's Me'or 'Einayim, a work that demonstrates a new critical spirit in analyzing Jewish historical sources, and David Gans's Tsemaḥ David.

Some historians have pointed to this crop of sixteenth-century texts as the beginning of modern Jewish historiography. To a great extent, Jewish historical writing until this period sought to emphasize the unbroken continuity of Jewish history, as well as to explain Jewish tragedy as part of a divine scheme. In this respect, Jewish history was Heilsgeschichte, sacred history whose recording was intended to edify and fortify. Anticipations of a more prosaic sense of history can, in fact, be found in sixteenth-century writers such as ibn Verga and 'Azaryah dei Rossi. However, a mundane sense of historical causality took root only later, with the important changes in political order and religious attitudes that characterized European society in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

Interestingly, the first systematic history of the Jews in modern times was written by a French Huguenot scholar, Jacques Basnage. Set against the backdrop of Protestant criticism of Catholicism, his seven-volume Histoire du peuple juif depuis Jésus Christ jusqu'à présent (1706–1711) reflects a new tolerance toward Jews and their history. At the same time, it is clear that Basnage's primary aim was not to edify the Jewish masses with tales of their past. By contrast, this ambition can be said to mark the new spate of biographical and historical writing among Jewish Enlightenment figures, or Maskilim, in the late eighteenth century. Centered in Berlin, in the 1780s, the Maskilim published a Hebrew journal, Ha-Me'assef, that reflected their reverential attitude toward the Jewish past.

An important new stage in Jewish historiography commenced in 1819 with the creation of the Verein für Kultur und Wissenschaft der Juden (Society for the Culture and Science of the Jews) in Berlin. Members of the Verein applied their recently acquired university training in history, philology, and theology to the study of Jewish sources. Infused with a commitment to scientific study, they sought to claim control over these sources from those whom they regarded as uncritical Jewish traditionalists and biased Christian scholars. One of the most distinguished members of this group was Leopold *Zunz (1794–1886), who wrote many seminal studies in German on Jewish literature, liturgy, and ritual. Zunz's childhood friend, I. M. Jost (1793–1860), published in the 1820s a nine-volume history of the Jews, Geschichte der Israeliten, noteworthy for its dispassion and integrationist thrust. From the next generation of scholars in Germany came the most important Jewish historian of the century. Heinrich *Graetz (1817–1891). Given the prevailing legal and social barriers, Graetz could not find employment in a German university. Rather, he and other scholars of *Wissenschaft des Judentums taught in the new rabbinical seminaries that arose in various Jewish communities in central Europe.

A related though distinct tradition of scholarship known as Ḥokhmat Yisra'el (see WISSENSCHAFT DES JUDENTUMS) developed throughout the nineteenth century. Its main advocates—Shelomoh Yehudah Leib *Rapoport, Naḥman *Krochmal, and Shemu'el David *Luzatto—wrote in Hebrew and regarded their work as continuous with traditional Jewish scholarship. In this respect, they differed from their German-Jewish colleagues who hoped to attain a new position of critical distance from the past. Nevertheless, both sets of scholars remained largely focused in their research endeavors on the religious and literary development of Judaism.

In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the Russian-Jewish historian, Simon *Dubnow, attempted to introduce a "sociological corrective" to previous Jewish historiography. Dubnow's multi-volume Weltgeschichte des jüdischen Volkes revealed his innovative periodization of Jewish history, based on shifting centers of influence, as well as an emphasis on the material condition of the Jewish community throughout history. This new emphasis was replicated by other scholars, particularly those who had come to identify the Jews more as a nation than as a religious group. Eastern European researchers such as Meir Balaban (1877–1942), Jacob Lestschinsky (1876–1966), and Ignacy Schiper (1886–1943) produced important studies, often in Yiddish, of Jewish communal, demographic, and economic history prior to World War II. Meanwhile, at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, a cadre of transplanted Europeans began in the 1920s to advance a new framework for Jewish history that stressed the national dimensions of the Jewish past. This group of scholars, whose most notable first-generation representatives were Yitzhak *Baer, Benzion Dinur (1884–1973), and Gershom Gerhard *Scholem, opened a new chapter in the intellectual and institutional history of Jewish historical scholarship. Scholem, in particular, exerted a dominant influence on Jewish studies internationally as a result of his magisterial research into the history of Jewish mysticism. In part due to the labors of this founding generation of Jerusalem scholars, the largest center of Jewish scholarship in the world now exists in Israel.

The other major world center of Jewish historiography is the United States. The dominant figure among Jewish historians in twentieth-century America has been Salo Wittmayer Baron (1895–1989), whose monumental Social and Religious History of the Jews was the latest and perhaps last multi-volume narrative of Jewish history to be written by one person. Like Simon Dubnow before him, Baron was intensely interested in the social, economic, and communal aspects of Jewish history. He also fought to overturn what he called the "lachrymose conception" of Jewish history, which is characterized by the tendency to reduce that history to a series of unending persecutions and attacks. Many contemporary historians of the Jewish past have affirmed Baron's charge and have attempted to incorporate new methods in social and cultural history into an expanded reading of the Jewish past. The methodological expansion of Jewish history has yielded many new research possibilities. Especially notable in recent decades is the work of historians such as Paula Hyman, who seeks to weave the experience of Jewish women into the narrative of Jewish history.

Even with general scholarly consensus to overturn the "lachrymose conception" of Jewish history, the enormous impact of the Holocaust has proved to be an important countervailing force in Jewish studies over the past half-century. Both in scholarly and popular perception, it has been quite common to associate Jewish history with martyrdom and tragedy. At the same time, the Holocaust has generated a tremendous body of new historical scholarship that now forms an academic sub-field of its own, Holocaust studies. It may also be due to the Holocaust, with its challenge to conventional moral and philosophical assumptions, that a new introspective turn has been taken in Jewish historiography. Beginning in 1982, with the publication of Yosef Hayim Yerushalmi's Zakhor, Jewish historians have been reflecting upon the relationship between their scholarly endeavors and Jewish collective memory. With unprecedented reflexivity, they have started to study the history of their own profession in an attempt to understand the balance between scholarly and extra-scholarly (i.e., existential and ideological) considerations in their work.

HITLAHAVUT (הִתְלַהּוּבִיּוּת; enthusiasm), a term meaning religious ecstasy. In Hasidism, the profound *joy in God is rooted in an inner fervor—hitlahavut—from which one can achieve complete self-effacement. Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer *Ba'al Shem Tov stressed the importance of hitlahavut in prayer, and it is believed that each word of prayer requires concentration (kavvanah; see INTENT) to the extent that one loses consciousness of the self in religious enthusiasm.

HITTITES, a people of the ancient Near East, named as offspring of Heth, Canaan's second son (Gen. 10.15), who inhabited central Anatolia, with their capital at Hattushash (modern Bogazköy). The Hittites, who had a well-developed pantheon and an extensive literature, including a comprehensive legal collection, controlled Asia Minor from the seventeenth through the thirteenth century BCE, but their empire disintegrated under the pressure of the massive immigration of the Sea Peoples. The many city-states that resulted eventually fell to Assyria. The Bible scarcely mentions the great Hittite empire (cf. Jos. 1.4), although it makes a number of references to the Hittite kingdoms in Syria (e.g., 2 Kgs. 7.6). Biblical references to Hittites in Canaan indicate that they dwelt in and around the hill country of Judah (e.g., Nm. 13.29; Jos. 11.3), perhaps as migrants from the once powerful Hittite empire, fully assimilated into the surrounding population.

Ephron the Hittite sold Abraham the cave of Machpelah, in which he buried his wife *Sarah (Gn. 23). Esau married two Hittite women (Gn. 26.2). The destruction of the Hittites was ordered along with all the other Canaanite peoples (Dt. 20.17), though they did intermarry with Israelites (Jgs. 3.5–6). David, after his liaison with Bath-sheba, had her husband, Uriah the Hittite, one of his thirty warriors, dispatched to his death in battle (2 Sm. 11). King Solomon had Hittite women among his harem (1 Kgs. 11.1).

ḤIVI AL-BALKHI (9th cent.), "heretical" polemicist and critic. Born in Balkh (in present-day Afghanistan), he lived in Persia. He expressed his views in his "two hundred critical comments on the Bible." The book itself is lost, but its contents can be reconstructed from the polemical rejoinders it provoked, notably from *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on, which testify to the impact made by the book at the time. Ḥivi seems to have been influenced by gnostic trends.

ḤIYYA' (2d–3d cent.), a Palestinian *tanna', co-redactor, along with his disciple R. Hosha'yah, of the *Tosefta'. Born in Kafri, in Babylonia, Ḥiyya' is regarded as one of the leading authorities of the last generation of tanna'im. He settled in Tiberias, where he became a colleague of R. *Yehudah ha-Nasi'. He also encouraged the development of centers of learning in Babylonia, perhaps out of fear for the future of Palestinian Jewry during this period of hardship and turmoil in the Roman empire.

ḤIYYA' BEN ABBA' (3d–4th cent.), Palestinian amora'. He is sometimes designated as Ḥiyya' II ben Abba', to distinguish him from R. Ḥiyya' (ben Abba') the Elder, the contemporary of R. Yehudah ha-Nasi'. Born into a priestly family in Babylonia, he moved to Erets Yisra'el as a youth, where he studied with R. Ḥanina' and R. Yehoshu'a ben Levi, before becoming the most prominent student of R. Yoḥanan (Ber. 38b). Several of his sons were also prominent amora'im. He is mentioned hundreds of times in the two Talmuds and in the Midrash. He was appointed as an emissary of R. Yehudah ha-Nasi' II and traveled widely throughout Erets Yisra'el and the Diaspora. Known especially as a halakhic scholar, a Talmudic account relates that in one city R. *Abbahu's aggadic teaching drew a large crowd while the halakhic discourse of R. Ḥiyya' was sparsely attended, prompting a conciliatory R. Abbahu to compare aggadic lore to cheap merchandise while likening halakha to precious stones (Sot. 40a). There are, however, numerous Midrashic comments preserved in the name of R. Ḥiyya', among which are his oft-quoted interpretation of Jeremiah 16.11; that is, that God would rather that his people forsake him than his Torah, since through keeping his laws they would return to him (Y., Hag. 1.7, 76c).

HOCHSCHULE FÜR DIE WISSENSCHAFT DES JUDENTUMS (Ger.; High School for Jewish Studies), institute for Jewish studies and for the training of Reform rabbis opened in Berlin in 1872; from 1883 to 1920 it was also known as Lehranstalt für die Wissenschaft des Judentums. The Hochschule, which was founded according to the "scientific approach" to Jewish law advocated by Abraham *Geiger, one of the school's first teachers, remained in existence until it was closed by the Nazis in 1942. Its last head was Leo *Baeck.

HOFFMANN, DAVID TSEVI (1843–1921), Bible and Talmud scholar, lecturer, and, from 1899, principal of the *Berlin Rabbinical Seminary. Hoffmann was a vigorous champion of Orthodoxy both against Reform and against antisemitic attacks on the Talmud and the Shulḥan 'Arukh. He wrote a two-volume work that critically examined the Graf-Wellhausen theories of biblical criticism (see BIBLE) and purported to show the unity of the Pentateuch. He applied these ideas in more detail in his works on Leviticus (2 vols. [1905, 1906]) and Deuteronomy (1913, 1922).

His biography of the Talmudic rabbi Mar Shemu'el (1873) was one of the first scientific historical works by an Orthodox scholar on the Talmudic period and aroused opposition in the Orthodox world. His Die erste Mischna und die Controversen der Tannaim (1882) showed that entire passages of the *Mishnah had been composed before the destruction of the Second Temple. Zur Einleitung in die halachischen Midraschim (1887) demonstrated that contradictions in halakhic midrashim derived from the existence of two competing schools—those of R. 'Aqiva' and R. Yishma'e'l—and from their separate sets of midrashim on Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. Hoffmann's responsa were collected in the three-volume Melammed le-Ho'il (1926–1932).

HOLDHEIM, SAMUEL (1806–1860), German Reform rabbi and religious philosopher. Under his tutelage, the Berlin congregation, which he served from 1847 until his death, became the center of Reform Judaism's most radical and revolutionary expression. He held that with their integration into the modern world, Jews should strive to reduce the barriers between themselves and "non-Jewish monotheists" and, concomitantly, to eliminate the national, particularistic aspects of traditional Judaism. In this spirit, his reforms included the transference of the Sabbath from Saturday to Sunday, and the sanctioning of intermarriage. Theologically, he justified these innovations by making a distinction between the eternal religious and ethical teachings of Judaism, and its ceremonial laws embodying ultimately transitory political and national principles. Although his following in Germany was limited, his disciples in the United States exercised a major influence on the direction that Reform Judaism was to take in that country in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. He wrote Über die Autonomie der Rabbinen und das Prinzip der jüdischen Ehl (1843).

HOL HA-MO'ED (חול המועד; the weekday of the festival), the intermediate days of the festivals of Pesah (days three through six in the Diaspora, days two through six in Israel) and Sukkot (days three through seven in the Diaspora, days two through seven in Israel). The pertinent regulations treat these days as a combination of weekday and festival. Only urgent work should be performed, although normal work is permitted if done with a distinguishing difference. *Mourning is restricted, while marriages are not performed since one does not "commingle one joy with another." A special prayer, *Ya'aleh ve-Yavo', is inserted in the 'Amidah and Birkat ha-Mazon; *Hallel is recited (Half Hallel on Pesah), as is Musaf; and special scriptural passages are read. There is a difference of opinion as to whether *tefillin should be donned; Sephardim and Hasidim do not, while Mitnaggedim do, but without reciting the customary blessing. In Israel, where the festive aspect of these days is more pronounced than elsewhere, the custom of not donning tefillin is almost universal. The Talmudic tractate *Mo'ed Qatan is devoted to the regulations governing hol ha-mo'ed.

HOLINESS (Heb. qedushah). In an ethical sense, holiness signifies the attainment of moral purity and perfection through right conduct and especially by imitating the divine attributes (see IMITATION OF GOD). Essentially holiness is an attribute of God, who alone is "holy with every form of holiness" (Y., Ber. 9a), and the most common epithet for God in rabbinical literature is "The Holy One, blessed be He." Man attains holiness to the extent that he consciously models his life and conduct on the known attributes of God: "As he is merciful, so be you merciful; as he is gracious, be you gracious" (Shab. 133b). Originally, however, holiness was not an ethical term; the basic concept is rather one of "separateness," the divine attribute of being apart from that which is not divine. As a result of the *covenant with God, Israel, too, became "separate" (Ex. 19.6; Dt. 7.6) and accepted a state of holiness that was to inform henceforth all its activities and even to have physical implications (see HOLY CITY; HOLY LAND; HOLY PLACE). Israel is separated as a holy people; the priests and Levites are separated as a holy caste responsible for the Temple ritual; the Sabbath is separated as a holy day; the Temple itself was out of bounds to profane access, and objects belonging to it, including, for example, sacrificial animals, were holy; that is, separate from profane use. The obligation of holiness falls on the individual as part of a holy people, and any shortcomings on the part of the individual reflect on the entire people. Failures in the ceremonial sphere cause a state of ritual impurity that must be expurged by a prescribed ritual. Apart from ceremonial holiness, greater stress came to be laid on holiness in the ethical sense as it affected personal character. The prophets clashed with the priesthood over the question of emphasis; they did not negate ceremonial holiness but proclaimed it meaningless without concomitant ethical holiness. The rabbinic code was devoted to sanctifying all of human life, and with this object in mind a daily routine was prescribed by which the Jew would always feel himself part of a holy people. More specifically, the rabbis on occasion connected holiness with the prohibition against sexual license, interpreting the verse "You shall be holy" (Lv. 19.2) as "you shall be separated from sexual immorality" (see RASHI) and adding that the word was always employed in connection with this aspect of right living (Sifra). Accordingly, Maimonides gives the title Qedushah to the fifth book of his code, which deals with sexual relationships. Similarly the rabbis connect holiness with the dietary laws because of the juxtaposition (both in Lv. 11.45 and Lv. 20.26) of the prohibition against unclean animals, birds, and insects with the commandment to be holy. Nevertheless the separation implicit in holiness is by no means to be regarded as a withdrawal from the world and its temptations, and Judaism has in the main opposed reclusion and extreme asceticism. It insists on the attainment of holiness by remaining separate from contaminating things but still living in their presence. It is this idea that runs through Leviticus 19—the so-called "Chapter of Holiness." The words "You shall be holy" are the keynote to the chapter, and the various precepts must be read in connection with it. Holiness is not so much an abstract or a mystic idea as a regulative principle in the everyday life of men and women. It is attained not by flight from the world, nor by renunciation of human relationship of family or station, but by the spirit in which the obligations of life in its simplest and commonest details are fulfilled. According to the rabbis, man has only to set his feet on the road to holiness to receive divine aid in its attainment: "If a man sanctify himself a little, he becomes sanctified much; if he sanctify himself below, he becomes sanctified from on high" (Yoma 39a). The classical exposition of the ladder of virtues by which man rises to holiness was set forth in Mosheh Hayyim Luzzatto's Mesillat Yesharim. See also SANCTIFICATION.

HOLOCAUST, RELIGIOUS RESPONSES DURING THE. For a Jew to maintain religious observances under the circumstances of the Holocaust became a supreme mitsvah, seen as a form of qiddush ha-hayyim (sanctification of life). Despite the circumstances, Jews found ways to pray together and to observe the life and annual festival cycles. Circumcisions were performed in the ghettos despite the risks involved. Observant women sought immersion in the miqveh in the Warsaw Ghetto. Jewish burial societies (see HEVRAH QADDISHA') struggled to ensure ritually proper burials under the most hostile conditions for those who died in the ghettos and on forced marches from starvation, beatings, and shootings. In the camps, where prayer books or study texts were not available, fragments from scripture, liturgy, or the Talmud were reproduced by hand.

The struggle to maintain a normal pattern of religious activity led to a responsa* literature. The replies of rabbinic authorities to ritual questions and ethical dilemmas reflect the effort to maintain the faith. Among the notable responsa were those by R. Tsevi Hirsh Meisels (Meqadshe ha-Shem), R. Efrayim Oshry (Mi-Ma'amaqim), and R. Yehi'el Weinberg (Seridei Esh). See also HOLOCAUST THEOLOGY.

HOLOCAUST THEOLOGY. While World War II was still raging, the question was already being asked: How could an omnipotent and merciful God, who had entered into a special covenant with his chosen people, have allowed this to happen? In 1944 Reform rabbi and Hebrew University chancellor Judah L. Magnes quoted R. *Levi Yitshaq of Berdichev, who addressed God: "I do not ask why I suffer but only do I suffer for your sake?" Many Orthodox rabbis said that for those with faith there are no questions; for those without faith there are no answers. Rabbi Issachar Jacobsohn urged: "We must give up the idea of arriving at a rational explanation of the Holocaust in order to remain believers."

Some Orthodox authorities found an explanation for the Holocaust in the traditional belief that suffering must be the result of sinfulness. They blamed the calamities visited upon the Jewish people on their faithlessness to the divine covenant, sometimes linking their accusations to post-emancipatory developments, notably the emergence of Reform and Conservative Judaism, while others blamed Zionists, who refused to await the messianic age when the Jews would miraculously be returned to their land. One Hungarian Orthodox rabbi, Issachar Shelomoh Teichtal, in his Em ha-Banim Seme'ah (Budapest, 1943), blamed the Holocaust on the Orthodox leaders' sin of anti-Zionism. Since they had rejected the chance to end the exile, the exile had finished them.

In the years following the Holocaust, Jewish thought has been dominated by Holocaust theology and its implications. Leading Jewish thinkers who survived the Holocaust reexamined their attitudes. Leo *Baek shifted his prewar emphasis on Judaism (This People Israel [1965]) to stress Jewish peoplehood and his belief in Jewish rebirth, exemplified by the emergence of the State of Israel. Martin Buber asked whether it was still possible to enter into a relationship or dialogue with God and found his answer in the concept of the "eclipse of God" (a variation on the old Jewish theme of hester panim; The Eclipse of God [1952]). This theory found its critics, among them Israeli philosopher Eliezer Schweid, who wrote that hester panim was a punishment and that no sin could deserve the punishment of the Holocaust; if any event warranted divine intervention, this was surely it. To say that at that very moment God turned his face away in order to allow man freedom was a theological prevarication (Holocaust and Genocide Studies 3, no. 4 [1988]). To Schweid, the problem raised by the Holocaust is not the justification of God but the justification of religion; the implications are more severe for Christians than for Jews because of the historical ethical failure of Christianity.

One subject that has been widely debated is the uniqueness of the Holocaust. Elie Wiesel wrote, "In the beginning was the Holocaust," and called it a new Jewish Sinai, a revelatory event, in which context all Jewish thought must now be set. In the words of Immanuel Jakobovits, however, "The size of suffering can hardly affect its justice or meaning. A single baby's cot death [crib death] may theologically be no less baffling than the deliberate genocide of millions." United States theologian Eugene Borowitz denied that the Holocaust is the Sinai of our time; he argues that the terms of the covenant are unchanged after the Holocaust and that God still acts in history. Others have drawn distinctions between the Holocaust's historical uniqueness and its theological uniqueness.

Another view was advanced by Richard Rubenstein, in line with the fashionable "Death of God" theology. In his After Auschwitz (1966) Rubenstein held that the Holocaust refuted the existence of God and of meaning in the universe. All attempts to justify God's part in the Holocaust are ultimately meaningless, and to say that God's ways are beyond comprehension is an insult to human judgment and dignity. At the same time, Rubenstein emphasized the supreme value of life and the importance of the Jewish religious community. Irving Greenberg believes that the Holocaust shattered the covenant and suggests that faith in a covenant of redemption be replaced by a new covenant to be formulated in terms of empowerment. The lesson of the Holocaust is that powerlessness is immoral, because it is not compatible with survival. The existence of the State of Israel validates continuing faith in God and constitutes a redeeming act, which matches the great catastrophe. Another lesson is that the embrace of modernity was a profound blunder, and Jews must learn to resist the absoluteness of the secular.

Emil Fackenheim says that God was present in Auschwitz, where he issued his 614th commandment—the obligation of survival. Individual Jews may deny God, but the Jewish people cannot, for their reality is his. It is no longer useful to distinguish between religious and secular Jews—any Jew who contributes to Jewish continuity fulfills the new, supreme commandment (The Jewish Return into History [1978]).

Orthodox rabbi Eliezer Berkovits holds that God's hiddenness creates the possibility for autonomous human action and leaves man the choice between good and evil. United States theologian Arthur A. Cohen concluded that God does not have the power to interfere in human affairs. He calls for the redefinition of the God concept, noting that "what is taken as God's speech is really always man's hearing" and that God is not a direct causal agent in human affairs.

For many thinkers, the establishment of the State of Israel was the answer to the theological problem of the Holocaust. To Fackenheim, the Jew in the State of Israel bears witness to the voice of Auschwitz in a way that is impossible in the Diaspora. Elie Wiesel, however, argues that any link between the Holocaust and Israel diminishes both—they are two different mysteries, one historic, the other messianic. To Schweid, theologians who seize upon the State of Israel are trying to escape from a very real dilemma. Two noted theologians, Abraham Joshua Heschel and André Neher, felt that in view of the enormity of the events of the Holocaust the only course for man is silence.

HOLY CITY, the traditional term for *Jerusalem. All cities that were believed to have been surrounded by walls at the time of the conquest of Erets Yisra'el by Joshua are also invested with a special holiness, though less so than Jerusalem. The Mishnah (Kel. 1.6–9) speaks of the ten concentric circles of geographical holiness that radiate out from Jerusalem and the various parts of the Temple, including the Holy of Holies. Beginning in the seventeenth century, three other cities in Erets Yisra'el came to be regarded as holy—*Hebron, because of its association with the patriarchs and matriarchs; *Tiberias, because it had become the religious focus of the country after the Bar Kokhba' Revolt; and *Safed, because it was the center of the kabbalists in the sixteenth century.

HOLY LAND (Heb. Erets ha-Qodesh). According to Kelim 1.6, "The Land of Israel is holier than any other land." This statement is true not only for Jews but also for Christians and, to a lesser extent, Muslims. The phrase "Holy Land" or "holy soil" is applied only once in the Bible to Erets Yisra'el (Zec. 2.16), but it is nevertheless clearly regarded as the land "which the Lord your God cared for" (Dt. 11.12) and is holy in the sense of being selected and set apart for the *chosen people. Promised by God to the descendants of Abraham in a secured covenant (Gn. 17.8), it became the "Promised Land." Legally, its sanctity was expressed in the fact that certain commandments could be fulfilled only in Israel. Consequently the question was raised whether the sanctity with which it was endowed after the conquest by Joshua ceased with the Babylonian exile and whether all the land or only those portions that were occupied by the returned exiles was endowed with a permanent sanctity (Eduy. 8.6; Hul. 7a). Over and above these legal considerations however, the sentiment of the Jewish people invested the land with imperishable holiness. The Talmud (e.g., Ket end.) provides many examples of the manner in which the rabbis gave expression to their love for the Holy Land. This love was echoed throughout Jewish literature, both lyrical and doctrinal, and finds its most vivid expression in the liturgy. Rabbinic and kabbalistic texts did not recoil from the most extravagant statements in glorifying the Holy Land, the merit of dwelling in it, and the spiritual graces (prophecy in particular) attainable in it. The holiness of the land led to the custom of taking to Israel for burial the remains of those who died abroad, and the rabbis said, "Whoever is buried in the Land of Israel is as if he were buried beneath the altar." The custom elicited a vigorous protest from R. Yehudah ha-Nasi' (2d. cent. CE), despite the fact that its first instances are those of the biblical Jacob and Joseph (Gn. Rab. 96.8). Throughout the centuries it was customary for Jews in the Diaspora to be buried with earth brought from the Holy Land. See also ZIONISM.

HOLY OF HOLIES. See TEMPLE.

HOLY PLACE. Every spot where God manifests himself becomes holy. Moses was bidden at the bush, "Do not come closer; remove your sandals from off your feet, for the place on which you stand is holy ground" (Ex. 3.5). Mount Sinai was a holy place for the period of the revelation only, during which time the people were forbidden to set foot there (Ex. 19.23). The *Temple likewise was holy, and gentiles and those in a state of ritual impurity were forbidden to enter it. The holiest of all places in Jewish tradition was the *Holy of Holies, which was barred to all but the high priest, and even he could enter only on Yom Kippur. Subsequent Jewish tradition has maintained the holiness of the Temple site, which should, therefore, not be visited in Orthodox tradition, because of the irremovable ritual impurity attached to individual Jews in the post-Temple period. Among Eastern Jews, even outside Erets Yisra'el, various locations have been invested with the sanctity of a holy place as the real or reputed sites of the graves of outstanding biblical and post-biblical figures. In many instances regular *pilgrimages take place to these shrines on specific days. Thus in Hamadan, Persia, the reputed graves of Esther and Mordecai were visited at the end of every month and on Purim; the Babylonian Jews venerated the site of the traditional grave of Ezra at Shatt al-Arab at the confluence of the Tigris and Euphrates rivers, and at Alkush, near Mosul, the grave of the prophet Nahum is venerated. In Israel, Mount Meron near Safed—the reputed burial place of R. Shim'on bar Yoḥ'ai, the traditional author of the Zohar—has become the site of a mass celebration on Lag ba-'Omer, although the custom was strongly denounced as near idolatry by many authorities, from the sixteenth century rabbis of Safed to R. Mosheh *Sofer in the nineteenth century. Many sites in Galilee were purportedly identified as the graves of distinguished Talmudic rabbis by the sixteenth-century Lurianic kabbalists in Safed and became the objects of the accepted tour of Orthodox pilgrims. The reputed grave of King David on Mount Zion is particularly venerated by *Adot ha-Mizrah. Other traditional holy places are the cave of *Machpelah in Hebron and the Tomb of Rachel on the road from Jerusalem to Bethlehem, and the *Western Wall in Jerusalem. Frequent interreligious and intrareligious conflicts over the holy sites of Jews, Christians, and Muslims have occurred throughout the history of the Holy Land. To some extent these conflicts were regulated by an Ottoman document known as the "Status Quo," recognized by subsequent régimes, although friction has continued over disputed sites. In 1967 the Israeli parliament passed a law guaranteeing respect for the holy sites of all faiths.

HOMBERG, HERZ (1749–1841), Haskalah educator. Born in Lieben (Bohemia), he studied at yeshivot in Prague, Bratislava, and Głogów. In Breslau, Berlin, and Hamburg he acquired knowledge of languages and mathematics, as well as an interest in pedagogy. Homberg was held in high regard by Moses Mendelssohn, who, in 1779, hired him to tutor his son Joseph and, in 1782, invited him to contribute to his German Bible translation Bi'ur. Homberg taught in Gorizia and Trieste and in 1787 was appointed superintendent of the Galician-Jewish school district, where he established over a hundred German-language schools, including a teachers' seminary. He recommended that civil rights be extended to Jews only on condition that they be thoroughly acculturated and that traditional educational institutions and "superstitious" Jewish texts be abolished. His own text, Benei Zion (1812), was made mandatory reading in all Hapsburg Jewish schools. Homberg's pedagogic dogmatism and willing collaboration with non-Jewish authorities, however, met with the fierce opposition of the local Jewish community, and he was forced to leave Galicia. After a dozen years as Jewish book censor in Vienna, Homberg became a teacher of religion and ethics in Prague in 1814.

HOMICIDE. "You shall not murder" (Ex. 20.13) is one of the Ten Commandments; willful murder is a capital crime for which no expiation is possible other than the forfeiture of the life of the murderer (Nm. 35.31–33; see CAPITAL PUNISHMENT). Failure to expiate the crime of murder renders society guilty (Dt. 19.10) and the land polluted (Nm. loc. cit.). Thus, even in a case where the murderer is unknown, the Bible ordains the ceremony of eglah 'arufah* (Dt. 21.1–9), in order to free society from the taint of innocent blood shed in its midst. The prohibition against homicide was formally and explicitly enjoined upon Noah (see NOAHIC LAWS)—“Whosoever sheds man’s blood, by man shall his blood be shed, for in the image of God made he man” (Gn. 9.6)—and is already presupposed in the original order of creation as implied in the story of Cain’s murder of his brother Abel (Gn. 4.8–16). The capital punishment suffered by the murderer serves both as an expiation for the community at large and as *atonement for the criminal, provided repentance and a full confession are made. The only instances of what might be called justifiable homicide are: self-defense, which applies not only when one’s life is directly threatened but also when there exists reasonable certainty that one’s life might be in danger (see BURLARY; this also applies in the case of war); when one pursues another with the intention of taking that individual’s life (rodef), it is justifiable for anyone to prevent the attempted crime, even by taking the pursuer’s life; and when one sees another pursuing a victim with the intention of committing rape, adultery, incest, or an unnatural sexual act, one is obligated to prevent the crime by taking the assailant’s life.

In these instances the assailant is intent upon a crime that is punishable by death or excision (karet*); the taking of a life is condoned only where other means, such as wounding, prove ineffective in preventing the crime. If such means could have been attempted but were not, the rescuer is considered a murderer (San. 74a). However, the punishment of the rescuer is left to divine intervention and not to a human court. Moreover, once the crime has been committed, it is forbidden to take the law into one’s own hands. Accidental manslaughter is punished by banishment to one of the forty-eight cities of refuge (see ASYLUM). The court trying a case of murder must consist of no less than twenty-three fully qualified judges (San. 26b). While the court may acquit by a simple majority vote, a majority of at least two votes is necessary for a conviction. In the event the accused is sentenced to death, the judges must fast until evening. Circumstantial *evidence, even of the most compelling kind, is not acceptable in court. To be convicted, the intention of both the act and its result must be proved and the death of the victim must have resulted from the direct and immediate blow of the accused. If, after summing up the evidence, one of the judges is unable to render a decision, two more judges are added to the bench, a new trial commenced, and the previous proceedings rendered void. In rabbinic law, capital punishment can be imposed only after the fulfillment of conditions so stringent (e.g., two eyewitnesses must have forewarned the murderer of the gravity of the crime he was about to commit [see WARNING]; the Sanhedrin must be sitting in the Temple) that a death sentence was an extremely rare event. When carried out, execution for homicide was by means of the sword. If the crime of homicide was proved but the requisite conditions for the death penalty had not been fulfilled, rabbinic law provides for lengthy *imprisonment. In the State of Israel, homicide is not punishable by death. See also ABORTION; EUTHANASIA.

HOMILETICS. While it is debatable whether the orations of Moses and the prophets should be considered sermons, the Levites’ explication of Torah verses read at a public gathering (Neh. 8.7–9) appears to be a model emulated by subsequent preachers. Jewish synagogue oratory continued through the Hellenistic and Roman periods; some examples may have been preserved in early Christian sources (e.g., Mt. 5.1–7.27—the Sermon on the Mount—and Acts 13.16–41).

Rabbinic literature contains many references to the obligation of preaching, especially in connection with holidays (Meg. 32a), and to the actual circumstances of sermon delivery (Gn. Rab. 98.11). Distinctive homiletical forms were developed. Aggadic midrashim contain extensive material based on synagogue sermons (derashot; see AGGADAH; MIDRASH). Yet the vast rabbinic literature has apparently not preserved even a single text of a sermon as actually delivered, in contrast to the hundreds of recorded sermons delivered by the church fathers. The reason for this absence (beyond the prohibition of transcribing what was said on the Sabbath) has not been satisfactorily explained.

Documents in the Cairo Genizah show that preaching continued throughout the early Middle Ages in Islamic lands. The earliest extant collections of sermons date from thirteenth-century southern Europe. These model sermons reflect a continuity of form from the rabbinic period. Beginning with a verse from the Hagiographa, they explore different meanings of that verse before applying it to the Torah lesson for the week. They then proceed to a discussion of various topics pertaining to the lesson.

A different form, clearly influenced by medieval Christian homiletics, emerges in the late fifteenth century. The preacher begins with a verse from the Torah lesson (the nose [theme]), often followed by a rabbinic dictum (ma’amar). In sermons for special occasions, an elaborate formal introduction is used. The preacher then focuses on a particular issue (the derush). Sometimes a series of problems (sefeqot) is raised and eventually resolved.

As for content, holiday sermons frequently reviewed and explained the detailed obligations that Jews had to fulfill. The nonlegal components were generally grounded in exegesis of biblical verses and rabbinic statements, including imaginative puns on the Hebrew wording of proof texts. Jewish preachers (e.g., Ya’aqov Anatoli, 13th cent.) began to use philosophical material, giving allegorical interpretations of biblical stories and discussing philosophical problems. Citations of Aristotle became frequent, and some sermons employed philosophical modes of reasoning such as the syllogism and the scholastic “disputed question” (Yosef and Shem Tov ibn Shem Tov, 15th cent.). These developments aroused opposition, but attempts to suppress them were unsuccessful.

Despite a greater reluctance to discuss kabbalistic material from the pulpit, some preachers did so (Yehoshu'a ibn Shu'eib, early 14th cent.). The noted Talmudist Yitshaq Aboab (late 15th cent.) incorporated both technical philosophy and kabbalistic literature into his sermons. Preachers criticized the religious shortcomings of the community. In times of disaster, they turned to exhortation and solace. Parables serving as vivid illustration of a difficult point were used for their didactic and entertainment value. Beginning in the fifteenth century, the *eulogy (hesped) became an increasingly important genre of Jewish homiletics.

In lands of the Mediterranean basin and in the Sephardi Diaspora, many rabbis preached each Sabbath. Writings by Shelomoh ha-Levi in Salonika (16th cent.), Saul Levi Morteira in Amsterdam (17th cent.), and Isaac Cantarini in Padua (17th cent.) include the sermons they delivered each week over many years. In northern and eastern Europe, preaching was the primary responsibility of specialists appointed to the position of maggid*. There were also itinerant preachers, some of whom were treated with disdain, while others (e.g., Ya'aqov Krantz, the Maggid of Dubno, 18th cent.), achieved enormous renown. In eastern Europe and elsewhere, leading rabbis preached twice a year—on Shabbat Shuvah (before Yom Kippur) and Shabbat ha-Gadol (before Pesah). These sermons were usually lengthy expositions of halakhic themes.

In the nineteenth century, preaching became a part of the controversy over the new Reform movement in Germany. While sermons had always been delivered in the vernacular, the Reformers' innovation made the German sermon a central part of the worship service; their preaching emphasized edification rather than exegesis. In twentieth-century America, weekly sermons prevailed in modern Orthodoxy and in the Conservative and Reform movements, and homiletics became part of the syllabus of rabbinical seminaries. Some of the most influential rabbis in American Jewish life, including Stephen S. Wise, Abba Hillel Silver, Solomon Freehof, Israel Levinthal, Milton Steinberg, Joseph Lookstein, were celebrated as preachers.

HOMOSEXUALITY. Male homosexual relations, specifically in a Canaanite context, are prohibited in Leviticus 18.22 and 20.13. Rabbinic sources extend this prohibition to all contexts (San. 53a and following; Yev. 83b; Ker. 2a and following; Ned. 51a), and they also forbid female homosexual sex (Shab. 65a; Yev. 76a; Sifrei 98; Mishneh Torah, "Laws of Forbidden Intercourse" 21.8; Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 20.2). Male homosexual relations were considered an abomination to be punished by death (Lev. 20.13), although the incidence of homosexuality was thought to be so rare that the Talmud states, and Maimonides concurs, that Jews were not suspect of the practice (Qid. 82; Yad, Issurei Bi'ah 22.2). However, the sixteenth-century Shulhan 'Arukh asserts that "in these generations, when sexual licentiousness is rampant, a man should distance himself from lying together with another man" (Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 24.1). In recent years, many Jews have challenged the traditional Jewish stance. In general, the Reform and Reconstructionist movements have been more accepting of homosexuality than has the Conservative movement. The rabbis of the Reform movement passed a resolution in 1977 that "encourage[s] legislation which decriminalizes homosexual acts between consenting adults and prohibits discrimination against them as persons." In 1991 and 1992 the rabbinic and synagogue arms of the Conservative movement passed similar resolutions. In 1996, same-sex civil marriages were endorsed by the U.S. Reform rabbinical organization. Conservative rabbinic rulings have forbidden officiating at commitment ceremonies for homosexuals; Reconstructionist and many Reform rabbis, and a few Conservative rabbis, are willing to perform them. Sexually active homosexuals have been accepted into the rabbinical and cantorial schools of the Reform and Reconstructionist movements though not into those of the Conservative movement. Also, synagogues with special outreach to homosexuals have gained affiliation with the Reform and Reconstructionist synagogue organizations but not with the Conservative synagogue association. The Orthodox have continued to denounce homosexual sex while accepting the homosexual as a full, but sinning, Jew.

ḤONI HA-ME'AGGEL (died 65 BCE), a pietist (hasid), known as the Circle-Drawer or the Roof-Roller; a scrupulous observer of the Law, who also performed some good deeds that are said to have been accomplished through extraordinary powers of prayer or as miracles. All the sources (Mishnah, Tosefta, Talmud, Megillat Ta'anit, Josephus) record a single story about his power to bring rain in times of drought. According to the Mishnah version (Ta'an. 3.8): "Once it happened that they said to Honi the Circle-Drawer, 'Pray that rain may fall' . . . He prayed but no rain fell. What did he do? He drew a circle and stood within it, and said before God, 'Master of the Universe, your children have set their faces to me, for that I am as a son of the household before you. I swear by your great name that I will not stir hence until you will have compassion upon your children.' Rains commenced to trickle. He said, 'Not for such rain did I pray, but for rain which will fill the cisterns, pits, and caves.'" The Mishnah relates that he then prayed for adjustment of the rainfall until it was satisfactory. Later, the sage Shim'on ben Shetaḥ, according to tradition president of the Sanhedrin, said to him, "Had you not been Honi, I would have excommunicated you [for importuning God in this manner of prayer], but you act before the Lord like a son who importunes before his father, and he fulfills his desires."

Honi's death account is preserved in rabbinic sources and in Josephus. During a conflict between John Hyrcanus and his brother Aristobulus, Honi was told to place a curse on Aristobulus and his followers. When he refused, he was stoned to death. According to legend, Honi slept for seventy years and on awakening prayed for death rather than living in a strange world.

HONOR (Heb. kavod). [For the theological use of the term kavod, see KAVOD.] In the first place, honor is due to God, the source of all honor (Prv. 3.9; Mal. 1.6), and, according to the Bible, also to parents (Ex. 20.12), the Sabbath (Is. 18.13), the aged (Lv. 19.32), and the God-fearing (Ps. 15.4). The rabbis also emphasize the honor due to one's teacher, since "the father only ensures him life in this world, while the teacher brings him to the life of the world to come" (B. M. 33a). The rabbinic saying "Let the honor of your friend be as dear to you as your own" (Avot 2.15) enjoins both the duty of self-respect and the honor due to others. The honor of others takes precedence even over the observance of a negative mitsvah (Ber. 19b). Honor is to be paid to royalty (Ex. Rab. 4), the patriarch (Ket. 17a), scholars, and the Torah. The Talmud discusses whether a person can renounce the honor that is due him and concludes that a king (Ket. 17a) and a teacher (Qid. 32b) may not. At the same time, the rabbis repeatedly and severely condemned the seeking of honor: "Honor flees from him who pursues it, but it pursues him who flees from it" (Eruv. 13b). It is an expression of respect, and a person can be punished for offending another's honor.

HORA'AT SHA'AH (הוראת שעה; teaching for the hour), the temporary suspension of biblical prohibitions in cases of emergency. The Talmudic source for this power of the court is the action taken by Elijah in offering sacrifices on Mount Carmel rather than in the Temple in Jerusalem (I Kgs. 18.19–46). Although this deed contravened two biblical prohibitions, it was permitted, since its purpose was to restore the people to faith and save many Jews from falling into sin (Yev. 90b). Maimonides provides a medical parable for this judicial function: "Just as a physician amputates a hand or foot to save a life, so a court in appropriate circumstances may decree a temporary violation of some of the commandments so that their totality will be preserved" (Hilkhot Mamrim 2.4).

HORAYOT (הוריות; Rulings), last tractate of Mishnah order Neziqin, consisting of three chapters, with related material in the Tosefta' and both Talmuds. The tractate deals with the different sin offerings required to expiate transgressions of the community, the high priest, or the king (Lv. 4). According to Horayot, the special sin offerings of the community and of the high priest are brought only when the transgression is committed as a result of a mistaken halakhic ruling, hence the name of the tractate. The laws of sacrifices serve as point of departure for an in-depth analysis of the procedures used by the *Sanhedrin to issue rulings and of the character of the Sanhedrin's authority.

Following a comparative analysis of the positions of high priest and king, the tractate concludes with a hierarchy of the different levels of sanctity of the Jewish people. The final words of the tractate express the superiority of personal merit over inherited rank: "A mamzer Torah scholar takes precedence over an ignorant high priest."

The tractate was translated into English by Herbert Danby in The Mishnah (Oxford, 1933).

HOROWITZ, PINHAS BEN TSEVI HIRSH (c.1730–1805), German rabbi. Born in Poland, Horowitz gained wide note as an antagonist of the prominent R. Yehezqel Landau of Prague in a controversy over the validity of a bill of divorce. Horowitz's reputation as an outstanding halakhist earned him an appointment, in 1771, as rabbi of Frankfurt, where he soon was embroiled in the conflict between the town authorities and R. Natan Adler over the latter's Hasidic tendencies. Horowitz, despite his own Hasidic leanings and his friendship with Adler, joined the ban because of the latter's refusal to accept communal discipline. He also opposed Moses Mendelssohn's German translation of and commentary on the Bible, Bi'ur, charging that Mendelssohn systematically rejected the traditional rabbinic understandings of the biblical text. Horowitz was the author of Sefer Hafla'ah, a pilpulistic commentary to the Talmudic tractates Ketubbot and Qiddushin.

HOROWITZ FAMILY, a family of Polish scholars.

Avraham ben Shabbetai Sheftel Horowitz (c.1550–1615), Polish scholar and moralist. A student of Mosheh Isserles, he lived in Kraków, Lemberg (Lwów), where he was dayyan, and Prague, where he died. In his youth, he was attracted to philosophy and secular study, perhaps under the influence of Sephardi tradition. In 1557 he wrote two moralistic works, Ḥesed Avraham and Berit Avraham (Kraków, c.1602), a commentary on Maimonides' Shemoneh Peraqim. In 1559 he wrote a pamphlet attacking the rabbi of Poznań for preaching against Maimonides. Later, he returned to Ashkenazi tradition and was influenced by the kabbalistic ideas then spreading. His work 'Emeq Berakhah (Kraków, 1597), a halakhic exposition on the benedictions, and the revised edition of his 1557 books (1602), reveal this changed emphasis. He is best known for his ethical will Yesh Nohalin (1615), to which his sons and grandson added notes (Amsterdam, 1701).

Yeshe'yahu Horowitz (c.1570–1626), Polish rabbi and kabbalist, known as Shelah after the acronym of his main work; son of Avraham ben Shabbetai Sheftel. He studied under his father and at yeshivot in Lublin and Lemberg before serving as rabbi in Dubno and, in 1606, Frankfurt am Main. In 1614 he was appointed rabbi of Prague, and in 1621 he went to Jerusalem, where he became rabbi of the Ashkenazi community. He died in Tiberias and was buried close to Maimonides. Horowitz wrote kabbalistic notes on his father's 'Emeq Berakhah; they were published together in Kraków in 1597. In his youth, he wrote a commentary on the medieval halakhic text, Mordekhai, part of which was published after his death (Bigdei Yeshe' [Kraków, 1757]). His most important work was the compendium Shenei Luhot ha-Berit, which he compiled while in Jerusalem. The major purpose of this extensive and multifaceted book was the presentation of halakhah as a basis for spiritual life. The work is divided into two parts; the first, arranged in order of the Talmudic tractates, contains the laws pertaining to the sequence of festivals in the calendar, while the second part presents the laws in the order in which they appear in the Torah. It concludes with a section on Talmudic methodology and hermeneutics and an ethical passage dedicated to his children.

Horowitz's use of the sources was remarkably wide, and though opposed to the study of the Greek philosophers, he did quote works of Jewish philosophy. He approved of halakhic compendia as a study tool, and although he felt that Shelomoh Luria's work on the dietary laws was superior, he agreed that Mosheh Isserles should be followed as the accepted authority. An important halakhist, he took an independent and often innovative stance on questions of Jewish law, opposing accepted customs inconsistent with halakhah and advocating new customs, particularly under kabbalistic auspices. Horowitz was heavily influenced by the kabbalistic thought of Yitshaq Luria, Mosheh Cordovero, and Yosef Karo, and although not an original thinker as a kabbalist, he was able to harmonize the thought of early mystics, the Zohar, and the later Safed masters. According to Horowitz, humans were created with free will to choose between good and evil, since all potentialities are contained within the Creator. The aim of humanity is to achieve mystical union with God by achieving perfection through study, contemplation, and adherence to his precepts. Revelation is an ongoing process. Horowitz saw qiddush ha-Shem (martyrdom) as an expression of the human ability to cleave to God even when physically prevented from fulfilling God's precepts, and he prescribed a special preparatory prayer to be recited by those about to face such a fate. He also proposed a new educational system for Ashkenazi society: the systematic and grammatical study of the entire Bible, followed by step-by-step study of the entire Mishnah and the Talmud, advancing to the later halakhic authorities. The intellectual and moral elite could progress to studying the Zohar, but Horowitz was of the opinion that the secrets of mysticism should be transmitted orally and not made generally available.

His other published works include a prayer book and commentary (Sha'ar Shamayim [Amsterdam, 1717]), notes on the Zohar (1882), and novellae (Kraków, 1729). Shenei Luhot ha-Berit was extremely influential among the Jews of eastern Europe for many generations, playing a role in the early development of Hasidic thought. The authoritative edition of Shenei Luhot ha-Berit was published in Amsterdam in 1648.

HOSANNA. See HOSHA'NOT.

HOSEA (Heb. Hoshe'a; 8th cent. BCE), son of Beeri; a prophet from the northern kingdom of Israel who, according to the superscription of the biblical Book of Hosea, prophesied during the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and of Jeroboam II, king of Israel, prior to the Assyrian invasions of Israel under Tiglath-pileser III (745–727). Hosea is the only prophet to have come originally from northern Israel, which explains the distinctive character and difficulties of his language. Hosea's message centers around a condemnation of the northern kingdom of Israel for its religious infidelity to God and its willingness to enter into a political alliance with Assyria to carry out trade with Egypt (cf. 7.8-11; 8.9; 12.1). To this end, Hosea condemns the monarchy, and the priests in particular, for not teaching the true knowledge of God. Hosea underscores his message with his marriage to Gomer, daughter of Diblaim, described as a "woman of harlotry" (1.2). He has three children with her, each of whom represents a different aspect of the broken relationship between Israel and God. Thus, his first son, Jezreel, calls to mind the bloody revolt in Jezreel against the Omrides, which brought the Jehu dynasty to power in Israel (1.4-5); daughter Lo-ruhamah (Not Pitied) symbolizes the Lord's lack of pity for the people (1.6-7); and Hosea's second son, Lo-ammi (Not My People), symbolizes God's rejection of the people (1.8-9). In chapter 3, Hosea is also commanded to love an adulterous woman, symbolizing God's love for Israel who, in turn, consorts with other gods. The prophet envisions a return to an ideal state in the relationship between Israel and God (3.5). According to the Talmud, Hosea was greater than his contemporaries Isaiah, Amos, and Micah (Pes. 87a).

The Book of Hosea is the first book of the Minor Prophets and is composed of three major parts. Chapters 1-3 contain a mixture of narrative and poetic material that describes and reflects upon the meaning of Hosea's marriage to Gomer, apparently a cultic prostitute; her infidelity to Hosea symbolizes Israel's broken relationship with God, its spouse. Chapters 4-13 consist of a series of poetic speeches in which the prophet condemns the superstitious people, the corrupt priests, and the Israelite monarchy for their failure to display proper "knowledge of God" and for relapses into idolatry (4.1). This section also contains many allusions to Israel's past ideal relationship with God. The final section in Hosea 14 is an impassioned plea to the people to return to God from their iniquity and idolatry because they will not be saved by Assyria. The presence of various statements throughout the book that address Judah as well as the northern kingdom of Israel have led some scholars to conclude that the redaction of the book took place in Judah (dating varies from the late 8th cent. to the post-exilic period).

HOSHA'NA' RABBAH (הוֹשַׁעְנָה רַבָּה), the seventh day of Sukkot, falling on 21 Tishrei, and the last day of hol ha-mo'ed. During Sukkot in Temple times the people made daily circuits round the altar, waving the *four species (or just the willow; there is disagreement over this) and crying "hosha'na'" (see HOSHA'NOT); on the seventh day they circuted seven times. In late sources the day was therefore called Hosha'na' Rabbah, namely, "the Great Hosha'na'." *Simhat Beit ha-Sho'evah, a ritual of great merrymaking (Suk. 53a), took place during Sukkot, while Hosha'na' Rabbah itself was the occasion for the beating of the willow branches (hibbut 'aravah; possibly the remnant of an earlier rite calling on the "waters below" to respond to the "waters above," the subject of Sukkot prayers that were the climax of the festival, although they were opposed by the Sadducees and Boethusians because of the absence of scriptural authority). During the Middle Ages a sober note was introduced into the celebrations by identifying Hosha'na' Rabbah with the last day of judgment and the culmination of the period of self-examination and repentance that begins three weeks earlier on Ro'sh ha-Shanah. This aspect is especially stressed in Sephardi practice. There was a popular belief that on Hosha'na' Rabbah God issued notes with the fate of every individual for the coming year. A common Ashkenazi greeting was gute kvitl (Yi.; good note). The synagogue service combines the hol ha-mo'ed ritual together with a sevenfold circuit of the bimah with the four species, while appropriate hosha'na' hymns are recited accompanied by the blowing of the shofar. In the Ashkenazi rite the penitential character of the day is emphasized by the reader's wearing of the white robe of the *Aseret Yemei Teshuvah and by the recitation of the preliminary psalms read on Sabbaths and festivals. The beating of the willow branches continues the Temple custom. Such importance was attached to this day that the calendar was eventually adjusted so that Hosha'na' Rabbah would never fall on a Sabbath when the carrying of the willows would be forbidden. David ben Yosef *Abudarham (14th cent.) mentions the custom, which still prevails among pious Jews, of staying up on the night of Hosha'na' Rabbah. The kabbalists evolved a special order of service for the occasion, which included the reading of the Book of Deuteronomy and the Book of Psalms and passages from the Zohar (the selection of readings was changed by the seventeenth-century authority Yesha'yahu Horowitz to resemble the readings in the tiqqun* for *Shavu'ot). A number of superstitions arose, and it was widely believed that a person who was to die during the coming year would not see the shadow of his head on the night of Hosha'na' Rabbah.

HOSHA'NOT (הוֹשַׁעְנוֹת; from hosha'na', "O deliver" [Ps. 118.25]), prayers recited on the festival of Sukkot during the haqqafot* (circuits) around the synagogue (originally around the Temple altar). Written in the form of litanies, the hosha'not consist of a large number of brief lines (usually arranged alphabetically), each of which opens and concludes with the response hosha'na' spoken by the congregation. Hosha'not are generally simple in form, addressing God by different epithets or beseeching him for deliverance "because of your truth, because of your covenant . . ."; some hosha'not in use today, however, were composed by well-known payyetanim such as El'azar Kallir, and are more complex. Originally, the hosha'not were prayers for rain (see TEFILLAT GESHEM) recited on Sukkot because it marks the approaching rainy season in Erets Yisra'el, but rain is not explicitly mentioned in all hosha'not as the desired object. The word hosha'na was also popularly applied to the willow branch carried on *Hosha'na Rabbah.

HOSHA'YAH RABBAH (3d cent.), Palestinian amora', disciple of R. *Hiyya'. A celebrated authority on the Mishnah and editor of baraiyot, it was said that "Any baraiyta that was not studied and formulated in the academy of Rabbi Hiyya' and Rabbi Hosha'yah is not authoritative, and should not be brought as evidence in the discussions of the academy" (Hul. 141b). He was equally prominent as an aggadic teacher. His homilies (of which the opening chapter of Genesis Rabbah* is one—hence, the whole midrash has been attributed to him) reflect the religious discussions between Jews and Christians in Caesarea, where Hosha'yah had his academy. Most leading Palestinian amora'im of the next generation were his disciples. His famous statements include "Customs can annul law" (Y., R. ha-Sh. 7.1) and "The Lord was gracious unto Israel in that he scattered them among the nations" (Pes. 87b, which means, according to Rashi, that they could not be annihilated in one blow).

HOSPITALITY (Heb. hakhnasat orehim [bringing in guests]). Few social virtues rank higher on the scale of merit than hospitality, which is included among "those things of which a man enjoys the fruit in this world while the principal remains with him in the world to come" (Shab. 127a; Pe'ah 1.2). Abraham's welcoming of the three travelers in Genesis 18.1–8 typifies the virtue of hospitality in Jewish lore. The Bible, which offers many instances of hospitality to travelers (e.g., Jgs. 13.15; 2 Kgs. 4.8–11), bases the requirement of hospitality on Israel's experiences as strangers in a strange land (Lv. 19.34). The phrase now incorporated into the Pesah Seder—"Let all who hunger enter and eat"—was originally the invitation uttered before all meals by R. Huna' (Ta'an. 20b). Hospitality is to be extended to everyone, including the poor, the ignorant, the stranger, and those of lower social status than the host: "Let your house be open wide, and let the poor frequent it" (Avot 1.5). The laws of hospitality and the duties of both host and guest are elaborated in rabbinic literature. The host should always have a cheerful countenance in order to make his guests feel at home: he should serve the guests himself; various dishes should be placed on the table so as not to embarrass the fastidious guest. The guest is required to express his thanks to the host; therefore, the privilege of reciting Birkat ha-Mazon is given to him "in order that he may thereby invoke the blessing of God on his host" (Ber. 58a). In addition, "the good guest also says 'Blessed be the host, may he be remembered for good'" (Y., Ber. 9). When a learned company was assembled and speeches were delivered in a private home, "they opened their discourse with praise of the host" (Ber. 68a). During the Middle Ages, hospitality was extended to itinerant mendicants and traveling scholars; a Jew visiting a synagogue in a strange town would naturally be invited to the homes of the congregants for meals. Hakhnasat orehim societies were established to provide shelter for travelers.

HOST OF HEAVEN. God is frequently described as the "Lord of Hosts," the reference being sometimes to human armies (e.g., Ex. 7.4, 12.41), to the stars (Dt. 4.19; Is. 40.26), to the angels (Jos. 5.14ff.), or to cosmic powers generally (Gn. 2.1). The "host of heaven" may have originally referred to the stars, regarded as arrayed in battle order (cf. Jgs. 5.20, "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera"). In ancient Mesopotamian religion the heavenly host was the object of worship (cf. 'avodat kokhavim [worship of the stars], one of the rabbinic terms for paganism). The gods were considered as naturally residing in heaven, each of the major stars and other heavenly bodies being identified with a different prominent deity, as were the three individual sections of the horizon. In biblical theology, the creation and the nature of the host of heaven are emphasized as part of the monotheistic polemic against polytheism: the God of Israel, as the one true God, himself created all the heavenly bodies. This miraculous feat was considered major evidence that the God of Israel was the creator of the universe (e.g., Ps. 136.4–9; Jb. 9.9–10). It was absolutely forbidden to worship the stars and the heavenly bodies (see 2 Kgs. 21.3–5, 23.5; Jer. 19.2; Zep. 1.5) as independent deities (e.g., Ex. 20.3; Dt. 5.8; 2 Kgs. 23.5; Jer. 19.13; Am. 5.26). On the other hand, popular religion already considered the heavenly bodies as representing living beings. Thus the stage was set for the process of demythologization, according to which the host of heaven became identified with the *angels, God's usually subservient assistants and members of his heavenly entourage (see 1 Kgs. 22.19; Jb. 38.7; 2 Chr. 18.18; and cf. Is. 6). He counted and ordered them as well as determined their names (Is. 40.26; Ps. 147.4), and it was within his power to extinguish their light (Jb. 9.7; cf. 38.31). Their function was to serve and praise God (Is. 40.26; Ps. 8.2, 4, 148.1–6) as his very own heavenly host (Ps. 115.15–16).

HULLIN (חֻלִּין), name of things that are profane and of a Mishnaic tractate.

Profane Things. Hullin denotes anything that is not holy, that is, reserved for priestly or ritual use. More particularly it refers to profane food, food to which the rules of Levitical purity do not apply (unlike meat, the terumah offering, etc.; Ter. 11.5).

Tractate. The tractate Hullin is in Mishnah order Qodashim and consists of twelve chapters, with related material in the Tosefta' and Talmud Bavli. The tractate deals with the laws concerning the *ritual slaughter of animals for profane use, and in addition, it includes prescriptions relating to the preparation of meat and poultry. Hullin stresses the differences between the laws relating to food from consecrated and unconsecrated animals. However, many points of contact may be noted: disqualification of slaughter due to improper intent, concern for maternal sensibility, the importance of proper disposition of blood, and the setting aside of a priestly portion. Hullin is one of the main sources for the *dietary laws.

HUMAN BEING. The Bible generally uses the term adam to refer to any member of the human species, as is implied by its original use as the name of the first man, and the term is etymologically connected with the word for earth (adamah; Gn. 1.26). Other names are ish, enosh (an archaic form of ish) and gever, the last suggesting masculine qualities. Human beings are considered the highest creation (Gn. 1.28) and are insignificant only when compared to *God. The contrast between human majesty in one sphere and insignificance in another is expressed by the Bible: "What is man that you are mindful of him, and the son of man that you visit him? Yet you have made him little less than the angels, and have crowned him with glory and honor. You made him to have dominion over the work of your hands and have put all things under his feet." (Ps. 8.4–6). In the biblical account of creation, the creation of humans (male and female) along with that of other living creatures, took place on the sixth day; though placed in the same physical category with the other living creatures, the human claim to preeminence rests on the statement that human beings were created "after the image and likeness of God" (Gn. 1.26–27). In their statement, "Beloved is man, for he was created in the image of God; still greater was the love in that it was made known to him that he was created in the image of God" (Avot 3.15), the rabbis wished to emphasize that humans are endowed not only with special dignity but also with the consciousness of this dignity. There is no initial distinction between one person and another, and the opening sentence of Genesis 5.1 ("This is the book of the generations of adam") is held by the rabbis to convey the "fundamental principle" of the common descent of all humankind. The biblical account of the creation of humankind (Gn. 1.27), "And God created man in his image . . . male and female he created them," emphasizes that this image is constituted only by man and woman together. Subsequent formulations and elaborations of the idea of the human being by Hellenistic thinkers, Talmudic aggadah, medieval philosophy, Kabbalah, and modern writers have relied on the theories and terminologies of contemporary philosophies. HUMANISTIC JUDAISM, philosophy and movement that views Judaism as the cultural creation of the Jewish people rather than in theological-religious terms. It has its roots in the Haskalah, in the secular nationalism of the last one hundred years, in the democratic revolution of modern times, and in the Holocaust experience. It maintains that reason is the best method for the discovery of truth, that it is in our power to solve human problems, and that ethical guidelines derive from the human quest for renewal, justice, and happiness. Jews and non-Jews alike must rely on themselves and on each other in the struggle for their ideas. Its worldview centers around the autonomous human and not a God figure. Hence, neither God-language nor worship are appropriate to a humanistic style of life. Humanistic Jews study Jewish history and culture from a naturalistic perspective, cultivate Jewish languages, celebrate holidays in a humanistic spirit, mark life cycle events with secular poetry and music, respond ethically to personal needs and social issues, and organize communities in which these activities can be done cooperatively. The kibbutz movement in Erets Yisra'el formulated an ideology, ethic, and practice based on humanistic values and Jewish cultural traditions (see KIBBUTZ FESTIVALS).

Many Humanistic Jewish communities are served by certified leaders. In ascending order of training the titles of these leaders are madrikh (guide), senior leader, and rabbi. The International Institute for Secular Humanistic Judaism (Jerusalem and Detroit) provides the training. The International Federation of Secular Humanistic Jews, founded in 1985, has affiliates in nine national organizations, including in the United States, Belgium, and Israel. Humanistic Judaism has existed as an organized movement since the mid-1960s.

HUMILITY. The Talmud says (Mak. 24a) that the verse "What does the Lord require of you but to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with your God" (Mi. 6.8) contains within it the entire Torah, and the rabbis described the third of its prescriptions, humility, as the outstanding virtue. The greatest of prophets, Moses, is singled out as being "exceedingly humble, above all the men that were upon the face of the earth" (Nm. 12.3). Humility is regarded as the outstanding characteristic of the "disciples of Abraham," in contrast to the "disciples of Balaam" (Avot 5.21). However, humility must not be confused with servility, which is considered a vice, despite the statement "Be exceedingly lowly in spirit" (Avot 4.4). The virtue of humility is ascribed even to God: "In every passage where mention is made of the greatness of God, it is combined with mention of his humility. This is written in the Pentateuch, repeated in the Prophets, and stated for a third time in the Hagiographa" (Meg. 31a).

• Samuel H. Dresner, Prayer, Humility and Compassion (Philadelphia, 1957).

HUMMASH, popular term for the *Torah derived from hamishah humshei Torah (five-fifths of the Torah). Originally each humash referred to one-fifth of the five books of the Torah; later the term came to be used to designate a printed volume containing one of these five books; and still later as a name for a volume containing the entire five books, used in the synagogue by the congregation to follow the public reading.

HUMRA' (Aram.; חֻמְרָא; severity), in cases of halakhic doubt, the stricter of two possible rulings. Although indiscriminate preference for the more lenient ruling is condemned by the rabbis, they deny any virtue to a humra' for its own sake. When there are doubts regarding biblical law, the stricter ruling applies; in matters of rabbinic law, the more lenient solution (qulla') should be adopted. Rabbinic law provides further directives as to when and to what extent doubts, mitigating circumstances, the nature of the issue, and so forth should affect the ruling. The term humra' was later applied to stringencies that pious individuals took upon themselves over and above accepted interpretations.

HUNA', Babylonian amora', who died in 297 according to Iggeret Rav Sherira' Ga'on. Best known of the many Talmudic sages named Huna', he is sometimes confused with R. Huna' the exilarch, who was, according to some sources, his grandfather. Both Talmuds make frequent mention of his halakhic and aggadic teachings and also preserve numerous personal anecdotes regarding his life and death that attest to his great stature as a "pillar of the Talmud." In eulogizing him, R. Abba' claimed that the shekhinah (divine presence) would have rested on him had he not lived in Babylon (Mo'ed Q. 25a). Huna' studied with *Rav in *Sura, becoming one of the principal transmitters of Rav's teachings (cf. Nid. 24b; Bekh. 45b). He eventually succeeded Rav as leader of the Sura academy, reportedly holding the position for forty years (according to Sherira' Ga'on). During this time the academy thrived (cf. Ket. 106a), surpassing the scholarship of Erets Yisra'el (cf. Git. 6a). He was not, however, officially recognized as academy head until the death of Shemu'el, leader of the *Nehardea academy. At that time, Huna' became acknowledged as the leading sage in Babylon, a reputation that extended even to Erets Yisra'el upon the death of R. Yoḥanan (cf. Y., Ḥag. 1.8, 76c). He was known in his earlier years for his devotion to study in spite of his poverty (Meg. 27b). He later became wealthy and was fabled for his generosity (cf. Meg. 27a-b; Ta'an. 20b).

HUPPAH (חֻפּוּת; canopy), originally the bridal chamber in which a marriage was consummated (see Jl. 2.16; Ps. 19.6) and in which the nuptials continued for seven days. The word now refers to the canopy, symbolizing the chamber, under which the wedding ceremony takes place. Canopies range in form from richly embroidered baldachins to a simple tallit* attached to four poles. The word huppah is popularly employed to mean the wedding ceremony. In some communities a new *Sefer Torah is brought to the synagogue under a huppah.

HUQQAT HA-GOYYIM (חֻקֵּי הַגּוֹיִם; statute of the gentiles), non-Jewish practices, which the rabbis, expanding upon the law in Leviticus 18.3 and 20.23, forbade the Jews to copy, especially if these involved lewdness or loose morality or the manner in which the gentiles conducted their religious rites. Jews were prohibited from wearing a specifically gentile *costume, including even the manner of dressing one's hair (see Shab. 67a-b; San. 74a-h), and they were forbidden to attend circuses and stadiums (see Rashi on Lv. 18.3). The ban on idolatrous rites also extended to customs that "have become part of their folly," such as superstitious practices (see tosafot on San. 52a). From Talmudic times, heathen customs and superstitions were called "Amorite ways" (darkhei ha-Emori) and were strictly forbidden, although some folk customs were retained among the people. Maimonides denounced all "those heathen follies" (Hilkhot 'Akum 11, 16). Orthodox Jews condemned many of the innovations of *Reform Judaism because of the dangers they saw in adopting non-Jewish habits. On the other hand, Jewish religious practice has always been influenced by its environment; liturgical music and synagogue architecture are two examples. However, a line is drawn when practices, while harmless in themselves, are regarded as contravening Jewish symbolism and spirit, as in the introduction of Christmas trees into Jewish homes.

HUSHI'EL BEN ELHANAN (died c.1027), North African rabbinical scholar. Born in Italy, he arrived in Kairouan (near Tunis) in 1105. He was one of the *four captives of the popular legend who introduced Talmudic studies into various Mediterranean countries. He became the head of the Kairouan beit midrash, the highest judicial position in North Africa at that time. His titles were mu'alam (teacher) and reish bei rabbanan (head of the yeshivah). While his focus of study was the Talmud Bavli and the geonic halakhic literature, Hushi'el introduced study of the Talmud Yerushalmi to Kairouan. He attracted many students from east and west, including the head of the Jerusalem Yeshivah, R. Natan ben Avraham, who brought Hushi'el's study methods to Palestine and Egypt. Hushi'el was a pioneer in bringing Talmudic studies from Babylonia to North Africa. His son was *Hanan'el ben Hushi'el.

HUTNER, YITSHAQ (1906-1980), rabbi and educator. He was born in Warsaw and educated in the Slo-bodka Yeshivah (both in Europe and Erets Yisra'el) and at the University of Berlin. In 1935 he immigrated to the United States and in 1939 became the head of Yeshiva Rabbi Chaim Berlin in New York City. In 1950 he founded and headed Kolel Gur Aryeh for advanced rabbinic studies.

Hutner published extensively on rabbinic subjects. His collected discourses, entitled Pahad Yitshaq have been issued in thirteen volumes (1964-1991). They reflect the influence of both Hasidic and Mitnaggedic traditions. He was particularly known for his approach to the apparent contradictions between Torah and philosophy.

HYPOCRISY. The Talmud states that God detests the hypocrite as "he who says one thing in the heart and another with his lips" (Pes. 113b). Hypocrisy is frequently condemned by the rabbis, and Gamli'el II forbade any student "whose inside is not like his outside" to enter his academy (Yoma 72b). A classic warning against the hypocrite is the deathbed advice of the Sadducee king Alexander Yannai to his Pharisee wife Salome Alexandra, "Fear neither those who are Pharisees nor those who are not, rather fear those hypocrites who pretend to be Pharisees, who act like Zimri and want the reward of Pinchas" (Sot. 22b, in reference to Nm. 25).

IBN AKNIN, YOSEF BEN YEHUDAH (c.1150–1220), philosopher. He was born in Barcelona but from an early age lived in Fez. Almost nothing is known of his life. Three of his works are: Sefer ha-Musar, a Hebrew commentary on Avot; Tibbal-nufus, in Arabic on psychology; and an Arabic philosophical commentary on the Song of Songs called Inkishaf al-asrar watuhar al-anwar (with Hebrew translation by Abraham S. Halkin [Jerusalem, 1964]). In this last book, which was influenced by the Arabic philosopher al-Farabi, Ibn Akin explains the emanation of the intellects from God. He interprets the Song of Songs as an allegorical account of the love of the human soul and the “active intellect”—the divine lover asks the beloved, the soul, to acquire knowledge and to separate itself from matter so that it can unite with the active intellect. In his commentary, Ibn Akin interprets the literal meaning of the text, the rabbinical-Midrashic meaning, and the traditional meanings of the text as an allegory of the relationship between God and Israel. Ibn Akin also wrote a Hebrew introduction to the Talmud.

IBN BAL'AM, YEHUDAH (11th cent.), Spanish biblical commentator and Hebrew grammarian. He was born in Toledo, but spent most of his life in Seville. Ibn Bal'am wrote his commentaries on the Pentateuch, Kitab al-Tarjih, and on the Prophetic books, Nuqat al-Miqra, in Arabic. The former explains both narrative and legal passages in light of the writings of Ha'i Ga'on, while the commentary on the Prophetic books draws on the lexicography and linguistic analyses developed by Ibn Janaḥ and Ibn Hayyuj. Ibn Bal'am's exegetical writings, recovered in the nineteenth century, constitute a significant source for the development of biblical commentaries from Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on to Avraham ibn Ezra. In addition to his biblical commentaries, he wrote three works in Arabic on Hebrew grammar.

IBN DAUD, AVRAHAM (c.1110–1180), Spanish philosopher, historian, physician, and astronomer; known by his initials as Ravad. He was born in Cordova, Spain; fled from the Almohade persecutions to Castile in 1146; and lived in Toledo, where he died a martyr. The first thoroughgoing Jewish Aristotelian, he tried to show in his major philosophical work, Emunah Ramah, composed between 1160 and 1161 (of which only two Hebrew translations from the 14th-cent. Arabic original have survived), that science and religion were not at variance and that the distinctive doctrines of traditional Judaism were in complete harmony with Aristotelian philosophy. He followed the Islamic Aristotelians in his proofs of the existence of God and in his interpretation of prophecy (which, however, he limited in accordance with rabbinic teaching to the Jewish people in Erets Yisra'el). Prophecy is the highest attainment of the human spirit and derives solely from pure intellect without the participation of imaginative faculties. The problem of free will is solved by Ibn Daud with the traditional argument that God limits his own omniscience. In his discussion of the soul, Ibn Daud follows the Arab Aristotelian philosopher, Avicenna. He departs from Aristotle in denying the eternity of matter and upholding the doctrine of creation ex nihilo. The Bible contains the highest ethical precepts, and these are not contradicted by philosophical speculation. The goal of humans is conceived in Aristotelian fashion as intellectual perfection and knowledge, which is in turn identified with faith. Ibn Daud also wrote Sefer ha-Qabbalah, relating the chain of rabbinic tradition from Moses to his own time. Primarily undertaken to refute Karaite denials of such a tradition, the work is of major importance for our knowledge of the history of Spanish Jewry. He also wrote histories of the Second Temple and of Rome. Emunah Ramah was published by Simon Weil in 1852 with a German translation (republished in Frankfurt, 1982). An English translation with commentary was published by Norbert M. Samuelson (The Exalted Faith [Rutherford, 1986]). Sefer ha-Qabbalah was published in Hebrew and English by Gerson Cohen (Philadelphia, 1967).

IBN EZRA, AVRAHAM (1089–1164), Bible commentator, poet, grammarian, philosopher, and astronomer. He was responsible for the transmission of the literary, philosophical, and cultural achievements of the Jewish community in Spain to Jewish communities in northern Europe. As did the Kimḥi and Ibn Tibbon families, Ibn Ezra translated significant works in Arabic about the Hebrew language into Hebrew. In his voluminous biblical commentaries, he provided access to Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on and to the commentator Mosheh ben Shemu'el ha-Kohen Gikatilla for Hebrew readers.

Ibn Ezra's life can be divided into two periods. From 1089 to 1140, he lived in Spain. From there, he traveled throughout North Africa as far as Egypt. He had a significant friendship with Yehudah ha-Levi. Of Ibn Ezra's four children, only one is known, Yitsḥaq. It seems to have been the conversion of Yitsḥaq to Islam that sent Ibn Ezra in exile from Spain. The second period, from 1140 until his death in 1164, was a time of wandering. Ibn Ezra traveled first to Italy, where he lived in Rome, Lucca, Mantua, and Verona. By 1147 he had left Italy for Provence, where he visited Narbonne and Béziers. He then went north to Normandy, where he lived in Rouen and Dreux. By 1158 he had reached London. After 1161 he returned to southern France. The precise location of his death remains unknown.

As a poet, Ibn Ezra was the last link in the chain of great religious poets of Spain that began with Yosef ben Yitsḥaq ibn Abitur. Ibn Ezra had a complete mastery of the structure of Arabic poetry. He was the first of the Spanish poets to write disputations between animals and other inanimate objects. In addition, he developed rhythmic and rhymed riddles on letters and numbers.

His poetry focuses on ordinary things, such as food and lodging. However, it is also filled with humor, irony, and satire. Many poems provide a window into Ibn Ezra's stormy relationships with his literary patrons. There is also a large corpus of religious poetry that reveals Ibn Ezra's intense longing for a mystical encounter with God. These religious themes recur in his poem Ḥai ben Meqits, which describes a journey from the created world into the heavenly spheres to behold the Creator. Ibn Ezra's poetic abilities are also evident in the rhymed introductions to his biblical commentaries.

He is best known for his biblical commentaries, which cover almost the entire scripture, with the exception of Samuel, Kings, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Proverbs, Ezra, Nehe-miah, and Chronicles. Some of these commentaries exist in two versions. The style of the commentaries is often cryptic, indicating that they may simply provide his own random notes.

Ibn Ezra emphasized the role of human reason in understanding the divine revelation of the Pentateuch and the Prophets. He scrutinized biblical language and grammar as a point of departure. He believed the grammarian was in danger of error without a correct understanding of rabbinic tradition. *Karaites scholars, for example, might have applied the rules of grammar to scripture, but since they did not believe in the interpretations of the rabbis, their interpretations were incorrect. The limits set by the rabbis did not prevent Ibn Ezra from raising questions about chronological inconsistencies in the Bible. Later thinkers, such as Baruch Spinoza and Nahman Krochmal, would point to Ibn Ezra's questions as a foreshadowing of modernity. Closer scrutiny of Ibn Ezra's resolutions to these questions indicates that they do not constitute a radical departure but fall within the broad range of opinions contained within classic rabbinic literature.

In addition to the linguistic elements of his biblical commentaries, Ibn Ezra also wrote philosophical digressions on subjects like the name of God, miracles, and astronomy. His Yesod Mora' is a treatise on the meaning of the biblical commandments. His approach to philosophical matters was influenced by the Neoplatonism of Shelomoh ibn Gabirol.

IBN EZRA, MOSHEH (1070–1138), Spanish philosopher and poet. Born into a distinguished family, his life was marked by sorrows and misfortune. His major philosophical work, Arugat ha-Bosem, dealing with the familiar problems of medieval philosophy (e.g., divine attributes, creation, nature, and the intellect), suggests a knowledge of Greek and Latin in addition to the standard acquaintance with Arabic thought. However, his fame rests mainly on his religious and secular poetry. A great part of his 220 sacred compositions are scattered throughout the Sephardi *prayer book, especially the liturgy for Ro'sh ha-Shanah and Yom Kippur. In these poems he calls upon people to search themselves, to consider the emptiness of life and the vanity and illusion of mundane pleasures. His poetic paraphrase of the Book of Jonah was adopted in the Avignon rite for Yom Kippur.

IBN GABIROL, SHELOMOH (c.1021–1058), Spanish philosopher and poet. Little is known of his life after he left Saragossa at the age of sixteen. He seems to have suffered from melancholia and loneliness, and to have died young. His chief philosophical work, Meqor Ḥayyim, written in Arabic, has survived only in a Latin translation, Fons vitae, and in a few Hebrew excerpts translated by Shem Tov Falaquera in the thirteenth century. The Fons vitae was known to Christian scholastics, who never suspected it to be the work of a Jewish author, since it had no specifically Jewish context and was neglected by Jews. It was only in 1845 that the French scholar Solomon Munk discovered that its author, "Avicbron," was identical with Ibn Gabirol. The work represents the climax of the Neoplatonic tradition in medieval Jewish philosophy. The initial question, how a material world could derive from an utterly spiritual Being, is answered in Neoplatonic fashion: by way of emanation from the Creator. From the divine will, which is, in essence, identical with the Godhead yet also separate from it in its outward action, there proceeded the two basic principles of "general matter" and "general form." The chain of emanations ends with the corporeal world, in which, however, the initial divine will is still present. Since man is a *microcosm partaking of both the intelligible and the corporeal worlds, he is able to grasp the immaterial, spiritual forms in things by his own powers and is not dependent, as Arab thinkers asserted, on an external intelligence for his illumination. By means of this conception of matter, Ibn Gabirol attempted to reconcile the Arab view of matter as metaphysically self-subsistent with the Jewish view of a transcendental God who created the world by an act of his divine will. Ibn Gabirol's doctrine of the will subsequently, although indirectly, influenced the kabbalistic doctrine of divine emanation. His ethical work, Tiqqun Middot ha-Nefesh is the first work of its kind by a Jewish philosopher, inasmuch as it presents an ethical system independent of any specific religious tradition. Ibn Gabirol also ranks among the greatest Hebrew poets. His secular poetry deals with the standard themes of wine, friends, life, and love, as well as with loneliness and sorrow; it expresses both a joie de vivre and despair at the vanity of life and worldly striving. In his religious poetry, personal sorrow and joy have been transmuted into Israel's sorrow in its exile and joy in its communion with God. Many of Ibn Gabirol's penitential prayers have found their way into the prayer book, and his powerful hymns on the glory of the divine majesty form part of the Sephardi liturgy for the High Holy Days. His greatest poem, "Keter Malkhut," is frequently recited as a private devotion after the evening service on Yom Kippur.

IBN HAVIV FAMILY, scholars of Spanish origin.

Ya'aqov ben Shelomoh ibn Haviv (c.1450-1516), Talmudist. After the expulsion from Spain, he settled in Salonika, where he served as rabbi. There he compiled 'Ein Ya'aqov, a comprehensive collection of the aggadic sections of the Talmud Bavli (and some from the Talmud Yerushalmi) with relevant commentaries, including his own. In his lifetime the sections devoted to the orders Zera'im and Mo'ed were published. He also wrote comments on part of Ya'aqov ben Asher's Arba'ah Turim, some of which are cited by Yosef Karo in the Shulhan 'Arukh.

Levi ibn Haviv (c.1484-1545), son of Ya'aqov; the leading sage in Jerusalem in his time. He left Salonika and settled in Jerusalem in 1525. He was soon elected chief rabbi of the city and completed his father's 'Ein Ya'aqov, which was first published in full in Salonika in 1516 and has been reprinted over a hundred times. It became an extremely popular work among all sections of Jewry and was studied by groups specially formed for the purpose.

Levi was the leading opponent of Ya'aqov *Berab's attempt to revive *ordination. He published a series of pamphlets against Berab after Berab ordained four of his pupils and was responsible for thwarting the scheme. His responsa were published in Venice in 1565.

IBN HAYYIM, AHARON (1555-1632), rabbinical scholar born in Fez, Morocco, and descended from Spanish exiles. He studied with Yosef Almosnino (see ALMOsnino FAMILY) and was a member of the beit din of his teacher Vidal ha-Tsarefati. He was apparently a leading authority in Fez and Marrakesh, the two main communities of Spanish and Portuguese exiles. In 1608 he left Fez for Venice and after three years moved to Egypt. He lived his latter years in Jerusalem.

A scholar by nature, his best-known works were Mid-dot Aharon (Venice, 1609) on the thirteen hermeneutical rules expounded by R. Yishma'e'l ben Elisha' and Qorban Aharon (Dessau, 1742) on Sifra (on the Book of Leviticus). He laid down limits for the application of a fortiori arguments derived from the internal relationship between laws. Of his biblical and Talmudic commentaries, only his Lev Aharon on Joshua and Judges has been published (most recently in Jerusalem in 1984).

IBN LATIF, YITSHAQ (c.1228-1290), Spanish kabbalist and philosopher. Unlike other kabbalists, he was an admirer of Maimonides, though his philosophy was of a Neoplatonic character and clearly indebted to Shelomoh *ibn Gabirol's Meqor Hayyim, which he knew in the original Arabic. His emphatic rejection of the doctrine of transmigration of souls rendered him suspect in the eyes of some kabbalists. His writings influenced many medieval and modern thinkers.

IBN MIGASH, YOSEF BEN ME'IR (1077-1141), Spanish Talmudic scholar. In Lucena he was the favorite pupil of Yitshaq *Alfasi, who chose him to be his successor as head of the academy. He was accepted as the highest rabbinic authority throughout Spain. He was the teacher of Maimon, father of Moses *Maimonides, who mentions him with great respect and esteem. He also influenced R. *Zerahyah ben Yitshaq ha-Levi Gerondi. *Yehudah ha-Levi composed for Ibn Migash a poem to be sent to the rabbis of Narbonne. Few of Ibn Migash's writings have survived; they include novellae to tractates Bava' Batra and Shevu'ot and responsa. On the question of whether decisions of rabbinic law should be based strictly on the Talmud or whether it was necessary also to consult geonic literature, he decided that it was forbidden to make decisions without consulting the ga'onim, believing that one must take living traditions into consideration. Ibn Migash's works played an important role in the development of Talmud study in Spain and Provence.

He headed the beit din in Marrakesh and maintained close links with rabbinic authorities in northern Morocco, whom he often cites in his responsa. He disseminated Torah study not only in his own community but in the large Atlantic coastal towns of Essaouira (Mogador) and Safi. He offered original interpretations to the Bible, aggadah, and halakhah. Many of his most notable works were written while he was still a youth. IBN SHEM TOV FAMILY, family of Spanish kabbalists, theologians, and philosophers, whose activities spanned three generations.

Shem Tov ibn Shem Tov (c.1380–1441), author of the anti-philosophical work Sefer ha-'Emunot (Ferrara, 1556; reprinted in Jerusalem in 1969), which attacked Greek scholarship, Aristotelian philosophy, and those Jewish authors who used them in their writings, particularly Maimonides. Shem Tov's opposition to philosophy was partly a result of the large number of Jews who converted to Christianity in the decades following the massacres of 1391, which he attributed to the spread of philosophy. In place of philosophy, Shem Tov advocated a mixture of biblical literalism and Kabbalah.

Yosef ben Shem Tov ibn Shem Tov (c.1400–1480), son of Shem Tov ibn Shem Tov. A participant in religious disputations in the courts of John II and Henry IV of Castile, he accepted the philosophers, including Aristotle and Maimonides. His tolerance for philosophy was based upon his reinterpretation of their doctrines and his reliance upon apocryphal works attributed to them. In his commentary on Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics, he wrote that Aristotle believed that the highest good of human beings was to be achieved in the next life. In the same commentary, Yosef ben Shem Tov mentions a work discovered in Egypt and attributed to Aristotle, in which Aristotle rejects his doctrine of the prior eternalness of the universe. Although Yosef wrote commentaries on several philosophical works, he is best known for his Kevod Elohim (Ferrara, 1556). In it he subordinated philosophy to traditional observance of the commandments. According to his understanding, while philosophy assisted the Jew in achieving the ultimate good, reliance on scripture took precedence, leading to the greatest good. Moreover, he advised that the study of philosophy be delayed until the student has reached a suitable age. Yosef spent the last years of his life as an itinerant preacher, and some of his sermons have survived, as has a handbook on preaching that he composed. He died a martyr.

Yitshaq ben Shem Tov ibn Shem Tov (flourished c.1461–1490), another son of Shem Tov ibn Shem Tov. He was more philosopher than theologian and apparently taught philosophy for several decades. He wrote a number of commentaries on Arabic philosophers, as well as a commentary on Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed.

Shem Tov ben Yosef ibn Shem Tov (flourished c.1461–1489), son of Yosef ben Shem Tov ibn Shem Tov; author of a commentary on Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed and a book of sermons titled Derashot ha-Torah (Salonika, 1525).

IBN TIBBON FAMILY, family of translators who lived in southern France. Their activities spanned four generations during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Their translations made major works of Greek, Islamic, and Jewish philosophy available in Arabic accessible to the European Jewish communities of France and Germany, and through them, to the larger intellectual communities of Europe. Pioneers in the art of translation, the Ibn Tibbons developed the Hebrew idiom for rendering Arabic philosophical terminology.

Yehudah ben Sha'ul ibn Tibbon (c.1120–1190), a physician by profession; known as "the father of translation." He moved from Granada, Spain, where he was born, to Lunel in southern France. Among other works, he translated Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on's Emunot ve-De'ot, Yehudah ha-Levi's Kuzari, and Shelomoh ibn Gabirol's Tiqqun Middot ha-Nefesh. In his introduction to Hovot ha-Levavot, by Bahya ben Yosef ibn Paquda', Yehudah explains the superiority of the Arabic language because of its breadth and diversity, as well as its widespread use by Jews in Islamic countries. This translation, which may have been Yehudah's first, was commissioned by the head of Lunel's Jewish community, R. Meshullam ben Ya'aqov of Lunel, and was completed around 1160.

Shemu'el ben Yehudah ibn Tibbon (c.1150–1230), son of Yehudah ben Sha'ul; best known for his translations of Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed, which included a glossary of philosophical terms in an appendix; for his introduction to Mishnah tractate Avot (known as Shemonah Peraqim) and the tenth chapter of Mishnah Sanhedrin (known as Pereq Heleq); and for his Treatise on Resurrection, Epistle on Resurrection, and Epistle to Yemen. Shemu'el's correspondence with Maimonides has also survived. He composed a commentary on the biblical book Ecclesiastes and a commentary on Genesis 1.9 called Ma'amar Yiqavu ha-Mayim (Pressburg, 1837).

Moשה ben Shemu'el ibn Tibbon (fl. 1240–1283), son of Shemu'el ben Yehudah. The most prolific member of the family, he translated works in a wide variety of disciplines, including medicine, science, philosophy, and mathematics by non-Jewish as well as Jewish authors. He also wrote a philosophical commentary on the Song of Songs and a number of other works that have not survived.

Ya'aqov ben Makhir (c.1236–1307), known as Don Prophet Tibbon, Profatius, and Profacius Judaeus; grandson of Shemu'el ben Yehudah. He translated mathematical and astronomical works.

IBN ZUR, YA'AQOV (1672–1753), known by the acronym Yavets; Moroccan religious leader. Born in Fez, he was appointed dayyan (judge) in the rabbinical court at the age of thirty-one and served there for almost fifty years, except for a period of exile in Meknes. His public and literary activities greatly influenced Moroccan Jewry and its communal and legal structure. He was noted for the courage of his leadership and legal decisions. His edicts that a single dayyan had as much authority to make decisions as three dayyanim, and that a ruling handed down in one place could not be challenged in another, strengthened the status of small communities. Ya'aqov ibn Zur codified the taqqanot (enactments) of Moroccan Jewry, beginning with those passed at the time of the Spanish expulsion, and these became a basic source of reference for rabbinic judges. Before his death, he ordained five dayyanim in Fez, who constituted the largest beit din known in Morocco at that time. The rulings of Ya'aqov ibn Zur covered all facets of life: he banned parents from taking children of ages six or seven out of school; he guaranteed compensation to the affluent for arbitrary seizures and arrests; and he defined the functions of court officials, scribes, and ritual slaughterers as well as exempting them from taxes.

IDOLATRY, the worship of physical representations of gods, generally symbolizing the forces of nature, and of the powers that they represent; often treated as synonymous with paganism. Jewish tradition finds the first protest against idols in Abraham's iconoclastic revolt against his idolatrous father, Terah. Monotheism has ever since become synonymous with the negation of idol worship: "You shall have no other gods before me. You shall not make for yourself a graven image or any likeness of anything that is in the heaven above or in the earth below . . . you shall not bow down to them or serve them." Biblical literature is replete with references to Israel's reversion to idolatrous foreign cults, and the struggle against such practices constitutes one of the major features of biblical history (see GOLDEN CALF for a notable lapse). Legal prohibitions, passionate denunciation, and scathing sarcasm (particularly by Deutero-Isaiah) were among the weapons that the Law and the prophets directed against idolatry and its attendant moral and spiritual degradation (orgiastic promiscuity, human sacrifices, necromancy, magic, divination, etc.). The most frequently mentioned idols in the Bible are the Canaanite Baal and Astarte; references are often couched in the form of derogatory epithets such as: "vanity," "iniquity," "abomination," "carcasses," and so forth. In the northern kingdom of Israel, Jeroboam placed idols of bulls in the sanctuaries at Bethel and Dan. It was only during the Babylonian exile (586–516) that Israel was effectively weaned from idol worship. The varied attempts at reintroducing pagan cults into Judea during the Greco-Roman period met with the physical opposition of the Jewish masses. The Talmud devotes an entire tractate—Avodah Zarah—to the regulation of the social and commercial intercourse between Jews and heathens. Idolatry, together with incest and murder, was a cardinal sin that must not be transgressed even to the extent of forfeiting one's life. The *wine of a gentile may not be drunk out of fear that it was prepared as a libation to an idol. The problem as to which of the non-Jewish religions were to be considered as idolatrous has been discussed by medieval and later halakhists and theologians. Islam was generally considered a genuinely monotheistic religion, but many authorities classified Christianity as idolatry (because of its doctrines of the Incarnation and the Eucharist and its use of images). Others held that Christianity, while not a "pure monotheism," was not idolatrous either, since strict monotheism was enjoined on Israel only, and so Christians need not be considered as idolaters. Some authorities also distinguished between Roman Catholic and Protestant forms of Christianity, the latter being considered as less idolatrous.

IDRA', name of three kabbalistic works (Idra' Rabba', Idra' Zuta', and Idra' de-Vei Mashkena') incorporated into the *Zohar and containing its most fundamental and revered doctrines. The date of composition is unknown, but in its final form, the Idra' dates from the first part of the thirteenth century. The kabbalists introduced Idra' Rabba' and Idra' Zuta' into certain liturgies (e.g., the Tiqqun for Shavu'ot and Hoshana' Rabbah). Many commentaries have been written on all three works.

IGGERAT BAT MAHALAT, in popular mythology, a demon queen controlling a hundred eighty thousand angels of destruction, who travels about in her chariot seeking to harm living creatures. According to the Talmud, R. Hanina ben Dosa was able to limit her activities to the Sabbath eve and Wednesdays, while the amora' Abbaye endeavored to banish her altogether but was not completely successful (Pes. 112b). According to the Zohar, Iggerat will exist until the messianic era, when God will destroy the spirit of uncleanness.

CE), head of the Talmudic academy of Pumbedita in Babylonia, to an inquiry from *Nissim ben Ya'aqov ben Nissim ibn Shahin concerning the origins of the Mishnah, the Talmud, and other works of classic rabbinic literature. The answer of Sherira', which draws heavily upon the archives of his academy, provides a running history of the oral Torah and is an indispensable source for knowledge of the savoraic and geonic periods. His remarks on the redaction of the Talmud Bavli have served as the focal point for scholarly debate on that subject for centuries. First printed in Constantinople in 1566, Iggeret exists in two manuscript versions, the "French" and the "Spanish," distinguished from each other by considerations of orthography and content. The "French" version is considered the more reliable.

IGGERET HA-QODESH, a short treatise on the proper meaning and conduct of sexual relations written in the early thirteenth century in Spain by a still unidentified kabbalist. It became enormously influential in subsequent centuries in defining Jewish attitudes toward sexuality, but it also bears some similarities to medieval Christian and Moslem treatises on sexual conduct.

The Iggeret denounces Maimonides for denigrating the sense of touch and argues that marital intercourse, when properly conducted, is holy. Following kabbalistic doctrine, the correct union of husband and wife fosters the union of the male and female emanations of God. Proper union, which is intended for the procreation of holy souls, requires that the thoughts of the partners be directed toward the divine; if their thoughts are directed only toward the pleasure of the body, the sex act becomes idolatrous. Going far beyond earlier Talmudic law, Iggeret ha-Qodesh placed much greater weight on intentionality and made sexuality a matter of cosmic importance. It was edited and translated into English by Seymour J. Cohen (New York, 1976).

'IKKUV HA-TEFILLAH (עֲכִיב הַתְּפִלָּה; delaying of prayer), a custom, also called 'ikkuv ha-qeri'ah, that arose among Ashkenazi Jewry in the Middle Ages, whereby a person who felt that he (or she—the right was available to all) had been wronged could call a delay in either the prayers or the Torah reading in the synagogue in order to voice the grievance. The wrong might be moral or legal, and the complaint could be against an individual or the communal authorities. The source for this custom is attributed to a decree by R. *Gershom ben Yehudah permitting a person who felt wronged by the community and who had exhausted all other avenues the right to call a halt in the prayers and explain to the entire congregation how the wrong had occurred. Should community authorities not respond, the person had the right to delay the prayers for the following two days as well. If still not satisfied, the offended could cause prayers in all the synagogues in the city to be delayed. As a counterweight, should the leaders of the community declare that the person's charges were baseless, they had the right to cancel the delay. Although various measures were adopted to curtail the overuse of 'ikkuv ha-tefillah, the authorities generally made special provision for widows and orphans to be heard. Although there are still isolated cases of 'ikkuv ha-tefillah, it has all but died out. This practice is also referred to as bittul ha-tamid, "the cancellation of the daily sacrifice" (which was offered in the Temple).

ILLEGITIMACY. Jewish law does not subject children born out of wedlock to any deprivation of status or rights. The product of an adulterous or incestuous union, however, is a *mamzer and is forbidden to marry any person other than another mamzer or a convert. Aside from the mamzer, there are a number of other cases in which individuals are subject to restrictions in the area of personal status. An *asufi is a child found abandoned in a public place and whose parents cannot be identified. Such an individual is of doubtful status in relation to both religious identity and mamzerut and, hence, may not marry anyone at all. Any evidence of care for the asufi's survival will tip the scales in favor of legitimacy since it is assumed that such care would be lavished only on a child of untainted lineage (Qid. 73b–74a). A shetuqi is the child of an unmarried Jewish woman who cannot or will not reveal the identity of the father. In the absence of a clear majority of Jews of perfect lineage in the vicinity of its birth, the child is likely to be declared a “doubtful mamzer.” The mother’s declaration of paternity is definitive in the case of a shetuqi and she can remove any suspicion of mamzerut from her offspring by declaring the father to be a legitimate Jew or a gentile. In the latter case, the child takes its status from the mother (Qid. 69a, 74a). The male offspring of a kohen and a woman forbidden to him in marriage is called a halal and is disqualified from the priesthood. Halakhic problems relating to the status of “doubtful mamzerut” have also arisen in relation to Karaites and Ethiopian Jews (see BETA ISRAEL).

IMITATION OF GOD. Although the desire to be “like unto God” (cf. Gn. 3.5) is considered a sinful disregard of human limitations, certain of the attributes of God should, according to the rabbis, be taken as models for human behavior. Although the literal fulfillment of the biblical commandment (e.g., Dt. 10.20, 13.15) to “cleave” to God is impossible, yet man should “cleave to his qualities.” Elaborating on Leviticus 19.2 (“You shall be holy for I the Lord am holy”), the rabbis taught, “As he is merciful and gracious, so be you merciful and gracious” (Mekhilta’ 37a); similarly R. Ḥama’ bar Ḥanina’ said, “Follow the attributes of God; as he clothes the naked, so do you clothe the naked; as he visits the sick, so do you visit the sick; as he comforts the mourners, so do you comfort the mourners; and as he buries the dead, so do you” (Sot. 14a). These and other texts show that it is God’s qualities of mercy, compassion, and lovingkindness that are held up for imitation. In the moral teaching of the kabbalist mystics, the concept of imitation of God is correlated in great detail to the various aspects of the deity known as the sefirot*. In general, however, Jewish piety was more influenced by the ideal of the Godly life practiced with a sense of the presence of God (cf. Ps. 16.8 [“I have set the Lord always before me”] or Prv. 3.6 [“In all your ways acknowledge him”]) rather than of the imitation of God.

IMMERSION. See MIOVEH.

IMMORTALITY. See AFTERLIFE.

IMPRISONMENT, always mentioned in the Torah as a temporary measure pending a decision on appropriate punishment (cf. Lv. 24.10–23 and Nm. 15.32–36); nowhere is imprisonment considered by the Torah as a form of punishment, and offenders were at most placed in custody until the court could attend to their case and decide their ultimate penalty. The experience of Jeremiah (Jer. 37.15; cf. 2 Chr. 16.7–10; 1 Kgs. 22.26–28) possibly indicates the use of imprisonment for political offenders during a later period. Nonetheless, penal institutions did exist in ancient times, and the rabbis legislated imprisonment as a punishment in the case of certain offenses for which no other penalty is prescribed in the Bible or for which circumstances demanded particular measures. As provided for in the Talmud, imprisonment is extremely severe and is for life. The prisoner is to be incarcerated in a narrow cell and receive a scant diet. Imprisonment was applied to the incorrigible offender (San. 9.5), but only in cases where the culprit had already received corporal punishment for transgression of a prohibition involving excision (karet*); when the court was certain that the culprit was guilty of murder but was unable to pronounce a death sentence because of legal technicalities (if there is insufficient evidence in law to convict and execute a culprit in crimes other than murder, but that also involve capital punishment, the accused is, nonetheless, acquitted); to one found guilty of causing a murder by hiring an assassin; and as detention during judicial investigation and prior to execution. In post-Talmudic times, imprisonment was a common punishment imposed by Jewish courts in the framework of Jewish autonomy*. Sometimes the community had its own prison; if not, the person sentenced would be handed over to the non-Jewish authorities for the imposition of the punishment. From the fourteenth century on, imprisonment was applied for a variety of offenses ranging from sexual crimes to gambling. Imprisonment for debt, previously rejected by the rabbis, was instituted by communities, although this development was sharply disputed by rabbinic authorities. The subject was also debated in the State of Israel before a 1967 law allowed imprisonment for debt in certain extreme cases, but for a maximum of twenty-one days.

IMPURITY (Heb. tum'ah). Ritual impurity results from a flux issuing from a man or woman (Lv. 15.2, 25); menstruation (Lv. 15.19); childbirth (Lv. 12.2); leprosy (Lv. 13.1ff.); and semen (Lv. 15.15). Contact with a corpse (Nm. 19.11); carrion (Lv. 11.26, 39); creeping things (Lv. 11.29–31); the burning of the red heifer (Nm. 19.7); the burning of certain sacrifices (Lv. 4.12, 4.21, 4.26; 16.27–28); or the scapegoat as it is led away (Lv. 16.26) also creates a state of ritual impurity. Those impurities mentioned specifically in the Pentateuch are called avot ha-tum'ah. Items rendered impure by avot ha-tum'ah are called ri'shon le-tum'ah (first degree of impurity); items rendered impure by ri'shon le-tum'ah are called sheni le-tum'ah (second degree impurity). Most authorities rule that tum'ah expires at the fourth level, but some contend that it expires at the third or fifth. Holy objects (e.g., sacrificial meat, heave offerings) that are defiled become unfit for consumption and must be burned. A state of impurity lasts for varying periods and is removed by immersion in the miqveh*, by offering sacrifices for more serious cases, and in some cases also by the sprinkling of the ashes of the red heifer (Nm. 19). A person in a state of impurity is not allowed to touch holy objects, enter the Temple precincts, partake of sacred foods, or (in the case of a menstruating woman, a woman after childbirth, or a woman with a flux of blood) have marital contact. Leprosy precludes normal intercourse with other people. The biblical laws of ritual purity (tohorah) and impurity are set out mainly in the Book of Leviticus; in the Talmud the entire order Tohorot* is devoted to the subject. Much attention is paid to the impurity of vessels, clothes, and food. Most of the relevant laws ceased to apply after the destruction of the Temple, and all Jews are now regarded as being in a state of ritual impurity. For this reason many Orthodox Jews will not approach the Temple mount in Jerusalem, for which full ritual purity is essential. See also ABLUTION; HOLINESS; NIDDAH.

INCENSE (Heb. qetoret) Fragrant incense was to be offered twice daily on the gold-plated incense altar inside the Tabernacle (Ex. 30.1-10). A similar, but larger, gold altar was erected in Solomon's Temple (1 Kgs. 6.20, 22, 7.48) for the burning of incense, as well as in the Second Temple. Incense was used throughout the ancient world (as an inhalant or for cosmetic purposes) by kings and on special occasions. Its use in the Tabernacle symbolized obedience to the deity, perceived to be enshrined in his earthly abode. The incense used in the Tabernacle consisted of four ingredients (Exodus 30.34), the most precious being pure frankincense. The Talmud (Ker. 6a) mentions seven additional ingredients, including one called ma'aleh 'ashan, which caused the smoke to rise in a straight column. Rabbinic tradition states that extraordinary care was taken in the preparation of the incense, and the repetition in the phrase "pound well, well pound" indicates the belief that "noise [possibly meaning the regular rhythm] is beneficial to the fragrance." The recipe for the altar incense was not to be used for any other purpose (Ex. 30.37-38), and the rabbis considered the omission of even one ingredient a capital offense. A special ceremony took place annually on Yom Kippur*, when the high priest entered the Holy of Holies (Lv. 16.12-13) in a cloud of smoke, carrying a censer filled with incense taken from the altar. The stated purpose was to screen himself from the "fatal" presence of the deity; but the rabbis tended to reject this explanation (Yoma' 5.1-2). Incense was probably offered, in censers and not on altars, as part of the Israelite cult in biblical times (cf. Nm. 17.11), but with the centralization of the cult, this practice fell into desuetude. Though incense plays no part in post-Temple worship, its role in ancient times and its symbolic significance as a spiritual rising to God are recalled in the references to it included in the daily prayer service (see PITTUM HA-QETORET).

INCEST (gillui 'arayot). The family relationships that constitute incest in the biblical view are specified in Leviticus 18.6-18. The list includes only primary relationships, such as parents and sisters-in-law. The rabbis extended this list with twenty additional relationships, including secondary relationships, such as a paternal grandmother and a son's daughter-in-law (Yev. 21a). Primary incest carries either the death penalty or karet*. In some cases both penalties are prescribed (Ker. 1.1). Only the product of primary incest is a mamzer*. Whereas there can be no valid marriage among the primary degrees of consanguinity, marriages among secondary degrees are valid, and require a legal divorce in the event of their termination. Incest is one of the three cardinal offenses which a person may not commit even in order to save himself from certain death (San. 74a). According to some authorities, however, a woman, being the passive partner, may submit to incest rather than suffering death (Rema', Yoreh De'ah 157.1). INCLINATION, GOOD AND EVIL. See GOOD AND EVIL.

INDEMNITY. Injury to another's person is considered equivalent to damage inflicted upon the person's property (San. 2b), and in both instances financial compensation and restitution are obligatory. In cases of personal injury, indemnity consists of payment based on the injury itself, pain suffered, medical expenses arising from the injury, loss of earnings incurred, and indignity suffered. In estimating the amount due for indignity suffered, the sensitivity of the victim, the circumstances surrounding the incident, and the standing and intention of the perpetrator are all taken into account. A halakhic principle states that two punishments cannot be meted out for a single offense; therefore, one who is obligated to pay an indemnity receives no corporal or other punishment. Crimes punishable by monetary indemnity are not considered criminal offenses.

INHERITANCE. The biblical order of inheritance is the deceased man's son, daughter, brothers, father's line and the next of kin (Nm. 27.8–11). A daughter succeeding to her father's estate was required to marry into her father's tribe so that "the inheritance of the Children of Israel shall not move from tribe to tribe" (Nm. 36.6–7). The Talmud, however, confines this requirement to the generation entering the Promised Land (B. B. 120a). It is settled law that a husband inherits from his wife, although the question of whether or not this is a biblical rule is disputed (Maimonides, Laws of Inheritance 1.8). Under Talmudic law, a father inherits from his son (B. B. 8:2). Jewish law operates with a parentelic system of succession, that is, all the kin of the deceased in the agnate (paternal) line stand to inherit along both descending and ascending branches. A mother does not inherit from her sons, nor do her brothers or other relatives. Sons do, however, inherit from their mothers (B. B. 8.1). Mamzerut does not detract from inheritance rights under Jewish law (Yev. 2.5). The right of primogeniture applies under biblical law (Dt. 21.16–17), and if the firstborn son predeceases his father, then the double share is passed on to his heirs. A firstborn's double portion is equivalent to the portions of two ordinary heirs and it is taken out of the estate assets at the time of the father's death; future earnings are not taken into account (B. B. 142b). The right of inheritance carries with it the obligation to pay any debts owed by the deceased, and the firstborn's double portion includes debts as well as assets (B. B. 124a). Various taqqanot were introduced, from the Talmudic period onwards, for the purpose of ameliorating the bias toward the male line in inheritance law. Under the Mishnaic taqqanah of ketubbah benin dikhrin, the sons of a wife who predeceased her husband would be the sole inheritors of their mother's ketubbah and dowry. These assets would not be shared with other sons of the father upon his death (Ket. 52b). In the Middle Ages, the trend toward restricting the inheritance of a woman's dowry to her sons and other relatives continued, and even the husband was generally limited to only one-half of her estate (Rema, Even ha-'Ezer 118.80). A wife is not a legal heir to her husband's estate (B. B. 8.1), but is entitled to receive her ketubbah, the dowry increment, and any property designated as hers which she brought into the marriage. Daughters must be maintained out of their dead father's estate and if there is not enough property for both inheritance and maintenance purposes, then the daughters receive maintenance and the sons "go begging for a living" (Ket. 4.6). If there are no sons but only daughters, then they simply share the estate (Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 112.18). Sons are obliged to give their deceased father's daughters part of the estate as a dowry. The size of the dowry portion is worked out on the basis of the amount the father would have given to his daughters had he still been alive. If no such estimate is possible then the amount is fixed at one-tenth of the estate (Ket. 68a). In Ashkenazi communities, the custom arose of writing a deed at the time of a daughter's marriage in which her father undertook to pay her a large sum one hour prior to his death, with a condition exempting his sons from paying the debt if they gave her half of all the assets (Rema, Hoshen Mishpat 28.1.7).

INNOCENCE. In Jewish law, a person is presumed innocent until proved guilty. Neither hearsay nor circumstantial *evidence (especially in capital cases) is allowed to undermine the presumption. In criminal cases, the presumption of innocence is so strong that the accused must virtually have surrendered to the consequences of the act in front of witnesses in order to be found guilty (see WARNING), while self-incrimination has no validity in law. A presumption of innocence is grounded in the essential trustworthiness and moral dignity ascribed to the individual.

INQUISITION, an ecclesiastical court ("Holy Office") set up by the Catholic church for the trial of heretics; that is, those who had abandoned the religious tenets and beliefs of the Catholic faith in which they had been brought up or that they had adopted. It first became prominent in Europe in the thirteenth century when it was established to deal with the heretical Albigenses in southern France. Its operation was mainly entrusted to the Dominicans. It had no jurisdiction over persons other than members of the church, including such Jews as had, voluntarily or otherwise, formally adopted Christianity. These were regarded as guilty of heresy when reverting to Jewish practice and belief. The Inquisition is best known for its relentless pursuit of the descendants of converted Jews in Spain in the late fifteenth century and afterward. It was introduced into the united kingdoms of Castile, Aragon, and Navarre by Ferdinand and Isabella and lasted for nearly 350 years, from the first auto-da-fé held in Seville in 1481 until its final abolition in 1834. Both the Spaniards and the Portuguese carried it to their overseas possessions in America and India. In northern Portugal alone, over nine hundred communities were victimized by the Inquisition between 1565 and 1595, and estimates are given that the Spanish Inquisition sentenced over thirty thousand *Marranos to be burned at the stake, with another sixteen thousand punished in absentia by being burnt in effigy.

INSANITY, the state of being permanently deranged. One who suffers temporary, occasional, or periodic bouts of insanity or epileptic fits is considered sane and responsible during his lucid periods (Y., Ter. 81). Examples of the symptoms of insanity given by the rabbis include going out alone at night, sleeping in a cemetery, tearing one's garments, or destroying all that one has been given (Hag. 3b; Ter. 1.3). It is not necessary for all of the symptoms to be present, and a rational explanation must be lacking for the symptoms. A generally muddle-headed and irresponsible demeanor is also considered evidence of insanity. People suffering from insanity are free from all religious obligations or punishment and are not responsible in law for any tort committed by them. Their dealings have no legal validity, and they are classed together with the deaf and dumb mute and the minor. They are, however, to be compensated for any wrongful act committed against them or their property (B. Q. 87a). If adjudged dangerously insane, they may be placed in protective custody in order to safeguard others. They are, however, to be periodically examined, and upon recovery, their civil rights are fully reinstated. Insane persons cannot marry, since the consent of both parties is necessary. A man who becomes insane after marriage cannot give his wife a bill of divorce (Git. 71b); a woman who becomes insane after marriage legally can be divorced, but the rabbis forbade such an action on humanitarian grounds, though in special cases they permitted the husband to take a second wife upon receiving permission from a hundred rabbis (Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 1.10).

INSPIRATION, the condition of being directly under divine influence so that the spirit of God enters into an individual. Since inspiration emanates from God, it is free from human error. Biblical prophecy is a classical example of inspiration, and as a result the one criterion in selecting and determining the biblical canon was whether the books under review were "composed under divine inspiration" (Meg. 7a). However, inspiration was not confined to the prophets. Bezalel, the architect of the Sanctuary in the wilderness, was "filled with the spirit of God" (Ex. 31.3, 35.1); it came to the heathen prophet Balaam to enable him to utter his prophecies (Nm. 24.2); and it also descended on seventy elders (Nm. 11.17) and enabled them to prophesy. Although inspiration is considered to have ceased with the last prophets—Haggai,

Zechariah, and Malachi—(San. 11a), the Talmud does not hesitate to ascribe inspiration to the authoritative Aramaic translation of the Bible by Yonatan ben 'Uzzi'el (Meg. 3a), as Philo does to the Septuagint (Vita Moysis 2.7; Letter of Aristeeas 305–317). Although nowhere in the Talmud is there explicit mention of different degrees of inspiration between the Pentateuch, the Prophets, and the Hagiographa—all having been "composed under divine inspiration"—such a difference is implicit in a comparison of the manner in which Moses received the divine message with that of the later prophets: "If there be a prophet among you, I the Lord will make myself known to him in a vision, and will speak with him in a dream. Not so my servant Moses. . . . With him will I speak mouth to mouth, even manifestly and not in dark speeches" (Nm. 12.6–8)—that is, inspiration came to the other prophets while their cognitive faculties were in a state of suspended animation (in trances, in dreams, and in ecstasy), whereas Moses alone was inspired while in full possession of his normal cognitive faculties. This difference is succinctly expressed by the rabbinic statement that whereas other prophets saw God "through nine glasses," Moses saw him "through one lens" or "through a clear lens" (Lv. Rab. 1.14). Maimonides, on the other hand, specifically lays down three descending degrees of inspiration for the three sections of the Bible (Guide of the Perplexed 2.45). The belief in the descent or action of the Holy Spirit or other celestial agencies was common among charismatic mystics and kabbalists. Orthodox Judaism still holds to a strict belief in the verbal inspiration of the Pentateuch and rejects the modern critical study of the text. Conservative and Reform Jews believe that an honest reading of the Torah requires that it be placed in its historical context. Such a reading finds that the text itself is composed of at least four documents (the documentary hypothesis), which were committed to writing at different times and places. While this history of the transmission of the Torah makes some Jews (especially Reconstructionists) believe that the entire Torah was written by human beings without divine inspiration, that is not the majority view. Some Conservative and Reform Jews believe that God spoke words at Sinai; it is just that the record we have in hand was written by human beings in varying time periods and therefore is subject to the normal historical analysis through which every human document can be better understood. Other Conservative and Reform Jews believe that Moses and the later authors who wrote in his name were inspired by God to write the words included in the Torah in a process of inspiration similar to that of a great poet or musician. They then suggest various reasons as to why the inspiration contained in the Torah is more authoritative than any other inspiration. Still others believe that human beings wrote the Torah in response to their experiences with God in an effort to articulate the substance and import of those experiences for them and their religious community. These varying theories of both the authorship of the Torah text and the process of inspiration that produced it have major implications for the meaning and authority of the Torah, issues addressed by the ideologies of all modern movements. See also REVELATION.

INSULT is regarded as an injury in Jewish law and as such requires compensation. In cases of bodily injury, the insult, or shame (boshet), involved is considered an additional count in determining the extent of damages; for example, the shame endured by one who has been maimed or the shame suffered by the family of a female who has been raped. The compensation for insult "is in accordance with the standing of him that inflicts the indignity and him that suffers the indignity" (Ket. 3.7). Insulting a scholar or displaying insulting behavior in court was usually dealt with by rebuke and partial ostracism of the culprit. The rabbis decreed that "one who insults his fellow in public has no share in the world to come" (B. M. 58b).

INSURANCE. The insurance contract is not referred to as a distinct legal vehicle in the biblical or Talmudic literature, although there is mention in the Talmud of what was, in effect, a mutual insurance arrangement within guilds or professional associations. In that instance, the risk of loss of a vessel or of pack-animals was spread among all members of the group, and any loss suffered by one member of the group would be compensated by the group as a whole. As the concept of insurance developed in the general commercial environment of the post-Talmudic Diaspora, a need arose to examine the various insurance-related devices from the perspective of Jewish law, in order to determine whether the use of such devices involved any halakhic prohibitions, primarily that of ribbit (usury); and whether their use could be recognized as binding based on existing doctrines, such as bailment (where the shipper acts as insurer), surety (where the insurer is a third party), and commercial custom (situmta).

A classic example of an early form of insurance was the maritime loan, whereby the shipping agent received a loan to finance the purchase of the vessel or the goods, and agreed that upon safe arrival at his destination, he would repay the loan plus an additional sum (in effect, an insurance premium), calculated as a percentage of the loan, in consideration of the lender's assumption of the risk in the event that the ship or the goods were lost en route. Most authorities ruled that such an arrangement was tainted by the ribbit prohibition, since the additional sum being paid by the borrower, while designated as "insurance," constituted, in effect, the payment of interest.

The first mention of modern insurance, where a premium is paid in advance to cover the risk of loss, is to be found in the precedent-setting responsa of R. Yitshaq bar Sheshet of Spain in the fourteenth century. He ruled, as have many halakhic authorities down to the present time, that no comparable problem of ribbit exists in the standard insurance contract, since the premium is not related to a loan of any kind, and the contract was indeed binding under accepted Jewish legal principles. Similar rulings are to be found in the responsa literature regarding fire, theft, health and life insurance policies.

INTELLECT. The exact meaning of the term (Gr. nous, Lat. intellectus, Arab. 'aql, Heb. sekhel) and its synonyms (in Hebrew, e.g., da'at, binah, tevnah) vary according to the context and the vocabulary of writers. Aristotelian philosophy spoke of "separate intellects," meaning spiritual and non-material entities derived from the highest being; hence angels came to be called, in medieval philosophical Hebrew, "separate intelligences" (sekhelim nifradim). Alexander of Aphrodisias (c.200) defined Aristotle's "active intellect" as that aspect of the deity with which the highest part of the human soul could be in touch. The term thus acquired a very specific technical meaning with obvious religious implications: knowledge of God equals communion with God. Human perfection, the attainment of prophecy, perhaps even immortality, were due to contact with the divine active intellect, whereby the highest potentiality of the *soul could become realized in "acquired intellect." This doctrine became dominant in philosophy through the influence of Moses *Maimonides and was echoed by his followers, such as Yosef ben Abba' Mari *Caspi and *Levi ben Gershon. The doctrine as well as the rationalistic approach underlying it, which appeared to put a premium on intellectual understanding rather than the love of God, were opposed by the critics of Aristotelianism, such as Hasda'i ben Avraham *Crescas.

INTENT, corresponds to two Hebrew terms, kavvanah and zadon.

Kavvanah means intent, in both a legal and moral sense, and devotion, in the sense of spiritual concentration, particularly accompanying religious exercises or the performance of a commandment with a view to establishing devequt* (communion) with God. The Talmudic discussion of whether "the performance of a commandment requires kavvanah" ('Eruv. 95b) and the rabbinic statement that kavvanah is essential to *prayer (in particular the Shema', cf. Ber. 16a) both refer to the general intent of one's actions. "When standing in prayer one should direct one's mind to God" (Ber. 31a). According to the Mishnah (Ber. 5.11), the early Hasideans waited an hour before reciting the 'Amidah so as to be in the appropriate frame of mind (Ber. 5.1). Maimonides ruled that prayer without kavvanah was not accounted as prayer and that if a person prayed without kavvanah he should repeat the prayer with kavvanah (referring apparently to the first section of the 'Amidah). The person praying should empty his heart of all other thoughts "and regard himself as though standing in the divine presence" (Hilkhot Tefillah 4.15; cf. Guide of the Perplexed 3.51). Medieval mystics developed the concept of kavvanah to mean systematic meditation during prayer; this method reached its height in the kabbalistic system of Yitsh'haq *Luria. Moralists and spiritual writers (such as Natan Neta' Hannover and Yesha'yahu Horowitz) composed special prayers to be recited before the performance of specific ritual obligations (donning tefillin, counting the 'Omer, entering the synagogue, etc.) with the purpose of giving expression to the spiritual meaning underlying the outward action. These prescribed meditations are called kavvanot.

Zadon is a legal term; to be culpable in law, intention (zadon) must be proven (see WARNING). Where such intention is lacking, the Bible imposes compensatory ritual obligations in a limited number of cases (mainly those concerned with the performance of ritual, with purity, and with prohibitions involving excision from the community).

INTERFAITH RELATIONS. The modern interfaith movement is based on a number of principles which distinguish it from other attempts at interreligious exchange in the past. It is conceived of as an open encounter between believers of different faiths whose intention is to listen to each other, to understand each other, and to work together. The dialogue takes place on the basis of full equality between the partners. An important aspect of interfaith dialogue is that it is not intended to convert the other to one's own beliefs, and an effort is made to exclude any attitude of triumphalism, which has so often in the past characterized religious attitudes.

The emergence of the Christian ecumenical movement was one of the decisive reasons for the development of the modern interfaith movement. The division of the Christian churches was increasingly felt by a great number of believers to be no longer acceptable. This conviction led to the creation of a movement aimed at the restoration of Christian unity; it found its expression notably in the formation, in 1948, of the World Council of Churches, to which today several hundred Protestant and Orthodox churches belong. At the Second Vatican Council in Rome, the Roman Catholic church decided to join the ecumenical movement, while maintaining its full organizational independence. Religious dialogue between the various Christian churches and communities has become one of the most important methods in trying to overcome the present divisions and in preparing the way toward achieving a greater measure of Christian unity.

Another important factor in opening the way to inter-religious dialogue with Jews was the recognition by large Christian circles of the silence and passivity of the Christian churches in the face of the brutal anti-Jewish persecutions by the Nazis, and during the whole period of the Holocaust, and the necessity to understand the consequences of this dismal failure. This led to a re-examination of the basic teachings by the Christian churches on Jews and Judaism, and to the gradual elaboration of a new Christian theology on Judaism. The "Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to non-Christian Religions" (Nostra aetate, no. 4) of the Ecumenical Council Vatican II states: "Since the spiritual patrimony common to Christians and Jews is thus so great, this Second Synod wishes to foster and recommend that mutual understanding and respect which is the fruit above all of biblical and theological studies, and of brotherly dialogues." The new attitudes were developed in two further documents: Guidelines for implementing Nostra aetate (1975) and Notes on the Current Way to Present Jews and Judaism in Preaching and Catechesis (1985). The International Council of Christians and Jews and the national groups affiliated with it have been the pioneers of the dialogue between Christians and Jews. The participants in these meetings did not speak officially on behalf of their churches or communities but they prepared the ground, on a voluntary basis, for a new Christian-Jewish relationship.

A further development was the institution of official consultations between the churches and representatives of the world Jewish community. The first such encounter of a real international character was arranged in 1968, between the World Council of Churches and representatives of the world Jewish community. This led to regular meetings in the following years. Similar encounters took place in various countries on the national level. They were followed, on the Catholic side, by the establishment in 1970 of an International Catholic-Jewish Liaison Committee, the official dialogue organ between the Catholic church and the Jewish community, which since its formation has met regularly. The consultations with the World Council also continued and produced the document, "Ecumenical Considerations on Jewish-Christian Dialogue," published by the Executive Committee of the World Council of Churches on 16 July 1982. In addition, special meetings between the representatives of the various confessional families belonging to the World Council and representatives of the Jewish community have taken place since 1976. This was notably the case with regard to the Lutheran World Federation, the Anglican Communion, and the Orthodox churches. The top-level documents and meetings have been reflected also at a grass-roots level (though not everywhere). In the United States, for example, interfaith activities have become common in most larger communities. Attempts have also been made to extend the Christian-Jewish dialogue to the Muslim community. While several such meetings have taken place—mostly on a regional or national level—the political climate so far has not allowed a real breakthrough in this field.

In a world in which religious pluralism has become a reality, the interfaith movement has led to a series of interconfessional meetings, in which major political and social problems have been discussed and in which solutions for the burning questions with which the world is confronted have been sought. Not all of these initiatives have come from the West; important suggestions have originated from leaders of the Eastern religions in India, Japan and other Far Eastern countries. Most of the conferences have had as a major topic the problem of maintaining peace in a divided world. The World Conference on Religions and Peace has made this issue its major concern, and holds regular meetings on the international and regional level to this effect. Other groups have chosen different items for discussion. Interesting initiatives have been undertaken in the fields of social justice and ecology. In general, Jews have welcomed the dialogue. The main objection comes from the strictly Orthodox community, which refuses to participate, and there is a suspicion in certain Orthodox circles that Christians retain a hidden missionizing agenda. Many Orthodox Jews follow the guidelines established by R. Yosef Dov Soloveichik, according to which interreligious dialogue may not include theological issues but must be restricted to subjects of common social concern.

INTERMARRIAGE, marriage between a Jew and a non-Jew. In an alternative contemporary usage, intermarriage refers to any marriage of a Jew to someone who was born a non-Jew, with "conversionary marriage" used when the originally non-Jewish partner converts to Judaism and "mixed marriage" used when the non-Jewish partner remains a non-Jew. Since intermarriage is still most widely understood in its original sense, it will be so used here.

Intermarriage was always discouraged among Jews (Dt. 7.3-4) and was forbidden by Jewish law by the Second Temple period. When *Ezra returned from exile, he found extensive intermarriage with pagan women and got a promise that they would be banished (Ezr. 9-10). Indeed, intermarriages have no standing in Judaism's legal system. Since the children of invalid marriages acquire their mother's legal status, the children of intermarriages, according to Jewish law, are Jewish only if their mothers are Jewish. This matter is complicated, however, by two factors: the decision of the Reform movement, in 1983, to recognize as Jewish any child of intermarriage who publicly and formally identifies as a Jew, regardless of which parent is Jewish (see PATRILINEAL DESCENT); and the fact that open, democratic societies treat *Jewish identity as a personal option, rather than as a collective status over which a recognized group has formal control.

The opposition to intermarriage in Jewish history flows from Judaism's definition of Jewishness as familial, that is, not as a consequence of any given belief or specific act, but rather as descent from Abraham through Isaac and Jacob. A non-Jew who wishes to join the covenantal relationship does so by symbolically becoming a child of those same ancestors (see PROSELYTE). Opposition to intermarriage also has sociological roots, based on the view that Jewish identity is transmitted through socialization in the context of family life, with the result that the children of intermarried couples are not likely to be Jewish in the sociocultural sense, regardless of their status in Jewish law.

Until recently, intermarriage was seen, accurately in most cases, as a rebellion against or at least as a quiet renunciation of Jewishness, and the response by relatives, friends, and the Jewish community was usually severe. Intermarried Jews were often totally shunned, even treated symbolically as having died.

In more recent decades, there have been major changes. For most Jews, the scope and content of Jewish identity have changed. (The exceptions are, generally, the very traditional and, less frequently, those religious liberals whose lives are pervasively and profoundly shaped by their Jewishness.) The diminution of the scope of Jewishness in most Jews' lives has allowed intermarriage to be compatible with their continued Jewish identity. As a result, the rate of intermarriage has soared to the point that, according to recent studies, more than half of American Jews who now marry choose non-Jewish spouses. Intermarriage is much more widely accepted among Jews than ever before, not only in Diaspora communities, but in Israel as well. While intermarriage is still spoken of as a problem by Jewish organizations and communal leaders, most of them, especially the non-traditional, tend to emphasize cordiality and outreach over the application of negative sanctions. Many Jewish organizations (including liberal synagogues) now have significant numbers of intermarried Jews and their non-Jewish spouses among their members, and, therefore, it is not easy for these organizations, despite their official position, to conduct programs that explicitly discourage intermarriage or even convey convincingly the importance of marrying within the Jewish faith.

A number of Reform rabbis are prepared to officiate at intermarriages so as not to alienate the Jewish participant from the community and in the hope that children of such marriages will be brought up as Jews. Reconstructionist rabbis officiate if the marriage is under secular auspices but not in a church.

‘IR HA-NIDDAḤAT (עִיר הַנִּדְחָה; a city led astray), an Israelite city that worshiped deities other than the Lord, YHVH (Dt. 13.13–19). The Bible holds that Israel's very existence is predicated upon exclusive loyalty to the Lord and views the worship of other deities by Israelites as a crime exposing the entire nation to disaster. Therefore, Israelites who worship deities other than the Lord are subject to capital punishment. If the authorities hear that an Israelite city has been led astray, the report is to be investigated carefully; if confirmed, the city's population is to be executed, its contents completely destroyed, and the city itself never to be rebuilt. This law reflects the concept that God is Israel's king and that worshipping other gods is high treason. It has parallels in ancient treaties and similar texts requiring that sedition against the sovereign, by individuals and cities, be reported and punished. Talmudic exegesis holds that the authorities may not seek out such cases on their own but may investigate only if the crime is reported to them by others; the townspeople must be given a chance to reform, and only the guilty are to be punished. The rabbis interpreted the law narrowly and imposed stringent procedural safeguards on the investigation. Because the combination of circumstances they required for applying the law would rarely occur, some held that it was never expected to be applied but was stated in the Torah only to show the gravity of the crime.

ISAAC (Heb. Yitṣḥaq), second of the three *patriarchs; son of *Abraham and *Sarah. Both Abraham and Sarah laughed (tsaḥaq) with incredulity when God's angel promised them a son in their old age (Gn. 17.17, 18.12); hence, the biblical derivation of Isaac's name. Unlike his half brother Ishmael, Isaac was to be the heir of God's promise to Abraham. Isaac was circumcised at the age of eight days. His supreme trial was the agedah*. Although this was primarily the story of Abraham's willingness to sacrifice his beloved son at God's bidding (Gn. 22.1–19), Isaac's consent to be bound to the altar and sacrificed became symbolic of qiddush ha-Shem, the willingness to forfeit one's life for the glory of God. At the age of forty, Isaac married *Rebekah, who bore him *Esau and *Jacob. In old age, he lost his eyesight, and his wish to bestow the patriarchal blessing upon Esau was redirected to Jacob through a ruse of Rebekah. He died at the age of one hundred eighty and was buried by Jacob and Esau in the patriarchal tomb, the cave of *Machpelah (Gn. 35.28–29). Isaac's filial loyalty is depicted in many midrashim as well as in Islamic lore. Rabbinic tradition credits Isaac with the introduction of the custom of praying each afternoon.

ISAAC, BINDING OF. See ‘AQEDAH.

ISAIAH (Heb. Yesha'yahu; 8th cent. BCE), son of Amoz; a prophet active in Jerusalem during the reigns of four kings of Judah, Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah (cf. 2 Kgs. 19–20; 2 Chr. 26.22, 32.20, 32). Isaiah's sophisticated literary style and easy access to the Judean kings suggest that he was well educated and well connected. He prophesied during the rise of the Neo-Assyrian empire under Tiglath-pileser III and his expansion into the Syro-Israelite region. Major events presupposed in Isaiah's work include the Syro-Ephraimite War (735–732), the fall of the northern kingdom of Israel (722–721), Hezekiah's revolt (705–701), and Sennacherib's siege of Jerusalem (701). Isaiah's prophetic message emphasized the divine guarantee of Jerusalem's security and of eternal rule by the house of David. Isaiah did not hesitate to criticize monarchs when they deviated from what he considered the principles of Davidic rule. Since God, in keeping with his promise, would defend Jerusalem, Isaiah opposed alliances with foreign nations and censured Ahaz for considering an alliance with Assyria when Judah was threatened by Aram and Israel during the Syro-Ephraimite War (chap. 7). Isaiah gave his children symbolic names to illustrate his message. Shear-yashub (A Remnant Will Return) accompanied his father when Isaiah attempted to convince Ahaz to rely on God alone during the Syro-Ephraimite crisis (7.3) and to assure Ahaz that a remnant of Judah would survive, although Shear-yashub's name signifies the remnant of Israel that will return to God (and Davidic rule) following the Assyrian invasions in Isaiah 10.20–26. Likewise, Isaiah named another son Mahar-shalal-hash-baz (The Spoil Speeds, the Prey Hastens) to symbolize the defeat of Damascus and Samaria at the hands of the Assyrians during the Syro-Ephraimite War. Another child was named Immanuel (God Is with Us) to signify God's promise of security to Ahaz (7.14). The noun ‘almah (young woman [7.14]), referring to Immanuel's mother, was interpreted by Christian tradition (Mt. 1.18–25) as "virgin," and, hence, as a prophecy of the virgin birth of the messianic Son of David. Isaiah criticized Hezekiah for entering alliances with Egypt (chaps. 30–31) and the Babylonians (chap. 39) in preparation for his revolt against Sennacherib, king of Assyria from 705 to 701. Isaiah 36–39, however, reports that Hezekiah placed total trust in God during Sennacherib's siege of Jerusalem in 701, which was ended by what was seen as divine intervention that destroyed the Assyrian invaders. According to the pseud-epigraphous book, The Martyrdom of Isaiah (5.11), the prophet was put to death by King Manasseh when the latter purged Judah of opponents to his syncretistic policies. Isaiah 6.3, which portrays the seraphim flying about chanting "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts, the whole earth is full of his glory" in Isaiah's powerful vision of his commission to the prophetic ministry, is the basis of the *Qedushah prayer in Jewish (and the parallel Sanctus in Christian) liturgy.

The Book of Isaiah is the first of the Latter Prophets, although one opinion places Isaiah after Jeremiah and Ezekiel (B. B. 14b). According to the superscription in Isaiah 1.1, the entire book is attributed to Isaiah ben Amoz, but references to the sixth-century Persian monarch Cyrus II (44.24, 45.1), the Babylonian exile, and the return to Zion have led scholars, beginning with hints by Avraham *ibn Ezra, to conclude that chapters 40–66 were written by a later prophet. Scholarly consensus holds that only Isaiah 1–39 contains material from the eighth-century BCE prophet, and even these chapters may contain much later material. Examples include the Hezekiah narratives in Isaiah 36–39, which are drawn largely from 2 Kings 18–20; Isaiah 24–27, which appears to be an early form of apocalyptic literature dating to the sixth-century BCE or later; and the oracle against Babylon in Isaiah 13–14, which posits the downfall of Babylon, the dominant power of the sixth century (this prophecy, however, may actually refer to Assyria and the demise of one of its kings). Isaiah 40–66 reflects the work of an anonymous prophet living in Babylon during the sixth century BCE, designated as Deutero-Isaiah or Second Isaiah, who prophesied that the impending fall of Babylon to Cyrus would signal the return of exiled Jews to Jerusalem. This prophet engaged in an extensive polemic against idols and their worshipers and envisioned the eventual recognition of God's sovereignty by all the nations. Deutero-Isaiah's oracles are characterized by a flowing, picturesque, poetic style, in contrast to the shorter strophic style of Isaiah 1–39 (First Isaiah); the presence of Babylon rather than Assyria; his employment of the literary genre of a trial between Israel and its God against the idols and their worshipers; the emphasis on foreign nations' acceptance of God's teachings instead of depiction of their defeat; the glory of the new Jerusalem; the extensive use of traditions from the Pentateuch and literary influences of earlier prophets and psalms. Christian theology interpreted the so-called "suffering servant" of the Second Isaiah (52.13–53.12) as a precursor to Jesus despite the identification of the servant as the people of Israel throughout these chapters. According to many scholars, Isaiah 56–66 reflects a different literary style and different concerns, prompting them to identify it as the work of Trito-Isaiah or Third Isaiah (late 6th to late 5th cent.) with a Judean setting. The presence of various authors within the Book of Isa- iah is generally accepted, and scholars feel that the book was shaped over the course of some four centuries into a relatively coherent whole. Isaiah 1–33 focuses on the impending judgment against both Israel and Judah followed by a restored Jerusalem as the center of God's worldwide sovereignty. The second half of Isaiah presents contrasting images of the downfall of evil, represented by Edom, and the return of Israel to Zion in a new Exodus through the wilderness (chaps. 34–35); an extended argument that God is the master of creation who is raising up Cyrus and restoring Zion (chaps. 40–54); and exhortational material that calls upon Jews to hold firm to the covenant until the last elements of evil in the world are defeated (chaps. 55–56). One complete scroll of the Book of Isaiah and another fragmentary one were found at Qumran among the *Dead Sea Scrolls. Isaiah is the single most used source for prophetic readings (haftarot) in the synagogue, including all seven "haftarot of consolation" read in the weeks between Tish'ah be-'Av and Ro'sh ha-Shanah.

ISHBILI, YOM TOV BEN AVRAHAM. See YOM TOV BEN AVRAHAM ISHBILI.

ISHMAEL (Heb. Yishma'e'l), elder son of Abraham. His mother was *Hagar, Sarah's Egyptian handmaiden and Abraham's concubine (Gn. 16.15). Ishmael was circumcised by Abraham at the age of thirteen, an age at which the ceremony is still practiced among many Arab peoples. Expelled from his home because of Sarah's jealousy, he fled with his mother to the desert and became an archer. Ishmael married an Egyptian wife (Gn. 21.20–21), and his daughter married Esau (from them the heads of the Edomite families were traditionally descended; Gn. 25.13–15). Ishmael died at the age of one hundred thirty-seven (Gn. 25.17). Arabs trace their ancestry to Ishmael, and in Islam, he is regarded as a prophet. In the Qur'an (Sura 37.99–110), he (and not Isaac) is identified as the son about to be sacrificed by Abraham. In medieval Hebrew usage, Ishmael represents the Muslim world (i.e., the Arabs and later the Turks).

ISLAM, the religion founded by *Muḥammad (c.570–632), the spiritual development of which owed much to Jewish as well as Christian contacts and influences. Jewish elements are much in evidence in the *Qur'an, as well as in certain beliefs and institutions of Islam, particularly in its uncompromising *monotheism, which made many medieval Jewish authorities think more highly of Islam than of Christianity. Muḥammad became hostile to the Jews when he was unable to convert them to his religion, but he did not consider them on the same standing as pagans. Jews and Christians, in fact all "peoples of the book" (i.e., peoples with holy scriptures brought by messengers of God, recognized by Islam as precursors of Muḥammad), were to be tolerated, though regarded as inferior and made to suffer various indignities and disabilities (see DHIMMI). Islam, in its turn, profoundly affected Judaism, and both Jewish medieval philosophy and ascetic piety (see, for example, BAḤYA BEN YOSEF IBN PAQUDA) are indebted to the influence of Muslim thinkers and mystics (see SUFISM). The opening of the Shahadah (Confession of Faith, the first of the five pillars of Islam), "there is no God but Allah," is the Islamic counterpart of the *Shema' (cf. 2 Sm. 22.32, "For who is God save the Lord," and Ps. 18.32, "There is no God but the Lord"). Muslim orthodoxy does not recognize saints serving as mediators between the individual and the Creator, and it has no priesthood. Any competent man of good character may conduct the prayer service. Religious leadership rests with scholars and teachers of the law; the central Muslim concept of shari'a resembles the halakhah* of Judaism. The second pillar of Islam is the obligation to pray five times daily—at sunrise, midday, midafternoon, sunset, and at night before retiring—and some scholars have suggested that the Arabian Jews also used to pray five times a day. At first, Muslims turned toward Jerusalem when praying, but Muḥammad later changed the direction to Mecca. Even so, Jerusalem remains, after Mecca and Medina, the third most holy city of Islam, and according to one tradition, a single prayer in Jerusalem outweighs a thousand prayers elsewhere. The hours of prayer are announced by a crier (muezzin) from the tower of the mosque, a practice reminiscent of the custom followed in the Temple of Jerusalem, where according to the Talmud an appointed crier used to announce: "Arise, priests to your service, Levites to your platforms, and Israelites to your stands." Instead of the Jewish Sabbath or the Christian Sunday, Muḥammad chose Friday as a day of assembly (possibly influenced by the practice of Arabian Jews to begin the observance of the Sabbath early on Friday), but he did not declare it a day of rest; work is permitted and the day is merely marked by special congregational services and sermons. The third pillar, zakat (alms) to the poor, the widowed, and the orphaned, was originally left to individual charity but subsequently became a fixed tax. All Muslims must make a pilgrimage to Mecca at least once in their lifetimes (this is the fourth pillar of Islam), unless physically or financially unable to do so. For regular corporate worship, Muslims pray in mosques, which are similar to the synagogues that most likely served as their models. At first, Muḥammad instituted a fast on the tenth day of the Muslim calendar year ('Ashura', Fast of the Tenth), obviously in imitation of Yom Kippur, observed on 10 Tishrei, but he subsequently revoked the obligation. Instead, he instituted the fast of the month of Ramadan (the ninth month of the Muslim lunar year), which is observed for thirty days, from sunrise to sunset, and is considered the fifth pillar of Islam. Muslims practice circumcision and refrain from the consumption of blood, pork, or the flesh of any animal that "dies of itself." Jihad (struggle), that is, holy war, is a duty incumbent upon Muslims but not counted among the pillars of Islam. Followers of Muḥammad share the hope of spreading Islam to the non-Muslim world. This concept requires of Muslims that they subdue the infidel, and they who die in the war for Allah are considered martyrs and guaranteed entry into paradise. Jews under Islam have known occasional periods of fanatical persecution but also of great cultural flowering (such as the golden age of Spanish Jewry). On the whole, Jewish life in the Middle Ages was less precarious under Muslim than under Christian rule. The extent to which Jews shared the culture of their Muslim neighbors is illustrated by the number of Jewish classics (philosophical, ethical, and even halakhic) written in Arabic, as well as by the influence of Muslim thinkers that these works exhibit. In the twentieth century the Muslim-Jewish relationship in many lands deteriorated as a result of Muslim hostility to Zionism and the growth of Islamic fundamentalism. Most Jews living in Muslim lands left them after 1948, notably for the State of Israel.

ISRAEL (Heb. Yisra'el), name of honor (meaning God Fights, or He for Whom God Fights, or He Who Fights with God) bestowed upon the patriarch *Jacob after his nocturnal struggle near the brook of Jabbok (Gn. 32.24–32). The name was also applied to the whole of Jacob's descendants (the children of Israel or the *Israelites; Ex. 1.9). With the division of the kingdom after the death of Solomon, the name was used to designate the northern portion only (the southern part was called Judah). The land of Canaan became known as the Land of Israel (see ERETS YISRA'EL). When the Jewish state was established in 1948, it was named the State of Israel. See also ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.

ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF, the northern Israelite kingdom during the period of the divided monarchy (c.928–722). After Solomon's death, his son Rehoboam could not mend regional differences and discontent in his kingdom, especially among non-Judahites (1 Kgs. 12). David and Solomon's united monarchy was split into two nations, the kingdom of Judah (see JUDAH, KINGDOM OF) and the kingdom of Israel under the leadership of Jeroboam (who had led an unsuccessful revolt against Solomon). The northern tribes comprised the larger territory of Israel. Manasseh, Issachar, Zebulun, Naphtali, Ashar, and Dan were in Galilee, and Reuben, Gad, and part of Manasseh were east of the Jordan. The border between the two kingdoms shifted during the next fifty years as a result of repeated warfare. It became fixed in the mid-ninth century when relations between the two nations improved. The geographical area of Israel, however, continued to change throughout its history depending on the political situation between Israel, the Aramean and Transjordanian kingdoms, and Assyria. In its two centuries of existence, Israel was ruled by nineteen kings from a number of dynasties, none of the lineage of David. Several kings, including the first, Jeroboam, were anointed by prophets. Jeroboam established Israel's capital first at Shechem and then at Peniel. He set up golden calves at Dan and Bethel and designated those shrines as substitutes for the Jerusalem Temple. His religious institutions remained the objects of prophetic rebuke until the demise of the kingdom. Israel's history was marked by civil war, palace revolts, and assassinations, although a few powerful kings brought periods of stability and prosperity to the nation. The Omride dynasty was one of the most successful. Omri (882–871) founded the city of Samaria at a strategic location on Mount Ephraim and moved his capital there from Tirzah. His son Ahab (873–852) married a Phoenician princess, Jezebel, thereby establishing close ties with her homeland, a nation known for its craftsmen and master builders. He expanded Samaria and succeeded militarily. Assyrian documents referred to Israel as "the House of Omri" long after his dynasty ceased to exist. Jeroboam II (789–748), the longest reigning of Israel's kings, expanded its borders up to Damascus, Syria. Samaria reached the zenith of its growth and prosperity during his reign.

Following the death of Jeroboam II a combination of internal anarchy and Assyrian imperialism set in motion Israel's downfall. The Assyrian ruler Tiglath-pileser's conquest of the West (734–732) included most of Israel's territory. Only Samaria and its environs remained; its king, Hoshea, was an Assyrian vassal. Hoshea soon conspired with the Egyptians against Assyria (2 Kgs. 17), and Samaria was conquered by Shalmaneser V in 722. Shalmaneser's successor, Sargon II, returned to Samaria in 720 and exiled the population to Assyrian lands (see ASSYRIAN EXILE). Samaria then became an Assyrian provincial administrative center. Captives from other nations, later known as *Samaritans, were settled in Samaria. Based on the striking growth of Jerusalem at that time, it seems that many northerners fled into Judah before the deportations. See also TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

ISRAEL, STATE OF, JEWISH RELIGIOUS LIFE IN. Israel was founded as a Jewish state, and over 80 percent of its population is Jewish. The religious establishment in Israel is exclusively in Orthodox hands, along the lines set up by the British when they founded the *chief rabbinate in 1920 (at which time there were no non-Orthodox religious institutions). There is no separation of state and religion. Matters of personal status (notably marriage and divorce) are governed by the religious laws of each community (Jewish, Muslim, Druze, Christian). This means, for example, that there is no provision in Israel for marriages between couples of different faiths, although such marriages contracted outside Israel are recognized by the state. Rabbinical courts are recognized by the state, and their judges and functionaries are state officials. A Ministry of Religions supervises the rabbinical courts and is responsible for other aspects of religious life (such as the upkeep of synagogues). The question of membership is not easily settled in cases where individuals want to separate religion and nationality (for example, by being a Christian Jew). Israeli secular courts have ruled that one cannot be a Jew by nationality and a Christian by religion in Israel (see JEW, WHO IS A?, CONTROVERSY).

*Ashkenazim and *Sephardim in Israel each have their own chief rabbi and rabbis at the local level. However, there are unifying tendencies in courts of law and in prayer rites (such as the unified rite adopted by the army). Because of the historical anti-Zionism of the Reform movement, Reform communities and institutions only emerged after the establishment of the state, and although the Conservative movement was not anti-Zionist, few Conservative Jews lived in Israel before it achieved statehood. Both now have rabbinical seminaries and a network of synagogues. However, their rabbis are not allowed to act as marriage registrars. There is a plethora of *synagogues throughout the country, reflecting the diverse origins of the Jewish population. The synagogue is almost exclusively a house of prayer, as the educational and communal functions it assumed in the Diaspora are met in Israel by different institutions.

Within the Jewish population, there is a clear dividing line between two subcultures—the religious and the secular (hiloni). Orthodox Jews are in the minority, and their numbers have been estimated at less than one-third of the total Jewish population. However, religion is very much a part of everyday political discourse in Israel, and both the more moderate Orthodox and the *Haredim have their own political parties and representation in the Knesset (see RELIGIOUS PARTIES IN ISRAEL). The religious parties have been members of nearly all government coalitions, and in return for their support of the government, they have obtained key religious legislation. For example, dietary laws are observed in the army and in government institutions, while the raising of pigs and the selling of pork are forbidden by law (except in a few areas where Christians predominate).

The language of Israel is Hebrew, which incorporates much terminology from religious sources. The Sabbath and festivals are official days of rest: the Pesah *Seder is almost universally observed, while all traffic ceases on *Yom Kippur. The traditional rites of passage are observed by all. The Jewish state school system in Israel is divided into two parallel subsystems, one religious and the other secular. Even secular schools teach Bible, Jewish history, Jewish law, and Jewish literature. Haredim introduced an independent school system that now receives financing from the state. Israel is today the leading center of *yeshivah education (yeshivah students are exempted from military service). A recent development has been the establishment of a small network of schools for religious, non-Orthodox education.

Prior to the establishment of the State of Israel, the Haredim had been extremely anti-Zionist. A tiny group known as the *Neturei Qarta' still refuses to recognize the Jewish state. The more moderate Orthodox (datiim) participated in the Zionist endeavor (see RELIGIOUS ZIONISM) and hailed the foundation of the state as "the beginning of redemption." The term masorti (traditional) denotes those who are partially observant, and in Israel the Conservative movement is known as the Masorti movement.

One of the consequences of the Six-Day War was the settlement of the newly acquired areas of Erets Yisra'el by Orthodox Jews, who were determined that these should remain under Jewish control, motivated by the belief that Jewish law forbids the relinquishment of any part of the historic land of Israel. This resulted in a far greater involvement of religious Jews in matters connected with security and foreign policy.

ISRAEL, STATE OF, THEOLOGICAL ASPECTS.

The topic is usually discussed among Religious Zionists in terms of messianism. The institutionally sanctioned prayer for the state, recited in synagogues around the world, refers to "the first flowering of our redemption." This view, largely as it developed under the influence of the chief rabbi Avraham Yits'haq ha-Kohen Kook (see KOOK FAMILY), adopts a naturalistic understanding of the messianic process. The fact that no overt miracles are involved suggests that the Jewish people, working within the order of nature and history, can play a positive role in the messianic advent. The State of Israel is seen as a decisive stage of that process. Furthermore, given the way in which the history of the State of Israel seems to mirror so many prophetic promises concerning redemption (victory against overwhelming odds in war; ingathering of the dispersed of Israel; the greening of the desert; etc.), Religious Zionists have become convinced that Israel is the athalta' di-ge'ullah* (the beginning of the redemption).

Those who deny both the messianic character and the theological significance of the State of Israel on religious grounds generally represent ultra-Orthodox (haredi) understandings of messianism, according to which the messianic advent will be accompanied by overt miracles. Furthermore, haredi thinkers tend to claim that repentance on the part of the whole people is a precondition and not a consequence of that event. They also expect the wars of Armageddon and the "great and terrible Day of the Lord" as necessary parts of the traditional messianic scenario. Since the State of Israel satisfies none of these criteria it is devoid of messianic and, therefore, theological, significance. Some (e.g., Satmar Hasidim) even maintain that in attempting to encroach on God's prerogative, "ungodly" Zionism reveals itself as the work of Satan. It was this Satanic Zionism that brought down upon the people God's wrath, which found its expression in the horrors of the Holocaust.

Orthodox Zionists and ultra-Orthodox non- or anti-Zionists are further divided over two other issues, both having messianic implications. From the Zionist perspective, the Holocaust marks a caesura in Jewish history. Since the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE, Jews have behaved as if there was a de facto agreement with the powers of the world, under which they renounced all claims to political power in return for tolerated existence. The Holocaust marked the end of that arrangement. For the first time, the people as a whole was threatened with extinction. The gentile powers can no longer be relied upon to guarantee the mere existence of Jews and Judaism. In consequence, Israel must reenter the world of history and once again become actors upon its stage. For Orthodox Zionism, this is God's will, and the State of Israel is the way in which it is realized.

Ultra-Orthodox thinkers, on the other hand, tend to see the Holocaust as one more in a series of pogroms that Jews have suffered throughout history. Without minimizing the horrors of the Holocaust, they do not see it as different in kind from other persecutions: quantitatively greater, qualitatively the same. Hence, there are no new lessons to be learned from it. Gentiles have always hated Jews and will always hate Jews. They always have and always will seek to destroy Israel, until God ushers in the messianic era. According to this view, conclusions drawn from the Holocaust are simply a misreading of history, and relating these conclusions to messianism compounds the mistake, which can at best be excused as an act of immaturity, and at worst must be condemned as a revolt against God. ISRAELI, YITSHAQ (c.855–955), North African philosopher who lived in Kairouan, where he was court physician. His medical writings, for which he was best known, were influential for many centuries, while his philosophical works gained the attention of Christian scholars. His most famous philosophical book, Sefer ha-Gevulim, defines and sometimes discusses major philosophical concepts. Other works include Sefer ha-Yesodot, which discusses Aristotle's theories of the elements, and Sefer ha-Ruah v'ha-Nefesh, the only book in which he refers to the Bible and which he wrote specifically for Jewish readers. His books were written in Arabic, but his philosophical works are known only in Hebrew and Latin translations. Israeli was a pioneer of Jewish Neoplatonic thought and influenced later medieval Jewish thinkers. He himself was influenced by the works of the Arabic philosopher al-Kindi and by other Neoplatonic writings no longer known, and he also introduced a number of Aristotelian ideas, such as the tripartite division of the soul into the vegetable, animal, and rational, into his works. While seeking to synthesize religious and philosophical concepts, for example combining the biblical account of creation with Neoplatonic ideas of emanation, his emphasis is on the philosophical approach.

ISRAEL INDEPENDENCE DAY. See YOM HA-'ATSMA'UT.

ISRAELITE, a descendant of *Jacob (who was given the name *Israel, Gn. 32.29). Israelites were also known as the children of Israel and as the Twelve Tribes. After the death of Solomon, the term Israelite was limited to the inhabitants of the northern kingdom of Israel (in contrast to the Judahites in the south), but following the end of the northern kingdom in 722 BCE, Israelite was almost entirely superseded by *Jew, derived from Judah. Because of the derogatory associations connected with the word Jew during and after the *Emancipation, Western and assimilated Jews, in particular, revived the term Israelite as a less offensive substitute; in certain languages, such as French and Italian, Israelite remains the accepted term. In a purely liturgical context, an Israelite is a Jew who is neither a priest nor a Levite (see QER'AT HA-TORAH). A citizen of the State of Israel is called an Israeli, a term that designates nationality and citizenship but not faith.

ISRAELITISCH-THEOLOGISCHE LEHRANSTALT, rabbinical and teachers' seminary established in Vienna in 1893. Adolf Schwarz was its first rector, and under his guidance it developed into one of the most important rabbinical seminaries in Europe, combining traditional rabbinic studies with general education. Many noted scholars, among them Samuel Krauss, Meir Friedmann, and Victor Aptowitzer, taught at the seminary, which closed in 1938 after the Nazi occupation of Austria.

ISRU HAG (יִסְרֻ חָג; bind the festival), the day after the Shalosh Regalim. The Talmud comments: "To add a day to the festival and honor it with feasting, is as if to have offered a sacrifice at the altar" (Suk. 45b). The day is considered a minor festival for liturgical purposes, and no supplicatory or penitential prayers are said; fasting and funeral eulogies are prohibited. This custom, expressive of the reluctance with which the passing of the festival is viewed, possibly goes back to a more ancient custom—deduced from Deuteronomy 16.7—of remaining an extra night in Jerusalem at the conclusion of a festival (Hag. 16a). In the Talmud Yerushalmi ('A. Z. 1.1) the day is called berei de-mo'ada, "the son [offshoot] of the festival."

ISSACHAR (Heb. Yissakhar), Jacob's fifth son from Leah and one of the Israelite tribes. The name is apparently derived from two words: ish (man) and sakhar (recompense). The meaning of the name is explained in the story of Issachar's birth (Gn. 30.8) and in Jacob's blessing of Issachar (Gn. 49.15).

The land of Issachar extended mostly from the highlands north of Jezreel to Mount Tabor in the north and the Jordan River in the east. The western border is not clearly known (Jos. 49.17–23). It seems that the valley areas of Issachar were not conquered by the tribe until a later period, since the Canaanites with their chariots were too difficult to defeat for a long time. Therefore, it is likely that the sons of Issachar (and parts of the tribe of Zebulun) were subjected to the Canaanites, a reflection of which can be found in Genesis 49.15: "... so he bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a slave at forced labor." Men from the tribe of Issachar participated in the war against the Canaanites (Jgs. 5.15). The land of Issachar is mentioned as a separate county in the time of King Solomon (I Kgs. 4.17), which may reflect the stabilization of the status of the tribe of Issachar in their land. The judge Tola, son of Puah, was from the tribe of Issachar and so was Baasha, the third king of Israel (the northern kingdom, 906–883).

ISSERLEIN, YISRA'EL BEN PETAHYAH (1390–1460), German rabbi who figured prominently in the intellectual and cultural renaissance that followed the period of decline associated with the Black Death persecutions of 1348 and 1349. Born in Regensburg, he served as rabbi for many years in Wiener Neustadt. Recognized during his lifetime as an outstanding halakhic authority, he is frequently cited as a source for the legal rulings of R. Mosheh Isserles, appended to the Shulḥan 'Arukh, decisions that in turn exerted enormous influence upon subsequent Ashkenazi halakhic practice. Isserlein, nonetheless, held a rather restrictive view of rabbinic authority. He was well known for his opposition to the attempts by some rabbis to enforce their decrees upon communities that did not accept them. In his view, even the gedol ha-dor (the greatest scholar of his time) has no power to enact legislation that the majority of the community cannot abide. Among Isserlein's best-known works is Terumat ha-Deshen (Venice, 1519), a collection of halakhic responsa, which some (though not all) authorities regard as answers to questions that Isserlein himself composed rather than to inquiries received from others. His Pesaqim u-Khetavim (Venice, 1519) and Leqet Yosher (1903–1904) are collections arranged by his students. The former primarily contains responsa and halakhic decisions, while the latter emphasizes many of Isserlein's own personal religious practices (minhagim).

ISSERLES, MOSHEH (c.1525–1572), Polish halakhic authority and codifier; popularly known by the acronym Rema'. Born in Kraków and educated at the yeshivah of Shalom Shakna in Lublin, Isserles was an acknowledged halakhic authority while still a youth.

His principal halakhic works established him as Yosef Karo's counterpart in the Ashkenazi community. Darkhei Mosheh, Isserles's commentary to the Arba'ah Turim, presents Ashkenazi legal precedents not found in Karo's Beit Yosef. Karo codified mainly Sephardi usage, for which his works were criticized among Ashkenazim. Therefore, after Karo produced the Shulḥan 'Arukh*, Isserles published the supplementary Mappah, providing Ashkenazi rulings and customs. Although Isserles frequently contested Karo's views, by appending his own notes and glosses to Karo's work (printed in all standard editions), he rendered the Shulḥan 'Arukh an acceptable code of law for Ashkenazim, and one to which future generations of Ashkenazi halakhists added their own commentaries. The eventual emergence of Karo's Shulḥan 'Arukh as the definitive code of law for world Jewry was therefore due in no small part to Mosheh Isserles. Isserles's glosses uphold the authority of minhagim (customs)—"the minhag* is the law" (Darkhei Mosheh on Arba'ah Turim, Yoreh De'ah 116)—thereby placing the legal decisions of aharonim* (later generations of rabbis) along with current practices on a level equal to that of earlier authorities.

Isserles wrote a treatise entitled Torat ha-Hattat (Kraków, 1569), following the structure of Yitshaq ben Me'ir *Dueren's Sha'arei Dura', and he composed glosses to several Talmudic tractates, as well as to Ya'aqov ben Yehudah *Weil's Shehitah u-Vediqah and Asher ben Yehiel's Ro'sh. In addition, Isserles wrote ninety-one responsa (Kraków, 1640). His principal non-halakhic works were Mehir Yayin, a philosophical-allegorical interpretation of the Book of Esther, and Torat ha-'Olah, a philosophical analysis of the Temple's structure and apertures and of the relationship of the sacrificial cult to the nature of man and the universe.

Although Isserles was not an ardent kabbalist and ruled against the Zohar whenever it contravened halakhic precedent and practice, he did incorporate kabbalistic observations into the Torat ha-'Olah and left behind an unpublished commentary on the Zohar, as well as a kabbalistic treatise entitled Yesodei Sifrei ha-Qabbalah. He also composed notes to Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed and commentaries to aggadic portions of the Talmud and to the Song of Songs.

Isserles's designation as the "Maimonides of Polish Jewry" was meant to imply similarities between the two in their mastery of both sacred and secular studies. However, Isserles's approval of the study of philosophy earned him caustic rebukes from Shelomoh Luria and Eliyahu ben Shelomoh Zalman, the Vilna Ga'on.

Isserles also had his critics in the area of halakhah. His Torat ha-Hattat was attacked by *Hayyim ben Betsal'el and Yom Tov Lipmann *Heller. Heller also criticized Isserles's glosses on the Shulhan 'Arukh for neglecting German-Jewish customs and warned that such codes of law were dangerous because they discouraged the study of the true sources, the Talmud and the ri'shonim.

Such criticism notwithstanding, Isserles is the pre-eminent Ashkenazi codifier-annotator, whose rulings generally came to be accepted as authoritative by subsequent generations.

He lived in Kraków where a synagogue was named after him during his lifetime. The synagogue still stands, with his tomb in the courtyard.

ISSUR VE-HETTER (אסור וְהֵתֵר; prohibited and permitted), the classical Jewish legal term denoting ritual law. The rules governing issur ve-hetter differ in certain ways from other fields of Jewish law, such as financial cases. Thus, for example, mutually agreed upon conditions in violation of Jewish law have no impact in the areas of ritual law or criminal law but are valid in the area of financial law. The Talmud (Ber. 19b; Ket. 40b) states that neither analogies from ritual matters to financial matters nor the reverse are generally accepted to prove law. So, too, the role of secular law is vastly curtailed in ritual law, whereas dina' de-malkhuta' dina'* is a valid source of financial law. Finally, Talmudic methodology appears to be different in these two areas in that financial law is driven by the more classical forms of legal reasoning, whereas ritual law is more closely governed by the hermeneutic rules of the Talmud.

While most areas of law intuitively divide between ritual and financial law, this is not always the case. Thus, the rules governing usury fall under ritual law, whereas certain portions of the laws governing redemption of the firstborn are regarded as financial matters. Charity laws are regulated by both sets of principles, and the proper status of inheritance laws is subject to dispute.

IYYAR (יָאָר), second month of the Hebrew civil calendar and eighth of the religious; the zodiac sign for Iyyar is Taurus. It has twenty-nine days and is referred to in the Bible as the month of Ziv. Special days in this month are *Yom ha-'Atsma'ut on 5 Iyyar, *Pesah Sheni on 14 Iyyar, *Lag ba-'Omer on 18 Iyyar, and *Yom Yerushalayim on 28 Iyyar.

IYYUN CIRCLE, a term denoting a circle that produced a few dozen relatively short theosophical treatises. The earliest date from either late twelfth-century Provence or mid-thirteenth-century Castile. These anonymous or pseudonymous works were presumably composed by many different individuals. It is unknown whether the authors had personal contact with each other, but their writings all exhibit the influence of one or both of two pivotal texts: Sefer ha-Iyyun, attributed to R. Ḥamma'i, and Ma'ayan ha-Hokhmah, ascribed to Moses. The first two recensions of Sefer ha-Iyyun delineate ten divinely emanated koḥot (powers) beginning with Primordial Wisdom and Marvelous Light; two later recensions discuss thirteen powers. Ma'ayan ha-Hokhmah presents a cosmogony using distinct, yet interrelated, sequences of primal letters or cosmic ethers and lights. Neither Sefer ha-Iyyun nor Ma'ayan ha-Hokhmah refer to the sefirot. Later writings, however, synthesized kabbalistic terminology with the 'Iyyun Circle's concepts.

IZBICA, nineteenth-century Polish Hasidic dynasty founded by R. Mordechai Yosef Leiner (1800–1854). Leiner was the preeminent student of Menahem Mendel of Kotsk until an ideological estrangement led to Leiner's move to Izbica (1840). Leiner advocated a pluralistic, egalitarian approach to Judaism that encouraged idiosyncratic interpretation of the divine will and individual criteria for the fulfillment of the divine commandments. He argued against the search for unequivocal truth and denied an authoritative reading for the holy scripture. Further, since the omnipotent divine will is concealed within the illusions of reality, all human deed is inconsequential. Leiner wrote Beit Ya'aqov (Warsaw, 1890). He was succeeded by his son Ya'aqov Leiner of Radzyń and his grandson Gershon Henik of Radzyń, who published his grandfather's teachings in Mei ha-Shiloh (vol. 1 [Venice, 1860]; vol. 2 [Lublin, 1922]).

JACHIN AND BOAZ (Heb. Yakhin; Bo'az), names of two bronze pillars that flanked the entrance of the porch of Solomon's Temple—Jachin on the right, Boaz on the left (1 Kgs. 7.21–23). Their exact significance is uncertain, as they appear not to have been part of the Temple structure itself. According to Jewish tradition, the pillars were symbolic of God's presence as a pillar of fire and a pillar of cloud in the wilderness. Their names could signify words from a dynastic inscription: Jachin (Heb. kun), "He will establish"; Boaz (Heb. 'oz), "in strength."

JACOB (Heb. Ya'aqov), Israelite patriarch, son of *Isaac and *Rebekah, also called *Israel (Gn. 32.29). The third and eponymous forefather of the Jewish people, he was the younger twin of Esau. The two traditional folk etymologies of the name derive from Jacob's gripping Esau's heel ('eqev*) at birth (Gn. 25.26) and Esau's later charge that "he has supplanted me [va-ya'qeveni] these two times" (Gn. 27.36). The narratives concerning Jacob form one of the main components of Genesis. Jacob himself characterized the years of his life as "few and difficult" (Gn. 47.9). His struggles began in the womb of his mother, Rebekah, where he wrestled with his brother, Esau—a condition divinely explained as indicating that the older twin would serve the younger (Gn. 25.21–23). While Esau was described as red, hairy, a skillful hunter, and a man of the open field, Jacob was portrayed as reserved, tending his flocks, and tilling the fields (Gn. 25.25–27). Jacob later exploited this difference both when he extracted the birthright from the famished Esau for a pottage of lentils (Gn. 25.29–34) and when, under the direction of Rebekah, he secured the blessing of the firstborn through deceiving his father, Isaac (Gn. 27.1–40). Rebekah then intervened and sent him off to her brother Laban in Mesopotamia. At the outset of his journey, Jacob received a revelation from God at Bethel in which he saw a ladder reaching up to heaven. God promised him divine protection as well as eventual possession of the country. While abiding with Laban he was deceived into marrying Laban's eldest daughter, *Leah, rather than *Rachel, the younger daughter whom he wished to marry (Gn. 29.14–30). Jacob continued working for Laban for a period of twenty years in order to eventually marry Rachel and to provide for his own family, which numbered twelve sons and one daughter. During that time, Jacob prospered despite Laban's repeated attempts to profit at his expense (Gn. 30.25–43). Eventually Jacob fled from Laban's authority to return to the land of Canaan (Gn. 31). En route, however, after preparing gifts to assuage Esau (Gn. 32.3–21), he wrestled with God (or a divine being) at Peniel near the ford of the Jabbok River and received the blessing of a new name: Israel (Gn. 32). In his later years Jacob was deprived of his son Joseph through the machinations of his other sons (Gn. 37). The family was later reunited, however, by the agency of Joseph himself, who, as vizier of Egypt, settled them in the region of Goshen during a time of famine (Gn. 42–47.12). After blessing his sons (Gn. 49; see JACOB, BLESSING OF), Jacob died in Egypt at the age of 147 but was carried in a solemn procession to the land of Canaan to be buried with Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Rebekah, and Leah in the cave in the field of Machpelah (Gn. 49.29–50.14). In biblical literature the name Jacob appeared very often as an epithet for Israel (e.g., Nm. 23.7; Dt. 33.4). Jacob's many trials are treated in rabbinic literature as symbolic of the plight and struggles of the Jewish people. The rabbis ascribed to Jacob the introduction of the evening prayer, Ma'ariv (Ber. 26b). See also TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

JACOB, BLESSING OF, the words of the dying patriarch Jacob, contained in Genesis 49. E. A. Speiser has termed it "The Testament of Jacob," because most of the sayings are curses rather than blessings (e.g., Gn. 49.3–4, 5–7; and cf. Ibn Ezra and Hizquni on Gn. 49.1). It is part of the corpus of early Israelite poetry, apparently dating from the Mosaic period in the thirteenth century BCE until the end of the united kingdom around 921 BCE. While the various sayings in the Testament of Jacob refer to, and may well have been composed in, diverse periods (e.g., the passage concerning Simeon and Levi [5–7] can refer only to the rape of Dinah [Gn. 34] in the patriarchal period; while the passage concerning Judah [8–12] apparently dates from the period of the united monarchy), the composition as a whole can not be earlier than the date of the composition of its latest components, namely the period of the united kingdom in the tenth century BCE.

JACOBSON, ISRAEL (1768–1828), financier and pioneer of Reform Judaism. Born in Halberstadt, Germany, he received an Orthodox education. Influenced by Moses Mendelssohn and the Haskalah, he saw a need to train Jews for vocations and opened a school in Seesen. His suggestion to Napoléon to establish a supreme Jewish council headed by a patriarch headquartered in Paris (1806) probably influenced Napoléon's idea for a Sanhedrin (see SANHEDRIN, FRENCH). Jacobson convened a gathering of Jewish notables in Kassel in 1808 to introduce religious reforms; he built a synagogue there, the services of which included sermons in German as well as confirmation rites (1810). Officiating in the robes of a Protestant clergyman, he dedicated the school the following year with the ringing of bells and singing of German hymns accompanied by organ music. After the fall of Napoléon and the breakup of Westphalia, Jacobson moved to Berlin, where he continued to work for religious reform. For his son's bar mitsvah in 1815, Jacobson opened a Reform synagogue in his house. Due to lack of space, he later moved the synagogue to the home of Jacob Hertz Beer, where Leopold Zunz and Eduard Kley preached. The holding of prayer meetings in private homes was a practice typical of upper-class German Jews of the period. Responding to pressure by Orthodox rabbis who argued for the closure of Jacobson's synagogue, the government prohibited all private, home-based synagogues in 1823.

JAFFE, MORDEKHAI BEN AVRAHAM (c.1535–1612), codifier and Talmudist known as the Ba'al ha-Levushim (Author of the Levushim). Born in Prague, Jaffe studied under Shelomoh *Luria and Mosheh *Is-erles in Poland, where he also became well versed in mathematics, astronomy, philosophy, and Kabbalah. Upon his return to Prague, Jaffe headed the local yeshivah, but his disappointment with the emphasis placed upon pilpul* there led him to devote himself primarily to literary endeavors.

Jaffe composed a code of law, the Levushim (found in most standard editions of the Arba'ah Turim by Ya'aqov ben Asher), over the span of half a century. Shorter in length than Yosef *Karo's copious Beit Yosef but longer than his concise Shulhan 'Arukh*, Jaffe's code incorporates parts of the Arba'ah Turim omitted by Karo and includes numerous customs practiced by Polish and German Jewry. Jaffe's code supplies rationales for many religious observances as well as kabbalistic insights. Five of the ten sections of Levushim deal with the legislation of the Arba'ah Turim; the remaining five sections include sermons, comments on *Rashi's and Menaḥem Recanati's commentaries to the Pentateuch, and Jaffe's own commentary to Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed. Although the Levushim proved to be a popular code of law during Jaffe's lifetime, it was eclipsed in ensuing years by the popularity of the Shulhan 'Arukh.

Jaffe served as a rabbi in both eastern and western European Jewish centers, most notably Grodno, Lublin (where he played an active role in the deliberations of the Jewish autonomous body, the Council of the Four Lands), Prague, and Poznań.

JAGEL, AVRAHAM BEN HANANYAH DEI GALICCHI (1553–c.1623), philosopher and scientist. He was born at Monselice, northern Italy, and lived in various towns in Italy. His Leqah Tov (Venice, 1595) was written under the influence of the Christian catechism as a dialogue between a rabbi and a student. He bases Judaism on Maimonides' *Thirteen Principles of Faith and posits faith, hope and charity (i.e., love) as the basis of righteous conduct. Jagel combined a broad secular knowledge with Jewish tradition and sought to link the sciences to the sources of Judaism. His Beit Ya'ar ha-Levanon, written in 1579 (unpublished), is an encyclopedic work of the sciences of his day. One of its main themes was magic, which Jagel held had been part of Jewish tradition since the time of Abraham. His ethical work, Gei' Hizzayon, was written when he was twenty-five. In an imitation of Dante, the author describes how he was guided through the afterworld by his father's spirit. From the spirits, he hears moral tales; many of them are Renaissance novellae which are given a Jewish coloring. The work was written in rhymed prose. It was translated into English by David R. Ruderman (A Valley of Vision [Philadelphia, 1990]).

JEDID AL-ISLAM, a Persian Jew forcibly converted to Islam. The first forced conversion under Shah Abbas I (1588–1629) was followed in 1656 by the mass conversion of all Persian Jews by Shah Abbas II (1642–1666). These new Muslims were allowed to revert to Judaism only to be persecuted once again in the eighteenth century. Another forced conversion occurred in the city of Mashhad, site of Iran's most important Shiite shrine, in 1839. These converts continued to practice Judaism in utmost secrecy, while scrupulously performing the rites of Islam publicly. They lived separately in their own quarter and married exclusively among themselves. While prohibited from reverting to Judaism, they eventually immigrated to neighboring countries and later to Israel and the United States, where they have formed Mashhadi congregations that retain some of the unique practices forged under the adverse conditions of crypto-Judaism.

JEHOIADA (Heb. Yehoyada'), chief priest in the Temple during the reigns of Athaliah and Joash of Judah (c.842–798). Jehoiada was responsible for restoring Judah's monarchy to the house of David (2 Kgs. 11). Following the death of Ahaziah, the king's mother, Athaliah (Ahab's daughter), murdered the royal heirs and usurped the throne. Jehosheba, Jehoiada's wife and Ahaziah's sister, saved the sole living prince, Joash, and hid him in a Temple chamber. In the seventh year of Athaliah's reign, Jehoiada successfully carried out a revolt against the queen. He crowned Joash, put Athaliah to death, tore down the house of Baal, and killed its priest, Mattan. The Temple of God was purified, and a chest was installed to collect donations for Temple repairs. Jehoiada is credited for Joash's exemplary behavior (2 Kgs. 12.3). After his mentor's death, Joash accepted idolatrous practices and even murdered Jehoiada's son Zechariah when he reproached the king for his behavior (2 Chr. 24.17–22).

JEHOVAH. See GOD, NAMES OF.

JELLINEK, ADOLF (1821–1893), rabbi, preacher, scholar; officiated in Leipzig and, from 1856, in Vienna. The most celebrated Jewish preacher of the period (he always referred to himself by the title “preacher” [Pre-diger] and not “rabbi”), his brilliant sermons—noteworthy for their Midrashic exposition—attracted large congregations, including many non-Jews. Over two hundred of his sermons were published and greatly influenced Jewish homiletics. He inclined toward moderate Reform Judaism and opposed Zionism. As a scholar, he belonged to the modern school of the *Wissenschaft des Judentums. His extensive researches covered many fields, in particular medieval Jewish philosophy (he wrote on Thomas Aquinas in Jewish literature). A pioneer in Jewish scholarly research into mysticism and one of the few Wissenschaft scholars to approach it with true respect, he was the first to show scientifically that *Mosheh de León was the author of the *Zohar. He edited from manuscript many of the smaller and apocryphal midrashim, publishing ninety-nine of these in his Beit ha-Midrash (6 vols. [1853–1878, 1938]). He also was the author of many bibliographical works.

JEPHTHAH (Heb. Yiftah), one of the Israelite judges. Because he was the son of a harlot, he was driven out of the house by his half brothers and subsequently gathered a band of mercenaries in the land of Tob (probably in the northern part of modern Jordan; Jgs. 11.1–3).

After the Ammonites attacked the Gileadites, Jephthah, who was a Gileadite, came to their rescue at the request of the elders of Gilead. Before the battle, Jephthah vowed to sacrifice whomever he first met when he returned home victorious from the battlefield. When he did return from battle, it was his own daughter who came out first to greet him, and he was obliged to offer her as a sacrifice, but the text is vague about her actual fate. Some scholars contend that she was not sacrificed but was forced to live in confinement. After his victory over the Ammonites, Jephthah went on to suppress an Ephraimite force in Gilead, an incident that probably reflects the Ephraimite aspirations in Transjordan and Gilead (Jgs. 12.1–6).

Jephthah served as a judge for six years and was buried in the region of Gilead (Jgs. 12.7).

JEREMIAH (Heb. Yirmeyahu; born c.645 BCE, died after 582), prophet during and following the last years of the monarchy of the kingdom of Judah; son of Hilkiah, a priest of the line of *Eli from Anathoth, a village a few miles northeast of Jerusalem. Jeremiah's prophetic career began in the thirteenth year of the reign of King *Josiah (626 BCE), and continued through the reigns of Kings Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah to the Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem in 586 and the assassination of the Judean governor Gedaliah in 582. Jeremiah prophesied during the years of the collapse of the Assyrian empire and the rise of the Neo-Babylonian empire, whose king Nebuchadnezzar destroyed Judah. Jeremiah was an early supporter of the reform measures taken by Josiah to purify Jewish religious practice according to the principles laid down in Deuteronomy. Following Josiah's death in battle in 609 and the collapse of his restoration program, Jeremiah became convinced that God would punish his people, and he contested the general belief, rooted in the prophecies of Isaiah, in the inviolability and divine security of Jerusalem. Although Jeremiah was banned from the Temple after nearly being executed for sedition (chap. 26), he sent his scribe *Baruch ben Neriah to read his sermons publicly (chaps. 36 and 45). The king, Jehoiakim, destroyed the scroll, which was then dictated by Jeremiah to Baruch. At the time of the Babylonian victory over Egypt at Carchemish in 605, Jeremiah appeared at the royal court in Jerusalem with a yoke on his back arguing that Judah would submit to Babylon for a period of seventy years, in contrast to the (according to Jeremiah, false) prophet Hananiah, who foretold that God would deliver Jerusalem within two years (chaps. 27–28). After the exile of Jehoiachin and the leading citizens of Judah in 597, Jeremiah wrote a letter to the exiles encouraging them to accept exile as God's will (chap. 29). Many considered Jeremiah a traitor, since he urged the people to submit to Babylon. For this he was constantly persecuted, placed in stocks, and put under house arrest. During a lull in the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem in 588, Jeremiah was arrested for treason when he attempted to leave the city to settle a family property matter (chap. 37). Although he was imprisoned, an Ethiopian eunuch named Ebed-melech saw to his welfare, and Zedekiah continued to consult with Jeremiah throughout the rest of the siege (chaps. 37–38). After the fall of Jerusalem, the Babylonians placed Jeremiah under the care of Gedaliah, whom they appointed governor of Mizpah (chap. 39). Following Gedaliah's assassination in 582, Jeremiah urged the remaining population to stay in Judah and rebuild the devastated land, despite the prospects of Babylonian vengeance (chaps. 40–44), but he was taken by force to Egypt, where he lived out his days. He never married, in order to symbolize the destruction that was coming upon his people (chap. 16). His actions and words were very unpopular in Judah, which prompted a great deal of opposition against him. Jeremiah waged an ongoing battle against the false prophets (23.25) who deceived the people into thinking that the times were ones of peace and welfare (7.14). He complained bitterly about his rejection by many in his society. At times, he even charged that God had deceived him, and he cursed the day that he was born (chap. 20). Despite his prophecy of judgment, Jeremiah portrayed a future restoration of Judah and Israel in which the Lord's Torah would be written upon the hearts of the people (chaps. 30–31). He therefore purchased land in his native Anathoth in anticipation of the future restoration (chap. 32). According to rabbinic tradition, Jeremiah wrote the Book of Jeremiah, Kings, and the Book of Lamentations (B. B. 15a).

The Book of Jeremiah is the second book of the Latter Prophets, although a minority of rabbis considered it to be the first (B. B. 14b). There are two extant versions: the Hebrew (the Masoretic Text) and the Greek (the Septuagint). Many scholars believe that the Greek version was a translation from a Hebrew edition of Jeremiah that predates the Masoretic Text. The Greek text is approximately one-eighth shorter than the apparently expanded Masoretic Text, and the arrangement of the two versions differs substantially after Jeremiah 25.13a. Portions of at least four Hebrew Jeremiah manuscripts were discovered among the Dead Sea Scrolls; three of the manuscripts are proto-Masoretic, while one corresponds much more closely to the Greek text. The book contains a mixture of prose and poetry, and some scholars argue that the prose sections may reflect the work of Baruch. An early edition, which may incorporate some of Jeremiah's original discourses in the Temple, is suggested in the present version of chapters 1–20. Within these chapters appear the account of Jeremiah's call to prophesy (chap. 1); prophecies from his early years that focus on the themes of religious harlotry and the "foe from the north" (chaps. 2–10); and oracles concerning Judah and Jerusalem that are built around the prophet's so-called confessions (chaps. 11–20). Jeremiah 21–23 is an appendix to chapters 1–20 and focuses on Judah's kings and prophets. A prose section, chapters 24 and 25, presents the prophet's life in relation to the last years of the kingdom of Judah. Included is the "Book of Comfort," chapters 30–33, which appears to be a reworked version of Jeremiah's early oracles that point to the ultimate restoration of the land. The oracles against the nations appear in chapters 46–51. A historical narrative drawn largely from 2 Kings 24.18–25.30, which describes the Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem and the exile of the population, concludes the book.

JERUSALEM (Heb. Yerushalayim), ancient capital of the Davidic kingdom; spiritual capital of Judaism throughout the ages. It is first mentioned in the Ebla documents and Egyptian execration texts (c.2000 BCE). Although referred to 656 times in the Bible, in the Pentateuch it is linked only with Salem, mentioned at the time of Abraham (Gn. 14.8). Later legend identified Mount Moriah, site of the aqedah, with the *Temple mount. After *Joshua's conquest of Canaan, the Jebusites retained Jerusalem (Jgs. 1.21), situated in hill country, until *David captured it. Anointed king of all Israel, David, in a move aimed at unifying the nation, chose it as his capital over *Hebron (2 Sm. 5.5). His choice was probably dictated by its strategic site, its central location, and its non-identification with any of the tribes. It was subsequently referred to as the City of David. In addition to being the political capital, Jerusalem's role as spiritual center was immeasurably enhanced by David's act of bringing the *Ark of the Covenant into the city (2 Sm. 6) and by the building of the *Temple under *Solomon (1 Kgs. 6ff.). During Temple times the city was the goal of *pilgrimage on the occasion of the three annual pilgrim festivals (see SHALOSH REGALIM). After the Israelite kingdom split in two, Jerusalem remained the capital of the kingdom of *Judah. During the period of the Second Temple, pilgrims flocked to Jerusalem not only from the land of Israel but from Diaspora communities near and far. Jerusalem received distinct treatment in Jewish law. It was the holiest place on earth, and the Holy of Holies was the holiest place in Jerusalem. This led to a series of laws applicable solely in Jerusalem (B. Q. 82b; Kel. 1.6ff). After the exile of 70 CE, Jerusalem retained its centrality in the Jewish mind. Scattered Jews faced Jerusalem when praying, prayed for the restoration of *Zion, and concluded the Seder service and the Yom Kippur liturgy with the yearning prayer, "Next year in Jerusalem." Many folk customs were linked to mourning over the destruction of the city. An often imaginary Jerusalem was a central feature of folk art. Believing that the Messiah would appear in Jerusalem, Jews went there to die and be buried on the Mount of Olives in anticipation of the resurrection of the dead. After the State of Israel was established, Jerusalem was proclaimed its capital.

JERUSALEM DAY. See YOM YERUSHALAYIM.

JERUSALEM TALMUD. See TALMUD.

JESUS (c.4 BCE–30 CE), founder of *Christianity. The name Jesus is the Greek form of the Hebrew name Yehoshu'a; Christ is the Greek equivalent of messiah (anointed one). The only source of knowledge about Jesus' life and teaching is the New Testament, which was written in the late first and early second centuries and apparently often reflects the beliefs and struggles of the nascent church rather than those of Jesus' own day. Jewish references to Jesus (for example, in the Talmud and Toledot Yeshu) are late and merely polemical; there is also a reference in Josephus (Antiquities of the Jews 18.3.3.63–64). It appears that Jesus was a Galilean Jew who, as a young adult, was influenced by *John the Baptist. John preached *baptism and repentance in preparation for the immediate advent of the kingdom of God. During this period, Jesus also may have absorbed some sectarian influences (see ESSENES). He became a wandering teacher, roaming the country with a small band of followers, preaching in the synagogues, and urging the people to repent because the kingdom of God was at hand. New Testament accounts of Jesus' clashes with the *Pharisees and his diatribes against the Jews probably reflect growing Christian hostility against the Jews, who rejected the claims of the young church. The Pharisees evidently resented the authority that Jesus claimed and the liberties that he took regarding the law far more than they minded the insistence (which he shared with other moralists and teachers) that intention and right spirit were more important than outward performance. In spite of these conflicts, Jesus' sayings resemble contemporary rabbinic teaching, and he essentially belonged to the Pharisaic rather than the Sadducean or sectarian tradition, both in his observance of the law and in his acceptance of specifically Pharisaic doctrines (e.g., the resurrection of the dead). Ultimately, it was his conception of his messianic mission and destiny that was decisive. Jesus lived in the intense apocalyptic expectation of contemporary Jewish sectarian *eschatology and apparently believed himself called to the messianic role of the *Son of Man. In the course of his short ministry, he seems to have concluded that his task also involved suffering and dying. After a messianic entry into Jerusalem just before Pesah in 30 CE, he was arrested as a potential revolutionary and executed (by crucifixion) by order of the Roman procurator Pontius Pilate, probably at the instigation of Jewish circles who feared the Roman reactions to messianic agitation. For some time, his disciples and their followers, who believed that Jesus had risen from the dead and ascended into heaven, existed as a sect within the main body of Jewry (see JEWISH CHRISTIANS) but soon established a distinct, and for a long time hostile, religion. Although the life and teachings of Jesus have exercised a great influence on the course and development of Western civilization, they had no direct effect on Jewish thought; nevertheless, their reconstruction by New Testament scholarship helps to illuminate the religious movements and messianic ferment in Judaism at the end of the Second Temple period. Over the past century, there has been considerable Jewish scholarship concerning Jesus (J. Klausner, D. Flusser, G. Vermes). After World War II, Western Christianity became increasingly conscious of the Jewishness of Jesus, his totally Jewish milieu, and the Jewish inspiration of his teachings. Research into the *Qumran community has shown that much of Jesus' teaching previously thought to derive from Hellenistic sources can be traced to Jewish sectarianism.

JETHRO (Heb. Yitro), father-in-law of Moses and priest of Midian. After Moses, having fled from Egypt to Midian, saved Jethro's seven daughters from being molested by shepherds, Jethro gave his daughter Zipporah to Moses in marriage. In this account, Jethro is called Reuel (Ex. 2.16–22); in Exodus 3.1, he is called Jethro; and in Numbers 10.29, Hobab. These are three variant traditions referring to the same individual. Jethro later blessed the Lord, offered him sacrifices, and gave Moses advice on how to lighten his judicial burden by hearing only the most difficult of cases, while appointing God-fearing men to handle the rest (Ex. 18.1–24).

JEW (Heb. Yehudi), originally a tribal definition meaning a member of the tribe of *Judah. With the division of the kingdom during the reign of Rehoboam, the southern kingdom, consisting of the two loyalist tribes of Judah and Benjamin, took the single name Judah. Thus the word Yehudit (Hebrew) in 2 Kings 18.28 means, in its context, "the language of the kingdom of Judah." With the disappearance of the northern kingdom of Israel and the exile of its population, Judah alone remained to perpetuate the Israelite faith and nationality. During the Babylonian exile, the Judean exiles retained their communal identity. After their return to Jerusalem following the declaration of Cyrus II, they came to be called by the name Yehudi. The word became synonymous with the "descendants of Abraham" and is found in Esther 2.5 referring to "Mordecai . . . a Benjamite." Hence, Jew developed into a common appellation (from the Gr. Ioudaios and the Lat. Judaesus, from which the word Judaism was derived to designate the faith of the Jew). In rabbinical sources the term is used in a purely homiletical as well as in a legal-theological sense; a statement such as "anyone who repudiates idolatry is called a Jew" (Meg. 18a) has homiletical significance only, whereas rabbinic law defines a Jew as either a person born of a Jewish mother or one who has been converted to Judaism (see PROSELYTE). The origin of the rule that a child born of a Jewish father and a non-Jewish mother is not considered a Jew is obscure, but scriptural authority is adduced from Nehemiah 10.29, where it is said that Ezra obligated those Jews who had married foreign wives to put them away together with their children. The child of a Jewish mother, on the other hand, even if the father is not Jewish, has all the rights and privileges of a Jew. Whether, or the extent to which, a Jew can lose his Jewish character and the rights and responsibilities entailed by it has been a matter of controversy. The Talmudic statement "an Israelite, even though he sins, remains an Israelite" (San. 44a) has been interpreted so widely as to include even the sin of apostasy, but different authorities have held varying views regarding the loss of certain rights. Later authorities ruled that a repentant apostate who wishes to return to his original faith must go through a ceremony of readmission; nevertheless, failure to do so would not deprive him of his character as a Jew. The non-Jew who wishes to become a Jew has, after undergoing a course of instruction, formally to take upon himself the obligations of Judaism, and in the case of a male to undergo ritual circumcision. All converts, in addition, have to undergo immersion in a ritual bath (miqveh) and come before a properly constituted court. Such a convert is in every respect a Jew and is considered to be on a par with natural-born Jews. The convert suffers from practically no disabilities, except that a female convert cannot marry a priest. Reform Judaism modified and sometimes abolished the Talmudic rules and rituals concerning conversion and in recent years has accepted as Jews those born of a Jewish father and a non-Jewish mother (see PATRILINEAL DESCENT). This has led to conflicts with other branches of Judaism, especially Orthodox Judaism, which in many cases will not recognize as Jews those considered as such by Reform (and often by Conservative) Jews. Bitter controversies have erupted over the interpretation of the *Law of Return (see JEW, WHO IS A?, CONTROVERSY). In the post-Emancipation world, Jewish identity is no longer based exclusively upon religious practice or belief, and many of those who consider themselves or are considered Jews are not religiously observant (see JEWISH IDENTITY). Prior to the Holocaust there were almost seventeen million Jews in the world. Almost six million were killed during World War II, and today, the world Jewish population is approximately thirteen million people.

JEW, WHO IS A?, CONTROVERSY. Jewish law (halakhah) defines a Jew as a person born of a Jewish mother or one who has converted to Judaism. In the State of Israel it became essential to formulate a legal definition of a Jew as a result of the adoption in 1950 of the *Law of Return, which granted Jews the right to immigrate to Israel and immediately receive citizenship. This became a major issue following the considerable immigration from Poland in 1956 and 1957, which included a high proportion of mixed marriages, in which the wife was generally the non-Jewish partner. The question arose as to how to register children of such marriages should both parents request that they be registered as Jews. The dispute led to a government crisis when the minister of the interior instructed that anyone who declared himself to be a Jew should be registered as such, as a result of which decision the religious parties left the coalition government. Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion sought the advice of scholars throughout the world in search of a solution. The replies were diverse. Orthodox authorities insisted on halakhah and criticized Ben-Gurion for even seeking non-Orthodox opinions. Israeli Supreme Court justice Haim Cohn responded that once jurisdiction in the country had been split between religious and secular authorities, inconsistencies were unavoidable; a Jew for the purpose of citizenship registration could not be the same as a Jew according to rabbinical tradition, and therefore the parents' wishes should be respected. The majority of respondents recognized the link between nationality and religion and recommended the maintenance of traditional categories, at least for the time being. In 1959 Ben-Gurion revoked the directive of the interior minister, and the following year new directives were issued according to halakhic guidelines. In 1962, Brother Daniel Rufeisen, a converted Jew who had become a Catholic monk, claimed citizenship under the Law of Return, saying he was a Jew by birth and remained a Jew halakhically (according to the halakhic prescription that however much a Jew may stray, he remains a Jew). The Israeli Supreme Court ruled that Jew for the purposes of the Law of Return referred to those traditionally regarded by Jews as such and did not apply to a convert to Christianity. In the Shalit case, a Jewish father with a non-Jewish wife sought to have his Israeli-born children registered as Jews. A political controversy was triggered when the Supreme Court ruled that a registration officer was bound to honor the request of the parents, as a result of which in 1970 the Law of Return was amended to set aside the halakhic definition as the criterion.

The Indian *Bene Israel and the Ethiopian *Beta Israel were not originally recognized by the Israeli rabbinate because of doubts about the Jewish origins of these communities. The problems concerning the Bene Israel were eventually resolved; the halakhic identity of the Beta Israel remains under dispute.

The State of Israel has always recognized non-Orthodox conversions contracted outside Israel and registered such converts as Jews, though they are not recognized as Jews in the rabbinical courts, which have jurisdiction over all matters of personal status (including marriage and divorce). In the 1980s, Orthodox Jews proposed that only converts who had undergone an Orthodox conversion be recognized as Jews and not those who had converted under Conservative or Reform auspices. The storm of opposition aroused in the Diaspora, notably in the United States, persuaded the Israeli premier not to act on the demand. It has remained, however, on the agenda of the religious parties. In 1985 a Reform convert from the United States who had moved to Israel appealed to the Supreme Court when the Interior Ministry refused to register her as a Jew. She won the appeal. The issue arose again in 1995 when the Israeli Supreme Court recognized the legitimacy of Reform and Conservative conversions inside Israel. The religious parties fought to overturn the ruling.

The question of who is a Jew also arose in the United States, heightened by the proliferation of mixed marriages. Thousands of conversions were performed by non-Orthodox authorities. The problem was exacerbated in the mid-1980s by the acceptance of *patrilineal descent by the Reform and Reconstructionist movements as an acceptable criterion for creating a presumption of Jewishness for children of an interfaith marriage. Thus a considerable and growing number of children of non-Jewish mothers or of parents whose conversions have been conducted under non-Orthodox auspices are not accepted as Jews in Orthodox circles. This means, for example, that they could not have an Orthodox marriage without undergoing an Orthodox conversion.

JEWISH CHRISTIANS. The abrogation, called "fulfillment," of the Law proclaimed by *Paul (see CHRIS-TIANITY) led to adoption of the new faith by many gentiles. Most of the Jewish followers of *Jesus, however, who had scrupulously maintained the ritual and ceremonial regulations of Judaism, continued to do so and became Jewish Christians; that is, Jews who observed the Law while believing in Jesus. The varying extent of their belief differentiates the two main sects of these Jewish Christians, the *Ebionites and the Nazarenes. The former believed in Jesus' messianic character but denied his divinity and miraculous birth, while maintaining the continued validity of the Law, which they observed. The Nazarenes accepted Jesus' divinity and maintained that the Law was binding on Jews only. It was in order to drive the Jewish Christians from the Jewish religious communion that the patriarch *Gamli'el II instructed R. Shemu'el ha-Qatan to compose the imprecation that became an additional paragraph to the existing *'Amidah (c.100 CE; see BIRKAT HA-MINIM).

In modern times, attempts have been made by Jewish converts to Christianity to reestablish the concept of Jewish Christians (or Hebrew Christians). Over a hundred such groups are in existence including Beth Sar Shalom (founded in 1894), Ariel Ministries, Beth Yeshua, and Emmanu-el. The best-known Hebrew Christian group is Jews for Jesus, founded in 1970. They have active proselytization programs and teach that Jews who accept Jesus as Messiah are not giving up their Judaism but are fulfilling it; without this, Judaism remains incomplete. The groups have missions in various parts of the world, including Israel. Jews do not accept members of these groups as Jewish and maintain that a person who accepts Jesus as Messiah is simply a Christian. A number of court rulings in Israel have rejected claims by Hebrew Christians to be regarded as Jews. See also APOSTASY.

JEWISH IDENTITY. In the biblical period, Jewish identity meant belonging to the Jewish community as a religio-national entity. The stranger (ger) was naturalized into this community by choosing to live its life. At the very beginning of Jewish history, during the Exodus from Egypt, a substantial number of strangers chose to accompany the Jews into the desert (Ex. 12.48; Lv. 24.10). During the conquest of Canaan, remnants of the earlier inhabitants of the land of Canaan remained resident among the Jews (1 Kgs. 9.20–21), and, from time to time, some refugees from nearby peoples also came into the land of Israel (Is. 16.4, 24.14–15). Marriage with gerim was expressly permitted with the exception of those descended from Ammonites and Moabites and, for three generations, from Edomites and Egyptians (Dt. 23.4–9). The first important change in these attitudes occurred after the Babylonian exile. The handful of Jews who returned under Zerubbabel and Ezra in the sixth and fifth centuries BCE were now an embattled minority, even in the very heart of their own settlement, in Jerusalem and the land nearby. Ezra chose the uncompromising path of ordering all of those who wanted to remain faithful as Jews to "put away" their foreign wives (Ezr. 9-10).

Because of the remarkable success that ancient Jews had had in converting others, new formulations of Jewish identity arose. The Hasmoneans, in the first century BCE, forced Idumeans and a number of other border communities to convert to Judaism (it is not entirely clear whether these conversions were conducted with more formality than those of the ancient biblical gerim). In the Diaspora there was an increasing number, perhaps millions by the first century, of sebomenoi (metuentes, yere'im [God fearers]), gentiles who had not gone the whole route toward conversion. Most half-Judaized gentiles remained in that estate and were regarded not as Jews but as sympathizers. The earliest Pauline Christians, those gentile converts to the new religion who had not first become Jews according to the law, were not regarded by anyone as Jews. The Jewish Christians, especially the circle in Jerusalem and the Holy Land in the first century, were much more of a problem. Whatever may have been the exact beliefs of these *Ebionites, their exclusion from the Jewish community did not occur primarily for halakhic reasons. By their own choice these Jewish Christians left Jerusalem and emigrated to Pella in Transjordan at the beginning of the war of 66-70. They separated themselves from the national destiny of the Jews. For some years the Jewish Christian group remained in an intermediate position, but those who did not participate in the Bar Kokhba' Revolt (c.132-135) could no longer lay any claim on being Jewish. Official Christianity was by then largely gentile, and the new religion was systematically excluding all traces of the pre-eminence of Jews.

The most complicated example of the interweaving of internal and external forces was that of Marranism (see MARRANOS). On occasion, both Islam and Christianity forced Jews to apostatize. This occurred in such places as Yemen and North Africa, in the early centuries of Islam, and, from late antiquity throughout the Middle Ages, especially in the Iberian Peninsula, in the case of Christianity. Under Islam, forced apostates were usually allowed to return to Judaism within one generation. Those who chose not to do so usually rapidly assimilated. Under Christianity, the situation was different. The majority that had forced the conversions looked upon the newcomers with suspicion for many generations, certainly for longer than any intensity of Jewish feeling or affirmation lasted among the Marranos themselves. Those who chose to remain Marranos had, in one or two generations, little Jewish loyalty and observed even fewer secret Jewish practices than supposed. Remaining Jewish loyalties were evoked into new vigor in sixteenth-century Spain, not so much by memories of the past as by the persecution of the Inquisition. Attacks continued in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in the name of the doctrine of limpieza de sangre (purity of blood), under which new Christians of even partial Jewish ancestry were barred from the highest offices of state and church; there was, therefore, new reason for people who had ceased to be Jewish except by the accident of birth to return, as it were, to Judaism. This was a difficult and sometimes tragic journey into a strange and constricting world. Until the dawn of the modern era, the definition of Jewish identity was not a problem. A Jew was defined by halakhah, as one who was born of a Jewish mother (or who converted to Judaism) and who, in actual practice, regarded himself and was regarded as belonging to the Jewish community.

*Emancipation cast a new light on the whole question of Jewish identity. With the creation of the modern secular state, the decision to uphold one's religion became purely voluntaristic. At the height of nineteenth-century liberalism in Europe and America, some Jews simply ceased to maintain Jewish associations of any kind. On the other hand, it was possible for Jews to feel a strong sense of Jewish identity on the basis of minimal or no association, even after every vestige of religious faith and practice had evaporated. Increasingly there arose the institutions of the voluntaristic Jewish community of the modern era, these bodies who regarded it as their task to serve all who claimed to be Jews, especially at moments of danger or when such people needed social services. Indeed, these voluntaristic associations to alleviate suffering became increasingly the building blocks of Jewish communal organization.

The new definition was that Jews were not a religion but a people. Just as it was possible in the modern age of doubt to cease being Anglican yet remain English, so it was possible to cease believing in Judaism yet remain Jewish. Theoreticians of Diaspora nationalism, such as Simon Dubnow, opted for Jewish communal organization, an international Jewish parliament, and national institutions of culture and education to maintain the national ethos. The Yiddishist movement that arose at the beginning of the twentieth century placed emphasis on Yiddish as the spoken and living language of world Jewry (at least before 1939) and aimed at preserving a secular national culture in that language. The most important national movement, Zionism, proposed to normalize the Jewish people by concentrating them in their own land and reviving the Hebrew language.

In the 1980s, the Reform movement agreed to regard someone either of whose parents were Jewish as a Jew by birth (see PATRILINEAL DESCENT). For religious Jews, the question of Jewish identity continues to be decided by halakhah. The overarching institutions of world Jewry determine their policy by broader and more amorphous considerations of history and situation. So, when the last remaining, completely de-Judaized, almost entirely intermarried Communists of Jewish parentage in Poland were purged in 1968, the Israeli government provided them with the necessary exit passports even though few were going to Israel, and the world Jewish social-service budget took care of the overwhelming majority who opted to go to other countries. Beginning in the 1970s, equally flexible standards were applied to those who were leaving the Soviet Union as Jews and more recently, in the 1980s, to the *Beta Israel from Ethiopia. Those who suffer as Jews remain part of world Jewish concern. In the broadest sense, significant elements of world Jewry in the modern era have defined, and are defining, Jewish identity as a community of history and destiny. JEWISH LANGUAGES refers variously to the *Hebrew language, to languages at some time spoken by most Jews (*Aramaic, Greek), and to about twenty Judeo-Xenic (from Gr. xenos [foreign]) languages used by Jews in the Diaspora, including *Judeo-Arabic, Judeo-Berber, Judeo-German (*Yiddish), Judeo-Greek, *Judeo-Persian, Judeo-Tatar, Judeo-Catalan, Judeo-French, Judeo-Italian, Judeo-Portuguese, Judeo-Provençal, and *Judeo-Spanish (Ladino or Judezmo). The last six named may have descended from Judeo-Latin. Judeo-Xenic languages originated in the language of the larger community, with an admixture of religious and cultural lexicon, and occasionally grammatical or syntactic features from Hebrew, Aramaic, or other languages; were mostly reduced to writing, always with Hebrew letters (Ladino is now written using the Latin alphabet); have in many cases produced considerable religious (Bible translations and dictionaries) and secular (poetry, philosophy) literature; and have at times been used as secret languages (some like the North African Lashon have had only that purpose). With respect to provenance, number of speakers, and literature, the most important Judeo-Xenic languages are Judeo-Arabic, Ladino, and Yiddish. Yiddish was previously spoken by three-fourths of the world's Jews. Because of the Holocaust, migration to the State of Israel, and assimilation, all Judeo-Xenic languages are on the decline or have disappeared.

JEWISH LAW. The term Jewish law is a translation from the German jüdisches Recht and is identified with the nineteenth-century scholarly enterprise of highlighting the legal quality of the halakhah* and demonstrating its similarity to other systems of law. The Hebrew form of the term, mishpat 'Ivri, was coined by a group of Jewish legal scholars in Russia, shortly after the issuing of the Balfour Declaration by the British government in 1917. The major goals of this group, which became known as the Mishpat Ivri Society, were the preparation of a legal system for a future Jewish state based upon halakhah and the establishment of a research institute for this purpose in Jerusalem. The method proposed by the society for achieving its first goal was to separate the legal aspects of the halakhah from its purely religious elements and to "prepare Jewish law to exist as a secular legal system" (Ha-Mishpat ha-'Ivri [Moscow, 1918]).

Halakhah as a Legal System. Notwithstanding the overall unity of its religious and legal elements, the halakhah makes a number of basic distinctions between these two areas. Religious laws, such as Sabbath observance and the dietary laws, are known as issur ve-hetter* and are distinguished from *civil law and criminal law (*penal law), which are termed dinei mamonot and dinei nefashot, respectively. Religious law is generally less amenable to rabbinic legislation than civil law, and the maxim that "custom overrides law" is restricted to the realm of civil matters. The rule that the "law of the land is the law" (dina' de-malkhuta' dina*) has no application in the area of religious law but is highly significant in civil law. Dinei mamonot is, therefore, an identifiable body of halakhah that corresponds to a substantial part of the subject matter of modern legal systems and displays much of the flexibility and capacity for development associated with them. It is this body of legal doctrine that is the object of study in the discipline of Jewish law and with which the Mishpat Ivri Society was concerned.

The Jewish Judicial System. Biblical law provides detailed instructions for the establishment of a judicial system (Ex. 18.21–27; Dt. 16.18), and Jewish courts (see BERT DIN) have existed in all Jewish communities, even in the absence of political sovereignty, and in all countries of the Diaspora. Jewish judicial *autonomy was a consistent feature of Jewish life until the Emancipation and constituted one of the major privileges of Jewish communities in their medieval charters. The jurisdiction of the Jewish courts extended to all aspects of private and communal life, and in Spain it included the power to administer capital punishment, particularly in cases of informers. The wide range of issues dealt with by the Jewish courts in pre-Emancipation times is manifested in the responsa literature of this period, the bulk of which is devoted to civil, criminal, and public administrative law. Sanctions available to Jewish courts included attachment of property, *fines, corporal punishment (see FLOGGING), and, most important of all, the herem (*excommunication). Internal discipline was also effected by means of the prohibition against non-Jewish courts (Git. 88b), and a Jew who took his case to a gentile tribunal in defiance of the Jewish court was "deemed to have reviled and blasphemed and rebelled against the Torah of Moses our teacher" (Maimonides, Hilkhot Sanhedrin 26.7). Only in exceptional circumstances was recourse to a non-Jewish court permitted, and even in the post-Emancipation period, religious Jews continued to take their civil disputes to rabbinical courts rather than to the general courts of the countries in which they lived.

Matters of Personal Status in Israeli Law. Upon its establishment in 1948, the State of Israel adopted the legal system in force during the British Mandate. Matters of personal status, which consist mainly of marriage and divorce, were decided by the religious courts of the parties concerned; other legal issues were governed by an amalgam of English, Ottoman, and Muslim law, together with a number of Mandatory ordinances. Under the Rabbinical Courts Jurisdiction (Marriage and Divorce) Law of 1953, Jewish citizens and residents are subject to the sole jurisdiction of the rabbinical courts in these areas. The religious courts also enjoy a limited concurrent jurisdiction with the general courts in *maintenance cases and in cases involving other aspects of personal-status law. In these other areas of personal-status law, however, the religious courts are not empowered to rule based solely on halakhah without reference to Israeli legislation. Judicial review of a religious court is also available if the court ignores the requirements of natural justice, such as denying one party the right to a court hearing. In general, the trend in Israeli law is to restrict the jurisdiction of the rabbinical courts to marriage and divorce and to place the rest of personal-status law in the hands of the secular courts. There are, nevertheless, examples of the incorporation of halakhic principles into secular personal-status law, an outstanding example being the provision in the Succession Law of 1965 that "the fact that a child is born out of wedlock shall have no effect upon succession rights." This principle, which was certainly unique to Israeli law in 1965, was based squarely upon the halakhic rule that illegitimate offspring (mamzerim) do not suffer any disadvantage with respect to rights of succession (Shulhan 'Arukh, Hoshen Mishpat 76.6). A striking illustration of the purely secular character of Israeli personal-status law in areas outside of marriage and divorce is the definition of Jewish identity under the "Law of Return of 1950. (See also JEW, WHO IS A?, CONTROVERSY.)

Jewish Law in Areas Other than Personal Status.

There is no legal recognition in Israel of the binding force of halakhah outside the rubric of matters of personal status. Even those laws that deal entirely with issues of a purely halakhic or religious nature, such as the official status of the Sabbath and festivals or pig breeding and missionary activities by non-Jews, are all administered by secular authorities and applied by the courts without any reference to halakhah. The rules and principles of Jewish law are, nevertheless, often referred to in the course of parliamentary debates on proposed legislation, and it is routine practice for all draft bills to be sent to the deputy attorney general and advisor on Jewish law, whose comments are, on occasion, incorporated into the preamble to the final law. One example of such a law is the Wages Protection Law of 1958, which requires employers to pay their workers on time. The principle of prompt payment is found in the Bible (Lv. 19.13; Dt. 24.15) and is discussed in the Talmud and codes (B. M. 11a-112a). These sources were referred to in the Knesset deliberations, and the preamble to the law mentions its halakhic background. Nevertheless, none of the sections of the actual law is based upon halakhic principles, and the detailed provisions that they incorporate are to be found in many modern legal systems. Moreover, in the course of the Knesset discussion, the suggestion that "any problem arising in relation to the implementation of this law be resolved by reference to Jewish law" was summarily dismissed by the minister of justice on the grounds that it was neither practical nor wise.

With regard to case law, the judiciary has proved to be a far more fertile ground for the incorporation of Jewish law than the legislature. Judges have referred to the halakhah for the purpose of elucidating legal terms and concepts. In some cases, Jewish law has played a pivotal role in actual decisions. One of the most dramatic cases is that of Moshe Cohen v. State of Israel (Cr.A. 91/80 P.D. 35(3) 281), in which the petitioner was charged with the "rape of his wife. The relevant section of the 1977 Penal Law defines rape as "illegal" intercourse. The common law position was that a husband could not have "illegal" intercourse with his wife since intercourse constituted one of the basic conditions of the marriage agreement entered into by both parties. The origin of this position lies in the Christian concept of the conjugal debt owed by a wife to her husband. The prosecution argued that the term unlawfully should be interpreted in the light of the petitioner's personal law, which in Cohen's case was Jewish law. Upon examination of the relevant sources it became evident that the halakhah forbids the use of force in the context of marital intercourse ('Eruv. 100b; Maimonides, Hilkhot Ishut 15.17; Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer no. 25.2), although there is no criminal sanction against a husband who disregards this prohibition. The court held that it was permissible to extrapolate from the realm of pure halakhic prohibitions to the criminal law, and Moshe Cohen was found guilty of raping his wife. Justice Bekhor commented on the progressive approach of Jewish law in this area, and contrasted the positive attitude toward female sexual fulfillment in Jewish sources with the generally negative one found in many Christian writings. The law has since been changed in both the United Kingdom and the United States in favor of the wife. In this case, halakhah was applied in order to achieve a result that was morally progressive, and it is in this type of enterprise that the courts have excelled at drawing inspiration from the halakhah. Another case of this nature is Becker v. Eilat (H.C. 172/78, P.D. 32(3) 372), in which the petitioner was a road-safety expert who had been summoned to testify in a homicide case. He declined to take the witnesses' oath on the Bible because he was an agnostic. Under existing law, a witness could be excused from taking an oath on the grounds of "religion" or "conscience." Moreover, the petitioner's request to be excused from taking the oath was not made in "good faith" as required by the law. The high court reversed the lower court's decision both in terms of the interpretation of the exemption qualifications and the issue of "good faith." Justice Elon pointed out that under Jewish law there is no witnesses' oath, since all witnesses are subject to the biblical prohibition against "bearing false witness against your neighbor" (Ex. 20.13; Dt. 5.17). According to Talmudic law, witnesses are warned about the terrible consequences of lying to the court, but there is no formal oath to tell the truth. A change occurred in the Middle Ages, possibly under non-Jewish influence, and the court was given discretion to impose an oath should it feel that this step was necessary for the establishment of the truth. This approach was recommended to the Israeli legislature by Justice Elon as being commensurate with the demands of both justice and the Jewish tradition in a modern context. Shortly after this decision the law was changed, and under the Evidence Law Amendment (Warning of Witnesses and Removal of Oath) of 1980 there is no mandatory witnesses' oath in Israeli courts. Instead, the witness is warned to tell the truth, and the judge has the discretion to impose an oath if this step would facilitate truthful evidence. The witness preserves the right to request exemption from such an oath on grounds of "conscience" and "religion," provided that the request is made in "good faith." In both of these cases, the results obtained under the inspiration of Jewish law were acceptable under general jurisprudence and morality. Where this is not the case, the court is very firm in its rejection of halakhah as a source for considering the solution to the problem with which it is dealing. Notwithstanding its lack of official status, Israeli courts have turned to Jewish law for guidance with respect to general issues of morality and justice from the early days of the establishment of the state.

One of the elements of mandatory law incorporated into Israeli law was article 46 of the Palestine Order in Council (1922). It provided that legal problems to which there were no solutions in the existing law be solved by reference to the principles of canon law and equity as they were applied in England. Although this link with English law was severely restricted by Israeli courts in the early years of the state, it was not officially severed until 1980, with the passage of the Foundations of Law Act. According to this act, a court that is unable to find an answer to a legal problem in "legislation, case-law or by way of analogy shall decide the case in the light of the principles of freedom, justice, equity and peace of the heritage of Israel." The scope of this law is a matter of debate, but it does provide an official basis for the use of halakhic material in cases where the result accords with the principles of freedom, justice, equity, and peace specified in the law. Among the issues discussed and informed by Jewish law in recent years are kidney transplants from mentally incompetent patients; protection of privacy and the status of evidence obtained by non-consensual medical procedures; conscientious objection; prisoners' rights to marital relations and judicial bias; and issues of ethical significance (see ISRAEL, STATE OF, JEWISH RELIGIOUS LIFE IN).

The Mishpat Ivri movement has been criticized on the grounds that its work constitutes a secularization of halakhah. One reason for this charge is the fact that the areas of halakhah chosen by the proponents of the movement for purposes of both academic research and practical application to the legal system of the State of Israel are confined to civil and criminal matters. The field of religious law is almost entirely neglected, notwithstanding the fact that it includes procedural matters such as the laws of evidence and judicial discretion, which apply to all areas of halakhah. Another critique is that the unique feature of halakhah is its concept of justice and righteousness rather than its substantive solutions to particular legal problems. Only a judge steeped in the traditional ethos of the halakhah is in a position to elucidate this feature of halakhah in the case before him and apply it. It is also argued by critics of Mishpat Ivri that the research methodology used by its principal champions is historical rather than normative, and yet they claim that the results of this research should be applied in the legal system of the State of Israel, which is, after all, a normative legal system.

The defenders of Mishpat Ivri maintain that the distinction between civil and religious law is an internal one and that the former is traditionally much more flexible than the latter. Mishpat Ivri also is presented as the process of analyzing halakhah (lamdanut) rather than deciding it (pesiqah). Both the selective nature of Mishpat Ivri and the secular context in which it operates are compatible with the division between civil and religious law and the distinction between lamdanut and pesiqah in classical halakhic thinking. This argument is also valid in the context of research methodology, since it justifies the adoption of an analytical, as opposed to a strictly normative, approach to law.

JEWISH RECONSTRUCTION FOUNDATION. See RECONSTRUCTIONISM.

JEWISH RELIGION. More than three thousand years ago the Jewish religion originated in the Near East among the Hebrews. From the patronymic of a patriarchal ancestor, loosely associated clans came to be called the children of Israel. The dominant self-understanding of the people of Israel since biblical times is expressed through the concept of a *covenant or alliance with *God, a relationship analogous to the family bond but more contractual in character, in this case established by divine initiative (see CHOSEN PEOPLE). Many of the central theological terms (e.g., hesed, go'el) indeed derive from the traditional kinship vocabulary. The *Shema' (Dt. 6.4-9), which in the course of time became the self-identifying expression of the Jewish faith, is not so much a theoretical proclamation of monotheism as the living "acceptance of the yoke of the kingdom of heaven" (in rabbinic language) implicit in the covenant relationship and elaborated in the divine commandments (see MITSVAH) set forth in the *Torah, the quintessence of the Mosaic revelation. The study of Torah (see TALMUD TORAH) is in itself a spiritual practice.

The frequent invasions of the Jewish homeland and the severe oppression, persecution, and dispersion of Jews to the four corners of the earth tested the strength and flexibility of Judaism to survive creatively. Among the most decisive developments that took place after the destruction of the Second Temple and the cessation of the sacrificial cult administered by the hereditary priesthood was the emergence of new patterns of religious authority and organization devised by the rabbis, with the *synagogue replacing the Temple as the focus of the ritual. Devotion to Jerusalem (Zion) and its eventual restoration remained a potent symbol, embracing both the promise of national redemption from exile and oppression and a messianic vision of an end to violence and injustice. Over the centuries, a vast body of religious teaching has grown up. The most important, authoritative, and influential rabbinic text is the *Talmud. Alongside this major rabbinic corpus there also developed a body of ethical literature (see ETHICS) as well as a continuous mystical stream (see KABBALAH).

Jewish worship (see LITURGY), the holidays (see HAGGIM), and rituals marking the life cycle recapitulate the archetypal themes of Judaism and form a metanarrative that spans the creation of the universe by God, God's covenant with the patriarchs, the liberation from bondage in Egypt, the revelation at Mount Sinai, and the coming redemption of Israel and the world with the establishment of the kingdom of God.

In accordance with this paradigm, the creation of the world and its moral order is celebrated as a spiritual renewal at the beginning of the year, starting with *Ro'sh ha-Shanah, followed by a ten-day period of introspection culminating with *Yom Kippur. *Sukkot, *Pesah, and *Shavu'ot, the three biblical pilgrimage festivals (*Shalosh Regalim) combine references to the natural and agricultural rhythms with the commemoration of events of historical significance. The weekly *Sabbath liturgy stresses the three themes of Judaism: *Creation, the Sinaitic *revelation of the Torah, and ultimate *redemption. Life is shaped not only by the religious calendar but by the daily observance of a variety of mitzvot, among the more conspicuous of which are the *dietary laws.

Although Judaism does not lack theological *dogmas, and although at times acrimonious doctrinal *controversies have arisen, Jews do not classify themselves into credal denominations in the manner familiar to Christians, for example. There are positions reflecting varying understandings of revelation and of the authority of the received Torah, as well as differing responses to the encounter with the modern world. The most liberal of these is usually designated as *Reform Judaism, which, in the nineteenth century, responded to modernity by the adaptation of Western styles of worship and considerable modification of forms of observance, invoking the concept of "continuous revelation." *Orthodoxy cleaves to the entire body of Jewish observance as authoritative and unchangeable, except through the hermeneutic procedures held to be revealed together with the Torah. But the spectrum of Orthodoxy, too, is wide and varied, ranging from the rejection of secular *Zionism to an extreme and quasi-messianic *nationalism, from non-mystical halakhic rigorism and fundamentalism to a revived appeal of *Hasidism (as in the Lubavitch Habad movement). *Conservative Judaism seeks a middle ground between Orthodoxy and Reform, while *Reconstructionism, a specifically American phenomenon that stresses Judaism as a civilization, has been open both to naturalistic theology and to neomystical themes and observances.

JEWISH SCIENCE, a philosophy of Judaism that emphasizes God's goodness, the efficacy of personal prayer, and the human capacity to activate the Divine Mind, or power of healing, within us. As conceived by Reform rabbi Alfred Geiger Moses in Jewish Science: Divine Healing in Judaism (1915), it sought to awaken religiously apathetic Jews to Judaism's spiritual possibilities and, subsequently, stem the tide of Jews attracted to Christian Science. Efforts by Bertha Strauss and Lucia Nola Levy of New York City led to the creation of the Society of Jewish Science in 1922, under the leadership of Reform rabbi Morris Lichtenstein. The most successful of several Jewish Science groups formed during the 1920s, the society brought its optimistic message to thousands of American Jews through such publications as Lichtenstein's Jewish Science and Health and the monthly Jewish Science Interpreter. Led by Lichtenstein, until his death in 1938, and his wife Tehilla, from 1938 until 1973, the society continues to exist.

JEWISH STUDIES. Critical Jewish scholarship in the twentieth century owed much to the methodological advances made by the nineteenth-century founders of *Wissenschaft des Judentums. At the same time, the field of modern Jewish studies has changed dramatically. By the turn of the twentieth century, Jewish scholars in Germany and eastern Europe had begun to expand the scope of research by moving away from an exclusive emphasis on literary history to the study of social, economic, and local history. An important figure in challenging the earlier emphasis of German-Jewish scholars was the Russian-Jewish historian, *Simon Dubnow, author of a multivolume history of the Jewish people, who called for a sociological corrective to the historicophilological approach. This attitude reflected the broader tendency of many eastern European scholars to focus on the material aspects of Jewish existence using the disciplines of social and economic history, demography, and sociology. From 1925, the clearinghouse for scholarship of this nature became the Yiddish Scientific Institute (YIVO) based in Vilna. Around the time that YIVO was founded, another center of advanced Jewish learning opened in Jerusalem. The Institute of Jewish Studies of the new Hebrew University provided a home to immigrant scholars from eastern and central Europe. Most of these immigrants shared the belief that the establishment of a Jewish national university in Palestine offered the prospect of overcoming the biases and limitations of previous scholarship, and in fact new emphases, not without biases of their own, developed among the Jerusalem scholars, who included Gershom Gerhard *Scholem, Yitzhak *Baer, Benzion Dinur, and Yehezkel *Kaufmann. Scholem's pioneering research on Jewish mysticism created an entirely new field of study. Dinur developed a "Palestinocentric" historiographical approach, in which Erets Yisra'el stood at the center of all Jewish history. Through their efforts, and partly due to the death of so many Jewish scholars in Europe during the Holocaust, the Hebrew University became the cradle of a new style of Jewish scholarship.

Since the end of World War II, the United States has emerged as a major center of Jewish studies. A central role was played by the three rabbinical seminaries affiliated with the Conservative, Orthodox, and Reform movements. Another, and increasingly significant, venue developed in American universities. The origins of Jewish studies in American universities extend back to the late nineteenth century, when Jewish professors were invited to teach in departments of Semitic languages. In the latter half of the 1920s, the first two explicit Jewish studies appointments were made at Harvard (Harry Austryn *Wolfson) and Columbia (Salo W. Baron). From the 1970s, there has been a proliferation of Jewish studies in various departments of American universities (religious studies, history, Near Eastern languages). This development has encouraged a greater openness to new methodological approaches and interdisciplinary research. A similar pattern for Jewish studies can be seen, though on a smaller scale, in France, England, Germany, Russia, and South America.

JEWISH THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY OF AMERICA, the rabbinical seminary of the *Conservative movement, situated in New York City. It was founded in 1887 by Sabato *Morais with the objective of training rabbis and teachers in traditional Judaism in order to combat the challenge of radical *Reform Judaism. It was reorganized in 1902 after the arrival in the United States of Solomon *Schechter, who assumed the presidency and made the seminary into one of the outstanding theological schools in the Jewish world and the cradle of *Conservative Judaism. He assembled a faculty of world-renowned scholars, expanded the library, and founded the Teachers Institute. Schechter was succeeded by Cyrus Adler (1914–1940) and Louis *Finkelstein (1940–1972). Under the latter's long chancellorship, the seminary and the Conservative movement flourished. In the seminary itself a creative tension existed between teachers such as Saul *Lieberman and Abraham Joshua *Heschel, who were in the more conservative wing of the movement, and Mordecai Menahem *Kaplan, who was more liberal. Finkelstein was succeeded by Gerson Cohen (1972–1986) and Ismar Schorsch (1986–).

The New York campus houses the Rabbinical School, the Graduate School, the Cantors' Institute, and other institutes, as well as the library with its 270,000 volumes, 15,000 manuscripts and codices, and 40,000 *genizah fragments. Affiliated with the seminary are the *University of Judaism in Los Angeles, the Beit Midrash in Jerusalem, the Jewish Museum in New York, and the *Seminario Rabínico Latinoamericano in Buenos Aires. The seminary is now operating programs in the former Soviet Union. It also pioneered Jewish broadcasting on radio and television, notably through its Eternal Light and Frontiers of Faith programs.

JEWS' COLLEGE, training institution for Orthodox rabbis for the British Commonwealth. Established in London in 1855, it originally included a day school, which was separated from the college in 1860 and closed in 1879. Jews' College now includes a training section for cantors and is a recognized college of the University of London. Among those who have served as its principal are Michael Friedlander, Adolf Büchler, Isidore Epstein, H. J. Zimmels, and Jonathan Sacks.

JEZEBEL (Heb. Iyzevel), daughter of the Phoenician king, Ethbaal; wife of *Ahab, king of Israel (9th cent.

BCE; 1 Kgs. 16.31), and mother of King Ahaziah and King Jehoram. Jezebel's marriage to Ahab helped him, politically and commercially, but it also entailed alien religious influence and the introduction of foreign cults (1 Kgs. 18.4, 13, 19, 19.1, 21.11, 23; 2 Kgs. 9.7, 10, 22, 30, 36–37). Her sponsorship of Baal and Asherah worship, together with her royal origins and personal influence, made her into a bitter enemy of the prophets *Elijah and *Elisha. Though she acted as a reigning queen, the Bible never refers to her by that title. She was, however, called gevirah (lady) after her husband's death (2 Kgs. 10.13), probably acting as regent after her second son, Jehoram, was killed by Jehu (2 Kgs. 9.14, 28). She also planned Naboth's killing (1 Kgs. 21) with legal skill and determination. She was killed by Jehu, who was determined to eradicate the cult of Baal in Samaria (2 Kgs. 9.30–37). She is depicted as merciless, unscrupulous, and cruel, and later Jewish and Christian traditions, from the New Testament (Rv. 2.20) onward, made her name a symbol of depravity.

JHWH. See GOD, NAMES OF.

JOB, a man of exemplary righteousness, mentioned together with Noah and Daniel (Ez. 14.14, 20). He also appears as the hero of the biblical work (the third book of the Hagiographa) that bears his name. The prologue of the Book of Job (chaps. 1–2), in prose, portrays the righteous ways of Job, who lived and prospered in the land of Uz. In the celestial council Satan cynically attributes Job's exemplary piety to his good fortune, and he is granted a free hand to test Job's faith in God. Visited by a series of increasingly heavy misfortunes and ills, Job is reduced to the depths of agony and despair but withstands the temptation to "curse God." There follows a series of poetically phrased discourses on the possible causes and significance of Job's suffering, delivered in the form of a discussion between Job and his four friends (Eliphaz, Bildad, Zophar, and Elihu), most of whom maintain the traditional, popular view that suffering must be a consequence of sin, while Job insists that he is not conscious of having committed any wrong that would be deserving of such unbearable punishment (chaps. 3–37). Finally God answers Job out of a whirlwind, in an overpowering manifestation of his inscrutable omnipotence (chaps. 38–41). The book concludes with an epilogue (chap. 42) in which Job regrets his presumption in doubting God's ways; his health and vigor are restored and his former fortune doubled. The setting and characters of the book are all non-Israelite, thus stressing the anonymous author's universalist conception of his central theme: innocent suffering and God's justice. The precise interpretation of the book's argument depends in part on one's views regarding the nature and composition of the text. Many scholars consider Elihu's speeches (chap. 32–37) a later addition. But it is generally agreed that God does not offer any rational answer to Job's problem of innocent suffering. While disavowing the theological explanations of Job's friends, God humbles Job and forces him to realize that man cannot presume to ask God any questions. The book exhibits a unique combination of audacity and profound faith, climaxed by Job's affirmation: "But as for me, I know that my redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand up over my dust at the last" (19.25). Scholars differ as to the date of the book but agree that it belongs to the school of *wisdom literature. Some scholars claim that the book contains Edomite and Aramaic elements. Talmudic views varied. Some rabbis suggested Mosaic authorship for the book (B. B. 14b) and held Job to be a contemporary of Abraham; others thought that "Job never existed but was a parable" (B. B. 15a; Gn. Rab. 57). According to the Talmud, the book was read by the high priest shortly before Yom Kippur, and it is still read by Sephardim on Tish'ah be-'Av. The Book of Job is one of the few biblical texts whose study is permitted during the period of mourning.

JOEL (Heb. Yo'el), prophet in the kingdom of Judah of whom very little is known. The Book of Joel states the name of his father, Pethuel, but provides no information concerning the historical context in which Joel lived (1.1). Most scholars place him in postexilic Judah between the late sixth and fifth centuries BCE. The imagery of the prophet's message in his portrayal of the apocalyptic battle that will bring about the destruction of God's enemies among the nations and the full restoration of Jerusalem appears to have been prompted by a severe locust plague, which serves as a metaphor for the destruction and natural catastrophe that will precede new growth. Fundamental to Joel's preaching is the concept of the "Day of the Lord" (3.4), considered as the day of God's judgment of the wicked.

The Book of Joel is the second of the Minor Prophets. The Hebrew version is divided into four chapters, whereas the Greek is divided into three; Christian versions are generally based upon the Greek. Many scholars have interpreted the book as an example of prophetic liturgy, designed for a service of repentance in the Temple at a time of calamity. The structure of the book includes two basic parts. Joel 1–2 (Greek and Christian translation 1.1–2.27) contains community lamentations over a severe locust plague that is destroying the land, calls to repentance, and an oracle of deliverance. Joel 3–4 (Greek, 2.28–3.21) projects a future apocalyptic scenario in which God will defeat the enemies of Judah and Jerusalem on the "Day of the Lord" in a great cosmic battle in the "valley of decision" at the Valley of Jehosh-aphat. The book concludes with a promise of protection from all future attacks and a blessing of fertility for the land. Joel's prophecy that in the future all people will be prophets (2.28–29) provided the background for the New Testament account (Acts 2.14–21) of the descent of the Holy Spirit on the early church, as well as of prophetic mass phenomena in the seventeenth-century messianic movement centered around *Shabbetai Tsevi.

JOHN THE BAPTIST (died c.29 CE), ascetic preacher who exercised a powerful influence on *Jesus. Possibly connected with the *Essene sect, he lived as a hermit in the desert until about 15 CE, when he emerged from his seclusion in order to preach the need for repentance in view of the imminent advent of the kingdom of God. *Baptism, which he (like many others) regarded as of supreme importance, was to be the sign of that repentance; repentance, and not the ethnic factor of belonging to the Jewish people, was the key to salvation (Mt. 3.7–10). Among those who answered the call, according to the *New Testament, was Jesus, in whom John saw the Messiah, who would bring about the kingdom of God. Christian tradition casts him in a role similar to that of *Elijah in Judaism—the forerunner of the Messiah. According to the Gospels, he was beheaded by Herod Antipas at the request of Herod Antipas's wife's daughter, having offered to reward her dancing with whatever she wished (Mt. 14.6–12; Mk. 6.21–28). Modern scholarship has found parallels between John's teachings and that of the *Dead Sea Scrolls. However, there are also significant differences, and John may have been influenced by another sect, of which there were many.

JONAH (Heb. Yonah; 8th cent. BCE), son of Amittai; Jonah is mentioned in 2 Kings 14.25 as a prophet from Gath-hepher in Galilee, whose message supported King Jeroboam II's expansion of Israelite borders "from the entrance of Hamath as far as the Sea of Arabah." The figure of the historical Jonah was adopted as the name of the prophet in the Book of Jonah, but this book is seen by scholars as a parable, legendary fiction that has little to do with the actual prophet. The book is dated by some scholars, on linguistic grounds, to the Second Temple period. Because of its emphasis on God's sovereignty over all nations and his forgiveness after genuine repentance, the book is read as the prophetic portion during the afternoon service on Yom Kippur.

JORDAN RIVER (Heb. Yarden; from the root yarad [descend]), the largest river in Erets Yisra'el. From the foothills of Mount Hermon, the river winds its way along the Great Rift Valley through the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea, 1,292 feet below sea level. For the Israelites under Joshua, the crossing of the Jordan in miraculous circumstances heralded the first stage of the predestined conquest of Canaan (Jos. 3.15–17). The river figures in a number of biblical narratives, while in the Second Temple period a number of sects centered their baptismal rites around the Jordan (see ESSENES; JOHN THE BAPTIST). The river is prominent in both Jewish and Christian tradition and folklore.

JOSEPH (Heb. Yosef), elder son of Jacob and Rachel. The narratives concerning Joseph are related in Genesis 37–50 and form the transition between the stories of the patriarchs and the Israelite enslavement in Egypt. The account begins with the abduction of Joseph and his subsequent sale into slavery in Egypt by his brothers, who resented the fact that he was both a dreamer and the favored son of their father, Jacob. Joseph was sold to Potiphar, one of Pharaoh's officials, who recognized the blessing of God on Joseph and placed him over his entire household. In an episode with clear parallels to the Egyptian Tale of Two Brothers, Potiphar's wife unsuccessfully attempted to seduce Joseph. Having been rebuffed, she charged Joseph with attempting to rape her, and Joseph was imprisoned. In prison, Joseph again found favor and was placed in charge of all the prisoners. Among these were two of Pharaoh's officials, his chief butler and his chief baker. Joseph's correct interpretation of their respective dreams led to an invitation to interpret those of Pharaoh. Joseph revealed to Pharaoh that his dreams concerned a future period of seven years of abundance followed by a period of seven years of famine, and he advised Pharaoh on how to provide for the lean years by making adequate provisions during the bountiful years. Joseph's ability pleased Pharaoh, and he elevated Joseph to the position of vizier, as which he administered the accumulation and distribution of grain during the periods of abundance and famine. He also gave Joseph an Egyptian name, Zaphnath-paaneah.

During the famine, Joseph's brothers came to Egypt to buy grain. Having the advantage of recognizing his brothers without their recognizing him, Joseph perpetrated a series of deceptions on them that finally resulted in a restoration of family unity. At Joseph's invitation, and with Pharaoh's consent, the entire family traveled to Egypt, where they were settled in the region of Goshen and were regularly supplied with food. Before Jacob died in Egypt, he blessed Joseph's sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, who had been born to Joseph in Egypt by Asenath, daughter of Potiphera, priest of On. These sons were henceforth reckoned as Jacob's. After burying his father at the family burial place in Canaan, Joseph returned to Egypt, where he remained until his own death at what was considered the ideal life span for an Egyptian, 110 years. Joseph was embalmed in Egypt, but his remains were later carried along with the Israelites during the Exodus for interment in Canaan near Shechem (Ex. 13.19; Jos. 24.32). In biblical literature the name Joseph (or house/children of Joseph) denotes the tribes Manasseh and Ephraim (e.g., Jos. 17.14–17; 1 Kgs. 11.28) or the kingdom of the northern tribes (e.g., Am. 5.6, 6.6). In rabbinic tradition, he was known as "Joseph the Righteous."

JOSEPH, JACOB (1848–1902), Orthodox rabbi in the United States who championed the goal of transplanting east European Orthodoxy to the United States and preached immigrant resistance to Americanization. Born in Krozhe, Lithuania, R. Joseph was a disciple of Rabbis Hirsch Leib Berlin and Yisra'el Salanter and, a respected Talmudist and renowned maggid (preacher), served in various Lithuanian communities. He was brought to New York City's Lower East Side in 1888 by the Association of American Orthodox Hebrew Congregations and was installed there as that city's Orthodox chief rabbi. He advocated a separatist, all-day yeshivah education for young men, although most immigrant parents sent their sons and daughters to public schools. He called for scrupulous observance of the Sabbath, although most immigrants did not honor the day of rest. He fought for strict controls over the kosher meat industry, but local butchers and competing rabbis undermined his authority. Although the experiment of appointing a chief rabbi in New York was a failure, the *Union of Orthodox Rabbis of the United States and Canada was founded at the time of R. Joseph's death and attempted to achieve many of the goals R. Joseph had set for himself. He was the author of Le-Veit Ya'aqov (Vilna, vol. 1, 1872; vol. 2, 1888).

JOSEPH AND ASENATH, pseudepigraphous work extant in four different Greek recensions, as well as in Syriac, Armenian, Latin, Slavonic, Modern Greek, and Romanian. It was written in Greek by an Egyptian Jew, perhaps connected with the Temple of *Onias in Heliopolis, sometime between the second century BCE and the early second century CE. The work recounts how Asenath, the beautiful virgin daughter of the high priest of Heliopolis, fell in love with the handsome Joseph and asked to marry him (cf. Gn. 41.45). When Joseph refused to marry an idolatrous woman, she repented of her idolatry and was visited by an angelic being, who revealed many secrets to her and promised her that her wish would be fulfilled. Following her marriage to Joseph, conducted by Pharaoh himself, Pharaoh's son, aided by four of Joseph's brothers, tried to kill Joseph and kidnap Asenath. The wicked plot failed, Pharaoh's son died, and Joseph ruled Egypt for forty-eight years.

JOSEPHUS FLAVIUS (c.38–100), politician, soldier, and historian. During the Great Revolt against the Romans he was commander in Galilee, but when his fortress, Jotapata, was conquered, he went over to the Romans and changed his name (from the Heb. Yosef ben Mattityahu ha-Kohen), adopting the name of Vespasian's family, Flavius. Josephus accompanied Vespasian and Titus during the siege of Jerusalem and later lived in Rome, where he wrote books on Jewish history (The Jewish War and Antiquities of the Jews), a defense of the Jewish people (Against Apion, an anti-Jewish Alexandrian writer), and an autobiographical work called The Life. His writings, which cannot always be implicitly trusted, are an important source of knowledge about the religious scene at the end of the Second Temple period. All discussions regarding the Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes, and Qumran community must take Josephus into account. In order to make them comprehensible to his readers, he presented the various sects as Greek philosophical schools. His Antiquities of the Jews was written to teach non-Jews about the Jewish people and their beliefs, in the conviction that such knowledge would contribute to a diminution in anti-Jewish prejudice. He told the story of the Jews from biblical times, with Midrashic embellishments, always attuned to the Hellenistic mentality.

JOSHUA (Heb. Yehoshu'a) Moses' aide and subsequently his successor as leader of the children of Israel. An Ephraimite originally called Hoshea (Nm. 13.6, 8; Jos. 19.49–50), Joshua first appears in a military role, defeating the Amalekites while Moses' hands are raised toward heaven (Ex. 17.8–13). As a ministering servant to Moses, Joshua plays a supporting role during the golden calf episode (Ex. 32.17, 33.11) and at the “graves of lust” fiasco (Nm. 11.28). As one of the two spies, along with Caleb, who did not give a slanderous report about Erets Yisra’el, Joshua is promised that he will enter that land (Nm. 14.30). Toward the end of the period of wandering in the desert, Joshua is formally installed as Moses’ successor (Nm. 27.15–23, Dt. 31.7–8). The Book of Joshua, first book of the *Former Prophets, traces Joshua’s illustrious career spanning the conquest of Canaan (chaps. 1–12), the division of the land among the Israelite tribes (chaps. 13–21), and his final acts and exhortations, including a landmark covenant renewal ceremony at Shechem (chaps. 22–24).

The historical value of much of the material in Joshua has been the focus of scholarly debate. At the heart of this controversy is the nature of the Israelite occupation of Canaan. On the one hand, verses that can be characterized as editorial summaries describe a total and swift conquest of the entire land (e.g., Jos. 10.40–42, 11.16–20, 21.41–43; see also the impressive list of 31 defeated kings in Jos. 12). On the other hand, verses such as Joshua 16.10 and 17.11–13 (cf. Jgs. 1.27ff.) indicate that even the conquest of the tribal allotments in the heartland (as opposed to the remaining land on the periphery; see Jos. 13.1–6) was less than complete. The gradual nature of the conquest appears from the summary of these events in Judges 1.1–2.5. Complicating matters even further is the archaeological evidence, which casts grave doubts on the Bible’s accounts of the destruction of Jericho and Ai. In light of these complexities, scholars have tended to treat the materials in Joshua as a combination of local Benjamite or Ephraimite legends and hero stories, scattered authentic notices delineating the limits of Israelite control, and later Deuteronomist (7th cent. BCE) editorial statements that describe the conquest in sweeping and idealistic terms. The Deuteronomist editors were also responsible for portraying Joshua as one who scrupulously fulfilled Moses’ instructions as reflected in the Torah (Jos. 1.7–8, 8.30–35, 11.12–15, 23.6).

JOSIAH (Heb. Yo’shiyyahu; 640–609), king of Judah. Josiah ascended the throne at the age of eight, following the assassination of his father, Amon. As the Assyrian empire crumbled, Josiah strengthened Judah and expanded its frontiers to the north to include almost all of the former territory of the northern kingdom of Israel. His most important legacy was the extensive and unprecedented religious reform he undertook to wipe out all vestiges of Canaanite and Assyrian idolatry and to centralize worship in the Temple. According to 2 Chronicles 34, the bulk of this reform took place in Josiah’s twelfth year. However, according to 2 Kings 22–23, the impetus for Josiah’s reform came in the wake of the discovery of a Law book (identified by many scholars as the *Book of Deuteronomy), which came to light during the course of Temple repairs in Josiah’s eighteenth year. One possible way of accounting for the chronological discrepancy is that those aspects of the reform that related to the removal of foreign cults were initiated in Josiah’s twelfth year, whereas the centralization of the cult in Jerusalem took place only in Josiah’s eighteenth year. 2 Kings and 2 Chronicles concentrate on different aspects of the reform in order to highlight variant historiographic purposes. The Second Book of Chronicles seeks to emphasize Josiah’s youthful enthusiasm in undoing the cultic sins of the past, whereas 2 Kings wishes to underscore the crucial influence of the Deuteronomist code on Josiah’s actions. His exemplary righteousness is celebrated especially in 2 Kings, which describes him as unequaled among all the kings in his fervor of returning to the Lord “with all his heart, with all his soul, and with all his might” (2 Kgs. 23.25; cf. Dt. 6.5). Many recent scholars posit an earlier, preexilic version of Kings, which came to a climactic finale with the religious achievements of Josiah. One element of Josiah’s reform, described at length in 2 Chronicles, is his observance of a national Pesah festival in Jerusalem, the likes of which had not been observed since the period of the Judges. Josiah’s modesty and program of social justice is noted favorably by the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. 22.15–16). Ultimately, Josiah met a tragic death in the battle of Megiddo in 609 BCE at the hands of the Egyptian pharaoh Necho II, who was on his way to Carchemish in order to bolster the faltering Assyrian army against the rising Babylonians. Josiah’s death is accounted for theologically in 2 Chronicles 35.21–22 by his refusal to heed a divine message to stay out of Necho’s path. In rabbinic literature, Josiah’s death is explained as resulting from the duplicity of his generation (Lam. Rab. 1.53).

JOY. A spirit of joy is regarded as an essential prerequisite to the true worship of God. “Serve the Lord with joy [Heb. simḥah], come before him with exulting” (Ps. 100.2). The Midrash (Sg. Rab. 1.4) enumerates ten words used in the Bible to express Israel’s joy. The rabbis said “The divine presence does not rest upon a man while he is in a state of gloom . . . but is manifested only through the joy with which he fulfills the commandments" (Shab. 30b) and "The Holy Spirit descends only upon a joyful heart" (Y., Suk. 5.1). The truest source of joy is said to be the fulfillment of the commandments, in particular, family celebrations (such as circumcision and bar mitsvah ceremonies and especially weddings), marriage ("he who dwells without a wife dwells without joy"—Yev. 62b), and the observance of Sabbath and festivals. The water-libation ceremony in the Temple was described as a ceremony of such joy that "he who has not seen it has not seen true joy" (Suk. 5.1), and the celebration of *Simḥat Torah in the synagogue is to this day a public demonstration of the conviction that "the precepts of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart" (Ps. 19.8). The Ḥasidim have made joyful enthusiasm (hitlahavut) a central feature of their worship.

JUBILEES, BOOK OF, pseudepigraphous work. Originally written in Hebrew, it is extant in its entirety only in an Ethiopic translation, but numerous Hebrew fragments of several manuscripts have been found among the *Dead Sea Scrolls, attesting its Hebrew origins; parts of Greek and Latin versions were preserved through Christian transmitters. It was composed some time in the second century BCE or possibly even earlier. The Book of Jubilees recasts Genesis and the first chapters of Exodus in the form of an angelic revelation to Moses and amends the biblical stories. Many biblical passages are entirely omitted, while others are expanded either by the addition of narratives concerning the biblical characters or by the incorporation of numerous halakhic injunctions. The historical account is divided into jubilee periods (periods of 49 years) that set the chronology of biblical events, and the work emphasizes the importance of observing a 364-day solar *calendar, the same calendar that appears in some of the Dead Sea Scrolls. The explicit reference in the Qumran scrolls to "the book of the divisions of the times into their jubilees and their weeks," the community's insistence on the observance of the solar calendar, and the existence of Hebrew fragments of the text in Qumran suggest that the book is not a Qumranic composition but was already accepted as an authoritative text.

JUDAH (Heb. Yehudah), the fourth son of *Jacob by his wife *Leah, and the eponym of the largest Israelite tribe and its territory, which after Solomon's death formed the major part of the southern kingdom, also known as Judah (see JUDAH, KINGDOM OF). Judah plays a prominent role in the Joseph cycle (Gn. 37–44). Jacob's blessing anticipates the leadership of Judah in the tribal confederacy and that tribe as the source of a monarchy (Gn. 49.8–11; cf. also 1 Chr. 5.1–2). Genesis 38 provides the earliest history of the tribe and its marital alliances with the local Canaanites living in the coastal plain.

Of the three surviving lines (1 Chr. 2; 4.1–23), Shelah's descendants continued to reside around Lachish and Mareshah probably until they were exiled in Sennacherib's campaign in 701 (Mi. 1.10–15). Perez, centered in the Judean hills, became the dominant branch, from which came the clans of *Caleb (*Hebron) and Ram-e-phrath (*Bethlehem). *David, of the Perezite clan of Ram, united the Judean and allied southern clans, and established his kingdom at Hebron. After Solomon's death and the secession of the northern kingdom of Israel, the kingdom of Judah continued under the Davidic dynasty until its destruction by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 BCE. The extent of its territory varied depending on the political fortunes of its kings. Joshua 15.21–62, as well as an additional passage found in the Septuagint, presents the administrative subdivision of the kingdom, probably dating from the eighth century BCE.

Under Persian rule, the small province of Medinat Yehud extended from Bethel in the north to Bethsur in the south, from Jericho and Ein Gedi in the east to the higher plateau of the Shephelah in the west (Keilah, Zanoah, Adullam). At this time, the term Jew came into vogue (Est. 2.5). The earliest appointed governors Sheshbazzar, *Zerubbabel, Elnathan and Hananiah were probably members of the Davidic family. The later governor *Nehemiah (445–432) came from an old Jerusalemite family. He rebuilt the city walls and gave new stature to the old capital of Judah. In the fourth century BCE, the first Jewish coinage bears the name yhd in Paleo-Hebrew script.

After the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE and the loss of Jewish autonomy, Vespasian and his son Titus celebrated their victory through the series of coins called "Judea Capta," which depicted the defeated Jewish people among the spoils of war. It was at this time, also, that the Romans changed the name of the province from Judea to Palestina, the Greek term for Philistia, on the Mediterranean coast.

JUDAH, KINGDOM OF, the southern kingdom during the period of the divided monarchy (c.928–586). After Solomon's death, his son Rehoboam could not mend regional differences and quell discontent in his kingdom, especially among non-Judahites (1 Kgs. 12). David and Solomon's united monarchy was split into two nations, the kingdom of Israel (see ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF) and the kingdom of Judah. The northern tribes comprised the larger territory of Israel; Judah, Benjamin, and Simeon formed the Judean kingdom. The border between the two kingdoms shifted during the next fifty years as a result of repeated warfare. It became fixed in the mid-ninth century when relations between the two nations improved. The geographical area of Judah, however, continued to change throughout its history, depending on the political designs of the major Near Eastern powers, primarily Egypt, Assyria, and Babylon. With variations, it included small sections of coastal plain, the Shephelah (foothills region), the Judean hill country, the wilderness west of the Dead Sea, the Arabah (south of the Dead Sea), and parts of the Negev. In its three and a half centuries of existence, Judah was ruled by twenty monarchs. All except one, Queen Athaliah, were of the lineage of David. *Jerusalem, the site of the Temple and the king's chief residence, remained the capital throughout its history. Jerusalem was the largest urban center, well fortified, and made up of a lower city and an acropolis where the palace and Temple stood. By the end of the eighth century BCE Jerusalem covered an area of about a hundred fifty acres, ten times the size of the Canaanite city conquered by David. Much of its expansion can be attributed to an influx of Israelites from the northern kingdom at the time of its demise (722 BCE). Lachish, situated in the Shephelah, was the second largest city in Judah, a fortified administrative center with a palace fort, numerous store buildings, and a residential section. Small administrative centers, such as Beersheba in the northern Negev and Arad in the eastern Negev, were located in more sparsely settled areas. A number of seals belonging to officials and inscriptions bearing correspondences from these and other sites evidence a centralized administrative system of government.

Judah's modest size did not prevent its kings from clashing with larger nations and forming political alliances against the giant empires of the day. By the mid-eighth century, the Judean kingdom became an Assyrian vassal. Hezekiah (727–698), hoping to restore independence, formed an anti-Assyrian coalition. In response, Sennacherib, king of Assyria, marched against Judah in 701, devastating most of its cities. Although Jerusalem survived by paying an exorbitant tribute, the kingdom was much reduced and weakened (2 Kgs. 18–19). Judah was able to recover in the latter half of the seventh century, partly because of Assyria's decline. Josiah (639–609) expanded Judah's borders into Philistia and northern Israel. However, he lost his life and Judah's independence in a battle against Pharaoh Necho. Judah became first an Egyptian and then a Babylonian vassal. Jehoiakim's revolt against Babylon precipitated the first exile in 597 BCE. When Zedekiah rebelled (c.589), Nebuchadnezzar laid siege to Jerusalem. In 586 the city fell, the Temple was razed, and many Judeans were exiled to Babylon. The kingdom of Judah came to an end and the Davidic monarchy was never restored. See also TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

JUDAH THE MACCABEE (died 161 BCE), one of the five sons of the priest Mattathias of Modin and military leader in the rebellion against the Syrian Seleucids. How Judah came to be known as "Maccabaeus," a name probably related to the Hebrew word for hammer, is unclear; one explanation is that he was born with a hammer-shaped head. After the death of his father (c.166 BCE), Judah assumed command of the Jewish rebels and repeatedly defeated the Seleucid forces sent against him. By 164 he was able to liberate Jerusalem and reconsecrate the Temple, events commemorated in the *Hanukkah celebration. The Seleucids were forced to repeal their anti-Jewish measures (see *ANTIOCHUS IV EPIPHANES) and grant the Jews complete religious freedom, but by now it was too late to turn the wheel back. Judah led several campaigns against Idumea, Ammon, Galilee, Gilead, and Ashdod, aimed at relieving the oppressed Jewish communities there and at consolidating his own power in Judea and its environs. He also waged a constant war against those Jews who supported the Seleucids, including *Alcimus, the newly consecrated high priest. When Alcimus asked the Seleucid authorities for help, they sent a large army against Judah, but he was able to defeat their forces and kill their commander, Nicanor. Wanting to ensure that there would be no further Seleucid aggression, Judah sent emissaries to Rome to sign a treaty of friendship between the Jews and the Romans. The Seleucids, however, quickly dispatched a large military force to Judea, and in the ensuing battle, Judah's forces were routed, and he was killed. Upon Judah's death, the command of the anti-Seleucid Jewish forces was taken over by his brother Jonathan (see HASMONEANS). The main sources for the history of Judah are 1 Maccabees and 2 Maccabees. His piety, qualities of leadership, and military genius have made him one of the great Jewish heroes.

JUDAISM. See JEWISH RELIGION.

JUDAIZING SECTS, designation of groups of non-Jews who at various times adopted certain Jewish beliefs or observances (for example, the Sabbath, dietary laws). References to this behavior are even found in the biblical text (e.g., Est. 8.17), though it is unclear whether people were pretending to be Jews or actually converting to Judaism. In the Roman period, a number of people, in reaction to the paganism of this time, became sebomenoi (*God fearers) and adopted certain Jewish customs. The early church, following the teaching of Paul, opposed believers in Jesus who insisted on the continued validity of the law. These Judeo-Christian groups finally disappeared, but the term Judaizers was often applied to dissidents; its use was particularly frequent in Reformation controversies. The term should not be applied to groups that converted (see BETA ISRAEL; KHAZARS), although the borderline between Judaizing and conversion is often fluid.

Of considerable historical interest are the Judaizing sects that arose in eastern Europe. In the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries, heretical groups in Novgorod and Moscow, described as "atheist" and "Judaizing" (zhidovomudrstuyshchiye was one of the terms of opprobrium used against them), were persecuted and destroyed by the Orthodox church. Within one hundred years, however, Judaizing tendencies—stemming from the Reformation—took hold of anti-Trinitarian splinter groups throughout Europe. Unlike the milder "Old Testament" Puritans, the Huguenots, or the Hungarian Calvinists, the sectarians of Poland and Lithuania headed by Szymon Budny (c.1530–1593) combined a belief in the Messiahship of Jesus with adherence to Mosaic law. Their counterparts in Transylvania, under the leadership of Simon Péchi (c.1567–c.1639), moved even closer to Judaism and came to be known as the Szombatos or Somrei Sabat (Sabbatarians). Prior to its repression after 1638, this movement had gained at least twenty thousand adherents.

During the eighteenth century, Judaizing groups reappeared. The *Subbotniki, the Sabbath-keeping sect of an offshoot of the Dukhobors, gave rise to a third sect known as the Gery (True Proselytes) which, like the Hungarian Szombatos, went underground and managed to survive. A large proportion of these Sabbatarians merged with the Hungarian and Russian Jews; others were absorbed in Erets Yisra'el. The Abrahamites in eighteenth-century Bohemia adopted many Jewish customs and were persecuted—some were executed—until the Patent of Toleration in 1781 enabled them to emerge from the underground. They later disintegrated.

New Judaizing sects, often claiming descent from the ten lost *tribes of Israel, have appeared in recent years in southern Africa, Latin America, the United States, India, and Japan. They include genuine proselytes and fringe groups such as the Black Hebrews, some of whom emigrated from the United States and now live as a sectarian community in Israel.

JUDEO-ARABIC, dialect spoken and written, in Hebrew characters, by Jews in Islamic lands based on the Arabic language. With the Arab conquests of the seventh century, Jews under Arab rule began in many places to speak Arabic. The vernacular, retaining an element of Hebrew and Aramaic vocabulary and grammar, developed in the eighth century into Judeo-Arabic. Unlike in Ashkenazi Europe, where Hebrew remained the literary language of Jews, beginning in the ninth century Judeo-Arabic produced a rich religious and secular literature, although poetry and halakhic works for the most part continued to be written in Hebrew. Medieval Arabic literature is linguistically conservative, providing few clues to the spoken language of the time. Judeo-Arabic, therefore, representing the middle Arabic vernacular from which modern dialects are descended, is a valuable linguistic resource, exhibiting the evolving weakening of prefinal vowels and the loss of final ones, the loss of case endings, and the glottal stop. A rich literature in Judeo-Arabic appeared in the medieval period, including most of the classic works of Jewish philosophy. Judeo-Arabic, once spoken from Spain to Iraq, continues in use in pockets of the Middle East and North Africa.

JUDEO-PERSIAN, name of the form of Modern Persian written in the Hebrew alphabet. The very earliest examples of the Modern Persian language (Farsi), from the eighth century CE, are written in the Hebrew alphabet. Until recently, Persian-speaking Jews in Iran, Afghanistan, and the central Asian provinces of Uzbekistan and Tajikistan were only literate in the Hebrew alphabet. The earliest Judeo-Persian translation of the Bible is an incomplete Pentateuch dated to 1319 from a manuscript in the British Library. In the fourteenth century, the Jewish poet Shahin of Shiraz composed a number of extensive poems, including an account in rhymed couplets of stories from the Book of Joshua to the coronation of King David and a poetic work with the teachings of the Pirquei Avot. At the end of the nineteenth century, the noted Bukharan rabbi Shimon Hakhm, living in Jerusalem, arranged to edit and print many works in Judeo-Persian, in a form that reflected the central Asian variety of the language, which in modern times is called Tajiki. He also translated and published the entire Pentateuch, the Former Prophets, and much of Isaiah. He edited and printed the works of Shahin, adding his own compositions in prose on a number of subjects, such as an extensive biography of Moses entitled Musa-nama. In addition, there exist numerous examples of the works of many non-Jewish Persian poets whose poems are transcribed into the Hebrew alphabet for the benefit of Jewish readers. Major collections of Judeo-Persian books and manuscripts are to be found in the British Library, the library of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, the Royal Danish Library, and the libraries of the Hebrew Union College–Jewish Institute of Religion in Cincinnati, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, and the Ben-Zvi Institute in Jerusalem.

JUDEO-SPANISH, also known as Ladino, Judeo-Spaniol, or Judezmo. When the Jews were expelled from Spain at the end of the fifteenth century, the Castilian language was still in its formative stages of development. Sephardi Jews took this medieval Spanish with them, preserving its irregularities of pronunciation, spelling, grammatical forms, and morphology.

Some of the dispersed Sephardi communities retained ties with Spain, keeping abreast of developments in Spanish culture, including linguistic advances. In Morocco the Judeo-Spanish language, known as Ḥakétia, possessed more modern Spanish words and fewer loan words from Hebrew or Arabic. More distant communities, such as those of the Ottoman empire, gradually became removed from the developments of the language that came to be known as Spanish, retaining older forms or archaisms with a larger reservoir of loan words from the surrounding languages of Greek (in Salonika), Serbo-Croatian (in Monastir), Turkish (in the Ottoman empire), and Arabic, as well as French, Italian, Bulgarian and Romanian. The gap between Judeo-Spanish and its Castilian mother tongue widened with time, and various forms of Judeo-Spanish arose. The closer the relations were with Spain, the more likely the parallels between the languages. The Judeo-Spanish language was both a written (primarily in Hebrew characters) and a spoken language.

A body of Judeo-Spanish literature developed over the centuries. This literature was of two types: first, literature preserving medieval ballads (romansas), proverbs (refrenes), and folk songs; second, new rabbinic literature. The classic of Ladino literature, Me'am Lo'ez, a popular encyclopedia of biblical and rabbinic traditions, was composed by Ya'aqov *Culi in 1730. Culi combined biblical explanations in his commentary to the Book of Genesis with folk tales and anecdotes, as well as practical advice and information on a variety of subjects. His work became extremely popular among the Jews of the Ottoman empire. After Culi's death in 1732 others continued composing commentaries on the books of the Bible.

In the nineteenth century a renaissance of Judeo-Spanish occurred in the Balkans and the Near East, as publishing houses produced dozens of translations of European and Jewish books. A lively Judeo-Spanish press disseminated modern Jewish and Western ideologies in the Balkans, Palestine, Egypt, and Europe.

The decline of Judeo-Spanish began in the twentieth century: the Alliance Israélite Universelle schools opposed the use of Judeo-Spanish in favor of French as a means of modernizing Near Eastern Jewry, while the emergent Turkish Republic required that Jews use the Turkish language. The Nazi onslaught in World War II engulfed the Balkan communities. Most of the Sephardi Jews of Europe who survived the Holocaust (e.g., in Bulgaria) immigrated to Israel or France and South America. After five hundred years Judeo-Spanish has largely ceased to be a living language and is on the verge of extinction.

JUDGE. According to the biblical account, the *elders of the twelve tribes served as judges before the settlement of Canaan. Acting upon the advice of *Jethro, Moses appointed judges at various levels (Ex. 18.25–26). Afterward, the function of supreme judge was occasionally merged with that of the leader (see JUDGES, BOOK OF), king, priest, or prophet. The Bible insists on the impartiality of a judge, saying on the one hand that he should not favor the rich and, on the other hand, that in his mercy, he should be moved to show favoritism to the underprivileged. Bribing a judge (see BRIBERY) was a particularly heinous offense (Ex. 23.3–8). See also DAYYAN.

JUDGES, BOOK OF (Heb. Sefer Shofetim), second book of the second part of the Bible (the Prophets); a direct continuation of the Book of Joshua, describing Israel's varying fortunes from the death of Joshua to the rise of the prophet Samuel. The period was characterized by general instability and lack of cohesion among the tribes: "In those days there was no king in Israel; every man did what was right in his own eyes" (21.25). The judges were not judges in the legal sense (except for Deborah; 4.45), but were inspired leaders, arising in moments of severe crises and impelled to action by the spirit of God. As temporary leaders in war, their influence rarely exceeded local or tribal boundaries. There were twelve judges, six major ones (Othniel, *Ehud, *Deborah, *Gideon [with his son *Abimelech], *Jephthah, and *Samson) and six minor ones (Shamgar, Tola, Jair, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon). Judges consists of three parts. The first is an account of the conquest of Canaan

(1–2.5). This account, which explains the conquest as a series of independent battles fought by the warrior tribes for their own individual portion of land, differs from that of the Book of Joshua (chaps. 1–11), which presents an ideological picture of the conquest of Canaan as a sweeping military achievement in which all the tribes appear to be acting in unison. The second part of the Book of Judges consists of the stories of the judges (2.6–16.31); and the third part is an appendix that tells the stories of the migration of the tribe of Dan, of Micah's sanctuary and its idol, and of the war of the tribes against Benjamin following the outrage at Gibeah (chaps. 17–21). The purpose of the book is to present Israel's vicissitudes in Canaan in terms of an alternating rhythm of apostasy (as a result of the failure to exterminate the Canaanite population), foreign oppression, return to God, deliverance through a judge, reversion to idolatry, and so on (2.6–3.6). Rabbinic tradition ascribes the authorship of Judges to Samuel.

JUDGMENT, DAY OF. See YOM HA-DIN.

JUDITH, apocryphal book relating the story of Judith and Holofernes. Nebuchadnezzar, king of Assyria, enraged at the peoples of the western parts of his empire for refusing to help him in a military campaign, sent his general Holofernes with a large army to subdue the stubborn nations and destroy their ancestral shrines, so that Nebuchadnezzar alone would be worshiped as god. The Jews, terrified by the advance of Holofernes, fortified the mountain passes leading to Jerusalem. Holofernes laid siege to the Jewish village of Bethulia, "which is opposite Esdraelon, facing the plain near Dothan" (Judith 4.6). Judith, a pious and beautiful widow, left Bethulia, befriended Holofernes, seduced him, and cut off his head. When the Assyrians learned of their commander's death, they panicked and dispersed, chased by the jubilant Jews. The story contains many contradictions and historical anachronisms, and while it may reflect some historical events of the fourth century BCE, it may also be a purely fictional creation. Preserved in a Greek version, it probably was written in Hebrew, and given its obvious relevance for the period of the Maccabean Revolt, a date in the second half of the second century BCE seems most plausible. Some late Hebrew midrashim contain the same story, but they probably represent medieval retranslations from the Vulgate and do not preserve the lost Hebrew original of the work.

JUS TALIONIS, the law of retaliation. The Bible states "An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, a hand for a hand"

(Ex. 21.24–5; Lv. 24.20; Dt. 19.21) as the punishment to be inflicted upon one who has caused bodily injury to another. There is no evidence that this was ever applied literally (although according to an early source, the Sadducees maintained that it should be so interpreted), and in rabbinical law it was interpreted to mean that appropriate monetary compensation for personal injury, or financial restitution in cases of damage to property, would have to be made. The only exception to this rule was in the case of murder, where the life of the murderer is forfeit (see HOMICIDE). However, even in the case of murder, the practice (found in some ancient codes) of exacting vengeance from the children of the criminal is expressly prohibited—"The fathers shall not be put to death for the children neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers; every man shall be put to his death for his own sin" (Dt. 24.16).

JUSTICE, a divine attribute, expressed in God's intolerance of evil and his punishment of sin. Rabbinic literature frequently refers to the tension between God's justice (expressed by the divine name Elohim) and his *compassion (expressed by the Tetragrammaton; see GOD, NAMES OF). A corollary to the doctrine of divine justice is the belief in *reward and punishment. Divine justice must be reflected in human justice: "What does the Lord require of you but to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with your God" (Mi. 6.8). The passion for justice is the basis of the demand for social righteousness on the part of the prophets and can be regarded as the keynote of biblical legislation. The injunction "Justice, justice shall you pursue, that you may live to inherit the land that the Lord your God gives you" (Dt. 16.20) expresses the legal basis and "the Holy God is sanctified by justice" (Is. 5.15) its ethical basis. This insistence on justice as the foundation of Judaism is emphasized not only by contrasting it with injustice but by insisting, in deliberately hyperbolic language, on its superiority over two other supreme virtues, *peace and compassion. Rabbi Shim'on ben Gamli'el said, "By three things is the world preserved—by truth, justice, and peace" (Avot 1.18). The rabbis, however, make Moses the prototype of strict justice and Aaron the prototype of peace (San. 6b), interpreting Aaron's sin in making the golden calf as one of preferring peace to justice (Ex. Rab. 41.6). Similarly the rabbis were at great pains to define the precise bounds of justice and mercy. The world depends on justice (Ex. Rab. 30.15), but it cannot exist if governed solely by justice. Justice must, therefore, be tempered by mercy, but the element of mercy must not be permitted to deflect the straight course of justice and can only modify the verdict. This is strikingly exemplified by the injunction, "You shall not favor a poor man in his cause" (Ex. 23.3), which, in its unbending insistence on the strictest impartiality, signifies that even a wrongful verdict to favor the poorer party in a suit on the grounds that the rich man would not thereby be harmed is an act of injustice. The proscription "You shall not wrest justice; you shall not respect persons; neither shall you take a gift" (Dt. 16.19) was practiced to an extraordinary extent by the rabbis. Anything that might be interpreted as showing favor to one party against the other, anything that might, even unconsciously, influence a judge one way or the other, was rigidly forbidden.

K

KABBALAH (from the root q b l [receive]), tradition as defined from the point of view of the recipient. From the point of view of those passing it on, it would be masorah*, the exact equivalent of the English tradition. The term originally referred to tradition in general, but especially to halakhic rules for which there was no explicit scriptural warrant and which were therefore said to be a "kabbalah from Moses on Mount Sinai." The new type of esoteric theosophical teaching that appeared in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries in Provence and northern Spain was at first simply called secret or hidden teaching, but before long it came to be designated as Kabbalah. Its terminology, symbolism, and conceptual structure are better described as a form of esotericism rather than mysticism, though elements of the latter are not absent and sometimes even prominent. The first literary expression of this new doctrine was the Sefer ha-Bahir*. The literary culmination of the new teaching, the Zohar*, soon established itself as the authoritative and canonical kabbalistic text. The Kabbalah became the dominant form of Jewish mystical theology and was subsequently, and erroneously, identified with Jewish mysticism as such. At first cultivated in closed esoteric circles, it later spread more widely and, especially after the sixteenth century, gradually came to dominate popular belief and religious practice. This development was abetted by the increasingly messianic character of the later Kabbalah.

The salient features of this system are the notion of an utterly hidden and therefore completely inaccessible Godhead (Ein Sof*) and its manifestation in a complex and dynamic structure of ten emanations (the sefirot*). A particularly important feature of this system is the female character of the tenth sefirah, the Shekhinah*, and the view that the unity of the Godhead is consummated by the union of the male and female elements within it. The human being (male-and-female) is the "image of God" by virtue of its analogy to the sefirot. Divine manifestation means both creation* and revelation*, and hence it is through the created order and the revealed Torah*, that the Godhead-in-the-sefirot is accessible in meditation and religious performance. Central to kabbalistic piety is its relation to the commandments, which are given not an ethical but an esoteric and mystical interpretation with a theurgical character. Meditation on the sefirot also serves as a mystical "ladder of ascent." This, combined with the proper performance of the commandments, enables man to take an active part in the life of the Godhead by assisting the union of the sefirot in general, and, in particular, of the sixth sefirah, Tiferet (representing the male sefirot), with the tenth, female sefirah, Malkhut, or Shekhinah. Whether the doctrine of emanations also leads to a pantheistic conception of the cosmos is a much debated question that flared up also among non-Jewish scholars in the eighteenth century in connection with the so-called Spinoza controversy. The problem of evil is dealt with in terms of negative emanations (see LILITH; SAMAEL; SITRA' AĦRA'), which constitute a powerful demonology. The kabbalists also adopted the doctrine, hitherto considered as heretical, of the transmigration of souls* (gilgul).

The origins of this system and the historical and geographical reasons for its emergence in twelfth-century Provence are still obscure. Certain similarities with gnostic doctrines of late antiquity are suggestive, but there is no evidence of their secret, "underground," transmission, and no convincing explanation for their surfacing at that time and place. None of the explanations offered (e.g., as a reaction to the excessive philosophical rationalism of the period) adequately accounts for the phenomenon.

There were eight main phases of the development of the Kabbalah. Sefer ha-Bahir represents the early kabbalistic traditions and served as an authoritative source of the concepts of the sefirot and the feminine element in the divine world. The second phase comprises the schools of kabbalists in Provence, centered around the figure of Yitshaq Saggi Nahor (Isaac "the Blind"). This center flourished at the end of the twelfth century and the beginning of the thirteenth. The third phase comprises the Gerona circle, which united the traditions of the Bahir and Yitshaq and his school, systematized them, and reinterpreted many philosophical terms in light of the new teachings; it also developed a specific kind of ethical literature in which the kabbalistic message is hidden. The most prominent figures in this school were Ezra of Gerona, 'Azri'el, Nahmanides, Asher ben David (who came from Provence, a nephew of Yitshaq Saggi Nahor), and Ya'aqov ben Sheshet. The fourth phase comprises the school of the Kohen brothers, Ya'aqov and Yitshaq, and their disciple, Mosheh of Burgos, who flourished in Castile in the second half of the thirteenth century. These thinkers had a profound influence on the circle that produced the Zohar and on the school of Shelomoh ben Avraham Adret at the end of the thirteenth century and the beginning of the fourteenth.

The fifth phase comprises the school of Avraham Abulafia, whose teachings Gershom Scholem terms "ecstatic" or "prophetic" Kabbalah. Abulafia traveled to many Jewish communities, spreading his unique ideas and establishing a tradition that is in many aspects different from that of the Geronese and Castilian schools.

The medieval Kabbalah reached its peak in the age of the Zohar, in the last decades of the thirteenth century and beginning of the fourteenth century. This is the period in which Mosheh de León wrote the Zohar and his numerous kabbalistic treatises, and in which his colleague, Yosef Gikatilla, wrote some of the most influential kabbalistic works. Several other prominent kabbalists belong to this age, among them David ben Yehudah he-Ħasid, Yosef of Shushan, and Yosef ben Shalom Ashkenazi. The anonymous Sefer ha-Temunah probably also belongs to this period. Parallel to the group connected to the Zohar was the school of Shelomoh ben Avraham Adret, centered in Catalonia.

In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, kabbalistic schools appeared in Italy, in Greece, and in Erets Yisra'el. The spread of the Kabbalah in central Europe, which started in the second half of the thirteenth century, continued. In the second half of the fifteenth century, new kabbalistic schools appeared in Spain, influenced by the persecutions and expressing the messianic hopes of the age. The end of this century saw the development of the Christian Kabbalah in Italy and Germany.

In the sixteenth century, after the expulsion of the Jews from Spain, the Kabbalah emerged out of the esoteric circles in which it had been studied and experienced to become the dominant theology of most Jewish communities. The main centers were in Italy and Erets Yisra'el, especially Safed (see LURIA, YITSHAQ). In the early modern period, the Kabbalah became a central element in Jewish culture as a whole, shaping major historical and cultural events, such as the Shabbatean messianic movement (see SHABBETAI TSEVI) and modern *Hasidism. KAFAH, YIHYA' BEN SHELOMOH (1850-1931), Yemenite rabbinical authority who came to symbolize modern trends within Yemenite Judaism. He stood at the center of a dispute around the Kabbalah in which, under the impact of European scholars, he denied the traditional ascription of the authorship of the *Zohar to Shim'on bar Yoḥ'ai and went so far as to say that kabbalistic literature is alien to Torah. His extreme views found followers among the young and the affluent, and especially among those close to the Ottoman authorities who had been open to rationalist influences, but were sharply opposed by most of the community. In order to disseminate his views, Kafah founded the Darda' (Generation of Knowledge) movement.

This ideological struggle, which involved social, economic, and personal considerations, produced several polemical works for and against the Kabbalah. Kafah put forward his views in Sefer Milhamot ha-Shem (1931). In his beit midrash he advocated the literal interpretation of the Torah as against the homiletic, allegorical, or mystical ones. Up to that time, Jewish scholarship in Yemen did not extend beyond Maimonides' Mishneh Torah and had not even reached the Shulhan 'Arukh. Under the influence of Kafah, Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed, Yehudah ha-Levi's Kuzari, and Hovot ha-Levavot of Bahya ben Yosef ibn Paquda began to be studied, along with works of the ri'shonim who were not influenced by kabbalistic literature. The sages of Sana published Emunat ha-Shem (1937) to combat Kafah's views.

KAHANEMAN, YOSEF (1888-1969), also known as the Ponevezher Rav, rabbi, educator, and builder of educational institutions. In 1916 he became head of the yeshivah in Grodno, Lithuania, and three years later became rabbi of Ponevezh, soon opening a yeshivah there. In addition to Kahaneman's numerous communal and educational projects, he was also prominent in *Agudat Israel and was elected to a seat in the Lithuanian parliament. Kahaneman settled in Palestine in 1940, where he began to build a network of Jewish educational institutions. In 1944 he reestablished the Ponevezh Yeshivah in Bene Beraq and went on to organize many schools in the vicinity linked to the yeshivah.

KALAM, (Arab.; speed, or word), a form of Islamic scholasticism that appeared formally in the eighth century. The founder of the movement was Wasil b. 'Ata' (died 748). The establishment of the movement centered on the question of free will and the free moral choice of the individual. The practitioners of the Kalam were termed Mutakallimun; the earliest school was known as Mu'tazilah (Separatist), because Wasil separated himself from orthodoxy. This school remained highly influential, particularly in Jewish circles. The main doctrines that characterized the group were free will; atomism, the principle that the world is formed from indivisible atoms that are created and arranged by God at every instant and the denial of necessary causation; the creation of the Qur'an, along with the rest of the universe; the absolute unity and incorporeality of God, to whom no attributes may be ascribed; and the perfect justice of God. The two latter occupied the Mu'tazili to such a degree that they were also known as "the people of unity and justice." The Mu'tazili enjoyed their greatest popularity during the caliphate of al-Ma'mun, who in 833 declared their position on the Qur'an to be official doctrine and instituted an inquisition against those who denied it. In 847 the caliph al-Mutawakkil restored orthodox belief, and in particular the belief in the eternity of the Qur'an. The Kalam had a lasting influence on Jewish theology. Works by prominent members of the Karaite sect such as David ibn Marwan Muqammis, Yosef Basir, and Yesu'a ben Yehudah are almost indistinguishable from those of their Islamic counterparts. Among the Rabbantes, the most noted philosopher to apply the methods and arguments of the Mutakallimun was Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on, in his Emunat ve-De'ot.

KALISCHER, TSEVI HIRSCH (1795–1874), rabbinic forerunner of modern Zionism who flourished in the western Polish province of Posen (Poznań) annexed by Prussia. A disciple of R. 'Aqiva *Eger and for fifty years rabbi of Thorn (Toruń), a major Jewish community in the region, which he insisted on serving in an honorary capacity, Kalischer became the most prominent and active promoter of practical Zionism of his day, influencing both the English-Jewish leader Sir Moses Montefiore and the leaders of the newly established French-Jewish philanthropic organization Alliance Israélite Universelle to promote Jewish settlement in Erets Yisra'el. He prevailed on the latter to found the agricultural school of Miqveh Yisra'el, near Jaffa in 1870; organized societies for the settlement of the country; and convened an embryonic Zionist conference, mainly attended by rabbinic supporters, at Thorn in 1860. Although an author of halakhic, philosophic, and homiletic writings, Kalischer's most influential work was a booklet entitled Derishat Tsiyyon (1862), which became a classic, outlining his Religious Zionist program and citing the relevant rabbinic texts. He maintained that the Messiah would come only after large numbers of Jews had settled in Erets Yisra'el and opposed the prevalent Orthodox view that Jews had to await the arrival of the Messiah to return to the Holy Land. He advocated the restoration of the biblical sacrificial cult but nevertheless emphasized the essential rational basis of Judaism, combining a rigid Orthodoxy with a permissive approach to the conversion of the children of mixed marriages. His Zionist writings, including his letters, were published by I. Klausner (1947, with bibliography). His halakhic publications included Emunah Yesharah (2 vols. [1843, 1871]) and Moznayyim le-Mishpat (2 vols. [1855]).

KALLAH. [This entry discusses the minor tractate Kallah; for a discussion of brides, see BETROTHAL.] This minor tractate, printed in standard editions of the Talmud Bavli, probably dates from early geonic times. It deals with laws concerning marriage and sexual relations, many of which seem to be based on tannaitic and amoraic teachings, and it derives its name from its opening regarding the prohibition of a bride to her husband prior to the recitation of the marriage blessing. Kallah seems to have no connection with the Massekhet Kallah mentioned in the Talmud Bavli, which refers to the tractate, different each year, studied during the kallah study months in Babylonia (see KALLAH MONTHS). Kallah is followed, in standard Talmud Bavli editions, by the minor tractate Kallah Rabbati, written in Aramaic, which elaborates on the baraitot of Kallah and other sources in quasi-Talmudic style. It was published by Michael Higger (New York, 1936; reprinted in Jerusalem, 1970).

KALLAH MONTHS, the months of Adar and Elul, during which study conventions were held in the Babylonian *academies at the time of the ge'onim and perhaps even earlier during the time of the amora'im. The conventions were attended by a large number of scholars and students who did not reside in the vicinity of the academies. The choice of Adar and Elul, which fall immediately before the spring and autumn seasons, respectively, enabled farmers to attend, since they were comparatively free from agricultural duties during these months. Regular members of the academy, who received stipends, were expected to study a specific tractate during the five months between one kallah month and the next and were examined by the head of the academy during the kallah month. The discussion of queries addressed to the ga'on and scholars of the academy, although not restricted to these months, seems also to have featured prominently in these gatherings.

KALLIR, EL'AZAR (6th–7th cent.), the most famous and influential of the early liturgical poets. He refers to his home town as Qiryat Sefer (cf. Jgs. 1.11), which is not precisely identified but may be Sepphoris in Galilee. His voluminous oeuvre is the climax of the classical *piyyut in Erets Yisra'el, at the end of the Byzantine period, and contains elaborate piyyutim for almost every special liturgical occasion. Kallir developed the poetic tradition of his forerunners (e.g., *Yann'ai) into a personal, highly complex style. His poetry is full of Midrashic allusions, and his Hebrew showed daring innovation and departures from accepted usage. However, his meanings are often obscure, and his compositions were often criticized (e.g., by Avraham ibn Ezra) for their intricacy and artificiality. Nevertheless, his elaborate and often enigmatic style set standards in Jewish liturgical poetry for almost half a millennium, especially north of the Mediterranean, until the rise of the Spanish school. Some two hundred of his compositions may be found in editions of the Ashkenazi *mahazor. Others have been published by modern scholars, many of them discovered in the Cairo *Genizah.

KALONIMOS BEN KALONIMOS (1286–after 1328), Provençal author and translator. In his Iggeret ha-Hitnatselut ha-Qatan (Jerusalem, 1966), he explained why he left his native Provence to study under Shelomoh ben Avraham Adret (Rashba') in Barcelona. In most of his works Kalonimos ben Kalonimos was critical of Provençal society and his contemporaries. His Even Bohan (Naples, 1489; Tel Aviv, 1956) satirized the moral life, social positions, and religious abuses of Provençal Jewry. Kalonimos complained, for example, that Jewish festivals were observed in their externals—food and festivities—while their real significance was ignored. He also wrote Massekhet Purim (Pesaro, 1513), a parody of a Talmud tractate and its rabbinical argumentation for the festival of Purim; Iggeret Musar (Jerusalem, 1936), an ethical work to his son; and Teshuvah, a polemic against the philosophical views of Yosef ben Abba' Mari Caspi (Munich, 1879). Among Kalonimos's significant translations into Hebrew were Ibn Ridwan's Principles of Medicine, Archimedes' On the Sphere and Cylinder, Galen's De clysteribus et colica liber, Ibn Sankh's Cylinder and Cone, and Ptolemy's Hypothesis. Of special note is Kalonimos's Latin translation of Averroës's Destructio destructionis.

KALONIMOS FAMILY, prominent German-Jewish family from the ninth through the thirteenth century. Several sources, all stemming from the beit midrash of R. El'azar ben Yehudah of Worms, describe how in 917 CE "King Karl" (i.e., Charlemagne) brought the Kalonimos family from Lucca in northern Italy to Mainz. The most likely possibility is that the migration did take place in 917, although Conrad I was the king of Germany at that time.

The Kalonimides were adepts in liturgical poetry and esoteric teachings, in addition to being authorities on rabbinic literature. They were largely responsible for bringing mystical teachings from Italy to Germany. Through the First Crusade, along with several other elite families, they provided both the spiritual and temporal leadership of the main Rhineland communities of Mainz and Worms, even directing the martyrdom that took place at the time of the First Crusade. Rabbi Shemu'el he-Hasid, R. Yehudah ben Shemu'el he-Hasid, and R. El'azar of Worms, who molded the *Hasidei Ashkenaz in the twelfth and thirteen centuries, all belonged to this family (R. Yehudah was the major teacher of R. El'azar of Worms and the source from whom R. El'azar received the family chain of tradition and history). They and their circle attempted to retain aspects of the cultural and spiritual milieu of the pre-Crusade period in the face of tosafistic dialectic and inquiry and a changing Ashkenazi society.

KAPLAN, MORDECAI MENAHEM (1881–1983), U.S. rabbi; founder of *Reconstructionism. The son of an Orthodox rabbi, Kaplan, who arrived with his family in the United States at age nine, was ordained at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, where he became founding dean of the Teachers Institute in 1909. He taught at the seminary for over five decades and influenced generations of Conservative rabbis. He was one of the founders of the New York Kehillah; he organized the first synagogue center, the Jewish Center, in 1917; and he founded the Society for the Advancement of Judaism in 1922, The Reconstructionist magazine in 1935, and the Jewish Reconstructionist Foundation in 1940. Kaplan's first major work, Judaism as a Civilization (New York, 1934), criticized all current Jewish approaches as based on an inadequate understanding of Jewish civilization. Drawing upon American philosophical pragmatism, the cultural Zionism of 'Aḥad ha-'Am, and the sociology of Durkheim and Gittings, Kaplan defined Judaism as the "evolving religious civilization of the Jewish people," one that has been continuously adapted to the historical contexts in which Jews have found themselves. He argued that Jewish survival in modern Western culture similarly depends on the reconstruction of Jewish life in response to unprecedented challenges. Judaism is more than a faith or an ethic, he asserted. Jewish civilization, in all of its historical stages, has included the totality of Jewish culture: land, language, polity, arts. It has been transmitted in the context of Jewish communities that have been governed by Jewish law, and in which the language, culture, and governance have all been Jewish. Thus, he saw the political emancipation of the Jews as a critical challenge, since citizens of nations now had a choice about living in Jewish communities and, in any case, were integrated into the greater national culture. He sought to reconstruct Judaism in America to make it speak to the concerns of modern Jews. To do so, he articulated a theology of religious naturalism, defining God as "the process that makes for salvation" and not a miraculous intervener in history. He saw Jewish religion as embracing the cumulative quest of the Jewish people for a meaningful existence. He remained traditional in his ritual practice and developed a method of reevaluation, in which the values and insights embedded in seemingly arcane rituals are abstracted and then expressed in a contemporary idiom. Thus, the practices are preserved while the intention is reinterpreted. The Sabbath Prayer Book (Jewish Reconstructionist Foundation, 1945) and other liturgical works that Kaplan coedited retain most of the words of the traditional liturgy, but the text has been changed to avoid affirming belief in the Jews as the chosen people, resurrection of the dead, or a personal Messiah. Kaplan introduced the *bat mitsvah ceremony in the early 1920s. His other writings include The Meaning of God in Modern Jewish Religion (1937); A New Zionism (1955); and The Religion of Ethical Nationhood: Judaism's Contribution to World Peace (1970).

KAPPARAH. See ATONEMENT.

KAPPAROT (קַפָּרוֹת, expiations), a custom performed on the morning preceding Yom Kippur (or before), by which the sins of an individual are symbolically transferred to a live fowl. The fowl is taken in the right hand, and verses are recited from Psalms (107.17–20) and Job (33.23–24). After the recitation, the fowl is waved around the head while the following is said three times: "This is my substitute, this is my redemption. This rooster shall be killed, while I shall be admitted to and allowed a long, happy, and peaceful life." A cock is used by a man, a hen by a woman. Nowadays many who practice kapparot use eighteen coins (in Hebrew the numerical value of the word life) instead of a fowl. The fowl or the money is then given to charity. The custom may be ancient but is not mentioned before the geonic period (9th cent.) and may have arisen in Babylonia, where an analogous ritual of casting a basket filled with seeds into a river was sometimes performed. Several authorities (e.g., Shelomoh ben Avraham Adret, Nahmanides) opposed the practice because of its pagan character, and even the sixteenth-century codifier and kabbalist Yosef Karo dismissed it as a "foolish practice," but because of the weight of opinion and tradition, and kabbalistic influence in particular, the custom is still practiced in certain circles. The negative ruling in the first edition of Karo's Shulhan 'Arukh (Venice, 1565) was omitted in all later printings of the work.

KARA, YOSEF (born c.1065), northern French commentator on the Bible and on piyyutim*. He lived in Worms and Troyes, and studied with both his paternal uncle Menahem ben Helbo and with Rashi. He wrote commentaries on almost all the books of the Bible, although many of these have not been printed. These commentaries reveal his focus on the peshat* method of interpretation, in which reference to rabbinic literature is avoided when explaining difficulties in biblical language. Kara engaged in debate with Christian scholars, and his responsa are included in collections of Jewish polemics. He also wrote commentaries on the religious poetry used by Franco-German Jewry.

KARAITES (Scripturalists), a religious group that developed a system of Jewish law independent of the Talmud. Karaite roots may be traced to eighth-century Babylonia when, according to rabbinic (i.e., non-Karaite) traditions, *Anan ben David is said to have founded the new religion after having failed to obtain the position of exilarch. Karaites claim that their form of Judaism is the original one and that evidence of its premedieval existence can be found among certain Second Temple groups (such as the one known today as the *Qumran community). 'Anan, according to Karaite belief, merely revitalized this ancient Jewish group. Whatever 'Anan's actual role, most scholars agree that Karaism as it has developed since the ninth century has very little to do with 'Anan's teaching and that 'Anan was apparently appropriated (because of his presumed Davidic lineage) by later Karaites in an attempt to give the group greater legitimacy.

Strong Karaite communities developed in the early Middle Ages, but they were never as great a threat to rabbinic Judaism as is commonly believed (*Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on is credited with repulsing this threat). Karaism flourished between the late ninth century and the eleventh century. During that golden age, Karaite practices and beliefs were firmly established by such luminaries from Erets Yisra'el as Daniyye'l ben Mosheh al-*Qumisi (who called for immigration to Erets Yisra'el); *Salmon ben Yeruham and *Sahl ben Matsliaḥ (Karaite propagandists); *Yefet ben 'Ali (foremost Karaite commentator on the Bible whose work influenced such Rabbinites as Avraham *ibn Ezra); and Yosef ben Avraham *Basir and his student *Yeshu'a ben Yehudah (philosophers and legal authorities).

As a result of the destruction of the Karaite community in Erets Yisra'el in the wake of the First Crusade in 1099, the Karaite center of activity moved to Byzantium, where it remained until the sixteenth century. Migration patterns brought Karaites to the Crimean peninsula and eventually to Lithuania and parts of Poland. Whereas Karaites in Muslim countries maintained their identity as part of the Jewish people, Karaites in Christian Europe, beginning in the late eighteenth century in czarist Russia, denied their affinity to Jews, mainly in order to avoid restrictions placed upon Jews. By the time of the Holocaust, Karaites in Europe had forged a sufficiently separate identity to escape much of the persecution. This separate identity, however, has brought with it an almost total dissolution of Karaism in eastern Europe.

The one remaining significant Karaite community is in Israel, made up mostly of immigrants from Egypt (where the ancient Karaite community has been reduced to a handful of individuals). Their number is estimated at between twenty thousand and twenty-five thousand people in Israel with major centers in Ramla and Ashdod. Small communities also can be found in Istanbul, Turkey; France; and the United States (mostly in the San Francisco Bay area).

Major differences in practice exist between Karaites and Rabbinites. The Karaite calendar is calculated according to the actual phases of the moon, resulting in slight differences in dates from the Rabbinite calendar; there is no restriction on which day of the week a holiday can fall (except for Shavu'ot, which is always on Sunday), and biblical holidays (including Ro'sh ha-Shanah) are observed for only one day both in and out of Erets Yisra'el. Hanukkah is not recognized since it is a post-biblical holiday. Milk and meat are not eaten at the same meal; however, the same dishes are used. Since the fifteenth century, Karaites have allowed the kindling of lights before the Sabbath (without a blessing) to provide light on the Sabbath, but they still prohibit sexual relations and the preparation of hot food on the Sabbath. The Karaite liturgy is totally different from the Rabbinite one, and prayer is marked by removal of shoes and full genuflection in synagogues devoid of chairs. Tefillin are not worn.

Because of different marriage and divorce laws, intermarriage between Karaites and Rabbinites, though it has occurred, has always been problematic. To this day, Ashkenazim, following the ruling of R. Mosheh *Isserles (16th cent.), generally refrain from such intermarriages. Sephardim, however, may follow the ruling of *David ben Shelomoh ibn Avi Zimra (16th cent.), who permitted such unions. In Israel today Karaites have no de jure control over personal status, but the state informally recognizes Karaite marriages and divorces as long as both partners are Karaites and willing to accept the authority of the Karaite court.

KARAKASANI. See QIROISANI, YAQUB.

KARELITZ, AVRAHAM YESHA'YAHU (1878–1953), Talmudic scholar, popularly known as the Hazon Ish (Vision of a Man; ish [man] being an acronym of his name), after the title of his published writings. Born in Kosov, in the Russian province of Grodno, Karelitz received his education from his father, the town rabbi. He never held any official position, but devoted himself entirely to Talmudic study, supporting himself first from the proceeds of a store run by his wife, and later from the sale of his books. In 1911 his first work, on a section of the Shulhan 'Arukh, Oraḥ Hayyim, appeared anonymously under the title Hazon Ish, and made a strong impact on the rabbinic world in general and in particular on R. Hayyim 'Ozer Grodzinski, communal rabbi of Vilna and the leading rabbinic authority in eastern Europe. When Karelitz moved to Vilna in 1920, he was consulted by Grodzinski on all religious and communal matters. In 1933, Karelitz moved to Erets Yisra'el and settled in Bene Beraq. He quickly emerged as the unchallenged spiritual authority of the Haredi (non-Zionist strictly Orthodox) community in the country, and, after the death of Grodzinski in 1940, of the Haredi community the world over.

Karelitz's twenty-three volumes of halakhic writings (Vilna [vols. 1–7] and Jerusalem [vols. 8–23], 1911–1953) are characterized by their practical orientation. Soon after settling in Bene Beraq, he issued rulings on such issues as the proper mode of observance of the Jewish agricultural laws (in particular the laws of the sabbatical year), the problem of milking on the Sabbath, and the determination of the international date line. These rulings were accepted as binding by the Haredi community, and even influenced circles of the non-Haredi Orthodox. Karelitz also guided the Haredi community in its relationship with the newly established State of Israel. While strongly opposed to Zionism, including Religious Zionism, Karelitz urged the Haredi camp to accept the state de facto and participate in Israeli elections in the Knesset in order to further its religious interests.

In his collection of letters, Kovets Iggerot (3 vols. [Bene Beraq, 1954–1956, 1990]) and his pietistic work, Emunah u-Vittahon (Bene Beraq, 1954), Karelitz contended that the only path to ethical and spiritual perfection is exclusive devotion to Torah study, in particular the study of Jewish law, and by the unreserved submission to, and precise observance of, the rigorous and uncompromising demands of that law.

KARET (כָּרַת; cut off), a divinely imposed punishment for violations of Jewish law that usually involve transgressions that occur in private without the presence of witnesses. The punishment is left to God, not human beings, and the term karet refers to being cut off from God and the ability to communicate with him. There is a difference of opinion as to whether it consists of premature death or childlessness (see Lv. 20.20). Examples of such transgressions include consuming blood (Lv. 7.25), committing certain sexually deviant acts (Lv. 20.17), not sanctifying Yom Kippur (Lv. 23.29), and not eating matsah on Pesah (Ex. 12.15). Others note that this spiritual excommunication must be linked to the failure to circumcise (Gn. 17.13), which is also punished by karet. Avraham ibn Ezra (commenting on Lv. 15.29) notes that because of the severity of these crimes, the threat of karet is license for capital punishment.

KARLIN, name of a Hasidic dynasty with its center in Karlin and Stolin near Pinsk. Its founder was Aharon the Great (1736–1772), who was a disciple of Dov Ber of Mezhirech. The descendants and disciples of R. Aharon founded other, related Hasidic dynasties, such as those from Lyakhovichi, Kobrin, and Slonim. While most of these Hasidim and their leaders were killed in the Holocaust, some groups continue to have adherents in the United States and Israel. The heyday of the Karlin Hasidim was during the period of R. Aharon ben Asher (1802–1872), when as many as three or four thousand Hasidim would come to Karlin on the Shalosh Regalim.

KARO, YOSEF (1488–1575), Talmudic authority, codifier of rabbinic law, and kabbalist. Born (probably in Portugal) of a Toledo family of eminent rabbinic scholars, he was orphaned as a child and brought up by his uncle Yitsḥaq, who had himself lost all his children. He seems to have left the Iberian Peninsula at an early age, but it is impossible to reconstruct his movements and places of study; he may have studied in Egypt in the academy of R. Ya'aqov *Berab, to whom he refers as "my master" and from whom he received *ordination in 1538. The early part of his career was spent in Greece (then part of the Ottoman empire), Adrianople, Nicopolis, and possibly Salonika, where he was in close contact with leading scholars, pietists, and kabbalists, including Yosef Taitazak, Mosheh ben Ya'aqov Cordovero, and Shelomoh Alkabez, and where he soon gained a reputation as a leading rabbinic authority. In 1522 he began writing his monumental Beit Yosef, on which he continued to work after settling in Safed in Upper Galilee in 1536. The work was finished in 1542, but Karo devoted more years to a revision of this magnum opus, which confirmed his standing as the most eminent scholar and rabbinic authority of his age. The Beit Yosef is written in the form of a commentary on the code of *Ya'aqov ben Asher, the Arba'ah Turim, which (unlike Maimonides' code, Mishneh Torah) does not simply state rabbinic law, paragraph by paragraph, but summarizes the views of earlier authorities. Hence, Ya'aqov ben Asher's code lent itself admirably as a basis for a detailed critical survey and digest of the whole immense corpus of halakhic literature, on the basis of which Karo then formulated his definitive rulings. It has been frequently published in editions of the Arba'ah Turim. These were presented again, in simpler form and without discussion, in his shorter code Shulḥan 'Arukh*, which, being accessible to laymen, soon established itself as the standard formulation of rabbinic law and religious observance for subsequent generations, including present-day Orthodoxy, especially after R. Mosheh *Isserles of Kraków added glosses incorporating divergences in Ashkenazi customs. Karo also wrote a commentary, Qesef Mishneh (Venice, 1574–1575), on the code of Maimonides. His legal responsa were printed posthumously (Salonika, 1598, 1791). In Safed, Karo was soon recognized as the leading authority of this remarkable community, although most of the time he was also engaged in fierce controversies with another halakhic authority, Mosheh di Trani (see Trani Family). Karo was also involved in the great controversy triggered by Berab's abortive attempt to renew ordination.

Karo was a central figure in the circle of kabbalistic pietists and charismatics that had formed in Adrianople, Salonika, and other centers in Turkey and flourished in Safed and that combined extreme asceticism with messianic yearning. The meteoric career of Shelomoh Molkho (whom Karo may have met in Salonika), his intense charismatic life, and his martyr's death at the stake profoundly influenced Karo's spiritual life, which was marked by an unusual yearning for martyrdom. Over more than four decades, Karo maintained he was visited, mostly at night, by a celestial mentor (maggid), identified as the personified Mishnah as well as shekhiḥah. Karo wrote down these revelations in an intimate mystical diary. A minor part that survived was published in edited form under the title Maggid Meisharim (Amsterdam, 1708). The authenticity of this diary has been disputed by many historians who do not accept the idea that the lucid legalist scholar also was the subject of nocturnal heavenly visitations.

KASHER (כָּשֵׁר; fit, proper; Ashkenazi pronunciation, kosher), food prepared in accordance with the dietary laws; in this sense, the opposite of terefah. The term can be used to designate the ritual fitness of any object according to Jewish law, such as a shofar, tefillin, a lulav*, or a migveh*. Kasher is also used as a verb; one is said, for example, to kasher vessels, and the ritual preparation of meat is also commonly described as kashering. In many states of the United States, in some European countries, and in the State of Israel, the term is legally protected, and merchants or food dispensers who advertise their products as kasher may be prosecuted if they violate the rabbinic requirements. A modern development has been the introduction of degrees of kashrut (i.e., the state of being kasher). The strictly Orthodox insist on their food products being glatt-kosher or kosher le-mehadderin, terms attesting to an even more meticulous supervision. In the United States, foods classified as "kosher-style" resemble familiar Jewish products but have not necessarily been produced under rabbinic supervision.

KASHER, MENAHEM (1895–1983), scholar of Talmudic and rabbinic literature. Born in Warsaw, Kasher studied under prominent rabbis in Poland and was ordained in 1915. He moved to Palestine in 1925 as an emissary of the Ger Hasidic dynasty, on whose behalf he founded the yeshivah Sefat Emet in Jerusalem, which he headed for two years.

Kasher was a prolific scholar, producing several comprehensive anthologies. His best-known work is the Torah Shelemah, an encyclopedia of the Talmud and Midrash, in which material from the oral law is collected and organized according to biblical verse, together with notes and supplemental material. Between 1927 and 1992, forty-three volumes were published. Other important compilations include Haggadah Shelemah (1956), devoted to the Pesah Haggadah with variant readings, notes, and relevant homiletic comments; and Gemara' Shelemah (1960), which contains manuscripts and medieval commentaries dealing with the first nine pages of the Talmudic tractate Pesahim.

Kasher also wrote extensively about the halakhic aspects of such contemporary issues as artificial insemination.

nation and autopsies. Many of these writings appeared in No'am, an annual publication that was founded in 1958 and edited by Kasher.

KATZ, AVRAHAM BEN ALEKSANDER (died 1810), Hasidic rabbi. A disciple of Dov Ber of Mezhirech, Hasidic legend has it that he had previously been a student of the Vilna Ga'on. By 1768 Avraham was the leader of a group of Hasidim in a province of Vitebsk, Belorussia. He was a leading participant in the meeting of Hasidic leaders in the aftermath of the bans of excommunication in 1772. In 1777 he joined Menahem Mendel of Vitebsk at the head of some three hundred Jews who immigrated to Palestine, settling first in Safed and later in Tiberias. Menahem Mendel and Avraham continued to instruct the followers they had left behind in epistles, and their Hasidim in Europe in turn raised funds to support the colony in Galilee.

Avraham stressed the centrality of continuous attachment to divinity and the value of simple faith. He and his followers were accused (by Shneur Zalman of Lyady in the course of a dispute many years later) of provoking the first bans of excommunication by their extreme behavior—turning somersaults in the streets and mocking and insulting the rabbis—thus helping to create the division between Hasidim and *Mitnaggedim. His criticism of Shneur Zalman's book, Tanya ("too much oil may extinguish the flame"), probably contributed to the crystallization of Habad as a distinct Hasidic group. His Sefer Hased le-Avraham was published in Lwów in 1851.

KATZENELLENBOGEN, ME'IR BEN YITSHAQ (1473–1565), Italian rabbinic scholar; also known as Maharam of Padua. His halakhic writings emphasize the teachings of the *ri'shonim; his responsa are succinct, analytical, and clear and do not enter into pilpul, although he was a pupil of Ya'aqov *Pollak, a noted pilpulist. Katzenellenbogen was a recognized poseq while still a student in Padua, where he continued as rabbi and av beit din of the Venetian republic. He was noted for his moderation and modesty and the fatherly interest he took in the students of his yeshivah in Padua. He advised his colleagues not to reach their decisions hastily and to be respectful of their fellow judges and of the public, while at the same time standing firm once decisions were reached. He strengthened the ability of the courts to arbitrate disputes. His responsa were published with those of his teacher Yehudah *Mintz (Venice, 1553). Katzenellenbogen issued taqqanot, including one in which he ruled that semikhah should be given by three sages so as to strengthen the authority of the newly ordained rabbi.

KAUFMANN, DAVID (1852–1899), scholar of Jewish philosophy. Born in Moravia, he studied at the Breslau Rabbinical Seminary and received a Ph.D. from the University of Leipzig in 1874 with a dissertation on religious philosophy. In 1877 he was appointed professor at the Budapest Rabbinical Seminary, where he remained until his death. Kaufmann was a prolific scholar who wrote twenty-six books and over five hundred articles and reviews on many areas of Jewish scholarship. He is noted for his influential study of Jewish and Muslim religious philosophy in the Middle Ages, Geschichte der Attributenlehre in der jüdischen Religionsphilosophie des Mittelalters von Saadja bis Maimuni (1877–1878). He discovered and published the memoirs of Glückel of Hameln, one of the most important sources documenting Jewish social life in the seventeenth century. Kaufmann was also a pioneering scholar of Jewish art, cofounding the Gesellschaft für Sammlung und Konservierung von Kunst- und historischen Denkmälern des Judentums in Vienna in 1896.

KAUFMANN, YEHEZKEL (1889–1963), historian, biblical scholar, and essayist on Jewish nationalism and Zionist ideology. Born in the Ukraine, Kaufmann studied in Odessa, Saint Petersburg, and Berne and in 1928 immigrated to Palestine, where he taught at the Re'ali School in Haifa and, after 1949, at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. His first major work, Golah ve-Nekhar (1929–1930), is an interpretation of the forces and dilemmas in Jewish survival from the perspective of historical sociology. His Toledot ha-'Emunah ha-Yisra'elit (8 vols. [1937–1956]; translated and abridged by Moshe Greenberg as The Religion of Israel [Chicago, 1960]) is an explication of the historical uniqueness and antiquity of Israelite monotheism.

According to Kaufmann, Israelite radical monotheism was not a gradual evolution of paganism but a revolutionary intuition of Israelite culture from the time of Moses, which gave rise to a religion devoid of true mythology and possessing no theogony or theomachy. The prophetic misinterpretation of idols as fetishes made by human hands was a result of this monotheistic understanding of the world, one way in which the classical prophets from Amos on developed the implications of biblical faith. The universalistic potential of biblical ideas was actualized in Jewish proselytism of the late Second Temple period. Christianity developed out of the individualistic side of first-century apocalyptic Judaism, gradually severing its bond from the Jewish people but not from its monotheistic roots.

Contrary to the Jewish secular nationalists of his time, Kaufmann believed it was religion and not a supposed national will to survive that preserved the Jewish people in exile throughout the centuries. But religion, he held, could no longer serve that function in modern times. The painful need for an end to Jewish alienation could be resolved only with the creation of a Jewish homeland.

KAVOD (כְּבוֹד), a term with social, moral, and theological implications derived from the Hebrew root for weight, meaning honor, respect, reverence, importance, distinction, or glory. A person gives kavod (honor) to God (Jos. 7.19), and God is the kavod (glory) of those who believe in him (Ps. 3.4); Israel was created for God's kavod, that is to glorify him (Is. 43.7). More particularly, the term refers to God's power and majesty and is often connected with the appearance of divine light: "The glory [kavod] of the Lord was like devouring fire" (Ex. 24.17); "so was the appearance of the brightness round about. That was the appearance of the likeness of the glory [kavod] of the Lord" (Ez 1.28). As the visible and luminous manifestation of the divine, the kavod was considered by some medieval schools as a distinct creation. The doctrine of the "created kavod" draws on the philosophical theology of *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on and was further developed by the *Hasidei Ashkenaz. The new Jewish Publication Society translation of the Bible uses the word presence in place of the earlier glory in many instances where the nature of the divine appearance is not specified. KAZYONNY RAVVIN (Rus.; official rabbi), government-appointed official in czarist Russia responsible for regulating Jewish communal life. In its attempt to "modernize" and control the Jews of Russia, the Russian government in 1857 ordered all Jewish communities to elect rabbis in accordance with criteria set by the government. In practice, anyone who had a few years of formal schooling in a Russian primary school could apply for such a post, even if his religious training was rudimentary. These "rabbis" had almost no influence, devoid as most were of the requisite rabbinic training. Furthermore, the fact that they had to be reelected periodically to their posts left them open to the manipulation of various individuals and groups, further decreasing their influence. Among the Jews, these officials were referred to—generally contemptuously—as rabbanim mi-ta'am, "rabbis on behalf [of the authorities]." The "rabbis" nevertheless played a certain role in representing their communities to the Russian authorities, keeping records of births, marriages, and deaths, and even delivering addresses praising the czar. The office was abolished with the Russian Revolution of 1917.

KELAL YISRA'EL (כְּלָל יִשְׂרָאֵל; community of Israel), a phrase, though rarely found in rabbinical sources, that is widely used to convey the concept of what has been called "catholic Israel," that is, the totality of the Jewish people as one indivisible unit with a common destiny. The rabbis stress that "all Jews are responsible for each other" (Shev. 39a). The underlying idea is expressed in a Midrash that compares the "four species to the four types of Jews who make up the community—those who have both Torah and good works, those who possess only one or the other of them, and those who are completely devoid of any virtue. "Yet I cannot destroy them," the Midrash has God say; "let them all be bound together and they will complement one another and atone for one another" (Lv. Rab. 30.9–12). The concept of kelal Yisra'el played a central role in the thought of Solomon *Schechter and in Conservative Judaism.

KELIM (כֵּלִים; Vessels), first tractate in Mishnah order Tohorot, consisting of thirty chapters, with related material in the Tosefta. There is no corresponding gemara in either the Talmud Bavli or Yerushalmi. The tractate opens with a general introduction to the laws of ritual impurity, listing ten ascending levels of impurity, culminating in the most severe of all sources of impurity, the body of a dead person. The first chapter continues with a list of ten ascending levels of impurity that emanate from the human body and then enumerates the ten ascending levels of sanctity within Erets Yisra'el, which correspond to the levels of purity and sanctity demanded of one who would enter the Temple and finally the Holy of Holies.

The other twenty-nine chapters of the tractate deal with the minutely detailed laws governing the ritual uncleanness contracted by various types of utensils, as stipulated in Leviticus (11.32ff.) and Numbers (19.14ff.). Kelim follows the biblical differentiation among wooden, clay, and metal utensils, regarding conditions both for the contraction of impurity and for the purification process. The meticulous attention devoted by Kelim to classification of a broad array of utensils attests to the vitality and significance of the laws of ritual impurity in the daily lives and households of Jews during the Mishnaic period. The laws of impurity imbued even mundane activities, such as eating, with a sense of sanctity and regulated social groupings within the Jewish community and social intercourse among them. Kelim is a rich source of information on the everyday life and realia of the Mishnaic period.

Kelim was translated into English by Herbert Danby in The Mishnah (Oxford, 1933).

KENESET HA-GEDOLAH (בְּנֵי־הָעֵדֻת; Great Assembly), according to rabbinic tradition, a gathering originally convened by Ezra and his associates in order to promulgate various rulings and conclude a covenant as reported in Nehemiah 8–10. According to Avot 1.1, the Men of the Great Assembly, followed by Shim'on ha-Tsaddiq (fl. 200), came between the prophets and the pairs (the immediate forerunners to the tannaitic sages; see ZUGOT). On the basis of this and related Talmudic traditions, the Keneset ha-Gedolah has been described as a spiritual and legislative institution of supreme authority that governed the postexilic community of Erets Yisra'el throughout the Persian period (approximately 300 years). In the absence of historical sources for the Persian period, this account cannot be substantiated, and even relatively late Talmudic traditions do not support it. In the earliest rabbinic texts, the term refers only to the Great Assembly mentioned in Nehemiah 8–10, a single transitional generation (hence, the rabbinic phrase "the generation of the Men of the Great Assembly") bridging the worlds of biblical and post-biblical Judaism that lasted only thirty-four years. The Talmudic sages attributed a number of key enactments to the Men of the Great Assembly: they are said to have composed the books of Ezekiel, Daniel, Esther, and the twelve Minor Prophets; to have instituted the 'Amidah and its thrice daily repetition, Qiddush and Havdalah, and the benedictions before the performance of commandments and before and after meals; and to have initiated the public reading of the Torah at specified times. Finally, they are credited with the threefold division of the oral law into the fields of midrash, halakhah, and aggadah. These traditions reflect the assumption of the Talmudic sages that the final form of the biblical text and the characteristic elements of later Pharisaic-rabbinic Judaism came into being during the Persian period. Some scholars view the assembly in Nehemiah 8–10 as a model for assemblies throughout the Persian period or the forerunner of institutions known from the Second Temple period, for example, the *gerousia or the Hasmonean hever.

KENESET YISRA'EL (בְּנֵי־יִשְׂרָאֵל; assembly [cf. Gr. ekklesia] of Israel), a phrase often used homiletically in the Midrash as a synonym for the Jewish people as a collective whole, usually in a spiritual sense. More or less identical with "Israel," keneset Yisra'el is used to emphasize the characteristics that distinguish the Jewish people as a separate entity and in its special relationship with God. Midrashic literature abounds in references portraying keneset Yisra'el as speaking to or pleading before God, and interprets the Song of Songs* as a dialogue of love between God, the groom; and keneset Yisra'el, the bride. The rabbinic concept of an earthly community that is at the same time spiritual and heavenly seems to have influenced the Christian theological concept of "church." The symbol of keneset Yisra'el also played an important role in Kabbalah, where it is identified with the tenth sefirah (see SEFIROT), the *Shekhinah.

KERITOT (כְּרִיתוֹת; Excisions), tractate in Mishnah order Qodashim, consisting of seven chapters, with related material in the Tosefta' and the Talmud Bavli. The tractate deals with the laws of sin offerings (see PURIFICATION OFFERING), which are required as atonement for those who have inadvertently transgressed prohibitions bearing the divine punishment of karet* (excision). Biblical law mandates different forms of sin offerings for different transgressions (Lv. 4–5) as well as sin offerings that serve as part of a process of purification, such as the sin offering of a woman who has given birth (Lv. 12.5–8). Keritot defines those occasions for which one is obligated to make a sacrifice, concentrating on issues such as multiple births and multiple or combined transgressions. Keritot analyzes the role of objective and subjective factors in defining a series of transgressions as one continuous act or as discrete actions.

The Talmud tractate was translated by Israel Porush in the Soncino Talmud (London, 1948).

KETER (כֵּתֶר; crown). In the Bible, the word is found only in the Book of Esther (1.11, 2.17, 6.8), referring to the royal diadem. It came to be used metaphorically for the highest virtues (cf. "crowning glory" in English), a symbol of excellence. Avot 4.17 lists the "crown of the Torah," the "crown of royalty," and the "crown of priesthood" but finds that the "crown of a good name" outweighs the others. The keter Torah (crown of the Torah) is the symbol of learning. Unlike the crown of royalty and the crown of priesthood, the keter Torah can be acquired by anyone, regardless of birth or descent. This phrase is also applied to the ornate crowns that decorate the synagogal Torah scrolls. The keter Torah, usually made of silver, has two sockets into which the tops of the Torah rollers are inserted.

Keter malkhut (crown of royalty) is a phrase representing the enthronement of God by angels and human beings, not so much through their acceptance of his sovereignty but by "crowning" him with praise. The Talmud (Hag. 13b) describes Sandalfon, one of the archangels, as standing behind the divine chariot and "binding crowns on the head of his maker." Similarly Yalqut Yesha'yahu 272 states, "Daily the heavenly angels crown the holy one, blessed be he, with the threefold *qedushah" (see Is. 6.3), and a midrash states that the angels take the words of prayer and praise uttered by Israel and weave them into a crown for the supreme king of kings (Ex. Rab. 21.4). Shelomoh *ibn Gabirol titled his great poem in praise of God "Keter Malkhut"; other poets used the same title for similar compositions. Keter Malkhut poems, particularly Ibn Gabirol's, are frequently recited after the evening service of Yom Kippur.

Precious Bible manuscripts, carefully written and revised, were also called ketarim by Jews in the Muslim world, the best known being the tenth-century Keter of Aleppo, the oldest copy of the authorized Masoretic Text of the Bible.

KETUBBAH (כְּתוּבָה; writ), a legal document containing a statement of the obligations that the bridegroom undertakes toward his bride and that in rabbinic law is a prerequisite to marriage. The Aramaic language in which it is composed indicates its post-biblical origin. In biblical times the husband acquired the bride by paying a sum of money (mohar). At some stage (possibly during the Babylonian exile or following the return to Jerusalem in the 6th cent. BCE) the document was instituted for the economic protection of a divorced or widowed woman. Initially the text was not fixed, since the economic clauses varied with each case. The oldest known ketubbah was discovered in the Jewish settlement of Elephantine and dates from 440 BCE, while a second-century CE example has been found among the Dead Sea Scrolls. The first specific literary reference to a marriage document is in Tobit 7.19. Rabbi Shim'on ben Shetaḥ (2d cent. BCE) is said to have had a hand in the formulation of the document (Ket. 82b), which has essentially remained unchanged through the ages. Only the date is written in Hebrew, though in some periods a translation was appended, and today a summary in the vernacular is often read by the officiant. The Talmud discusses whether the institution of the ketubbah rests on biblical or rabbinic authority (Ket. 11). Originally it was not read aloud but was given to the bride (Shulḥan 'Arukh, Even ha'Ezer 66.1), who kept it as a statement of her rights; subsequently, it became customary to read it aloud as part of the wedding ceremony (Shulḥan 'Arukh, Even ha'Ezer 62.6).

The financial obligations assumed by the husband in the ketubbah were also meant to serve as an impediment to hasty divorce (Ket. 11a). Under the terms of the ketubbah the husband is legally responsible for the proper support of his wife; in the event of divorce, she is to receive monetary compensation and in the case of widowhood has a claim on his estate.

The ketubbah is prepared before the wedding ceremony. Formerly the officiating rabbi wrote it out shortly before the beginning of the ceremony. In modern times, the form is usually printed, leaving the date and other relevant details to be filled in. It is traditionally signed by two male witnesses not related to the bride, the groom, or each other; in some communities (including Israel), it is also signed by the bridegroom. The groom performs an act of qinyan (see ACQUISITION) as well, a symbolic acceptance of the listed obligations. The bride or her family keeps the ketubbah as legal proof of her husband's obligations toward her. In certain Muslim lands, it was customary to add to the ketubbah a second legal document recording a special gift by the groom to his bride. In Morocco, the distinguished genealogies of the couple were frequently appended to the document.

Under the provisions of the ketubbah the minimum amount payable to a widow or divorcee who was a virgin at the time of marriage was two hundred zuzim. Estimates suggest that this was sufficient to support a family for one year. If the bride had been a widow or divorcee, the amount payable was one hundred zuzim. The ketubbah also specified the dowry and the tosefet (addition) that the bridegroom undertook to repay in the event of divorce (or decease), beyond the legal requirements. The custom at present is to double the amount of the dowry for a previously unmarried woman (always the equivalent of a hundred silver pieces; fifty silver pieces for divorcees or widows). Both the real and personal property of the husband are under lien to the wife should a ketubbah settlement become necessary.

The tradition of adding tena'im (conditions) has been revived in modern times, and the Israeli chief rabbinate has sanctioned several such appendices. The Rabbinical Assembly of the Conservative movement has introduced a ketubbah in English containing an additional clause in which the bride and groom pledge to appear before a rabbinic court in the event of any dispute between them. The purpose of this provision is to enable the rabbinic authorities to counsel couples in marital difficulty and to ensure that all regulations concerning *divorce will be followed if the marriage is eventually dissolved. The couple also undertake to abide by decisions of the rabbinic court, thereby preventing problems that arise when a husband refuses to grant his wife a divorce to which she is entitled. In recent years, egalitarian marriage certificates have been introduced, specifying mutual obligations and omitting the traditional financial and legal details.

The ketubbah became one of the favorite objects of Jewish art. Illuminated marriage contracts are to be found from many lands, and there is evidence that the artists were often non-Jews. Most historical ketubbot are from Sephardi communities in Europe (examples from Italy and Holland are outstanding) and North Africa, but there are some Ashkenazi examples from eastern Europe. European examples often portray appropriate biblical scenes and sometimes even the bride and groom. Other favorite motifs include cherubim and kissing birds, as well as traditional Jewish symbols. Ketubbot from Muslim lands tend to be written on paper, not parchment as was usual elsewhere. The ornamentation is often nonrepresentational. Recent decades have seen a renaissance of illuminated ketubbot. Sometimes the bride and groom design and execute their own ketubbah. The regulations concerning the marriage document are codified in Talmud tractate Ketubbot*.

KETUBBOT (קְטוּבּוֹת; Marriage Contracts), tractate in Mishnah order Nashim, consisting of thirteen chapters, with related material in the Tosefta' and both Talmuds Bavli and Yerushalmi. The tractate deals with the marital and financial rights and obligations of husband and wife, focusing particularly on those obligations contained in the ketubbah* document. The most basic stipulation in the ketubbah is the *dowry payment from husband to wife, corresponding to the biblical mohar (Gn. 34.12; Ex. 22.16). In rabbinic times, this payment was made after dissolution of the marriage and served to protect the wife against hasty or arbitrary divorce (Ket. 39b). Virginity was highly prized, ensuring the purity and primacy of the bond between husband and wife; hence, the fixed bridal sum for a virgin was set at two hundred zuzim (approximately 960 grams of silver), while the sum for a nonvirgin was set at one hundred zuzim (approximately 480 grams). Other ketubbah stipulations include the right of the wife to financial support and conjugal relations at reasonable intervals, depending on the husband's profession, and the right of the husband to expect the wife to manage household affairs and to maintain decent standards of modesty. The regulation of rights, obligations, and expectations within the marriage was regarded as an essential component of marital stability, leading R. Me'ir to remark that a husband who tampered with the financial obligations mandated by the ketubbah was regarded as though he were engaging in fornication (Ket. 5.1).

KHAZARS, a tribe of Turkish origin that lived along the lower Volga region. From the eighth through the tenth century, they reached the zenith of their power, and during this period a Judaizing movement took place among them. King Bulan, together with some four thousand nobles, adopted the Jewish faith, probably about 730, and although Muslims, Christians, and pagans formed the great majority of the population and were granted internal autonomy, the state religion was Judaism.

Hisdai ibn Shaprut, vizier to 'Abdar-Rahman III of Cordova, is said to have established contact with the then reigning king Joseph by sending him a letter written by Menahem ben Saruq (c.960). In his reply, the king gave details concerning the conversion of his ancestor and other information about the state. Doubts have been expressed about the authenticity of the letters. They appear as a preface to *Yehudah ha-Levi's Kuzari (i.e., Khazars, which uses the historical incident of the king's conversion as the framework for an imaginary dialogue between the king and a Jewish sage). The power of the Khazars declined following a Russian attack in 965 and was broken by Archduke Jaroslav in 1083. The Khazars disappeared following the Tatar invasion of 1237.

KIBBUTZ FESTIVALS. The early nature festivals of the kibbutz originated in the 1930s. Ancient agricultural celebrations were renewed by tying them into the Zionist values of tilling the soil and settling on the land. Appropriate ceremonies, which linked the biblical and post-biblical past, when Jewish farmers worked the land, with contemporary settlers, included attempts to celebrate a water drawing festival, a sheep-shearing festival, an 'omer-cutting ceremony, and a love festival on Tu be-'Av. In most cases, these did not stand the test of time. Experience showed that only the traditional holidays with a continuous history of practice could be successfully adapted to the secular kibbutz society.

Festivals are observed on the Israeli kibbutzim without synagogues, rabbis, cantors, or prayer (with the exception of Orthodox kibbutzim, which follow traditional observance). Pesah, the festival of freedom, is the holiday that has been most successfully absorbed into kibbutz life, with many kibbutzim writing their own Haggadot (see HAGGADAH OF PESAH). The High Holy Days lack the historical and national perspective of the Shalosh Regalim or of Hanukkah and Purim. Indeed, Ro'sh ha-Shanah and Yom Kippur were not initially observed at all.

Agricultural values, though still strong, are being eroded by the growth of industry in Israel. Today the entire Jewish calendar is being progressively included in the kibbutz festival cycle as questions of Jewish identity increasingly appear on the kibbutz agenda.

KIDNAPPING. The biblical law "He that steals a man, and sell him, or if he be found in his hand, he shall surely be put to death" (Ex. 21.16; cf. Dt. 24.7) marks kidnapping as a capital offense. The Talmud, as well as some modern scholars, considers the eighth commandment of the Decalogue to refer not to the stealing of property but to kidnapping (San. 86a). To be subject to capital punishment the following four conditions had to be present: the kidnapper had actually to have taken the abducted person into his possession or domain, thus depriving that person of personal liberty; the kidnapper had to have sold the captive as a slave; the sale had to have been to a stranger (if the kidnapped person was sold to a relative, the thief was not culpable since the victim had not been deprived of association with family); and the kidnapper must have treated the victim as a slave before any sale. Each stage had to be attested to by at least two witnesses (San. 85b).

KIL'AYIM (כִּלְאִיִּם), name of laws prohibiting various mixtures and of a Mishnaic tractate.

Laws. The laws of kil'ayim concern the sowing, grafting, breeding, or mixing of diverse kinds of seeds, trees, animals, or fabrics, which are prohibited by the Bible (Lv. 19.19; Dt. 22.9-11). The relevant laws fall under four major headings, the first of which applies only in Erets Yisra'el.

The first set of laws is known as zera'im (seeds). Under these rules, it is forbidden to plant together two types of seed that differ in name, appearance, or taste. The prohibition applies only to seed normally planted for food but not to seed usually planted for medical use. The space to be left unplanted between different kinds of seed varies with the plant in question. The grafting of trees is also regulated by laws in this category.

The next heading of laws is kerem (vine). These regulations, which are stricter than those of zera'im, concern the planting of two kinds of seed together with the vine; it is forbidden to derive any benefit whatsoever from the product (Qid. 56b).

The next group is called behemah (animal). It is forbidden to crossbreed any two species of animal; nor may two species of animal be tied or yoked together for purposes of work, such as plowing or pulling (Dt. 22.10).

The final heading is sha'atnez (mingling of fabrics). Garments containing a mix of wool and linen are forbidden to be worn. Any intermingling whatsoever of hackled, spun, or woven wool with linen renders the cloth or garment sha'atnez. Exceptions to this are the priestly garments, of which the girdle contained both wool and linen, and tsitsit* (fringes), which in former times were made by adding a woolen thread even to a linen garment.

The laws of kil'ayim are among those called huqqim in the Bible (Lv. 19.19). Huqqim are interpreted by the rabbis as divine decrees, whose explanations are beyond human comprehension. The prohibition against kil'ayim may be related to the Creation account in Genesis, according to which each plant and animal species was created "according to its kind." Mixing species, therefore, is a sin against the divinely instituted order of creation.

Tractate. The tractate Kil'ayim is in Mishnah order Zera'im and consists of nine chapters, with related material in the Tosefta and the Talmud Yerushalmi. The tractate discusses and expands upon the biblical prohibitions against mixing plants, animals, or clothing of different species (Lv. 19.19; Dt. 22.9-11). Kil'ayim identifies which plants, animals, or clothing are regarded as exemplars of one species and which are of different species. The bulk of the tractate deals with the degree and nature of the separation required in order for different species not to be regarded as mixed. The separation required by the principles of kil'ayim depends, to a great extent, on agricultural practices and customs. Special attention is devoted in Kil'ayim to regulations concerning vineyards, both because of their agricultural centrality in Erets Yisra'el and because of the special severity attached by the rabbis to mixing the species of the vineyard.

The Mishnah tractate was translated by Herbert Danby in The Mishnah (Oxford, 1933).

KIMḤI FAMILY, grammarians, translators, and Bible commentators. They moved to Narbonne (in southern France) from Spain. They engaged in disputation with Christians, both of the Catholic church and heretics, as well as with Jews who opposed the introduction of philosophical learning into Judaism.

Yosef Kimḥi (c.1105–1170), wrote Sefer ha-Berit (Constantinople, 1710) to defend Jewish interpretation of the Bible against Christian typological exegesis. This is one of the first systematic treatises against Christianity written in Europe. He wrote works on Hebrew grammar, Sefer ha-Zikaron (1888) and Sefer ha-Galui (1887), which made the linguistic achievements of Jewish grammarians who wrote in Arabic, such as Ibn Ḥayyuj and Ibn Janah, available to Hebrew readers. His biblical commentaries emphasized the use of peshat*, or the plain meaning of the text, as opposed to the more homiletically oriented exegesis, such as that of Mosheh ha-Darshan*, which had been traditional in Provence. He wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, the Prophets, Job, and Proverbs. Many of his comments are known through the writings of his students, such as his son David and Menahem ben Shim'on of Posquières. His career as a biblical exegete parallels that of Avraham ibn Ezra, whom he knew and who cited him in his own commentaries. Yosef Kimḥi also translated Ḥovot ha-Levavot, by Baḥya ben Yosef ibn Paquda*, into Hebrew. His philosophical interests are also in evidence in his verse anthology Sheqel ha-Qodesh (pub. 1919), a reworking of ethical sayings from Shelomoh ibn Gabirol's Mivḥar ha-Peninim.

Mosheh Kimḥi (died c.1190), following the method of his father, Yosef, concentrated on Hebrew grammar and linguistic studies. He wrote a grammar book, Mahalahk Shevilei ha-Da'at (Pesaro, 1508), and a treatise devoted to the more theoretical dimensions of language, Sekhel Tov (1894). His biblical commentaries on Proverbs and Job follow the peshat orientation of his father.

David Kimḥi (c.1160–1235), also son of Yosef and known as Radaq, wrote a systematic treatise on the textual criticism of the Bible, Et Sofer (Lyck, 1864), which describes manuscript variations of the problems of the Masorah. He also wrote a grammar book, Sefer ha-Mikhlol (Constantinople, 1532), containing both a dictionary and a description of Hebrew grammatical rules. He wrote commentaries on Genesis, all the Prophetic books, Psalms, Proverbs, and Chronicles. These commentaries reflect the linguistic orientation that was developed in the Arabic-speaking Jewish world. They also have a strong rationalist approach, which he learned from the Jewish philosophical tradition, particularly from the writings of Maimonides. He argued that rationalist views of the miracles in scripture or prophecy were simply an extension of the original efforts of the classical rabbis. For him, philosophy was one more way to reclaim the correct interpretation of scripture. Toward that end, he wrote allegorical commentaries on the Genesis narratives of the garden of Eden, and of Cain and Abel, as well as on the first chapter of Ezekiel. These allegorical commentaries demonstrate his affinity for Maimonidean interpretation. Like his father, he engaged in polemics with Christians. His commentary on Psalms contains significant treatments of Christian interpretations of Psalms, which reveal, from Kimḥi's point of view, an insufficient knowledge of Biblical Hebrew grammar and syntax.

KINDLING OF LIGHTS (Heb. hadlaqat nerot). Lights are kindled by women at the onset of Sabbaths and festivals and indicate the approach of a day of light and cheerfulness. The kindling of lights is one of the three commandments that women* are obliged to perform, but in the absence of women the obligation falls on men. Maimonides (Hilkhot Shabbat 5.1) stressed the importance of the obligation and wrote that even if there is nothing to eat, the light must be lit, because this is the essence of "Sabbath delight" (oneg Shabbat*). A section of the tractate Shabbat (2) is devoted to the question of which oil may be used for the light; later, candles were substituted for oil lamps. It has been suggested that the custom arose to protest against the Babylonian belief in the Sabbath as an unlucky and gloomy day when no fire or light was lit. In Roman times, the lighting of Sabbath lamps was a distinguishing feature of Jewish homes, and the younger Seneca condemned Romans for imitating the custom (Epistulae 95.47). It is customary to kindle two lights; this has been associated homiletically with the two versions of the Sabbath commandment (Ex. 20.8 and Dt. 5.12) but may originate in the necessity of having one light in the living room and one in the kitchen. Some, however, light candles according to the number of persons in the family. The kindling of these lights constituted one of the major practical differences between the Karaites and the Rabbanites; the former would not allow a light to burn, even if kindled prior to the Sabbath, and sat in darkness throughout the Sabbath eve. Other occasions for the kindling of lights are Ḥanukkah, the anniversary of the death of a near relative (yortsayt), and on Yom Kippur. See also CANDLES.

KINGDOM OF HEAVEN (Heb. malḥut shamayim), an eschatological concept referring to a future state of perfection of the world, free from sin and suffering, in which all shall live in accordance with the divine will. Heaven is a metonymy for God; the term thus refers not to a heavenly realm but to the kingdom of God on earth. The Israelite prophets not only regarded history as the scene of divine action rather than as a fortuitous series of events but also envisaged a glorious consummation.

The present sinful and imperfect order would come to an end on the terrible *Yom ha-Din (see DAY OF THE LORD), after which God would create a "new heaven and a new earth," and all creatures would be at peace with one another, with nature, and with God, just as they were in the garden of *Eden. Originally, the concept of the kingdom of heaven was not identical with the messianic idea. However, the two eschatological concepts fused to some extent, until practically no distinction was made between the kingdom of heaven and the "Days of the *Messiah." Pseudepigraphous literature abounds in detailed descriptions of this new world, and the notion as well as the expectation of the imminent advent of the kingdom of heaven occupied a central position in the teachings of Jesus. Members of the Qumran community believed that they were members of the community of the elect, destined to inherit the kingdom of heaven. The Qumran community, like the early Christians, believed the kingdom of heaven to be at hand and saw themselves as active participants in the eschatological drama that had already begun to unfold. In contrast to the sectarians, the Pharisees saw themselves as still living in 'olam ha-zeh (see 'OLAM HA-ZEH AND 'OLAM HA-BA'). In Talmudic literature the concept of the kingdom of heaven is at times vague and ambiguous. In many instances it is equated with the "Days of the Messiah"; at other times it means a completely new age ('olam ha-ba'). The reign of the Messiah still belonged to this world. After the messianic era had come to an end, there would be a general *resurrection of the dead, followed by the great judgment of all mankind and the establishment of a new creation cleansed of all unrighteousness, namely, the kingdom of heaven. The distinction between the two eschatological eras, which implies that the political and social redemption of Israel and mankind were the penultimate and not the ultimate goal of history, was also maintained by medieval theologians. The idea of the kingdom of heaven connects ultimate perfection with a profound and radical transformation of the cosmos as a whole. See also APOCALYPSE; ESCHATOLOGY.

KINGS, BOOK OF (Heb. Sefer Melakhim), the last book in the Former Prophets section of the Bible. It recounts Israel's history during a four-hundred-year period from the end of the reign of David, the reign of Solomon, and the building of the Temple, the political division of the united kingdom under King Rehoboam, and the subsequent history of the two separate lines of kings in both Israel and Judah to the demise of the northern kingdom of Israel in 722 BCE and the destruction of Judah and the First Temple in 586 BCE, ending with King Jehoiachin's release from Babylonian imprisonment in 561. An important section of the Book of Kings is also dedicated to the narratives of the prophets Elijah and Elisha (1 Kgs. 17–2 Kgs. 9). Following the Septuagint, Kings is divided into two books, 1 Kings and 2 Kings (corresponding to 3 Kings and 4 Kings in the Septuagint, where 1 Samuel and 2 Samuel appear as 1 Kings and 2 Kings). Authorship of Kings is ascribed by the Talmud to Jeremiah (B. B. 15a). Modern critics believe the writing of its sources began as early as the end of Solomon's reign. These sources include official royal chronicles and temple archives that are no longer extant, for example, the Book of the Annals of Solomon (1 Kgs. 11.41) and the Books of the Annals of the Kings of Judah (1 Kgs. 14.29, 15.7, etc.). The final editing of the book took place in the exilic period (mid-6th cent. BCE). The prevalence of a strong Deuteronomic influence in the book has been pointed out by many scholars. This influence is most pronounced in the book's invariable tendency to evaluate the kings of both Israel and Judah in accordance with their degree of adherence to the "centralization of cult" reform, introduced by King Josiah of Judah (2 Kgs. 22–23), namely, the Deuteronomic requirement that all legitimate sacrificial worship be conducted at the central sanctuary (Dt. 12). Another typically Deuteronomic conception that finds expression in Kings is the inevitability of the prophetic word being fulfilled (1 Kgs. 12.15, 15.29, 16.12; 2 Kgs. 1.17, 17.23; cf. Dt. 18.14–22). The theological viewpoint of Kings occasionally obscures the accomplishments of those kings who were deemed to be wicked according to the book's strict religious standards. For example, the Omride dynasty in Israel exerted a powerful military influence in the whole region of ancient Syria and Erets Yisra'el, as is known from Mesopotamian sources. However, its legacy in Kings is one of continuous failure in upholding God's covenant. Ultimately, Kings seeks to provide a theodicy that accounts for the destruction of both the northern and southern kingdoms along with the First Temple.

KINGSHIP, first instituted in Israel at the end of the period of the judges (unlike most other ancient Near Eastern societies, in which kingship was conceived of as coming from God at the time of creation). At that time, the Israelites were confronted with the invasion of the better-organized and better-equipped Philistines and were unable to withstand such an attack without a unified resistance under the leadership of a single military leader. During this crisis, the prophet Samuel, at the command of God, anointed Saul as the first king of Israel. Samuel's personal reluctance about the institution of kingship was based on the theology that God alone was the sole ruler of the people, and he gave voice to his opposition by warning the people of the prerogatives that the king would take for himself (1 Sm. 8). He also reflected the sentiment of many of the Israelites who were unwilling to forgo their own autonomous tribal affinities. Deuteronomy 17.15–20 states that the king must be an Israelite, and he is warned not to take too many wives, too much silver and gold, or too many horses for himself. He is also commanded to write a copy of the law and to read it, so that "his heart be not lifted up against his brethren." After the schism of the united kingdom, there were frequent changes of dynasties in the northern kingdom of Israel; however, the southern kingdom of Judah remained faithful to the ideology that kingship was hereditary in the house of David. For this reason the first Hasmonean rulers, who were not of Davidic descent, did not adopt the title of king, and when Alexander Yannai took the title, he was criticized for flaunting the Jewish tradition. Prayers are still recited for the restoration of the Davidic line in one of the blessings of the haftarah in the synagogue service on the Sabbath. Many prayers stress the kingdom of God (see KINGDOM OF HEAVEN; MALKHUYOT).

KIPPAH (כִּפָּה), the skullcap (as distinct from the hat) worn as a *covering of the head in accordance with Orthodox Jewish custom. The Yiddish equivalent is yarmulke, a word of Slavic origin but uncertain derivation. Kappel (from the Italian cappella [hat]) is also used in Yiddish.

KISLEV (כִּסְלֵו), third month of the civil calendar, ninth in the religious. The name is of Akkadian/Babylonian origin and is first mentioned in the Bible in Zechariah 7.1 and Nehemiah 1.1. It has twenty-nine or thirty days, and its zodiac sign is Sagittarius. *Hanukkah commences on the twenty-fifth day of the month. In early times, if the new moon (see RO'SH HODESH) of Kislev arrived and no rain had yet fallen, the religious authorities called for a fast of petition (Ta'an. 1.5).

KISSING. The rabbis approved of three types of kisses: kisses given to a man when he is appointed to a position of honor; kisses of meeting and parting; and kisses between relatives. Other kissing was considered by the rabbis to be either "shameful" or "silly" (Ex. Rab. 5.1). Sacred articles are kissed as a sign of respect, for example, the tallit or tsitsit (cf. Nm. 15.37–41), the Torah scrolls, the mezuzah*, or a religious book that has fallen to the ground. Among Sephardim, children kiss their parents' hands after receiving a parental blessing, and among Jews in Muslim lands it is customary to kiss the hand of the hakham* in salutation. The peaceful surrender of one's soul to God is called "death by the kiss [of God]" on the basis of the literal translation of Deuteronomy 34.5, a privilege accorded only to the most pious (Ber. 8a). Later rabbis disapproved of men kissing relatives other than their mothers, wives, daughters, or sisters, and a man was forbidden to kiss his wife during her period of impurity.

KITEL (יֵי; כִּטָּל), the white garment traditionally worn in some Ashkenazi rites by the officiant and members of the congregation during prayer on the Yamim Nora'im (High Holidays), by the officiant and devout congregants during the Musaf service on the first day of Pesah (when Tefillat Tal is recited) and the eighth day of Sukkot (during Tefillat Geshem on Hosh'a'na' Rabbah), by the celebrant at the *Seder table, and in some communities by the groom during the marriage ceremony (where it is usually presented to him by his bride). Formerly it was worn every Sabbath and at all solemn occasions (cf. Y., R. ha-Sh. 1.3). The color white is associated with symbolic purity (and hence forgiveness of sins), integrity, and piety. The kitel is also part of the clothing in which the dead are buried.

KLATZKIN, JACOB (1882–1948), Hebrew publicist and philosopher. A son of a renowned Russian rabbi, he received a thorough traditional education. At the age of eighteen he went to Germany to study philosophy. Concurrent with his studies, he abandoned strict religious practice and joined the Zionist movement. In 1909 he was appointed the editor of the prestigious organ of the German Zionist movement, Die Welt. Together with Nahum Goldmann, he founded the Eschkol Publishing House, which sponsored the monumental Encyclopaedia Judaica, of which ten volumes appeared before Hitler came to power. Thereupon he left Germany and settled in Switzerland, where he lived until the end of his life; during the war he resided temporarily in the United States.

A disciple of the iconoclastic philosopher and psychologist Ludwig Klages (1872–1956), Klatzkin followed his master in repudiating both reason and the life of the spirit. Celebrating a biologically grounded life-force expressed in fundamental human instincts, he called upon his fellow Jews, enfeebled by a surfeit of spirit, to affirm the liberating vitality of that life-force. In the exile (galut)*, the Jews' abnormal existence had caused them to become estranged from their instincts, and develop a compensatory, but ultimately unhealthy, spiritual culture. The return to Zion would allow Israel to reestablish a natural, wholesome relationship to its institutional life. By virtue of the "normalization" of their existence, Jews would be freed from the life-denying effects of a spiritual vocation and revitalized through the reacquisition of the natural parameters of peoplehood: a land and language of their own. The attainment of these conditions would not only promote the revitalization of the Jews as a normal people, but also ensure their survival, especially now that religion, which hitherto held the people together, was being increasingly corroded by the secularizing forces of the modern world. It thus follows, Klatzkin argued, that Jewish existence in the galut, where the Jews are bereft of a land and language of their own, is not only undignified but destined to disappear. His philosophical writings included Sheqi'at ha-Hayyim (1925), Der Erkenntnistrieb als Lebens und Todesprinzip (1935), and Krisis und Entscheidung im Judentum (1921). A volume of his writings in English is entitled In Praise of Wisdom (New York, 1943).

KLOYZ (Yi.; קלדר; enclosure; also Ger. Klaus from Lat. claustrum [cloister]), a kind of beit midrash*, usually serving as a synagogue as well, in which the Talmud was studied by adults. The term was used in central and eastern Europe as far back as the seventeenth century. The Hasidim often referred to their synagogue as a kloyz. Among Sephardim, the corresponding institution was known as hesger (enclosure).

KLUGER, SHELOMOH (1785–1869), Galician rabbi and halakhic authority; known by the acronym Maharsaq. After short terms as communal rabbi in two small towns, in 1820 Kluger accepted the post as communal preacher (maggid) and head of the rabbinic court in Brody, where he served with distinction for almost half a century. His encyclopedic knowledge of Talmudic literature and keen analytical skills earned him a reputation as one of the leading interpreters of Jewish law of his generation. Kluger's independent mind and his uncompromising attitude toward what he regarded as breaches of Jewish law or custom brought him on occasion into conflict with Enlightenment-influenced communal leaders in Brody (over, for example, the issue of transporting a corpse to burial in a hearse rather than carrying the deceased's remains in a litter) or his rabbinic contemporaries (over the issue of machine-made matsot). Kluger was a prolific author. Only a small portion of his writings was published, but many have survived in manuscript. Included among his works are Ha-'Elef Lekha Shelomoh and Tuv Ta'am va-Da'at (response); Avodat and Nidrei Zerizin (Talmudic novellae); and Hokhmah Shelomoh (a commentary on the Shulhan 'Arukh).

KOHLER, KAUFMANN (1843–1926), American Reform rabbi. Born and educated in Germany, he initially supported Neo-Orthodoxy, but his doctoral thesis was far-reaching in its critical attitude toward the Bible, and, realizing that he could not obtain an Orthodox rabbinical position in Europe, he moved to the United States and became rabbi of Detroit's Reform Congregation Beth El. Later he served in Chicago and in 1879 succeeded his father-in-law, David *Einhorn, as rabbi of Congregation Beth El in New York. In 1903 Kohler moved to Cincinnati, where he served as president and professor of theology at Hebrew Union College, retiring in 1921. He supported the radical Reform advocated by Einhorn. In Kohler's major work, Jewish Theology (New York, 1918), he stated, "Judaism is nothing less than a message concerning the one and holy God and one undivided humanity, a message entrusted by divine revelation to the Jewish people." The Jewish people had the mission to teach the world ethical monotheism. Kohler found no place for Zionism in his system, nor could he find much justification for the rituals of traditional Judaism. He regarded legalism and nationalism as perversions of true Judaism, the essence of which he found in what he believed to be prophetic universalism. He attributed Jewish survival to the religious genius of the Jewish people and considered (influenced by Kant) the idea of God a postulate to man's moral conscience.

A long controversy with Alexander *Kohut, whose views were more traditional, led Kohler to convene a conference of Reform rabbis in Pittsburgh in 1885, at which his declaration of principles became the basis of the *Pittsburgh platform that was to guide American Reform for the next half-century. In his later years he became more open to religious ritual but remained strongly anti-Zionist.

Kohler was a major figure in the editing of the Jewish Encyclopedia (1901–1906), heading its theology and philosophy departments and writing many of its entries. He was also one of the editors of the Jewish Publication Society's translation of the Bible (1917), and the society published his translation of the Book of Psalms (Philadelphia, 1903). A bibliography of his writings up to 1913 appeared in Studies in Jewish Literature in Honor of Prof. Kaufmann Kohler (Berlin, 1913).

KOHUT, ALEXANDER (1842–1894), rabbi and scholar. A native of Hungary, he served as rabbi in congregations in Hungary and emigrated to the United States in 1885 to become rabbi of congregation Ahabah Chessed in New York City. He helped to inspire a revival of traditional Judaism in America and was one of the founders of the *Jewish Theological Seminary of America, where he was professor of Midrash and Talmudic methodology. He combined the traditionalist and progressive wings of the *Historical movement, which was reflected in his work The Ethics of the Fathers (1885). His main scholarly work was a revised and augmented edition of *Natan ben Yehi'el's talmudic dictionary 'Arukh ha-Shalem, which he had conceived in his youth; it was published in eight volumes (1870–1892).

KOIDONOVER FAMILY, a prominent Lithuanian family.

Aharon Shemu'el Koidonover (c.1614–1676), Lithuanian rabbi. He studied at Brisk but fled to Vilna in 1648 as a result of the Chmielnicki uprising. There he served on the rabbinic court with other distinguished scholars, including *Shabbetai ben Me'ir ha-Kohen and Mosheh ben Yitshaq Yehudah *Lima. In 1656 he moved to Kurów near Lublin, where two of his daughters were massacred by Cossacks. He left Poland, serving as rabbi in, among other places, Nikolsburg, Fürth, Frankfurt, and Hamburg, where, in 1669, he drew up a series of communal regulations. At the end of his life, he returned to Poland and was appointed rabbi of Kraków.

An important halakhist, Koidonover emphasized primary sources rather than later commentators. His major work, Birkat ha-Zevah (Amsterdam, 1669), consists of novellae and a commentary on Qodashim and includes an autobiographical introduction. His other works, posthumously published by his son, are Emunat Shemu'el (Frankfurt, 1682), responsa dealing particularly the question of the agunah*; Birkat Shemu'el (Frankfurt, 1682), sermons demonstrating kabbalistic influences; and Tiferet Shemu'el (Frankfurt, 1696), novellae on the Talmud and halakhic codes. His work on questions of divorce and levirate marriage has survived in manuscript.

Tsevi Hirsch Koidonover (died 1712), Lithuanian moralist. Born in Vilna, son of Aharon Shemu'el Koidonover, he studied under Yosef ben Yehudah of Minsk. While a child, Koidonover and his family suffered during the Polish wars of 1659 and fled to central Europe. He returned to Vilna but, after imprisonment on a false charge, moved to Frankfurt, where he published his homiletical work Kav ha-Yashar (1705). Drawing heavily on his teacher's Yesod Yosef, Kav ha-Yashar's readable style and mixture of homily, realistic detail, and folklore made it one of the most popular works of its genre. Koidonover was influenced by Kabbalah, and his biting social criticism was accompanied by graphic details of the terrors awaiting the sinner in the next world. Kav ha-Yashar was translated into Yiddish (Frankfurt, 1709) and Ladino (Constantinople, 1724) and often appeared in bilingual editions.

KOL BO (כָּל בּוֹ; everything within), an encyclopedia or compendium. The term is applied particularly to two works. The first is a ritual compendium, containing, apart from the usual laws (based mainly on Moses *Maimonides' Mishneh Torah), a number of religious enactments, legends, and other additions, written around the beginning of the fourteenth century, the authorship of which is unknown. The first edition was printed in Naples in 1490 and 1491. The second work is a large comprehensive folio prayer book designed for the use of the officiant; it includes the complete and unabridged liturgy with all piyyutim for every weekday, Sabbath, festival, and fast.

KOLEL (כּוֹלֵל; comprehensive), a term applied nowadays to a higher level yeshivah*, generally (but not exclusively) for married students who devote their time to Talmudic study. In many cases, these students are granted a modest stipend to enable them to help support their families. In Israel, much of the money used to pay such stipends is derived from government sources, to a large extent funneled through the Ministry of Religious Affairs. The first kolel was founded by R. Yisra'el *Salanter in Kovno (Kaunas) in 1878. The term kolel was also applied from the late nineteenth century by Ashkenazi Jews in Erets Yisra'el to groups of Jews in the four "holy cities" of Jerusalem, Hebron, Safed, and Tiberias who received support from compatriots in their native European countries, thereby enabling those in Erets Yisra'el to devote all their time to Talmudic study. KOL NIDREI (כָּל נִדְרֵי; All Vows), title and opening words of a declaration recited by the shaliach tsibbur* on behalf of the public at the commencement of the *Yom Kippur eve service. It states that all kinds of vows made before God unwittingly or rashly during the year (and hence unfulfilled) shall be considered null and void. Thus, from the outset of the solemn day the worshipers might remove from themselves the guilt of any vow that they had unintentionally failed to observe. The declaration dates from the geonic period and persisted despite the opposition of almost all leading ge'onim, ri'shonim, and aḥaronim. Kol Nidrei is recited in Aramaic in most rites, in Hebrew in others (e.g., Roman and Byzantine). In its original version, it referred to vows made during the preceding year; R. Tam altered the formulation to refer to the forthcoming year, thereby annulling its pseudo-legal character. This version became customary among Ashkenazim. Italians still use the original version. Sephardim and most congregations in Israel combine both forms. Because of its position at the opening of the service on the most sacred day of the liturgical year, it has been charged with strong religious sentiments. During its recitation, the ark is opened and two Torah scrolls taken out, one held on each side of the reader. It is recited three times. In the Ashkenazi rite, it is chanted to a melody derived from the mi-Sinai* repertoire. The impact of this ceremony has been so great that despite all halakhic or rationalistic criticism in Orthodox and Reform circles alike, its name is generally used to refer to the entire eve of Yom Kippur. Classical Reform replaced it with Psalm 103 or Psalm 110, but the modern tendency has been to reinstate it.

KOOK FAMILY, proponents of *Religious Zionism.

Avraham Yitshaq ha-Kohen Kook (1865–1935), religious thinker; first Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Palestine. Born in Griva, Latvia, his mother's family had leanings toward Hasidism, while his father's family had leanings toward Mittnagedism. In his youth, Kook studied in Lithuanian yeshivot and served as rabbi in Zaumel, Lithuania, and Bauska, Latvia. In 1904 he moved to Erets Yisra'el and was appointed rabbi of Jaffa, but, in fact, he was accepted as the rabbi of the entire new Jewish settlement of Erets Yisra'el. Rav Kook was simultaneously a highly revered and controversial personality. He was a spiritual and halakhic authority who laid the foundations for a Religious Zionism that was not restricted to the political pragmatism of the Mizrahi movement, but instead regarded Zionism as a movement of overall Jewish renaissance.

In 1914 he was caught in Europe by the outbreak of World War I and stayed in Germany and in Saint Gall, Switzerland, until 1916, after which time he accepted a temporary position as the rabbi of the Maḥzike ha-Das community in London. While in London he became involved in political efforts to obtain the Balfour Declaration. After the war, the British mandatory authorities established the chief rabbinate, and he was appointed the first Ashkenazi chief rabbi in 1921. He established a yeshiva in Jerusalem (Yeshivat Merkaz ha-Rav), and his students played a leading role in Religious Zionism. In his yeshiva, stress was laid on the agrarian laws and the Temple ritual that had been neglected in the Dias-pora. He praised the secular pioneers who were building Palestine for performing a holy mission; he believed that all Jewish souls possessed a religious character. His views were attacked by some Orthodox Jews.

His legacy encompasses many disciplines: Jewish law, philosophy, mysticism, and poetry. He refrained from adopting either kabbalistic or philosophic language. Instead he created a "new" language, freely utilizing kabbalistic and philosophic concepts, while vesting them with new meaning. Rav Kook perceived reality as an absolute unity and as the incarnation of divinity that becomes progressively clearer with the march of history. His worldview was characterized by openness, tolerance, and pluralism. He perceived the return of the Jewish people to their land as an important and central link in the process of the redemption of the entire world.

Tzevi Yehudah Kook (1891–1982), son of Avraham Yitshaq Kook. He succeeded his father as head of Yeshivat Merkaz ha-Rav and became leader and ideologist of the activist circles of Religious Zionism. After his father's death, he devoted himself to editing and publishing his writings. He regarded the State of Israel as the beginning of the redemptive process and believed that its institutions, including the army, were vested with intrinsic holiness. After the Six-Day War, he was adamantly opposed to any kind of territorial compromise and became the spiritual leader of the Gush Emunim movement, established by his students and based on the idea of Israel's divine right to the land within its biblical borders.

KORAH, a Levite, son of Izhar, son of Kohath, who, supported by other Levites and Israelites, led a rebellion in the wilderness against Moses and Aaron. The account of the rebellion in Numbers 16 seems to be a combination of three separate traditions regarding challenges against the authority of Moses as the leader of the Israelites and against the preferred status of Aaron and his family in all cultic matters. One of the traditions concerns Dathan and Abiram, members of the tribe of Reuben, and reflects the bitter feelings of the Reubenites, who, though members of the oldest tribe of Israel, were not accorded the honor due to them because of their impetuous behavior as narrated in Genesis 49.3–4. They were punished by being swallowed up by the earth (see also Ps. 106.17). The second tradition concerns the 250 Israelites (described as "chosen by the assembly, well known men"; Nm. 16.2) who revolted against the exclusive leadership of Moses; they were consumed by divine fire. The third, and apparently the latest, tradition was the challenge of Korah and other Levites against the privileges of the Aaronite order and their exclusive right to conduct the Lord's service. Korah argued that all the Levites deserved to serve the Lord, not only Aaron's family and Moses, the descendants of Amram, the firstborn son of Kohath. At first, Moses suggested that a divine sign should determine who shall "come near to the Lord" (Nm. 16.4–7), but according to Numbers 16.8–11, Moses did not entertain Korah's claim at all. Numbers 16.16 and following describe the divine test. The final redaction of the text merged the three traditions into one story but did not eliminate the inner textual problems. The story emphasizes the privileged status of the priests (from the house of Aaron) over that of the Levites and the rest of the Israelites. These traditions are all merged into one short account in Numbers 26.9–11.

The sons of Korah, a family of Levites (Nm. 26.58), are mentioned in the titles of eleven psalms (Ps. 42, 44–49, 84, 85, 87, 88). The statement in Numbers 26.11 that "the children of Korah did not die" may be interpreted as a late editorial comment intended to explain their occurrence in later biblical passages (cf. 1 Chr. 6.22). The Korahites are also mentioned among the mighty men of David in 1 Chronicles 12.7. The name Benei Korah (Sons of Korah) found on an ostrakon in the excavations in Arad in a room near the temple entrance, dated to the end of the eighth century BCE, may refer to a family of priests who served in the Arad temple.

KOTLER, AHARON (1892–1962), rabbi and ro'sh yeshivah. He was born in Sislowitz, Lithuania, and studied at the Slobodka yeshivah. In 1914 he assisted his father-in-law, R. Isser Zalman Meltzer, at the yeshivah Ets Hayyim in Slutsk, later transferred to Kletsk. In 1921 he succeeded R. Meltzer as ro'sh yeshivah and continued in this role until World War II. He fled Europe and reached the United States, via Japan, in 1941.

In the United States, he was active in the Va'ad ha-Hatsalah, an organization that rescued Jews from Nazi-occupied Europe. In 1943 he founded the Beth Midrash Govohah in Lakewood, New Jersey. This institution, with which Kotler was closely identified, became one of the most prominent yeshivot in the world.

In 1954 Kotler became president of the Supreme Council of Agudat Israel. He also served on the presidium of the Union of Orthodox Rabbis of the United States and Canada and was a leader of the independent Orthodox KRANZ, YA'AQOV BEN WOLF (1741–1804), Lithuanian preacher who achieved great fame as the Maggid (preacher) of Dubno, the city in which he served for a number of years. Kranz was very close to the renowned R. Eliyahu ben Shelomoh Zalman of Vilna, the Vilna Ga'on, who was greatly impressed with Kranz's incisive parables and, according to legend, even asked Kranz to point out his faults. Kranz's major works, all published posthumously, are Mishlei Ya'aqov (parables [Kraków, 1886]), Ohel Ya'aqov (homilies [1859–1863]), and Sefer ha-Middot (ethics and theology [Vilna, 1860]). KRAUSS, SAMUEL (1866–1948), scholar of Jewish history and literature. Born in Ukk, Hungary, Krauss studied at both the Jánosháza Yeshivah and at Salomon Breuer's yeshivah (see BREUER FAMILY) at Pápa before receiving his ordination from the Budapest Rabbinical Seminary in 1894. He also studied at the Universities of Budapest and Berlin and received his Ph.D. from the University of Giessen in 1893. He taught at the Budapest Lehrerseminar until moving to the Israelitisch-Theologische Lehranstalt in Vienna in 1905, where he became the head in 1932. In 1938 he moved to Cambridge, England. A prolific writer in five languages (his bibliography contains over thirteen hundred items), he wrote on philology, history, Bible, Talmud, Christianity, and medieval Hebrew literature. Krauss's main works include Griechische und lateinische Lehrwörter in Talmud, Midrasch und Targum (2 vols. [1898–1899]), Talmudische Archaeologie (3 vols. [1910–1912]), and Synagogale Altertümer (1922), which provided important sociohistorical information about life in the Talmudic period. Krauss also collaborated on the Hungarian translation of the Bible and contributed hundreds of articles to various encyclopedias.

KROCHMAL, NAḤMAN (1785–1840), historian and philosopher. Known by the acronym Ranak, Krochmal was born in Brody and lived all his life in that area. He was self-educated in philosophy, particularly in the works of Maimonides, Avraham ibn Ezra, Vico, Herder, Kant, Schelling, and Hegel. In his lifetime, Krochmal's reputation spread among participants of Wissenschaft des Judentums and, after he died, his philosophical speculations and historical researches were sent to Leopold Zunz, who edited and published them in 1851 as Moreh Nevukhei ha-Zeman.

Like Hegel, Krochmal believed that God or the Absolute Spirit is an infinite, supersensual reality in which everything subsists and that generates all finite particulars. Religious representations are a form of knowledge, differing from the ideas of philosophy primarily in their degree of abstraction and conceptual necessity. All religions conceive of some aspect of the spiritual, using images or imaginative language, rather than abstract concepts. Biblical prophecy truly grasped the infinite, unified nature of the Absolute, so that for Krochmal, the Torah of ancient Israel was the religion of the Absolute Spirit.

Like Vico and Herder, Krochmal viewed each nation as having its distinctive folk spirit and as passing through an organic cycle of birth, growth, maturity, decline, and death. The Jewish people, however, has experienced at least three such cycles, undergoing periodic regeneration as the latent teachings of Torah were further actualized. The first cycle began with the biblical patriarchs and concluded with the Babylonian exile; the second comprised the centuries of the Second Temple, from the biblical return to Zion to the Roman conquest; the third was the Middle Ages. Scholars disagree as to whether Krochmal believed a fourth, modern, cycle had begun.

Krochmal described the halakhah of the oral law as a unified system, the growth of which could be understood developmentally as various generations of sages interpreted Jewish law by exegetical rules and other means. Although the moral teachings and parables of the ancient rabbis were directed mainly to the general Jewish public, the underlying structure of the aggadah (the non-legal parts of rabbinic lore) was philosophical.

Krochmal was a philosopher of Judaism in the idealist tradition and an intellectual precursor of Jewish spiritual nationalism.

KUTIM, minor tractate, printed in standard editions of the Talmud Bavli at the end of tractate 'Avodah Zarah, based largely on tannaitic sources. It deals with the status of the *Samaritans, who were taken by Sennacherib, the Assyrian king, from Cuthah (near Babylonia) and resettled in Samaria after the exile of the ten northern tribes. They began observing Jewish customs—but without abandoning their idolatrous beliefs—in order to propitiate the god of the land, who had set lions upon them; hence, rabbis of the tannaitic period debated about whether they were true proselytes or "proselytes of lions" (Qid. 75b). Their ambivalent status in Jewish law is reflected in the tractate's introductory pericope: "The usages of the Samaritans are at times like those of the heathens, at times like those of the Israelites. . . ." Kutim was published by Michael Higger in Seven Minor Tractates (New York, 1930).

KVITL (Yi.; קְוִיטל), a petition offered to a Hasidic rabbi, placed near the grave of a saint, or inserted between the stones of the *Western Wall. In the Hasidic context, the offering of a kvitl to a Hasidic master is an act of fealty, a statement that the petitioner believes the holiness of the tsaddiq* or the merit of his ancestors will suffice to bring his prayers before God. Typically a kvitl is accompanied by a monetary gift known as a pidyon (short for pidyon nefesh [redemption of the soul]), serving to bind the tsaddiq to the concerns of the petitioner. Popular leaders of Hasidism accept petitions for healing, and they are especially thought to be helpful concerning issues of childbearing. Some Hasidic masters, including those of *Lubavich and Bratslav (see NAḤMAN OF BRATSLAV), accepted petitions only for help in the spiritual growth of their disciples.

LA'AZ (לֵאז), originally a term meaning foreign language. In the Talmud the word was used to mean a language current among Jews, specifically Greek (Meg. 2.1, 18a; Sot. 49b; Y., Sot. 7.1). By the early Middle Ages, however, it signified the Latin or Romance equivalent of a Hebrew word or phrase, diacritical marks indicating how the transliterated form was pronounced. *Rashi introduced several thousand le'azim into his commentaries on the Bible and Talmud, with the result that be-la'az was taken to mean "[a gloss] in Old French." Commenting on Jeremiah 2.22, for example, Rashi explains that borit is equivalent to the Old French sabon (soap). His contemporary *Natan ben Yehi'el of Rome and other medieval scholars also relied on vernacular glosses to clarify the Hebrew text. Their le'azim refer to many aspects of daily life and have therefore promoted Romance philology and helped to preserve pronunciations. According to a popular misinterpretation, be-la'az is the acronym of bi-leshon 'am zar (in a foreign tongue).

LABOR. The Bible and rabbinic tradition generally take a positive attitude toward the dignity and social value of labor. Rabbi Shim'on bar Yoh'ai stated that the phrase "six days shall you work" is a commandment as binding as the phrase that follows, "and on the seventh you shall rest" (Mekhilta' on Ex. 20.9–10). Even Adam was enjoined to work in the garden of Eden (Gn. 2.15), and such biblical verses as "when you eat of the labor of your hands, happy shall you be and it will be well with you" (Ps. 128.2); "sweet is the sleep of the laborer whether he eat little or much" (Eccl. 5.13); and "go to the ant you sluggard" (Prov. 6.6) emphasize the value of labor. Until the Middle Ages, rabbis earned their living from their occupations, and the trades of various Talmudic rabbis can be gauged from their names, such as Yohanan the Shoemaker and Yitshaq the Blacksmith. The rabbis said "idleness leads to immorality . . . and to degeneration" (Ket. 5.5), "he who does not teach his son a trade teaches him brigandage" (Qid. 29a), "great is labor for it lends dignity to man" (Ned. 49b), and "the man who lives from the labor of his hands is greater than one who fears heaven" (Ber. 8a). A difference of opinion developed over the question of whether one was entitled to abandon work in order to devote one's self to sacred study. Against the opinion of R. Gamli'el that "study without labor must be futile and lead to sin" (Avot 2.2), the view was advanced that in the case of the truly righteous "their labor is performed for them by others" (Ber. 35b). In answer to the injunction of R. Me'ir to the effect that "a man should always teach his son a light and clean trade," R. Nehora'i said "I eschew every trade in the world and will teach my son only Torah" (Qid. 4.14). The rights of the laborer laid down in the Bible are reinforced in the Talmud. Whereas the Bible legislates simply that the day laborer should be paid at the end of the day's work (Lev. 19.3; Dt. 24.5), the Talmud specifies that a breach of this rule contravenes four distinct biblical commandments (B. M. 111a). Moreover, wages were to be paid in money and not in goods (B. M. 10.5), and an employer could not make his laborers work outside the agreed working hours (B. M. 3.1). In the legal sphere, the general rule that one cannot establish a financial claim merely by swearing to it was set aside in the case of a laborer, who could establish a claim by swearing that wages had not been received (B. M. 9.13). In modern rabbinic law, attempts have been made to cope with recent developments that affect the character of labor, wages, the relationship between labor and management, and so on. LAG BA-'OMER (לֵאז בַּעֲמֵר; לֵאז בַּעֲמֵר), Thirty-third [Day] of the 'Omer, a minor festival that falls on 18 Iyyar, the thirty-third day of the seven-week period of the counting of the *'Omer, which extends from the second day of Pesah to Shavu'ot (Lev. 23.15). On Lag ba-'Omer the semimourning of the 'Omer period is lifted, and weddings, haircuts, and so on are permitted. Among Sephardim, the ban is lifted only on the following day but—unlike among Ashkenazim—is not imposed for the rest of the 'Omer period. The reason for the institution of Lag ba-'Omer is obscure. A Talmudic passage (Yev. 62b) that tells of the plague that killed the twenty-four thousand disciples of R. *'Aqiva' ben Yosef during the 'Omer period provides the rationale for the mourning observed and is taken as a reference to the disasters of the Bar Kokhba' Revolt (see BAR KOKHBA', SHIM'ON); this passage, however, makes no mention of Lag ba-'Omer, though one complicated gloss on the statement, "the plague ceased at the middle of the period to Shavu'ot," relates it to Lag ba-'Omer, which subsequently became known as the Scholars' Festival. Hence it became customary to grant students a holiday on this day. Some writers suggest that after a series of defeats, Bar Kokhba' secured a victory over the Romans on that date, which was henceforth celebrated, but owing to continued Roman rule, the real reason could not be publicly revealed and was eventually forgotten. Others have connected it with the taking up of arms at the outbreak of the first revolt against Rome (66 CE). According to another view the day was selected because only thirty-two of the forty-nine days of the 'Omer period are days of mourning when *Taḥanun is said; the thirty-third day, therefore, marks the lifting of the ban. In the synagogue service, Taḥanun is not recited. According to other traditions, the great Flood commenced on this day, and, in the time of Moses, manna began to fall from heaven. A later tradition established Lag ba-'Omer as the date of death of R. Shim'on bar Yoh'ai, to whom the *Zohar is attributed, and hence it came to be celebrated in particular by kabbalists. R. Shim'on's burial place—Meron in Galilee—has remained the scene of a picturesque ceremony on this day (*Hillula' de-Rabbi Shim'on bar Yoh'ai), when Hasidim and others bring their young sons for their first haircut, light bonfires, and dance through the night. The ceremony incurred the displeasure of many of the sixteenth-century kabbalists of Safed, who wished—unsuccessfully—to ban it because of its folkloristic, semipagan character. This displeasure was echoed as late as the nineteenth century by R. Mosheh Sofer, without detriment, however, to the popularity of the festival. In Europe it was customary for children to play in the fields with bows and arrows, perhaps as a reminder of the Jewish-Roman war. Lag ba-'Omer is also an occasion in Israel for lighting bonfires, even among the nonobservant. Among western and certain other Sephardim, the day is known as Lag la-'Omer.

LAMED VAV (לך וָאָבֶן; Hebrew letters for the number thirty-six), legendary group of righteous whose piety saves the world. According to a statement by *Abbaye (San. 97b; cf. Suk. 45b), "the world must contain not less than thirty-six righteous individuals who are vouchsafed the sight of the divine presence." The Talmud also says that these thirty-six individuals differ from other righteous persons in that they behold the divine presence with special clarity. On this basis arose the legend of the lamed vav tsaddiqim (thirty-six righteous individuals), men usually of humble vocation who do not know of the existence of the others and whose special spiritual gifts are not generally recognized or appreciated but by whose merit the world exists. In times of crisis and danger they reveal themselves and bring salvation to the people. According to the Tiqqunei Zohar (chap. 21), there are two such groups of thirty-six secret saints, one for Erets Yisra'el and one for elsewhere. The legend forms the basis for numerous Jewish folk tales, including many in kabbalistic and Hasidic sources. The Yiddish term lamed-vovnik is used for a saintly individual.

LAMENTATION. See QINAH.

LAMENTATIONS, BOOK OF (Heb. Eikhah, after its opening word; in the Talmud, called Kinot [Dirges]), sixth book in the Hagiographa section of the Bible and third of the Five Scrolls (see HAMESH MEGILLOT). Traditionally ascribed to the prophet Jeremiah (on the basis of 2 Chr. 35.25), the book is placed in the Septuagint version after the Book of Jeremiah. It consists of five chapters, of which the first four, written acrostically according to the alphabet (the third chapter contains a triple acrostic, each letter appearing three times at the beginning of a verse), elegiacally bemoan Israel's sorrowful plight during the siege and fall of Jerusalem in 587 and 586 BCE. In the fifth chapter (not an acrostic, but consisting of twenty-two verses, equivalent to the number of the letters in the Hebrew alphabet) the plaint fuses into a prayer for Israel's redemption. The prevalent motif is that a causal connection exists between divine punishment (graphically described in the plight of dying children and the ultimate resort to cannibalism) and the sins of the people—prophets and priests included. Nevertheless, with the exception of 4.13, the sins of the people are not spelled out specifically, and God's judgment in bringing on the destruction is regarded as exceptionally severe (e.g., 3.43, 5.7). This is one reason why critical scholarship denies the book's sole authorship to Jeremiah, who viewed the destruction as inevitable and fully justified (Jer. 5.7–9, 9.1–5, 11–13) and who foresaw the failure of foreign alliances (Jer. 2.18, 37.5–10), whereas the author of Lamentations expressed the frustrating reliance on outside help (4.17). Nevertheless, the book was most likely composed close in time to the catastrophic events it describes. From a literary-generic point of view, Lamentations resembles Sumerian elegies that were written over cultic centers destroyed by the god of the city. The book is read in the synagogue during the evening and morning services on Tish'ah be-'Av, the traditional anniversary of the destruction of the Temple.

LAMENTATIONS RABBAH, an aggadic midrash to the *Book of Lamentations, included in the collection commonly referred to as the *Midrash Rabbah. Compiled in Erets Yisra'el in the fifth or sixth century CE, Lamentations Rabbah contains exegetical comments, parables, and stories, written in Hebrew and Aramaic, and follows the order of the verses of the biblical book. The midrash is prefaced by thirty-six petiḥot (see PETIḤAH), most of them concluding with a reference to the first verse of Lamentations. The biblical book laments the destruction of the First Temple and the calamities that befell the Jewish people at the time, especially in Jerusalem; Lamentations Rabbah expounds on these and other calamities, often referring, obliquely or directly, to the destruction of the Second Temple and the Bar Kokhba' Revolt (see BAR KOKHBA' SHIM'ON). Much historical material relating to these periods is included—albeit in aggadic garb—in the midrash, some of which has parallels in Josephus's historical accounts.

LAMPONTI, YITSHAQ HIZQIYYAHU BEN SHEMU'EL (1679–1756), Italian rabbi, scholar, and physician. He practiced medicine in Ferrara, where (from 1743) he was rabbi and head of the yeshivah. He is best known for his Paḥad Yitshaq, an extensive halakhic encyclopedia that appeared in two editions, one consisting of a hundred twenty volumes, the other of thirty-five volumes. The articles in this work are generally exhaustive dissertations on their subjects and are valuable for their quotations of rabbinic responsa (especially from Italy) and other often unpublished sources. The work was published up to the letter mem in Italy between 1750 and 1840 and was completed in Germany between 1864 and 1887.

LANDAU, YA'AQOV, (15th cent.) Talmudist. Little is known of his life except that he was born and educated in Germany and later lived and worked in Italy. He is known for his work Ha-'Agur, which surveys Ashkenazi scholarship on two books of the Arba'ah Turim of Ya'aqov ben Asher—Orah Hayyim and Yoreh De'ah. It offers an abridgment and the halakhic decisions designed for the nonscholar and was often cited by Yosef Karo. Ha-'Agur was the first rabbinical work to contain haskamot (see APPROBATION) from other rabbis.

LANDAU, YEHEZQEL (1713–1793), known from his most famous work as Noda' bi-Yehudah; Polish-born rabbi and halakhist. Born to a leading rabbinical family in Opatów, he was educated in Ludmir (Vladimir-Volynskiy) and in Brody, where he also served as dayyan. In 1745 he was appointed rabbi in Jampol, serving for ten years until his appointment to the prestigious Prague rabbinate, where he remained until his death. His yeshivah in Prague soon became one of the most important such institutions in central Europe. Conservative in viewpoint, he took a public stand on many of the burning issues of his day. He was fiercely opposed to Shabbateanism and Frankism, though he adopted a conciliatory stance in the Emden–Eybeschutz controversy of 1752, arguing that Eybeschutz was being misrepresented—a position that was influential in winning Landau his Prague appointment. He was also opposed to the new Hasidism of his day, the innovations of which he suspected were influenced by Shabbateanism. Though open to the study of secular subjects within a traditional Jewish framework and cautiously supportive of the foundation of a new Jewish school in Prague in 1782, he was hostile to the Berlin Haskalah, attacking the publication of Wessely's Divrei Shalom ve-'Emet (1782) and excoriating Mendelssohn's Bible translation (1783). Aware of the changing legal status of Bohemian Jewry, he attempted to instill patriotic feeling in the Jewish community, while using his connections with the authorities (including the emperor) to ensure that new legislation harmed as little as possible the framework of Jewish traditional and, in particular, family life. When Jews were first recruited into the Austrian army, he addressed them in 1789, urging both loyalty to the country and adherence to Jewish law.

As a halakhist, his reputation was based on his extensive collection of 855 responsa, Noda' bi-Yehudah (vol. 1 [Prague, 1776]; vol. 2 [Prague, 1811]). These halakhic enquiries were addressed to him from every part of the Jewish world, and in his responses, he demonstrated his mastery of the sources and his incisive analytical skill, sometimes tending toward leniency in his decisions (for which reason some were rejected by later authorities). He was also a gifted preacher and wrote extensively. Among his more important works are Tsiyyun le-Nefesh Hayyah, novellae on various tractates of the Talmud (Prague, 1783, 1791, 1799, 1959); Ahavat Tsiyyon, Shivat Tsiyyon, and Derush le-Tsiyyon, three volumes of sermons, eulogies, and novellae (1826); Dagul me-Revavah, notes on the Shulhan 'Arukh (Prague, 1794); and Das mosaisch-talmudische Eherecht, describing Jewish family law and comparing it with legislation introduced by Emperor Joseph II (1903).

LANDESRABBINER (Ger.; land rabbi), title given to rabbis appointed or recognized by the government from the seventeenth century on in Germany and Austria. Their jurisdiction extended over the political unit known as a Land, of which there were many in Germany. Their function was often civic and representative (in the nineteenth century, they were generally expected to Germanize the Jews) rather than strictly religious.

LA-SHANAH HA-BA'AH BI-YERUSHALAYIM (לשנה הבאה בירושלים, "Next year in Jerusalem"), a wish traditionally expressed at the conclusion of the Pesah *Seder and, in most rites, at the concluding service of *Yom Kippur. The recitation of the phrase on these two occasions reflects a Talmudic dispute as to whether redemption will come in the month of Nisan or Tishrei (R. ha-Sh. 11a). In the State of Israel, the wording is bi-Yerushalayim ha-benuyyah, "next year in rebuilt Jerusalem" (cf. Ps. 122.3).

In this usage, the terms former and latter simply refer to the order of the books in the biblical collection. See also BIBLE.

LAUTERBACH, JACOB ZALLEL (1873–1942), rabbinic scholar. Born in Monasterzyska, Galicia, Lauterbach was ordained at the Berlin Rabbinical Seminary. In 1902 he received his Ph.D. from the University of Göttingen, where he studied with Julius Wellhausen. In 1904 Lauterbach moved to New York, becoming an editor of the Jewish Encyclopedia, to which he contributed two hundred sixty entries. Lauterbach served as rabbi for both traditional and Reform congregations and, from 1911 to 1934, taught at the Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati. His scholarly work centered mainly on the history of the Pharisees but also explored the literary history of the Talmud as well as Jewish customs and folklore. He published a translation of the tannaitic midrash Mekhilta' de-Rabbi Yishma'e'l. Several of his essays were published after his death (Rabbinic Essays [Cincinnati, 1951]).

LAVER, a bowl for washing hands. Priests were required to wash their hands and feet before entering the sacred precincts to perform their cultic duties; for this reason the instructions for building the Tabernacle concluded with the command to fashion a bronze Laver or wash basin (kiyyor) filled with water and to place it in the Tabernacle courtyard between the altar and the entrance to the Tabernacle (Ex. 30.18). According to Exodus 38.8, the Laver was fashioned out of the mirrors of the women who congregated at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, making the Laver a specifically feminine contribution to the construction of the Tabernacle. In the First Temple, the function of the Laver was served by the immense *Brazen Sea. There was also a laver in the Second Temple. Some synagogues have lavers, often ornamental, at which worshipers wash their hands before entering the sanctuary and at which the priests wash before pronouncing the Birkat ha-Kohanim.

LAW OF RETURN, an Israeli law adopted in 1950 stating that "every Jew has the right to immigrate to the State of Israel" and may immediately obtain an immigrant certificate. From the religious viewpoint, this has engendered a series of controversies over the definition of who is a Jew (See JEW, WHO IS A?, CONTROVERSY). In 1958, the minister of the interior decided that any new immigrant who made a sincere profession of Judaism was covered by the Law of Return. This enraged the National Religious Party (NRP), which resigned from the coalition government over the issue. Eventually, the Interior Ministry was entrusted to the hands of the NRP, and an amendment to the law was accepted in 1970 by which a Jew was defined according to halakhah: as "a person born of a Jewish mother or who has become converted to Judaism and is not a member of another religion." The nature of the conversion was not specified, but the *Agudat Israel party insisted that only conversions "according to halakhah" should be accepted, and not those by Conservative or Reform courts. This led to a crisis in 1988 when Agudat Israel postulated that such an amendment be adopted as a condition of its joining the government. The prime minister designate was willing to accept the demand, but this led to an outcry in the Diaspora, notably in the United States, and the amendment was not adopted. The 1970 amendment extended the Law of Return to cover "a child or grandchild of a Jew, the spouse of a Jew, the spouse of a child of a Jew, and the spouse of a grandchild of a Jew, except for a person who has been a Jew and voluntarily changed his religion." A further controversy arose in the 1990s as a result of large-scale immigration from the former Soviet Union and, to a smaller extent, from Ethiopia. It was estimated that a fifth of the immigrants from the former Soviet Union from 1989 through 1995 were non-Jews who fell into these categories (a consequence of widespread intermarriage) and that over a hundred thousand new immigrants to Israel were non-Jews who qualified under the amended Law of Return.

LAYMAN (Heb. hedyot), term used in Temple times to designate a private person, as opposed to a member of royalty or the priesthood. It is also found as an appellation for an ignorant man, one of low character or poor manners, and the unskilled as opposed to the skilled worker. Thus, leshon hedyot means popular, everyday, or vulgar parlance; kohen hedyot refers to an ordinary priest. With the destruction of the Temple, most distinctions between laymen and priests disappeared. See also PRIESTHOOD.

LAZARUS, MORITZ (1824–1903), philosopher and psychologist. Born in Poznań, he studied history and philosophy at the University of Berlin, from which he received his Ph.D. in 1850. In 1860 he was appointed professor at the University of Berne, and in 1874 he received an appointment at the University of Berlin. Along with Heymann Steinthal, Lazarus is noted for founding the discipline of Völkerpsychologie, the study of the psychological character of nations. From 1859 to 1890 he edited the journal Zeitschrift für Völkerpsychologie und Sprachwissenschaft. Lazarus's most noted Jewish work was his Ethik des Judentums (1898; English translation by Henrietta Szold, 2 vols. [1900–1901]). This Kantian work stressed the universal rather than the particularist elements of Jewish morality, a point that was criticized by Jewish scholars such as Hermann Cohen, who instead emphasized the historical evolution of a distinct Jewish morality. Lazarus's autobiography, Aus Meiner Jugend, Autobiographie was published in 1913.

LEAH, eldest daughter of Laban; Jacob's first wife, who bore him six sons—Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun—and one daughter, Dinah; third matriarch of Israel. Leah became Jacob's wife only after her father substituted her as a bride for *Rachel, her younger sister, for whom Jacob had worked for seven years. He then had to work for an additional seven years for Rachel's hand. Leah also gave Jacob her handmaid Zilpah, who bore him two children, Gad and Asher. Leah, along with Rachel and their children, returned to Canaan with Jacob when he fled from her father's house in Padan-aram (Gen. 29–31, 33.1–7). The names of both Rachel and Leah were invoked as a blessing to brides on their wedding day (Ru. 4.11), a custom still practiced today at Jewish weddings before the bride is led to the wedding canopy.

LEESER, ISAAC (1806–1868), Orthodox religious and communal leader. Leeser was born in Neuenkirchen, Westphalia, Germany, and as a youth was influenced by R. Abraham Sutro, an outspoken opponent of Reform Judaism. Arriving in America in 1824, Leeser first served as a hazzan in Richmond, Virginia, before being called in 1829 to Philadelphia's Mikveh Israel, where he remained until 1850. In 1857 he was elected head of Congregation Beth El Emeth in Philadelphia and remained its hazzan until his death in 1868.

While in Philadelphia, Leeser endeavored to modernize congregational ritual to make Orthodox Judaism more intelligible and attractive to laypeople who were assimilating or aligning with Reform Judaism. He introduced the weekly English sermon and struggled to institutionalize it in Mikveh Israel. The founder of the first Jewish Publication Society of America, he translated both the Sephardi and Ashkenazi prayer books into English and in 1845 published the first Jewish translation of the Bible in English, on which he had worked for seventeen years. Through his newspaper, the Occident, Leeser attempted both to promote Orthodoxy and to unify all American Jews. Toward that end, he was also instrumental in the founding in 1859 of the Board of Delegates of American Israelites. In 1867 Leeser founded Maimonides College, the first serious attempt at creating a rabbinical seminary in America.

LEIBOWITZ, YESHA'YAHU (1903–1994), scientist, philosopher, and theologian. Born in Riga, he studied in Berlin and Basel. In 1935 he joined the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, where he became professor of organic and biological chemistry and of neurophysiology. Judaism, according to Leibowitz, found its expression through the ages in the practice of the mitsvot and not necessarily in credos on which the sages of Israel did not unanimously agree. Halakhah and not the Bible is the distinctive mark of Judaism and the Jewish people. Leibowitz considered man's willingness and ability to choose religion as the culmination of freedom. Religion is not a means for achieving a goal, but is the goal itself; this is why one should not look for reasons for the mitsvot. The real believer should not expect any reward for fulfilling the mitsvot—their very observance is the reward. Leibowitz defined Judaism as a theocentric religion, requiring its believer to serve God for the sake of serving him. He made a complete distinction between religion and science. In his view, the findings of science are compelling, while religion is a matter of choice; these two paths will never cross. He therefore rejected the apologetic writings that try to explain miraculous events in the Bible on scientific principles.

Ethics, Leibowitz believed, might be in conflict with religious commands (for example, the sacrifice of Isaac). Therefore, he did not define himself as a humanist, even though many of his ideas, particularly those regarding politics and Arab-Jewish relations, were seen as humanistic. He believed that human history should not be interpreted on the basis of divine intervention but on the basis of human behavior, including all human atrocities. Thus, he avoided the necessity of finding a theological explanation for the Holocaust. Leibowitz saw in the State of Israel a mere political entity with no religious significance. He doubted the possibility of a halakhic state and advocated the complete separation between church and state. Regarding the messianic idea, he said "Any actual Messiah is a false Messiah." Like Maimonides, he thought that Jews should concentrate not on the world to come but on their duties in this world.

Leibowitz advocated the full participation of women in learning Torah but rejected their struggle for equality in the fulfillment of time-bound mitsvot as meaningless from a religious point of view. His writings include Yahadut, 'Am Yehudi u-Medinat Yisra'el (Jerusalem, 1975); Siḥot al-Shemonah Peraqim le-Rambam (Jerusalem, 1986); and Emunah, Historyyyah ve-'Arakhim (Jerusalem, 1982).

LEIL SHIMMURIM (ליל שמורים; night of watching), name given by the Bible (Ex. 12.42) to the night of the *Exodus and, hence, to the first night (in the Diaspora the first two nights) of Pesah. Because the night was thought to be under special divine protection, doors were often left unlocked and night prayers omitted. Some scholars suggest that the term leil shimmurim is similar to the Bedouin samarum (the practice of staying up all night and telling stories) and refers to the custom of staying awake all night and recounting the Exodus from Egypt.

LEKHHAH DODI (לִקְהָה דוֹדִי; "Come my beloved"), introductory words of a sixteenth-century composition (one of the last to be included in the prayer book) sung at the inauguration of the Sabbath. The author's name, Shelomoh *Alkabez, is given in acrostic in eight of the nine stanzas. Incorporating many biblical phrases, particularly from Isaiah, the poem personifies the Sabbath as a bride (cf. Shab. 199a) symbolically welcomed by the congregation's bowing toward the entrance during the last stanza. It is a remnant of a more elaborate processional greeting of the Sabbath renewed by Alkabez, who, with his fellow kabbalists, went out to the countryside around Safed to welcome "Sabbath the bride." Replete with references to the peace and joy of the Sabbath and the larger peace and joy of messianic times and the restoration of Jerusalem and Israel, Lekhah Dodi was quickly adopted in all rites. The hymn is sung after the introductory Psalm 29.

LEKHU NERANNENAH (לְכוּ נְרַנְנֵנָה; "Come, let us exult"), the opening words of Psalm 95, and hence of the group of six psalms (95–99 and 29) recited in the Ashkenazi rite for the inauguration of the Sabbath at the beginning of the Friday evening service. Initially, only Sephardi congregations began with Psalm 29 but eventually most Jewish liturgies came to include all six psalms. The six psalms, which describe the grandeur of God's work in nature and his righteous judgment of the world, were said to correspond to the six working days of the week. They are followed in the liturgy by Lekhah Dodi* and Psalm 92, the Sabbath Psalm. The custom of reciting this group of psalms was introduced by the kabbalists of Safed in the sixteenth century. Previously, the beginning of the Sabbath eve service had been the same as on weekdays.

It is sponsored jointly by the two British progressive movements, the Reform Synagogues of Great Britain and the Union of Liberal and Progressive Synagogues of Great Britain. Since 1982 the college has been housed in the Sternberg Centre for Judaism in North Finchley, London. Besides preparing rabbis for pulpits in Europe and the British Commonwealth, it provides teacher training and awards bachelor's and master's degrees in Jewish studies.

LEPROSY, an affection of the skin or other surfaces that renders a person or object unclean (see IMPURITY), referred to in the Bible as tsora'at. Signs of leprosy, which may appear on persons, walls of houses, or in fabrics, are described at length in Leviticus 13. Upon being pronounced as leprosy by a priest, the affected person or object was quarantined until the scourge disappeared. Upon being healed, a leper had to undergo a cleansing ceremony and bring special offerings to the Temple (Lv. 14). The rabbis suggested that leprosy was the punishment for scandalmongering and *slander, as evidenced in the instances of Moses speaking against Israel (Ex. 4.1–8) and Miriam speaking against Moses (Dt. 24.8–9). The laws concerning leprosy are discussed in Talmud tractate Nega'im*.

LEQAḤ TOV, midrash on the Torah and the Five Scrolls composed in Germany at the end of the eleventh century by the Balkan scholar *Toviyah ben Eli'ezer. It contains allusions to contemporary historical events, specific reference to the martyrs of the First Crusade of 1096, ideas culled from early (now lost) aggadic midrashim, and early mystical literature. The author frequently explains anthropomorphic verses and statements as parables, using the rabbinic phrase, "The Torah speaks in the language of humans," a reflection of the author's ongoing dispute with the Karaites, which frequently finds expression throughout this work. Leqaḥ Tov is also known as Pesiqta' Zutarta' and was often confused with other compilations. Leqaḥ Tov on Genesis, Exodus, and Esther was published by Solomon Buber (1884–1896); on Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy by Me'ir Katzenellenbogen (1884); on Song of Songs and Lamentations by A. LEQET, SHIKHḤAH, AND PE'AH (לֶקֶט, שִׁיחָה, וּפְּאֵה), three parts of the harvest that the farmer was instructed to leave for the poor; they are known as matenot 'aniyyim, "gifts to the poor" (see AGRARIAN LAWS).

Leqet (gleaning) referred to stalks dropped by the harvesters that may not be retrieved (Lv. 19.9–10). The same applied to grapes that fell while being gathered in the vineyard (for which the technical term was peret). The most well-known example of gleaning is the story of Ruth in the fields of Boaz (Ru. 2), in which the gleaners are pictured as following the reapers to gather up what was left. Gleaning is limited to cornfields, orchards, and vineyards and may not take place in vegetable gardens. The owner of the field may derive no benefit from the gleanings nor should he discriminate among or help the gleaners. Gleaners are exempt from the obligation of tithing.

Shikhḥah (a forgotten thing) refers to the sheaves that the landowner and his workers had overlooked during reaping and that may not be retrieved but must be left for the poor to gather (Dt. 24.19). The Bible refers to cut sheaves, but the rabbis applied the ruling also to uncut corn (Pe'ah 6.7) or to trees that had been overlooked (Pe'ah 7.1).

Pe'ah (corner) refers to corners of fields that should not be reaped but left for the poor (Lv. 19.9–10, 23.22). Although halakhically the obligation is met by leaving a single stalk for the poor, the rabbis ordained that at least one-sixtieth of the harvest should be left and that this proportion should be increased in the event of a good crop or a large number of poor gleaners.

The rabbis applied these laws only in Erets Yisra'el, but the custom was also observed in Babylonia and elsewhere. Although originally the laws were intended for the Jewish poor, they were later extended to apply also to the non-Jewish poor (Git. 5.8). The subject is discussed in the Talmudic tractate Pe'ah.

LETTER MYSTICISM. The view that the letters of the Hebrew alphabet are vehicles of God's essence and creative power underlies both mystical speculation and practical magic (see AMULETS). Human language, as used for communication, is different from divine language, which is a manifestation of the infinite wisdom of God and the instrument by which the world was created. Since divine power inheres in the letters on which language is based, the semantic aspect of language is merely one among many. Language as sound and, especially, written language as pictures are important means of unraveling divine secrets. Speculation concerning the shapes of the letters began in late antiquity and is contained in texts such as the Alphabet of Rabbi 'Aqiva, an esoteric, Midrashic anthology compiled at the beginning of the geonic period. The earliest kabbalistic work, Sefer ha-Bahir*, also discusses the shapes of the letters and of the vocalization marks. In the second half of the thirteenth century, R. Ya'aqov ben Ya'aqov of Castile wrote a commentary on the shapes of the letters, and his brother, R. Yitshaq, wrote a commentary on the shapes of the te'amim, the marks indicating the tunes to which scripture should be recited. The subject figures prominently in the Zohar. According to the fourteenth-century Sefer ha-Temunah, the image of the alphabet reflects the image of God. Many kabbalistic writings concentrate in particular on the letters that constitute the Tetragrammaton, regarded as the closest possible representative of the essence of God in the created world.

LETTER OF ARISTEAS, a Greek work written by a Jewish author probably in the second half of the second century BCE. It recounts how Ptolemy II, king of Egypt (285–246), wishing to have every possible book included in his Alexandrian library, decided to commission a Greek translation of the Hebrew Torah. He sent messengers to the high priest in Jerusalem, who sent the king seventy-two men, six from each tribe, to prepare the translation. Following a series of royal banquets, during which the king was impressed by the Jews' sagacity and good manners, the translators set to work, completing the whole translation in seventy-two days. The translation was subsequently approved not only by the king but also by the Jewish community of Alexandria, whose members vowed never to alter it in any way. The Letter of Aristeas, besides supplying an account of the origin of the *Septuagint, which may contain a grain of truth, provides an excellent example of the fruitful fusion of Jewish and Greek cultures. Its various Jewish protagonists, whether coming from Jerusalem or from Alexandria, take pride in their loyalty to their ancestral religion but are, nevertheless, open to the Greek culture around them and are willing to adopt many of its elements.

LEV, YOSEF BEN DAVID IBN (c.1505–1580), halakhist born in Monastir (Bitola, Yugoslavia); known by the acronym Maharival. By 1535 Lev had arrived in Salonika, where his fame as a legal authority became firmly established. In 1550 he moved to Constantinople, where he taught in the yeshivah endowed by Donna Gracia Mendes, a great patron of Jewish scholarship. He wrote the responsum that provided the legal basis for the boycott of the port of Ancona in Italy engineered by Donna Gracia in retaliation for the burning of Marranos at the stake. Three volumes of Lev's responsa were published during his lifetime and a fourth shortly thereafter (they were published together in Amsterdam in 1726; new edition, Jerusalem, 1959–1960). Each volume also contains novellae on tractates of the Talmud.

LEVI. See LEVITES.

LEVIATHAN, primeval sea monster mentioned in five different contexts (Is. 27.1; Ps. 74.13–14, 104.25–26; Jb. 3.8, 40.25–41.26), all of which are reminiscent of the demythologized battle between God and his rebellious helpers in the primordial era (see BEHEMOTH). The special reference to God's creation of Leviathan in Psalms 104.25–26 was probably intended to eliminate any doubt that this dragonlike creature was in any way an independent deity in biblical theology (cf. the creation of the tanninim in Gn. 1.21 and the parallelism or association between these two terms in Is. 27.1 and Ps. 74.13–14). In Isaiah 27.1 and Psalms 74.13–14, Leviathan, the many-headed sea serpent vanquished by the God of Israel in primordial times, allegorically symbolizes the forces of evil in the First Temple period (cf. Is. 51.9 from a later period). This symbol of evil and militancy, however, is ultimately derived from ancient, Northwest Semitic mythology, as specifically demonstrated by the Ugaritic literature of the fourteenth through the thirteenth century BCE; for example, "If you smite Lothan [the Ugaritic equivalent of Leviathan], the elusive serpent, destroy the twisting serpent, Shalyat of the seven heads" (KTU 1.5:I:1–3, 27–30). The description of Leviathan in Job 41.11–14 as a scaly monster of supernatural strength, breathing smoke from his nostrils and with flames blazing from his mouth, is a demythologized depiction of a dragonlike creature created by God to serve him, but against whom God was later forced to fight in the primordial era.

According to the Talmud (B. B. 74b), Leviathan was among the sea monsters mentioned in Genesis 1.21. Plotting to destroy the world, he was slain by the Lord, and his flesh was cut up and preserved as sustenance for the righteous in the world to come. Leviathan symbolizes the forces of chaos and evil defeated by the power of good. The kabbalists found esoteric significance in the story of Leviathan, identifying the male and female of the species with *Samael and *Lilith. Maimonides suggested that the Leviathan legends were veiled prophecies referring to future events.

LEVI BEN AVRAHAM BEN HAYYIM (c.1245–1315), French philosopher, encyclopedist, and scholar of the secular sciences. Born in Villefranche-de-Conflent, he lived in Perpignan, Montpellier, Narbonne, Béziers, and finally Arles, where he died. His life was made more difficult by the combination of poverty and persecution by his anti-Maimonist opponents, particularly R. Shelomoh ben Avraham Adret, whom he angered with his allegorical interpretations of scripture. Levi ben Avraham was the author of two extensive works. The first, Battei ha-Nefesh v'eha-Lehashim is an encyclopedia of the physical and metaphysical sciences, logic, and ethics. Begun in Montpellier in 1276, it consists of 1,846 lines in ten chapters, written entirely in rhyming prose. The second work, Livyat Hen, was also an encyclopedic work. It contained his more controversial statements on scripture and aroused the opposition of Adret in 1305. Livyat Hen incorporated three minor works by Levi ben Avraham: Sodot ha-Torah, Sefer ha-Tekhninah, and Sha'ar ha-Arba'im be-Kohot ha-Kokhavim, covering astronomy, astrology, and metaphysics.

LEVI BEN GERSHOM (1288–1344), Provençal Bible commentator, philosopher, talmudist, mathematician, and astronomer; known as Gersonides or by his initials as Ralbag. Levi attempted to solve contradictions between Ptolemy's system and his own astronomical observations, and he invented an instrument to measure the angular distance between two stars, called Jacob's staff, which proved very useful during the following centuries in navigation. He also perfected a camera obscura and propounded an original hypothesis for the movement of the stars. His Milhamot Adonai discusses the major philosophical and theological problems of his time, both supplementing Moses *Maimonides and criticizing him on many points. This work, finished in 1329 (Riva, 1526), is composed of six volumes. Volume one deals with the question of the immortality of the soul; volume two is dedicated to the question of prophecy; volume three to God's knowledge; volume four to divine providence; volume five to astronomy and mathematics (this part of the work, composed of 136 chapters, was not published in printed editions of the book); and volume six to the question of the eternity of the world versus creation ex nihilo. Although Levi exhibited a formal attachment to traditional Jewish doctrines, his thinking was more radically Aristotelian than that of most of his predecessors, and he was greatly influenced by the Arab philosopher Averroës, on several of whose works Levi wrote supercommentaries. Whereas Maimonides, where necessary, gave precedence to revelation over Aristotelian doctrine, Levi endeavored to adapt traditional concepts to Averroistic rationalism; thus he differs from Maimonides in holding that the world was created of eternal matter and not ex nihilo. Levi believed that divine providence is concerned with universals but not individuals, since God cannot know particulars. Immortality depends on the degree of philosophical knowledge that the soul absorbs as a result of its contact with the active intellect; the most advanced stage of this contact is prophecy. Miracles are possible for God, who created the world from formless primal matter by an act of divine will. Levi's Bible commentaries tend to the philosophical and ethical rather than to plain exposition of the text; his endeavor to interpret rationally every detail in the sacred text led him to make far-reaching use of allegory. Levi, who was one of the last Jewish Aristotelians, aroused much controversy, and his views were attacked by Hasda'i ben Avraham *Crescas, who even found some of them heretical. Milhamot Adonai was translated into English as The Wars of the Lord by Seymour Feldman (Philadelphia, 1984).

LEVI BEN SISI (3d cent.), amora'. He is referred to in the Talmud Bavli simply as Levi. A student of Yehudah ha-Nasi', he also collected and compiled tannaitic traditions. Because they do not appear in the Mishnah of Yehudah ha-Nasi', they are sometimes referred to as "the Mishnah of Levi" and are considered baraitot (see BARA'YTA'). The Talmud refers to a tractate Qiddushin "of Levi's academy" (Qid. 76b). Thus, Levi represents a bridge between the tannaitic and amoraic periods.

After the death of Yehudah ha-Nasi', Levi studied with Hanina' bar Hama'. After Hanina' became head of the academy, Levi went to Babylonia and settled in Nehardea. There he became the colleague of Abba' bar Abba'. Levi is most often found in dispute with Rav, a major first-generation Babylonian amora'.

LEVI BEN YEFET (10th–11th cent.), *Karaite scholar; known in Arabic as Abu Sa'id. He was the son of exegete Yefet ben 'Ali and lived in Jerusalem. He was recognized as an authority on religious law, and his Arabic code of law, translated into Hebrew as Sefer ha-Mitsvot, was widely used by later Karaite authors. He taught Yeshu'a ben Yehudah, who became an important authority. Levi also wrote Nukat, a commentary on some books of the Bible; an abridgment of David Alfasi's Jami' al-Alfaz; a book discussing the disagreements about legal matters between his father and Sahl ben Matsliah; an abridgment of the biblical commentary of Sahl ben Matsliah; a work on the masoretic differences between Aharon ben Mosheh Ben Asher and Mosheh ben David Ben Naftali; and also, evidently, a work of Kalam theology called Kitab al-Ni'ma. If Levi were indeed the author of this last book, he would have been the first fully to introduce this school of thought into Karaism. Only small fragments of his code of law have been published, although large parts of it and his other works exist in manuscript.

LEVIRATE MARRIAGE (Heb. yibbum). Biblical law requires the brother of a deceased, childless man to marry the *widow in order that the "firstborn will succeed in the name of the dead brother, and his name will not be blotted out of Israel." If the levir (yavam) does not wish to marry the widow (yevamah) then the ceremony of halitsah must take place before she may remarry (Dt. 25.5–10). In the Talmud, the scope of yibbum is confined to paternal brothers and to cases in which there is no child of either sex, including a mamzer (Yev. 22b, 17b). In principle, the obligation to fulfill the mitsvah of yibbum devolves upon the oldest surviving brother, but in practice any brother may perform it (Yev. 24a). Prior to yibbum or halitsah, the widow is known as a shomeret yavam. If she marries someone else, the marriage is prohibited but valid, and the offspring are not mamzerim (Yev. 13b). Where a levirate marriage would constitute a prohibited but valid union, halitsah is still required (Yev. 16a). The obligation of yibbum applies even to a yavam whose birth preceded his brother's death by as little as one day. In such a case, the widow must wait until he comes of legal age in order that he may either marry her or give her halitsah (Yev. 105b). Biblical law does not require a formal marriage ceremony between yavam and yevamah, but the rabbis insisted upon such a wedding, which is known as qiddushei ma'amar (Yev. 4.7). The issue of the precedence of halitsah over yibbum was debated in the Talmud (Yev. 39a–b), and, in the Middle Ages, it resolved itself into a division between Sephardim and Ashkenazim. The former tended to favor yibbum, both in order to spare the yavam the indignity of halitsah and for kabbalistic reasons concerned with the welfare of the dead brother's soul (Resp. Bet Yosef, end). A taqqanah of the Israeli chief rabbinate in 1950 brought the practice to an end in Erets Yisra'el, even among Sephardi Jews. Ashkenazi authorities followed the view of Abba' Sha'ul (Yev. 39b) to the effect that halitsah takes precedence. The reason behind this view is that since yibbum normally constitutes a forbidden marriage, it is only permitted if performed solely for the purpose of the mitsvah of continuing the dead man's line. Any other motivation brings yibbum dangerously close to *incest. The additional fact that polygamy was banned by Ashkenazi communities, following the taqqanah of R. Gershom, led to the gradual disappearance of yibbum among these communities. Halitsah takes place before a court of five judges and consists of the yevamah reading the relevant biblical passage; drawing off the levir's right shoe, which is made especially for the purpose of halitsah and the design of which is specified by the halakhah; and spitting on the ground in front of him as a sign of contempt and rebuke for shirking the duty of perpetuating his brother's name. Following halitsah, the widow may not marry the levir or any of his brothers, and she is forbidden to a priest. In the modern period, the problem of the apostate levir was one motivation for the development of the concept of conditional marriage, and the problem of absent, recalcitrant, or minor levirs gave rise to a range of prenuptial legal instruments designed to avert the need for halitsah in such circumstances. Under Israeli law, a recalcitrant levir may be imprisoned, and halitsah may be compelled, in an approach similar to that used to obtain a get from a recalcitrant husband. Conservative and Reform Judaism do not recognize levirate marriage, although in some Conservative circles the need for halitsah is discussed.

LEVITES (Heb. Leviyim), descendants of the ancient tribe of Levi, third of the twelve sons of Jacob. In biblical times, the Levites, to whom Moses himself belonged, were never a unified group assigned to a particular geographic region (Gr. 49.7; Nm. 18.24; Dt. 10.8–9; Jos. 13.33) but were indigent religious functionaries dispersed throughout the countryside.

According to the non-Priestly tradition, the privileges of priesthood were given to the entire tribe of Levi, in recognition for its faithfulness to God in the wilderness (Ex. 32.25–29; Dt. 10.6–9, 33.8–11). Their duties included providing cultic instruction; carrying the Ark; officiating at Temple sacrifice; and receiving the sacred portions of offerings, tithes, and firstborn animals. This role could be performed at local shrines as well as at the central Temple; any member of the tribe of Levi who presented himself at such a location could serve as a priest. Deuteronomy agrees, though it does not recognize the legitimacy of local shrines (Dt. 17.9, 17.18, 18.1, 21.5, 24.8). It views the provincial Levites as a class of unfortunates to be sustained by the alms of other Israelites (Dt. 12.12, 18–19, 14.27, 16.11, 14), including the third-year tithe (Dt. 14.28–29), and allows them to join their fellow Levites at the central Temple and serve there as full priests (Dt. 18.6–8). This law probably reflects historical development: following the centralization of worship in Jerusalem under King *Josiah, some local Levites were probably permitted to come to Jerusalem (2 Kgs. 23.8).

The Priestly literature differs. It maintains that the tribe is composed of two classes: priests (descendants of *Aaron; see PRIESTHOOD), and the remainder of the Levites. The insurrection of Korah (Nm. 16–17) established the primacy of the priests over the Levites. The latter were dedicated to God as a substitute for the Israelite *firstborn, who belonged to God from the moment he spared them in Egypt (Nm. 3.5–51); they were then consecrated by a special ceremony (Nm. 8). The priests alone officiated in the *Tabernacle; the Levites were not permitted to come into contact with the most holy objects. They were assigned the secondary tasks of erecting, dismantling, and carrying the Tabernacle and the sacred objects; forming a human guard, preventing non-priests from encroaching upon the Tabernacle precincts by surrounding it both in camp and on the march; and assisting the priests with general duties (Nm. 18.2). It has been suggested that the name Levi comes from the Hebrew nilvah (accompany). They were eligible for the first task from age twenty (1 Chr. 23.24), twenty-five (Nm. 8.24), or thirty (Nm. 4.3) until age fifty. Even those Levites above the age of fifty were not exempt from guard duty (Nm. 8.25–26). After entering Erets Yisra'el, the Levites resided in the *Levitical cities, since they were not given any residential or farm land (Nm. 18.21–24).

During the time of the First Temple, following the centralization of worship, in particular, nonpriestly Levites became a distinct class. They continued to perform sacred guard duty and assisted in the Temple service. In time they assumed responsibility for all musical aspects of worship: singing of psalms of prayer and praise, and instrumental accompaniment first reflected in Kings and stressed in Chronicles. By Second Temple times, the Levites were few in number (Ezr. 2.36–39, 8.15–19; Neh. 11.3–24), indicating that the actual composition of the Levitical tribe had changed over the centuries. Nevertheless the distinction between priests and (all other) Levites is rigorously maintained by Ezekiel (though not by Malachi) as well as in post-biblical Jewish tradition down to the present. Second Temple practice, as reflected in Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles, as well as rabbinic law institutionalized the separation, further dividing Levites (like the priests) into twenty-four divisions that functioned in rotation throughout the year. Virtually all cultic functions and privileges, including tithes, were removed from the Levites. They served as gatekeepers, and the main emphasis was placed on their musical role, performing “song and psalmody” as a prominent feature of the Temple service (for example, the festival Musaf prayer). Even in post-Temple Judaism, the identity of Levitical families and their secondary status to that of the priests have been preserved; a priest is still called first to the reading of the Torah, followed by a Levite; Levites still perform the ritual washing of the hands of the priests when the latter are to pronounce *Birkat ha-Kohanim in the synagogue.

LEVITICAL CITIES, towns set apart for members of the tribe of Levi. According to the Priestly tradition in the Bible, God instructed Moses to select forty-eight walled cities from the territories of the tribes and assign them to the *Levites (Nm. 35.1–8). These towns were to include the six *asylum cities; according to rabbinic law, all forty-eight became cities of asylum. Since the Levites, as a sacerdotal tribe, were given no residential or farm land, their city homes were their sole residences. They were inalienable: according to Leviticus 25.32–34, the Levite who sold his house could, unlike other Israelites (Lv. 29–31), purchase it back even after a year had elapsed, and in any case it would revert to him in the jubilee (see YOVEL). The Levites were also entitled to pasture their flocks in a two-thousand-cubit square around the assigned towns; some commentators believe that the amount of pasture land expanded as the town grew. This land, however, was not for cultivation and remained the property of the tribe in whose territory it was located. For their livelihood, the Levites depended on tithes, not agriculture. Probably the towns themselves were not exclusively Levite; the local tribe must have also made up a portion of the population. The actual list of towns, including ten on the east side of the Jordan and thirteen that are exclusively priestly cities, is given in Joshua 21; it appears again with minor differences in 1 Chronicles 6.

LEVITICUS, BOOK OF (Heb. Va-Yiqra' [And (the Lord) Called]), third book of the Torah, whose Hebrew title is from the opening phrase of the book. It was also called Torat Kohanim (Instruction for the Priests) in rabbinic times; hence, its Greek name Levitikon (Things Pertaining to the Levites; i.e., the priests, who are from the tribe of Levi). Leviticus takes up the biblical narrative from the time the divine presence enters the Tabernacle on the first day of Nisan in the year following the Exodus. From within, God calls to Moses and imparts to him, in a series of encounters, the laws pertaining to sacrifice (chaps. 1–7), priestly sobriety (10.8–11), permitted and forbidden foods (chap. 11), the purification and atonement following physical defilement (chaps. 12–15), the annual Yom Kippur, on which the Tabernacle is cleansed of Israel's impurities (chap. 16), prohibitions against blood and profane slaughter (chap. 17), sexual crimes (chaps. 18 and 20), miscellaneous regulations assuring Israel's holiness (chap. 19), the qualifications for priestly service (chap. 21) and for sacrificial animals (chap. 22), the weekly Sabbath and annual festivals (chap. 23), the oil for the Tabernacle lamp (24.1–4), the showbread (24.5–9), the principle of an eye for an eye in damages (24.17–22), and the sabbatical and jubilee years, including laws of slavery and property rights (chap. 25). This last divine address concludes with a lengthy speech promising reward for compliance and punishment for failure to obey (26.3–45), after which there follows a summary (26.46). Thereafter, the laws of vows and tithes (chap. 27) are appended. The only events that interrupt the lawgiving are the dedication of the priesthood (chap. 8) and of the Tabernacle (chap. 9), the crime and immediate death of Aaron's sons (10.1–7, 12–20), and the crime of the blasphemer and his execution (24.10–16, 23). The lawgiving takes about one and a half months, after which the preparations for leaving Sinai commence (Nm. 1). Bible critics assign Leviticus to the Priestly source and agree that chapters 17–26, along with some other passages, belong to a distinct literary stratum (the *Holiness Code) that may be later than the kernel of the Priestly document. Leviticus is divided into ten weekly portions, read in the synagogue from early spring until before Shavu'ot. In Talmudic times, it was customary for small children to begin their study of the Bible with Leviticus, on the grounds that it is fitting for the pure (i.e., children) to engage in the study of purity (i.e., the laws of purification and atonement). LEVITICUS RABBAH, an aggadic midrash to the Book of Leviticus, included in the compilation commonly referred to as *Midrash Rabbah. Compiled in Erets Yisra'el in approximately the fifth century CE, Leviticus Rabbah contains exegetical comments, parables, and stories—many containing popular and folkloristic elements—in Rabbinic Hebrew and Galilean Aramaic, relating to verses in the Book of Leviticus; these are divided into thirty-seven sections (parashiyyot). Unlike other compilations of the period (see GENESIS RABBAH), the Midrashic comments contained in a parashah of Leviticus Rabbah are related to only a few selected verses from the relevant biblical pericope. Each section typically includes several, usually lengthy, petiḥot (see PETIḤAH), followed by a collection of comments and stories, which, while formally expounding one or more verses from the pericope, often coalesce around a single theme. Many sections conclude with a message of comfort concerning personal or national salvation. For these reasons Leviticus Rabbah is described as a homiletical midrash as opposed to an exegetical midrash, as exemplified by Genesis Rabbah. Many parallels to the midrash are found in other rabbinic works, especially the Talmud Yerushalmi, Genesis Rabbah, and Pesiḳta de-Rav Kahana; the last includes entire sections almost identical with those in Leviticus Rabbah.

LEVI YITSHAQ OF BERDICHEV (1740–1809), Hasidic master. He was among the leading disciples of *Dov Ber of Mezheritsch, and his notebooks of his master's writings are the source for several published collections of Dov Ber's teachings. Levi Yitshaq served briefly as rabbi of Ryczów, and later in Zelechów and in Pinsk. He had to leave both of the latter communities because of opposition to Hasidism. Publicly identified as a leader of the new movement, Levi Yitshaq engaged in a debate with R. Avraham Katzenellenbogen in 1781, and both parties claimed victory. In 1785 Levi Yitshaq became both communal rabbi and Hasidic rebbe of Berdichev, a major Jewish community in the Ukraine, where he remained until his death. He was the leading representative of the Mezheritsch school of Hasidism in that area. His own book, Qedushat Levi (Berdichev, 1811), is a collection of homilies that continues Dov Ber's line of thought, including the insubstantiality of the corporeal world, the possibility of worshiping God through all things, and the identity of Torah with the essential, innermost self of every Jew. The figure of the tsaddiq is to be found quite frequently in the Qedushat Levi, though somewhat less prominently than in the writings of some others in the Mezheritsch school. Other teachings are included in Shemu'ah Tovah (Warsaw, 1938). There are several Yiddish collections of tales exclusively devoted to him: Niflo'os Qedushas Levi (Bilgoraj, 1911), Niflo'os Beys Helevi (Piotrków, 1911), and Melits Yoisher (Lwów, 1929), and he figures prominently in many other collections. After Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer *Ba'al Shem Tov, Levi Yitshaq is the favorite Hasidic master in the Jewish folk imagination. Such widespread veneration is said to stem from his love for all Israel, including both the simple and the sinners, and his willingness to carry their cases before God, even arguing with heavenly justice and daring to reprove God for the sufferings of Israel.

LEWANDOWSKI, LOUIS (1821–1894), composer and the first Jewish choral director. He left his native Poland at the age of twelve, following the death of his mother, and became a boy soprano under Cantor Ascher Lion of Berlin. With financial support from Alexander Mendelssohn (a Jewish cousin of Felix), Lewandowski became the first Jew to study at the Berlin Academy of Fine Arts. In 1840, he returned to serve Cantor Lion as choir director at the Old Synagogue in Berlin. Lion was succeeded by Cantor Abraham J. Lichtenstein, who inspired Lewandowski to arrange synagogue song for four-part singing. In 1866, after studying with Salomon *Sulzer in Vienna, Lewandowski was named choral director of the New Synagogue in Berlin. Lewandowski's Kol Rinah u-Tefillah for solo and two-part chorus was published in 1871; his Todah Ve-Zimrah (1876–1882), featuring works for solo, congregational singing, and four-part chorus (with optional organ accompaniment), included compositions for the entire calendar year. Lewandowski's solo recitatives are reminiscent of the eastern European tradition of his youth, which he studied further with immigrant cantors from the region. His choral works, much in the style of Felix Mendelssohn, are more Western in flavor.

LIBATION (Heb. neseikh), offering of wine or oil. Each of the animal sacrifices in the Temple was accompanied by a meal offering and a libation (Nm. 15.1–16) of wine, which was poured into a bowl in the southwest corner of the altar, from where it flowed through a shallow cavity into the depths of the altar foundation (Suk. 48a). In the case of a lamb, the libation consisted of a quarter hin of wine; for a ram, a third of a hin; and for an ox, a half hin. Sometimes the sacrifice (especially a meal offering) was offered with oil, which was either poured over the sacrifice or in which the sacrifice was soaked. During Sukkot, when prayers for rain (see TEFILLAT GESHEM) are offered, water libation formed part of the Temple service.

LIEBERMAN, SAUL (1898–1983), Talmudic scholar. Born in Motol, Belorussia, Lieberman attended the yeshivot of Malch and Slobodka as well as the University of Kiev. Immigrating to Jerusalem in 1928, he concluded his studies of Talmudic philology and Greek language and literature at Hebrew University. He lectured at Hebrew University and was affiliated with the Mizrahi Teachers' Seminary and the Harry Fischel Institute for Talmudic Research until 1940, when he joined the faculty of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America in New York. A preeminent Talmud scholar, Lieberman attracted and trained scores of students in both Israel and the United States. His scholarship addressed all aspects of Jewish life in Palestine during Talmudic times: his Greek in Jewish Palestine (1942) and Hellenism in Jewish Palestine (1950) discussed the role of Hellenistic culture; his controversial Talmudah shel Keisaryah (1931) suggested a new chronology for the compilation of the Jerusalem Talmud; and his Tosefet Ri'shonim (4 vols.

LIEN. A debtor's personal obligation to repay his creditor automatically creates a lien upon the debtor's real property, referred to variously as aharayut or shi'bud nekhasim, thereby encumbering the property in the creditor's favor until the loan is repaid or the debtor is released by the creditor. The lien attaches to all of the debtor's property, including property acquired by the debtor after the date of the loan, unless the parties restrict the lien to specific assets.

The lien follows the property into the hands of subsequent purchasers, but only if the debt transaction creating the lien was consummated in writing, thereby achieving a level of publicity deemed sufficient to put subsequent purchasers on notice about the lien. The creditor is restricted from collecting the debt from a subsequent purchaser so long as the debtor himself possesses sufficient assets to repay the debt, and he must levy against later purchasers before he may turn to earlier ones.

LIFE is considered God's supreme blessing (Dt. 30.19), breathed into humans by God himself (Gn. 2.7). The Torah itself is a "tree of life" (Prv. 3.18), and by giving it to Israel, God has planted eternal life in our midst. The purpose of the commandments is "that man shall live by them" (Lv. 18.5), a phrase to which the rabbis added "and not die by them" (Yoma' 85b). Hence, all laws—with the exception only of the cardinal sins of idolatry, bloodshed, and illicit sex (incest and adultery)—are liable to suspension in case of danger to life (San. 74a). As long as there is life there is hope, and "a living dog is better than a dead lion" (Eccl. 9.4). The biblical emphasis on life in this world (see Ps. 115.17, "The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence") was generally maintained in Jewish tradition, in spite of the increasing importance of belief in an afterlife, which was perceived as the true life eternal. The positive attitude toward physical life is also attested by the Amidah's dogmatic affirmation of the bodily resurrection of the dead, rather than the expectation of eternal life of the soul in a spiritual realm. The infinite value of every human life is solemnly asserted in the court's instruction to witnesses in capital trials: "Whoever destroys one life is as if he destroyed a whole world, and whoever preserves one life is as if he preserved a whole world" (San. 4.5). Hastening death even by one minute is considered tantamount to bloodshed, and rabbinic law prohibits euthanasia.

LIFNIM MI-SHURAT HA-DIN (לִפְנֵי מִשְׁרַת הַדִּין; inside the line of justice). The common equivalent of this Talmudic concept is the notion of going beyond the letter of the law in order to do the right and good deed (Dt. 6.18) and not to rest content with the mere fulfillment of the literal requirements of the law. The concept is derived from the biblical injunction to follow the "practices of the Torah" (Ex. 18.20), which is interpreted by R. El'azar to refer to lifnim mi-shurat ha-din (Mekhilta, Yitro 2, 198). The Talmud cites as examples of lifnim mi-shurat ha-din the restoration of lost property to its owners when the law does not so require (B. M. 24b) and the payment of compensation for damage caused as a result of erroneous expert advice for which, by law, there is generally no liability. This type of ethical behavior is not legally required, but the court may, in certain cases, enforce obligations which fall under this rubric.

LIGHT. In addition to its physical properties, light serves almost universally as a symbol of life, blessing, peace, knowledge, understanding, redemption, the soul, and good; whereas darkness represents chaos, death, ignorance, sin, suffering, and evil. God's first creation was light (Gen. 1.3–4), and in later theology, God himself was defined as light and the source of light. The Torah, too, is "a light," and to be blessed is to "walk in the light of God's face." In the Second Temple period the theology of light was further developed. Sectarian circles (see QUMRAN COMMUNITY) expressed the opposition between God's elect and the reprobate as one between the children of light and the children of darkness; this usage subsequently passed into the New Testament. Hellenistic philosophers, Philo in particular, and Neoplatonists made much use of light symbolism when speaking of spiritual and divine realities. In mystical literature both the symbolism and the experience of higher, heavenly (viz., spiritual) light played an important role. Kabbalistic writers, especially, use light synonymously with divine substance, spiritual essence, and the like and describe cosmic and mystical processes in terms of the emanation and retraction (tsimtsum) of supernal lights. The symbolic significance of light is reflected by the frequent ritual use of lights, in particular of *candles and candelabra. From the *Menorah in the Temple to the Sabbath lamp and the lights of Ḥanukkah, from the *ner tamid in the synagogue to the medieval custom of lighting a candle for the soul of the deceased (in the mourning period and on the *yortsayt), Jewish thought and practice share the perennial symbolic significance of light.

LILIENTHAL, MAX (1815–1882), rabbi and educator. Born in Munich, he was appointed preacher and Jewish school director in Riga in 1839, working with the czarist government in its plan to found state Jewish schools that would combine religious and secular education. The Jewish community, the Ḥasidim in particular, felt that the object of the czarist proposal was to undermine traditional Jewish education and encourage assimilation and conversion to Christianity. Despite the opposition of Lithuanian Jewry, Lilienthal continued to promote the scheme. In 1842 he was invited to be rabbi of Odessa, but now suspicious himself about the motivations of the government, which was issuing anti-Jewish legislation, he resigned his post in 1844 and immigrated to the United States. There he officiated as a rabbi first in New York City and then, in 1854, in Cincinnati, where he served the Bene Israel congregation and taught at Hebrew Union College. He was a moderate reformer who worked with Isaac Mayer *Wise in disseminating Reform Judaism in the Midwest. Lilienthal adopted a universalistic Judaism, opposing the belief in a return to Zion. He was president of the beit din of the American association of rabbis formed by himself and Wise and wrote extensively in the Jewish press.

LILITH (Heb. Lilit), an ancient (possibly Sumerian) name for a goddess, which occurs once in the Bible. Because of the similarity of the name Lilith to the word laylah (night), the name came to be interpreted as referring to a nocturnal spirit. In Talmudic legend she is described as the first wife of Adam, before Eve, and as the mother of demons born from this union. She plays a principal role in a ninth-century narrative cycle, the Pseudo-Ben Sira or the Alphabet of Ben Sira: as Adam's first wife, created, like him, from the earth, she demanded equality with him. When he refused, she ran away and united with "the great demon." Three angels pursued her by God's command: Sanoy, Sansanoy, and Samangelof (probably a parody of Heikhalot angelic names). They let her go when she promised not to harm babies protected by amulets carrying their names. Following this story, Lilith became a demon who harms babies and young children. She also began to appear as the sexual temptress of pious individuals. In the kabbalistic system of R. Yitshaq ben Ya'aqov ha-Kohen of Castile, formulated in his Ma'amar 'al ha-'Atsilut in the second half of the thirteenth century, Lilith is the spouse of *Samael and the feminine counterpart of the *Shekhinah in the system of evil powers. He also distinguished between the "elder Lilith," who is Samael's wife, and "the younger Lilith," who is the wife of *Asmodeus and a lower power in the system of evil, but coveted by Samael. Lilith is described in this treatise as "half woman, half fire." The Zoharic mythology adopted all these motifs and added many others. Subsequently Lilith became a central figure of evil in popular and folkloristic tales. A popular Jewish feminist magazine has been entitled Lilith.

LIMA, MOSHEH BEN YITSHAQ YEHUDAH (1610–1666), Lithuanian rabbinical scholar. After serving as rabbi in Slonim, he was appointed av beit din in Vilna, where his colleagues were R. *Shabbetai ben Me'ir ha-Kohen and R. Efrayim ben Ya'aqov ha-Kohen. The Lithuanian rabbis had rejected the pilpulistic approach to Talmudic study common in Poland and were adopting new and less dialectical approaches. Lima wrote Helqat ha-Mehoqueq (Kraków, 1670) on Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer, dealing with laws of personal status. It was criticized by R. Shemu'el ben Uri Shraga Phoebus in his Beit Shemu'el, but the two men collaborated on Qunteres ha-'Agunot, dealing with the laws of 'agunot (incorporated into standard editions of the Shulhan 'Arukh). Unlike Ashkenazi commentators (but like the Sephardim), they based their decisions on later commentators without going back to the Talmud and geonic literature.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS, or statutes of limitations, are essentially not part of Jewish jurisprudence. The Talmud, for example (Ket. 104a), affirms that a creditor may seek to recover a debt at any time.

There were a number of classical exceptions to this rule. The Talmud recounts that there is a twenty-five year statute of limitations on the collection of a ketubbah payment (Ket. 104a). A two-year statute of limitations was placed on the right of a widow to collect maintenance from the estate of her late husband (Ket. 96a).

In certain circumstances, Jewish law would view the delay in bringing a lawsuit for the collection of a debt as a presumption that the debt was not, in fact, valid, although this is closer to the modern legal doctrine of estoppel than to limitation of actions (see Shulhan 'Arukh, Hoshen Mishpat 61.0 and 98.1).

LIQUT 'ATSAMOT (ליקוט עצמות); gathering of the bones), the collection of bones for final burial. In ancient Erets Yisra'el, the deceased were not immediately buried in the ground. They were placed in burial chambers until their bodies were reduced to skeletons. Then, after a year, the bones were removed by the children of the deceased and buried. Mourning rites were observed on that day with the omission of formal acts of comforting the mourners and a full eulogy. However, it was permitted to offer words of praise. The bones were treated with reverence, and the ceremony could not take place on the intermediate days of the festivals, since it was incompatible with the joy of festival times.

LITURGICAL RESPONSES. See RESPONSES, LITURGICAL.

LITURGY (in the Septuagint, Gr. leitourgia [service, worship]), the public prayer service. In biblical times the divine service par excellence was the one performed by the *priesthood with *sacrifices and the singing of psalms by the *Levites at the Jerusalem *Temple. Only at the end of the Second Temple period was there an increasing participation of the ordinary worshiper in Temple liturgy (see MA'AMAD). Also at that time, a new focus of worship, that of studying Torah on the Sabbath, became a regular phenomenon in Jewish religious practice. Only after the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE did Jewish liturgy center in the *synagogue, combining reading of the Bible with fixed prayers (see 'AMIDAH; SHEMA'), which were the main features of liturgy in Talmudic times, framed by either *silent prayer or public readings (see PESUQEI DE-ZIMRA). Until the third century, the statutory prayers were allowed to be recited in any language, but Greek was the most popular. From then on, the dominant language used in the liturgy was Hebrew, with a few Aramaic exceptions, such as the Qaddish. Only in the nineteenth century was the vernacular reintroduced into Reform liturgy. After the Talmudic period, Jewish liturgy was expanded with the introduction of poetic embellishments of the prayers, the piyyut. This innovation originated in late Byzantine Erets Yisra'el, and from there spread to Europe, where it flourished from the sixth through the thirteenth century. The dominance of the Babylonian center in the geonic period is reflected in the codification of the liturgy in the eighth to the eleventh century. This step involved fixing the wordings of the prayers, providing instructions in ceremonial law, and determining a selection of piyyutim. Out of these efforts the first *prayer books were created. In the following centuries, Jewish liturgy maintained a basic unity in structure and in its main features, inherited from former periods, but also exhibiting a rich variety of regional rites, defined by differences in wording, the selection of the poetic parts, and details in ritual. Printing (which led to standardization), *codification of law, and the spread of Jewish mysticism (*Kabbalah) had a growing influence on liturgy. At the beginning of the nineteenth century in Europe, the growing stress on devotion found its expression in the introduction of new forms focusing on the experience of the participant (see HASIDISM; REFORM JUDASIM). In Israel, developments in the liturgy are characterized by mutual influences.

Jewish liturgy is not only defined by the text itself (see MAHAZOR), but by nearly two thousand years of evaluation of it in various disciplines; this has produced a large literature on the subject. The main focuses of traditional approaches are the halakhic, defining liturgy as the performance of divine prescriptions according to written and *oral law (see HALAKHAH); the philosophical, asking the question (in Talmudic times) how can I worship God and (in the Middle Ages) who am I that I should worship God?; and the mystical, regarding prayer as an act of communication. Modern scientific approaches, pioneered by the *Wissenschaft des Judentums movement in the early nineteenth century, include the philological, based on textual and historical research; the literary, seeing liturgy as text and examining the relationship of form and content; and the anthropological, seeing the liturgy as ceremony, involving social and psychological issues, and regarding such phenomena as *music and synagogue art as integral parts of Jewish liturgy. Under the influence of the Enlightenment and Emancipation, the various non-Orthodox trends have introduced modifications of the traditional liturgy, including abbreviations and omission of prayers felt to be incompatible with their beliefs.

LOANS. The injunction to lend money to one in need is a positive precept (Ex. 22.24; Lv. 25.36), while the refusal to grant a loan involves the transgression of a prohibition. The Bible warns against refusing to lend money at the approach of the shemittah*, during which debts were relaxed (see PEROZBOL). The rabbis enacted several ordinances to facilitate borrowing and regarded the lending of money as more important than charity (Shab. 63a), since it enables the borrower to stand on his own feet without feeling shame or humiliation. As potential recipients of loans, the poor take precedence over the rich, relatives over strangers, local persons over those from other towns. Where no date for repayment is stipulated, the normal loan period is thirty days, and repayment may not be claimed before the end of this period (Mak. 3b). Upon default of the borrower, no claim may be made against the guarantor before the thirty-day period ends. A loan contracted without recourse to a written deed is secured only by the movable property of the borrower; a loan contracted by deed is secured also by his immovable property. No interest may be demanded or offered between a borrower and lender who are both Jews (Ex. 22.24). See also MONEYLENDING.

LOGOS (Gr.; word, speech, reason), in Jewish theology, the word of God by which the universe was created. Although in a sense an aspect of the divine, the Logos often appears as a separate entity, namely, a half-personal *emanation of God. The concept was appropriated by *Philo in order to bridge the gap between the transcendent God of Judaism and the divine principle experienced by human beings. This view of the Logos as a mediating principle between God and material creation could link up with biblical references to the creative "Word of God," by which the heavens were made (Ps. 33.6) and with the concept of meimra' (Aram.; word) in *Targum literature (especially as it appears in Targum Onkelos). In Proverbs, Job, and in certain apocryphal books the concept of divine *wisdom (hokhmah) has some of the qualities of the Logos. Early Christianity took up the notion of Logos and in the Gospel of John (1.1), the Logos as an eternal, divine principle is said to have been made flesh in the person of Jesus. This emphasizes the redemptive function of the Logos as an exclusive vehicle of salvation, rather than its creative or revelatory function. As such, it became a major feature of Christian theology, and this fact possibly contributed to the disappearance of the whole Philonic tradition from Jewish thought. In "kabbalistic literature," concepts similar to that of Logos reappear in the doctrine of sefirot*.

LONZANO, MENAHEM (c.1550-1623), kabbalist, poet, and rabbinical editor, who lived and wrote in Constantinople, Safed, Venice, and Jerusalem. He wrote and published Midrashic commentaries and linguistic notes on the Talmud, as well as prayers and moralistic poetry. He criticized Yitshaq *Luria's interpretation of the esoteric parts of the Zohar and became a controversial figure among the kabbalists, who attacked him for such an audacious attitude. Lonzano traveled through many Mediterranean towns in his search for kabbalistic manuscripts to be studied and published. He opposed the poet Yisra'el ben Mosheh *Najara for his erotic descriptions of the relationship between the God of Israel and his people, accusing Najara of sacrilege.

LOOKSTEIN, JOSEPH (1902-1979), Orthodox rabbi in the United States. A proponent of the harmonization of Orthodoxy with American culture, Lookstein was born in Mogilev, Russia, and grew up on the Lower East Side of New York City and in the Brownsville section of Brooklyn. He was ordained at the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary in 1926 and subsequently earned advanced degrees in sociology from Columbia University. Lookstein served Congregation Kehilath Jeshurun for fifty-three years (from 1926 to 1979). As a professor of sociology, practical rabbinics, and homiletics at Yeshiva Rabbi Isaac Elchanan, he stressed the importance of decorum and sermonics to his students. In 1936 he founded the Ramaz School, a leading integrated Orthodox day school, and served as its principal. In 1958 he was appointed acting president of Bar-Ilan University in Israel and subsequently served as its president. His books include Judaism in Theory and Practice (New York, 1931) and Faith and Destiny of Man (New York, 1967).

LOST PROPERTY. The finder of lost property is required to seek its owner and restore the property (Dt. 22.1-3). Even the property of one's enemy is to be returned (Ex. 23.4). With the exception of certain articles that lack any identification mark and that their owner would presumably despair of finding as soon as he knew they were lost (e.g., scattered coins), advertisement of the found property is to be made (in post-Temple times, this was done in the academy, the synagogue, or study center). The announcement is to be worded in general terms, and the applicant must be able to prove his ownership by describing marks of identification. The lost article is to be kept in good order by the finder until claimed; the finder is considered in law a bailee and is not entitled to a reward. A finder who knows the identity of the owner but does not inform him is guilty of a severe crime and is punished accordingly. If the owner does not claim the property, the finder is regarded as the owner. Regulations vary according to the kind of property lost and found (for example, animals whose upkeep involves expense for the finder). The subject is discussed in detail in tractate Bava' Metsi'a'*.

LOST TEN TRIBES. See TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

LOT, grandson of Terah and son of Haran, Abraham's younger brother. Lot migrated with Abraham's family to Canaan from Haran and accompanied him in his journey in Canaan and Egypt (Gn. 12.10-20, 13.1). Upon their return from Egypt, Abraham's and Lot's shepherds quarreled, leading Abraham to suggest that they separate from one another. Lot chose to dwell in the then fruitful Jordan plain in Sodom, whereas Abraham remained in the mountain area, in Hebron.

In Genesis 14, Lot was rescued by Abraham and his 318 men after being taken captive in battle. Before God destroyed the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, he sent two emissaries to rescue Lot and his family (Gn. 19.1-29). During their escape from Sodom, Lot's wife disobeyed the angel's orders, looked back at the destruction, and was turned into a pillar of salt. After the destruction of the cities, Lot and his two daughters found refuge in a cave nearby. The daughters, believing that they were the only survivors left in the world, got Lot drunk with wine and each one cohabited with him. Their sons were given the pejorative names Moab (From the [Same] Father) and Ben-ammi (Son of the [Same] Clan), the ancestors of the Transjordanian peoples, the Moabites and the Ammonites.

This story explains the biblical ethnic view that the Moabites and the Ammonites were related to the ancestors of the Israelite nation (1 Sm. 22.3-4; Ruth 4.17-21; Nm. 21.24) but that their births were the result of incest. This tradition is later mentioned in Deuteronomy 2.9-19, where Moab and Ammon are called "children of Lot" (see also Ps. 83.9).

LO' TA'ASEH (לֹא תַעֲשֶׂה; do not do), a negative commandment; a term generally used to refer to a negative biblical commandment. Jewish law generally divides biblical obligations into positive and negative commandments. Within the category of negative commandments are those that prohibit activity (for example, "do not murder," Ex. 20.13) and those that compel activity ("do not stand by while one's neighbor's blood is shed," Lv. 19.16). Yet other negative commandments are connected to positive commandments, such as the prohibition against stealing, which is linked with the positive obligation to return what one has stolen. According to medieval calculations, there are 365 negative commandments among the 613 mitsvot in the Pentateuch. See also 'ASEH; COMMANDMENTS, 613; MITSVAH.

LOTS. The casting of lots as a means of making decisions is documented in the Bible and in post-biblical literature. In the Bible lots were used to single out one or more members of a group; for example, in the election of a king (1 Sm. 10.20-21), the designation of the scapegoat for Yom Kippur (Lv. 16.8-10), or the designation of 14 Adar as the day on which the Persians would murder the Jews (Est. 3.7). In addition, lots were used to divide booty or conquered territory (Is. 17.14; Na. 3.10); for example, the apportioning of the land of Canaan (Nm. 26.52-56; Jos. 14-19). The casting of lots was understood to reflect divine will and was also used as a means of communicating with God in connection with the Urim and Thummim (1 Sm. 14.41-42; see ORACLES).

According to the Talmud, priestly roles were determined by lot (Yoma 2.3–4), and the method of casting lots was described in some detail. The lots were placed in an urn and shaken, and one was taken in each hand. If the one marked "for the Lord" turned up in the right hand, it was considered a positive sign (Yoma 3.9, 4.1). Josephus reports that the defenders of Masada chose ten of their number to kill the remaining survivors as part of a suicide pact, so that they would not be captured by the Romans. The Israeli archaeologist Yigael Yadin, who excavated the site at Masada, found marked ostraca that he suggested were these original lots.

LOVE (Heb. ahavah). The love between men and women is frequently referred to in the Bible (Gn. 29.18, 29.20; Dt. 21.5; Jgs. 16.4), but the same word is also applied to relationships such as those between parents and children, between a person and fellow human beings (Lv. 19.18, 19.34), and between the individual and God (Dt. 6.5, 11.1, 13.4). It was the allegorical interpretation of erotic love as spiritual love that was responsible for the inclusion, or the retention, of the Song of Songs in the biblical canon. The prophets frequently use the image of matrimonial love to describe the relationship between God and Israel, most dramatically by Hosea; the prophets also describe the love between God and Israel as the love of a father for his son. In rabbinic literature the idea of the love of God as a supreme religious value is further developed, and in the Middle Ages the love of God acquired mystical connotations. According to the Talmud, the highest form of service to God is service "out of love," contrasted with "service out of fear" (Ned. 31a). God's love for Israel as expressed in his election of the people and especially in his granting them the Torah is an overriding theological concept. The benediction preceding the recitation of the Shema, which thanks God for the gift of the Torah and the commandments, is known technically as Ahavah (that is, God's love of Israel). The section of Maimonides' Mishneh Torah enumerating the laws of prayer, recitation of the Shema, tefillin, and circumcision has the heading "Ahavah" (commandments that express Israel's love of God). In most medieval manuals on the spiritual life, the central chapter is that on love.

Some medieval writers imply that love of God necessarily excludes love of created beings, but the mainstream of rabbinic tradition holds that in the love of God the natural forms of love (between spouses, family members, fellow humans) are hallowed. Love of God and love of one's fellow human beings are the natural bases of Jewish ethics. Ahavat Yisra'el (love of Israel), an all-embracing love, is regarded as a great virtue by the rabbis. Ahavat Yisra'el later became an important Hasidic concept. Love of one's fellow human beings is enjoined not only toward Jews (Lv. 19.18) but also toward the stranger (cf. Lv. 19.34; Dt. 10.19). Hillel's dictum (Avot

1.12) "Be as the disciples of Aaron, loving peace and pursuing peace" continues, "loving your fellow beings and drawing them near to the Torah."

LÖW FAMILY, Hungarian family of scholars.

Leopold Löw (1811–1875) was the first Reform rabbi in Hungary and became one of the most forceful spokesmen of religious reform, involved in bitter controversies with the Orthodox. In 1850 he became rabbi of Szeged, where he served until his death. An outstanding preacher, he was the first rabbi to give sermons in Hungarian. He edited a scholarly journal, Ben Chananja, from 1858 to 1867 and published studies in which he sought to show that Judaism as a religion was always evolving.

Immanuel Löw (1854–1944), followed his father Leopold as rabbi of Szeged and was also a distinguished preacher in Hungarian. A noted scholar, he wrote on Talmudic realia and lexicography. His best-known work, Die Flora der Juden (4 vols. [1924–1934]), applies modern botanical knowledge to the Bible, Talmud, and rabbinical literature to identify and describe the flora mentioned in different ages.

LUBAVICH, Belorussian town near Mogilev; name of a Hasidic dynasty. Until 1915 Lubavich was the chief seat of the *Schneersohn family, leaders of *Habad Hasidism. Lubavich viewed itself as the intellectual capital of the Hasidic world, where the study of Jewish mysticism, as recast in the teachings of Habad, was carried out in an intensive and systematic way. After their exile from Lubavich, the Schneersohns lived for twenty-five years in various cities in Russia and Poland, directing the most important network of resistance to the destruction of religious Jewry by the Soviet authorities. Since the move of R. Yosef Yitsḥaq Schneersohn to the United States in 1940, and especially under the leadership of his successor, R. Menahem Mendel Schneerson (died 1994), Lubavitch has become a worldwide movement for the promulgation of Habad Hasidic teachings.

LULAV (לולב; sprout), rabbinic term for the palm branch used together with other vegetable species on Sukkot. Because the lulav is the most conspicuous of the *four species (see Lv. 23.40), the term is used in the benediction to refer to the whole. The lulav is taken in the hand after the morning service 'Amidah and waved in the air at designated points in the Hallel service (except on Sabbaths). It is also carried in the hosha'not* procession (haqqafot*) and, in the Sephardi rite, during the additional service. The lulav, with the myrtle and the willow, is held in the right hand, the etrog* in the left.

LURIA, SHELOMOH (c.1510–1573), known by the acronym Maharshal (from Morenu ha-Rav Shelomoh Luria); Polish-Lithuanian Talmudist. Born in Poznań, he studied under his grandfather Isaac Kloiber and served as rabbi in the Lithuanian communities of Brześć and Ostrów before being appointed, in 1559, rabbi of Lublin, where he remained until his death. Conservative in outlook, he opposed the place of pilpul in the yeshivah curriculum, the study of philosophy, and the codification of halakhah, such as that produced by his rival Mosheh Isserles. He stressed the need to return to the Talmudic text in halakhic decision-making, demonstrating his method in his monumental, but uncompleted work Yam shel Shelomoh (published in parts: on B. Q. [Prague, 1616–1618]; on Hul. [Kraków, 1633–1635]). This rational commentary on the Talmud described the development of the halakhah from its origin until Luria's day. In his notes, Hokhmat Shelomoh (Kraków, 1582 or 1587), now printed in most editions of the Talmud, he used textual criticism to establish the correct readings for corrupt passages. In his later years, he composed other halakhic commentaries and a critical commentary on the liturgy, which served as a major source for Shabbetai Sofer's prayer book. Luria wrote many responsa that have been published (Lublin, 1574–1575; edited by S. Hurwitz [1938]), though his independent stance brought him into conflict with the dominant rabbinic figures of his day, Shalom Shachna' and Mosheh Isserles. Not widely popular, Luria's work was "rediscovered" by nineteenth-century Lithuanian yeshivot.

LURIA, YITSHAQ (1534–1572), kabbalist (see KABBALAH) and one of the most influential figures in the history of Jewish spirituality. Born in Jerusalem and brought up in Egypt, he acquired a reputation for halakhic and kabbalistic scholarship, but otherwise little is known about his early years. He settled in Safed in 1570 and died in the plague of 1572. These two years, about which no reliable details are known, laid the foundations for the subsequent explosion of legend, hagiography, and doctrinal innovation known as Lurianism. Luria appears to have collected around him a band of devoted disciples who had to pledge not to divulge the new esoteric teachings to outsiders. The first known reliable document is a solemn contract in which several disciples pledge not to discuss or commit to writing any of the master's teaching except in the presence of Hayyim Vital (see VITAL FAMILY), who had drawn up the contract in an effort to establish his claim to be the spiritual heir and sole repository of canonical Lurianism. In spite of the intended secrecy, pirated copies of Vital's "canonical" writings as well as other, and on some points divergent, versions of the master's doctrine began to circulate and were eagerly spread. According to legend, Luria himself had hardly written anything because the rush of inspiration was so powerful that it could not be reduced to writing. The vast corpus of Lurianic literature was composed by his disciples and by kabbalists influenced by them; it is still inadequately analyzed and any account of the Lurianic revolution is therefore provisional and incomplete. Luria's fame as a charismatic man of God spread through hagiographic epistles and books (such as Shivhei ha-'Ari and Toledot ha-'Ari) long before his doctrines. His name entered Jewish tradition in the form of an acrostic of his Hebrew names ("the divine Rabbi Yitshaq"), the Ari (Lion), and his disciples were referred to as "the lion's cubs."

The revolutionary aspect of Lurianism resides in the notion that perfection is not in the past, not even in the eternal Godhead before creation, but in the future. The achievement of perfection is the purpose of all existence, the divine realm as well as the created order. Luria addressed the problem of the purpose of existence in a more radical manner than other theologians. Whereas the early Spanish Kabbalah was concerned mainly with the spiritual achievements of the individual, Lurianism transformed the Kabbalah into a teleological and history-oriented system, teaching the meaning of exile and messianic expectation not only on the level of the individual but also on that of the community of Israel. In Lurianism, mystical life thus acquires a redemptive and potentially messianic quality.

Luria utilized an ancient term, tsimtsum*, found in Talmudic literature and in the writings of the *Hasidei Ashkenaz but gave it a novel twist. If God is All in All, how is a non-divine existence, such as creation, possible? According to Luria's theological mythology, the Godhead "retracted" and "withdrew itself into itself" so as to create an empty space in which creation could take place. This process is said to be cathartic, since the new vacuum (tehiru, Aramaic for empty) contained residues (reshimu) of elements in the primordial Godhead that would develop later into forces of evil. During the following process of creation, however, a major catastrophe occurred. The vessels (kelim), or channels, were not able to contain the power of the divine light that flowed through them, and so they collapsed (shevirat ha-kelim; see BREAKING OF THE VESSELS). This brought into being a new independent realm, into which fell many divine lights and sparks (nitsotsot), which are held captive by the powers of evil until they are raised again in a process that is the ultimate meaning and purpose of history. Creation is thus out of joint from its very beginning and it is Israel's, and especially the kabbalist's, duty to set it right (see TIQQUN 'OLAM). The way to do this involves the practice of the proper intentions and meditations, in both daily life and especially in ritual actions (see INTENT). The raising of the sparks is thus the inner purpose of everything. All historical events, from Adam and the garden of Eden to the theophany on Mount Sinai and the sin of the golden calf and beyond, were interpreted as failed attempts to bring about this tiqqun. The Lurianists created several mystical rituals and also re-edited the *prayer book. It has been suggested that the Lurianic Kabbalah was a response to the traumatic experience of the expulsion from Spain. The symbolism and terminological apparatus of Lurianic thought was taken up by both *Hasidism and non-Hasidic kabbalists of the eighteenth century.

LUTSKI, SIMḤAH YITSHAQ BEN MOSHEH (died 1766), Karaite scholar and bibliographer. He was born in Lutsk, but he was brought to Chufut-Kale in the Crimea in approximately 1751 by Mordekhai ben Berakhah, the leading Crimean Karaite, in order to raise the level of Karaite education there. Simḥah Yitshaq wrote at least twenty-two books on theology, philosophy, religious law, and Kabbalah. Of these, only three have been published: Or ha-Hayyim, a commentary on the philosophical work of Aharon ben Eliyyahu; Ets Hayyim (published together with Or ha-Hayyim [Yevpatoriya, 1847]), in which Simḥah Yitshaq's kabbalistic tendencies found expression; and Orah Tsaddiqim (Vienna, 1830), a short history of the Karaites and the dispute with the Rabbanites, together with the first bibliography of Karaite literature. Simḥah Yitshaq also wrote religious hymns, five of which found their way into the Karaite prayer book.

Yosef Shelomoh ben Mosheh Lutski (c.1777–1844), Karaite author born in Kukizov near Lwów. He lived in Lutsk until 1802, when he moved to Yevpatoriya in the Crimea and was appointed hazzan of the community. In 1827 he traveled with the hakham Simḥah Babovich to Saint Petersburg in a successful effort to seek an exemption for the Karaites from the compulsory military service imposed on the Jews by Nicholas I. Their journey and activities were described by Lutski in Iggeret Teshu'at Yisra'el (Yevpatoriya, 1840; English translation, Philip E. Miller, Karaite Separatism in Nineteenth-Century Russia: Joseph Solomon Lutski's Epistle of Israel's Deliverance [1993]). He also wrote Sefer ha-Hinnukh le-Petaḥ Tiqvah, a teaching manual (Constantinople, 1831), and Tirat Kesef, a supercommentary on Sefer ha-Mivḥar by Aharon ben Yosef ha-Rofe' (they were printed together [Yevpatoriya, 1835]). A number of his religious hymns and prayers were incorporated into the Karaite prayer book.

Avraham ben Yosef Shelomoh Lutski (1792–1855), poet and scholar; son of Yosef Shelomoh. Born in Lutsk, he moved to Yevpatoriya with his father, who later sent him to Constantinople, where he was in the service of a Karaite merchant whose daughter he later married. During these years, he studied rabbinic literature with Rabbanite scholars and learned a number of languages. In 1835 he was chosen to be hazzan and rabbi of the community of Yevpatoriya, but he refused. He established a Karaite school there in 1844, which produced many of the future leaders of the Crimean Karaite community. Among his works are Iggeret Zug ve-Nifrad, a decision concerning marriage law in which he disagreed with most of the authorities of his time (Yevpatoriya, 1837); a Turkish translation of the play Melukhat Sha'ul by Yosef Tropplowitz; Mishlei Musar, a translation into Judeo-Tatar of ethical stories; and Shoshanim 'Edu le-'Asaf, a collection of poems, letters, lamentations, sermons, and eulogies.

LUZZATTO, MOSHEH HAYYIM (1707–1747), Italian mystic known by the acronym Ramḥal; head of a messianic secret society and author of ethical works, allegorical plays, and liturgical poetry. Luzzatto is recognized as one of the leading kabbalists of the eighteenth century. He wrote the most influential Jewish ethical work of modern times, Mesillat Yesharim, and is considered by many as one of the founders of modern Hebrew literature.

Luzzatto was born and raised in Padua. Besides acquiring a traditional Jewish education, he was in close touch with Italian culture. One of his early works is a treatise on rhetoric, Leshon Limmudim (Mantua, 1727). In 1727, he experienced a mystical revelation, in which a maggid*, a messenger from the divine world, appeared to him, and from then on such experiences occurred frequently. The maggid instructed him to write kabbalistic works, and in the next few years, Luzzatto wrote several mystical treatises, many of them in the form and language of the *Zohar, calling them Zohar Tinyana (sections published in Warsaw in 1889 and Jerusalem in 1958). Redemption is the main theme of these works. A circle of disciples, motivated by messianic enthusiasm, gathered around him, including Mosheh David Valle, seen as the Messiah, Son of David, who wrote an extensive biblical commentary identifying himself as the messianic hero of the biblical texts, and Ye'quti'el Gordon of Vilna, who later spread Luzzatto's teachings in eastern Europe. It seems that this group regarded *Shabbetai Tsevi as the Messiah, Son of Joseph, destined to be killed during the messianic upheavals. Luzzatto himself was regarded as the reincarnation of Moses, the supreme power in the messianic structure. Luzzatto viewed his own marriage (1731) as the culmination of the messianic process and the union of the male and female elements in the divine world; he explained it in detail in his commentary on his marriage contract.

Information concerning this group reached R. Mosheh Hagiz, who suspected that it was a Shabbatean conspiracy and brought his accusations before the court of the rabbis of Venice. Yesha'yahu Basan, Luzzatto's teacher, tried to defend his pupil, and a controversy arose. In 1730, Luzzatto accepted the rabbis' demand that he stop writing kabbalistic texts dictated by the maggid and hand over his previous writings to Basan for safekeeping. However, the accusations did not cease, and Luzzatto was forced to leave Padua in 1735, migrating to Amsterdam. His exile, however, did not prevent the Venice rabbinical court from ordering his works to be burned.

In Amsterdam, Luzzatto concentrated on completing his ethical works, especially the Mesillat Yesharim (Amsterdam, 1740; English translation by Mordecai M. Kaplan [1936]). Based on the Baraiyot de-Rabbi Pinhas ben Ya'ir (Sot. 9.15), it described the path of ethical and spiritual ascension of the individual, until, with the help of God, sanctity is reached. In this and other works, Luzzatto refrained from using kabbalistic terminology, because of the court's prohibition, but the mystical dimension is evident. His two other major ethical treatises are Derekh ha-Shem (Amsterdam, 1896), and Da'at Tevunot (Warsaw, 1886). He wrote many poems and letters, besides his allegorical plays, La-Yesharim Tehillah (Amsterdam, 1743) and Migdal 'Oz (Leipzig, 1837). In 1743 he immigrated to Erets Yisra'el and settled with his family in Acre, where, in 1747, they all died in a plague.

Luzzatto's works were influential in both Hasidic and non-Hasidic circles. The *Musal movement made the study of his ethical works compulsory in their academies (see HASIDISM), and Maskilim (see HASKALAH) viewed his plays and poetry as an early expression of their own literary creativity.

LUZZATTO, SHEMU'EL DAVID (1800-1865), known by the acronym Shadal; Italian scholar. Luzzatto began teaching at the Padua Rabbinical College in 1828 and published studies on Jewish history and literature as well as on religious philosophy. He maintained the Mosaic authorship of the Bible and the unity of the Book of Isaiah. His commentaries on the Bible, utilizing his knowledge of Semitic languages and later Jewish and non-Jewish sources, are conservative, though not Orthodox, and scientific, though expressing opposition to what was called Higher Criticism. In his basic outlook, he was a romantic and contrasted his idea of a "Judaism of feeling" to the rationalism of Maimonides (he regarded philosophy as a negative phenomenon) as well as to the theosophy of the kabbalists. He distinguished two bases of world civilization—the Hellenistic, which had given the world philosophy and the arts and sciences; and Judaism, the contributions of which included religion, ethics, altruism, and the love of the good. Luzzatto is counted among the fathers of *Wissenschaft des Judentums. He translated much of the Bible into Italian and wrote many books and over three hundred articles in Hebrew and Italian on a variety of topics of Jewish study. They included editions of the prayer book, works on Hebrew grammar and philology, and a partial edition of the poems of *Yehudah ha-Levi. A bibliography of his writings by I. Luzzatto, Catalogo ragionato con riferimenti agli altri suoi scritti e inediti, appeared in Padua in 1881.

LUZZATTO, SIMONE (1583-1663), Italian rabbi; contemporary of Leone *Modena and chief rabbi of Venice following Modena's death. An outstanding halakhist, Luzzatto wrote a number of responsa, many of which exist in manuscript and have yet to be collected in a single volume. Among his other works are Discorso circa il stato degli hebrei (1638), a plea for tolerance of the Jews written in a spirit of rationalism usually associated with a later era, and Socrate oivvero dell'humano sapere (1651), written in the voice of Socrates, on the insufficiency of human reason without the assistance of divine revelation.

LYING. Any act of lying, even those forms less serious than bearing *false witness or committing *perjury, is considered a violation of both a prohibition—"You shall not lie to one another" (Lv. 19.11)—and a positive precept (Ex. 23.7)—"Distance yourself from a false matter"—and is an offense to the God whose "seal is truth" and of whom it is said that he "lies not" (1 Sm. 15.29; Ps. 89.34-35). The Talmud abounds in condemnations of lying, including "Liars cannot behold the glory of God" (Sot. 42a). Lying "is the equivalent [in severity] of idolatry" (San. 92a) and the equivalent of theft (T., B. Q. 7.8).

Telling young children that they will be given something and then not giving them those objects is forbidden, because that teaches them to lie (Suk. 46b). "God hates the man who speaks one thing with his mouth and another in his heart" (Pes. 113b). The punishment of liars is that they are not believed when they speak the truth (San. 89b). Occasionally, to preserve family harmony, lying may be permitted. Rabbi Yonah ben Avraham Gerondi lists the following nine types of lies: untruths spoken in the course of business dealings; lying without intending or causing harm; lying with an eye to some future benefit; deliberate falsification of facts heard; a promise made with the intention of not keeping it; a promise made and left unfulfilled; causing another to assume that one has done him a favor; priding oneself on qualities one does not possess; and the falsehoods of children who, while not lying deliberately, nonetheless do not speak the truth.

MA'AMAD (מַעֲמָד; status, position). During the Second Temple period, the ma'amadot were the Israelites (i.e., those who were not priests or Levites) designated to represent the entire community when the daily communal sacrifice was offered in the Temple (Ta'an. 4.2). The country was divided into twenty-four districts (ma'amadot), and delegations (also ma'amadot) from each district served in weekly rotations. This division corresponded to the twenty-four divisions of priests and Levites (mishmarot [guards]) that officiated in the Temple, also in rotation. Since only a token number of Israelites could be present in Jerusalem, the others whose turn it was to be present gathered in their towns to offer prayers, the possible forerunner of synagogue worship. The Mishnah reports that members of the ma'amad on duty were required to recite texts from Genesis 1, to fast from Monday to Thursday (Ta'an. 4.2-3), and to refrain from cutting their hair or washing their clothes (Ta'an. 2.7). In the post-Talmudic period, the memory of the mishmarot and ma'amadot was long preserved in references found in rabbinic and Karaite liturgy. In Sephardi, and more particularly in western Spanish-Portuguese synagogue usage, the term came to refer to the board or governing body of the synagogue elected by the yehidim (members). The ma'amad wielded great power within the synagogue, controlling, among other things, marriage and divorce, granting permission for one synagogue member to sue another, and determining which religious or political books might be published. No one had the right to refuse any assignment imposed on him by the ma'amad or its president, and anybody who declined to serve on the ma'amad when elected had to pay a fine. Because appointment to the ma'amad between elections (when a member died or resigned) was made by the remaining members and former members of the ma'amad, many of the positions became almost hereditary.

MA'ARAVOT (מַעֲרָבוֹת), a sequence of six prayer poems (piyyutim) inserted into the four benedictions before the 'Amidah in the evening service (*Ma'ariv) for the *Shalosh Regalim, in the Ashkenazi liturgy. They describe the particular holiday, its laws and its customs. Originally, ma'aravot were included in the evening services of Ro'sh ha-Shanah and Yom Kippur, but they were later removed in order to avoid unduly prolonging the service. Nowadays, they are often omitted from the Orthodox service. They are not included in the Sephardi liturgy, nor have they been retained in non-Orthodox prayer books.

MA'AREKHET HA'ELOHUT, an anonymous treatise that was probably written in Spain in the beginning of the fourteenth century by a kabbalist who belonged to, or was heavily influenced by, the school of kabbalists around R. Shelomoh ben Adret (Rashba'). One of the best-known and most influential works of the Kabbalah, the treatise is a brief, systematic, theosophical presentation of a kabbalistic worldview. Its opening chapters address the unity of God, oppose anthropomorphic terms that had been used in describing him, and present a system of the divine sefirot* that argues that the first sefirah should not be identified with the Godhead (Ein Sof). The author drew extensively upon the terminology and concepts of the Gerona school of kabbalists. The work was printed in Ferrara in 1557, and again in Mantua in 1558, beginning the practice of printing kabbalistic texts. Many commentaries were written on Ma'arekhet ha'Elohut, two of which were printed with it, becoming part of the work as it was used in later Kabbalah.

MA'ARIV (מַעֲרִיב), the evening service, also called 'Arvit (from 'erev [evening]), recited daily after nightfall and named after one of the opening words of its first prayer. Although it is to be recited by the midpoint of the night, if this is not possible, it may be said until dawn. Its institution was ascribed by the rabbis (Ber. 26b) to the patriarch Jacob (on the basis of Gen. 28.11). Opinions in the Talmud differ as to whether reciting the Ma'ariv *Amidah is obligatory or optional; the accepted ruling is that it is optional, unlike in *Shaharit and *Minhah, which correspond to the two daily communal sacrifices in the Temple. The established custom is, nevertheless, to recite the Ma'ariv 'Amidah daily, but it is not repeated by the reader. Biblical verses adduced to support a third daily prayer service include Psalms 55.18 and Daniel 6.11. Ma'ariv consists of two parts, which correspond to the two main parts of Shaharit: the *Shema' and its benedictions, and the 'Amidah. The recital of the Shema' each morning and evening is prescribed by the earliest law (Dt. 4.7), although according to ancient Palestinian custom, only the first two passages were recited at night. The benedictions before and after the Shema' follow the same scheme as the morning benedictions, though their wording is different. *Barekhu (preceded by Ps. 78.38 and 20.10) is followed by Ma'ariv 'Aravim ("Blessed . . . who brings on the evening twilight") instead of *Yotser, Ma'ariv 'Aravim is followed by Ahavat 'Olam, and the Shema' and the *Ge'ulah are followed by *Hashkivenu, a typical evening petition for peace and protection during the night. On weekdays another benediction, composed of a collection of Bible verses beginning with Psalms 135.21, is recited in most Ashkenazi congregations; it is of post-Talmudic origin. The Short *Qaddish precedes the 'Amidah, while the Full Qaddish and *Aleinu follow it. On Sabbath eve (when the service is preceded by *Qabbalat Shabbat), the reader recites one single benediction following the 'Amidah containing *Magen Avot (probably an early Palestinian form of the 'Amidah) and concluding "Blessed . . . who sanctifies the Sabbath." Otherwise Ma'ariv for Sabbaths and festivals is no different from that of weekdays (except for the 'Amidah) in most rites; only the conclusion of Hashkivenu has a different wording and is followed (in most congregations) by Bible verses appropriate to the day (e.g., Ex. 31.16–17 for Sabbath). In some congregations, however, it is customary on festivals to interpolate *ma'aravot into each of the benedictions of the Shema'. It also became customary to recite *Qiddush (originally for homeless strangers who slept in the synagogue) and either *Yigdal or *Adon 'Olam on Sabbath and festival eves. On Saturday nights, Ma'ariv is preceded by Psalm 144 and Psalm 67, while Psalm 91 is interpolated following the 'Amidah together with other prayers and *Havdalah. Ma'ariv on Yom Kippur is extended by the recitation of special piyyutim (see PIYYUT) after the 'Amidah.

MA'ASEH (מַעֲשֶׂה; incident; referred to as 'uvda' by the Talmud [B. M. 70a] and as ma'aseh rav by many), an instance in which an esteemed person or group of people performs an action that creates a legal precedent. Maimonides observes that "Tradition and precedent [ma'aseh] are important foundations of decision making and may be relied on." On the other hand, the Talmud recognizes the ease with which a ma'aseh can be misunderstood. It states, "One may not learn a normative rule from study or from a ma'aseh, unless the case is specifically stated to be a normative practice" (B. B. 130b).

Responsa literature is a manifestation of the Talmud's preference for developing legal rules based upon real cases, not merely based on abstract restatements of Jewish law. This has prompted a number of authorities, led by R. Ya'akov ben Moshe ha-Levi Molin, to state that responsa literature is of greater value in determining normative rules than any other form of legal literature.

MA'ASEH BE-RE'SHIT (מַעֲשֶׂה בְּרֵאשִׁית; act of creation), rabbinic term derived from the first word of the Hebrew Bible and designating an esoteric discipline of mystical cosmogony. In the Mishnah (Hag. 2.1), the term is used to refer to homiletical exegesis of the biblical chapters dealing with the subject of *Creation, mainly the first chapters of Genesis. The Talmuds, especially Hagigah 2, as well as the Tosefta, include several homilies and stories on the subject. The largest collection of stories of this genre is contained in the beginning of Genesis Rabbah, but others appear frequently in classical and late midrashim. In Talmud Bavli, the relevant section of Hagigah follows the Mishnah and prohibits dealing (at least in public) with "what is below and what is above, what is before and what is after," quoting Ben Sira. The esoteric interpretation of the first chapter of Genesis was not to be taught in public, but could be transmitted from master to disciple only "under four eyes" (Hag. 2.1), because of the dangers of heretical misunderstanding. Several treatises dedicated specifically to the subject were composed in the late Talmudic and the geonic periods: the Baraita de-Ma'aseh Be-Re'shit, Midrash Qonen, Midrash Tadshe. The Sefer Yetsirah* can be included in the Ma'aseh Be-Re'shit literature of late antiquity.

Maimonides and other rationalist thinkers interpreted the Mishnaic terms as referring to the study of physics (and *Ma'aseh Merkavah to metaphysics). Medieval Jewish mystics and esotericists devoted much effort to the study of this subject, especially in the numerous commentaries on the Sefer Yetsirah written by kabbalists and Ashkenazi Hasidim in the thirteenth century. In the Kabbalah, the term acquired specific mystical significance: it sometimes denoted not only the creation of the universe, but the emanation of the divine hypostases, the sefirot*. The detailed study of this process, in the Zohar and other kabbalistic works, served not only as a description of the past, but it also had a mystical purpose: the knowledge of the secrets of creation can provide the mystic with a means to ascend to the Deity, and return to the primordial perfection of the divine world. MA'ASEH BOOK (Yi. Mayseh Bukh; Story Book), a collection of anonymous Yiddish stories and folktales that first appeared in the latter part of the sixteenth century. The stories, of an ethical nature, are drawn from Talmudic and Midrashic aggadah (with much additional embellishment), as well as medieval legends of both Jewish and non-Jewish origin, but in all cases given a religious application.

MA'ASEH MERKAVAH (מַעֲשֶׂה מֵרָכָב; work of the chariot), Mishnaic term (Hag. 2.1) denoting the Midrashic exposition of the vision of the celestial chariot described in Ezekiel 1, parallel to *Ma'aseh Be-Re'shit, the Midrashic exposition of Genesis 1–2. The term was extended to include any discussion or description of the celestial realms and later was identified by Maimonides with metaphysics and by many Jewish writers with mystical speculation and theosophy. Several treatises that expound on the esoteric speculations of the Talmud, known as Heikhalot and Merkavah literature, have the term merkavah in their titles and greatly expand on Ezekiel's description. According to Re'uyot Yehezqel, for instance, Ezekiel saw seven chariots when looking into the waters of the river Chebar, as one firmament after another opened above him to reveal the chariot in each of them. The Merkavah texts served as the basis for the mystics of Europe: El'azar ben Yehudah of Worms wrote a treatise entitled Sod ha-Merkavah, and the kabbalists of Spain and Provence, especially the writers of Sefer ha-Bahir* and the Iyyun Circle*, used Merkavah terminology as a source for their mystical symbolism. Ma'aseh Merkavah, which is essentially a Midrashic activity, differs from yeridah le-merkavah (descending to the chariot), which is the term used for the actual mystical activity of ascension to the divine palaces (heikhalot) described in several ancient texts. The "descenders" used Ezekiel imagery, but their main sources and symbols were taken from the Song of Songs and other texts. Echoes of Merkavah traditions are also present in the liturgical poetry (piyyutim) of both Spanish and Ashkenazi authors.

MA'ASER. See TITHES.

MA'ASER SHENI (מֵאֲשֶׁר שֵׁנִי; Second Tithe), tractate consisting of five chapters in Mishnah order Zera'im, with related material in the Tosefta and in the Talmud Yerushalmi. Biblical law describes several *tithes that rabbinic law elaborates and organizes into a comprehensive seven-year cycle. Tithes that were offered to priests and Levites were taken annually (except in the seventh sabbatical year when no tithes were taken), whereas ma'aser sheni, which was used to celebrate the pilgrimage to the Temple, was taken only during the first, second, fourth, and fifth years of the cycle. Ma'aser ani (the poor person's tithe), which was distributed to the disadvantaged in the third and sixth years of the cycle (Dt. 14.28–29), was understood by rabbinic law—in contradistinction to other halakhic traditions during Second Temple times—as a replacement for ma'aser sheni.

Tractate Ma'aser Sheni deals with the laws governing the proper use and consumption of ma'aser sheni and of kerem reva'i (produce of a vineyard during its fourth year), whose sanctity is regarded as equivalent to that of ma'aser sheni. Ma'aser sheni must be eaten within the Temple environs, including the walled city of Jerusalem (Meg. 1.11), and may not be consumed when either it or the eater is ritually impure. The sanctity of ma'aser sheni requires that it not be used for commercial purposes.

Not all produce from every part of Erets Yisra'el could be transported to Jerusalem; hence, ma'aser sheni could be redeemed, removing sanctity from the produce to the coins, whose sanctity would then be transferred to food items purchased during the pilgrimage to Jerusalem (Dt. 14.24–26). Discussion of the conditions governing consumption and redemption of ma'aser sheni led the tractate to deal with the halakhic boundaries of the sanctity of the Temple and of Jerusalem. The tractate concludes with the law of confession of tithes (Dt. 26.12–15) in which the farmer, in effect, says to God: "We have fulfilled what you have decreed upon us, now you need to fulfill what you have promised us" (Ma'as. Sh. 5.13).

An English translation of the Mishnah tractate is in Herbert Danby's The Mishnah (Oxford, 1933).

MA'ASROT (מֵאֲסֹרוֹת; Tithes), tractate consisting of five chapters in Mishnah order Zera'im, with related material in the Tosefta and in the Talmud Yerushalmi. Several annual *tithes were required by biblical law for distribution to the priests, to the Levites (Nm. 18.12, 21ff.), and to the poor (Dt. 14.28–29) as well as for celebrating the pilgrimage to the Temple (Dt. 14.22ff.).

Ma'asrot deals with the regulations defining the kind of produce that is subject to the laws of tithing. Listing the different stages of growth that render various forms of produce subject to tithing, Ma'asrot forbids such produce for consumption when either it has been processed so that it is marketable or it is consumed in a manner or context characteristic of a fixed meal rather than of a snack. The requirement to tithe one's produce prior to its consumption reflects the devotion due to God and, perhaps, the continued devotion to the idea of Temple service; even after the destruction of the Temple rendered obsolete the original social context in which these laws were promulgated, Mishnaic law regarded untithed produce as forbidden for consumption.

The Mishnah tractate was translated into English by Herbert Danby in The Mishnah (Oxford, 1933).

MACCABEES. See HASMONAENS.

MACCABEES, BOOKS OF THE, four separate apocryphal books. The First Book of the Maccabees is primarily a historical account of the Maccabean Revolt, covering the period between 175 and c.135, that is, from the events preceding the persecution under *Antiochus IV Epiphanes to the death of Simon, last of the Hasmonaean brothers. It was written in Hebrew during the latter part of the second century BCE but is preserved only in a Greek translation. Its anonymous author emerges as an ardent admirer of the *Hasmonaens, described as "those through whom salvation was granted to Israel" (1 Mc. 5.62), and seems to have had access to much reliable historical information, which he presented in a manner deeply influenced by biblical historiographical models.

The Second Book of the Maccabees is, according to its author, a condensed version of Jason of Cyrene's (otherwise lost) history of the Maccabean Revolt. In contrast to 1 Maccabees, this book focuses on the career of *Judah the Maccabee alone, ignoring Judah's father, Mattathias, and ends with Judah's victory over Nicanor, the Syrian general, in 161 BCE. The Second Book of the Maccabees devotes much space to detailed descriptions of the suffering of the Jews under Antiochus IV Epiphanes and to God's intervention in various historical events. Written in Greek in the second century BCE (after 160), 2 Maccabees follows many of the conventions of contemporary Greek historiography. Both 1 Maccabees and 2 Maccabees are part of the Apocrypha (see APOCRYPHA AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA).

The Third Book of the Maccabees is in no way connected with the history of the Maccabees but relates the wonderful deliverance of the Temple from profanation at the hands of Ptolemy Philopator (r. 221–205) and Ptolemy's subsequent attempt to destroy the Jewish population of Alexandria. Ptolemy's plot failed, and the Egyptian Jews instituted a yearly festival to commemorate their miraculous deliverance. Written in Greek by an Alexandrian Jew, probably in the first century BCE or the first century CE, 3 Maccabees may be conflating two different historical episodes, one of which seems to be described by *Josephus Flavius as having occurred around 145 BCE (Against Apion 2.53–55).

The Fourth Book of the Maccabees is a philosophical work, aimed at finding out "whether devout reason is absolute master over the passions" (4 Mc. 1.1). To demonstrate that this indeed is so, 4 Maccabees adduces several examples, taken from 2 Maccabees, of Jews who chose to die under horrible torture rather than renounce their ancestral beliefs and customs. The Fourth Book of the Maccabees was written in Greek by a Jewish writer, whose geographical location is unknown, some time in the first century BCE or the first century CE.

MACHPELAH, CAVE OF, cave near Hebron. When Sarah died at Hebron, Abraham approached the local dignitaries desiring to buy a plot for her burial. Negotiations took place with Ephron the Hittite, who sold the cave of Machpelah to Abraham for four hundred silver shekels (Gn. 23). In this cave were also buried the three patriarchs and their wives (except Rachel) (Gn. 23.19, 25.9, 49.31, 50.13). In Byzantine times, a church was built on the site, and later a synagogue; and since the twelfth century, a mosque has occupied the site. In recent years, the location has been the scene of particularly intense rivalry and conflict between Muslims and Jews.

MAFTIR (מַפְתִּיר; one who completes), the last verses (at least three in number) of the weekly Sabbath and festival reading from the Torah scroll; popularly also applied to the person called for this reading. On a regular Sabbath, the last few verses of the weekly portion are repeated, and these are called the maftir. On special Sabbaths (see SABBATHS, SPECIAL) and festivals, the maftir is taken from a passage relevant to that particular day and is read from a second scroll.

The person called to the Torah for the maftir reading recites the Torah blessings before and after the reading and usually goes on to read the haftarah. A boy making his bar mitsvah (and, in non-Orthodox synagogues, a girl making her bat mitsvah) will generally celebrate the religious occasion by reading the maftir and haftarah. In Sephardi synagogues, a minor may be called to the reading of the maftir, but only on a regular Sabbath.

MAGEN AVOT (מַגֵּן אֲבוֹת; "Shield of our forefathers"), opening words of an abbreviated form of the seven benedictions of the Friday evening *Amidah (hence, also known as Me'ein Sheva' [an abstract of the seven benedictions]), recited by the cantor after the *Amidah. It was widely held (Maimonides, Hilkhot Tefillah 9.10–11) that it was originally instituted to enable latecomers to conclude their prayers and return home with the other congregants (since synagogues were situated outside towns, and it was dangerous to be out alone at night; see Rashi on Shab. 24b), but this theory is now considered as questionable. It has been suggested that Magen Avot is an early Palestinian form of the *Amidah.

MAGEN DAVID (מַגֵּן דָּוִד; shield of David), symbol consisting of two superimposed equilateral triangles, forming a hexagram. It was used for decoration and as a magical sign in many civilizations and in various parts of the world, but it was not known as a specifically Jewish symbol in biblical and Talmudic times. Where it appears in Jewish contexts, as in synagogues and on tombstones, it had a purely ornamental function. The phrase itself appears in the third benediction after the reading of the haftarah, where it is a designation for God. According to the authoritative study by Gershom Scholem, Jewish groups took over the designation seal of Solomon from Islamic magic sources. As a lucky sign it appeared on magical versions of the mezuzah from the tenth century. It is uncertain whether the term shield of David arose in Islamic or Jewish mystical circles. Although appearing in a number of Jewish contexts, it first had an official Jewish usage in Prague, probably as a heraldic symbol, and spread from there in the seventeenth century to other European countries. Some kabbalistic circles called it the "shield of the Son of David," referring to the Messiah, and it was adopted as a symbol by followers of *Shabbetai Tsevi. However, it only became widespread in the nineteenth century when central European Jews were looking for a striking symbol that would represent Judaism as the cross did Christianity. It had the advantage over the traditional menorah as being less particularistic (the latter was connected with the Temple worship). From Europe it spread to Muslim lands, and virtually no synagogue was without a representation of the magen David. It was adopted by the Zionist organization at the First Zionist Congress in 1897 and was subsequently incorporated in the flag of the State of Israel. In Israel the Red Shield of David corresponds to the Red Cross and Red Crescent. It formed the allegorical basis of Franz *Rosenzweig's major philosophical work, Der Stern der Erlösung (1921; The Star of Redemption [1971]). The Nazis used it on the identifying badge that Jews had to wear throughout Europe.

MAGGID (מַגִּיד), popular preacher or a technical term for a heavenly agent in mystical literature.

Popular Preacher. Known to have existed as far back as the eleventh century in France and Germany, the name and institution of the maggid became a characteristic feature of the Russian and Polish communities. From the seventeenth century on, the rabbis preached twice a year only (on the Sabbaths preceding Pesah and Yom Kippur); the preaching throughout the year for purposes of edification, instruction, and repentance was left to the maggid, the larger congregations often appointing a permanent maggid along with a rabbi (e.g., R. Ya'aqov ben Wolf *Kranz, the celebrated maggid of Dubno). The Hasidic leader *Dov Ber of Mezheritsch was universally known as "the Maggid" (because the term occurred in the title of one of his books), but most of the maggidim were associated with the *Mitnaggedim. The manner of their preaching was characterized by a distinctive sing-song delivery. It was mainly by means of wandering preachers that *Hasidism was spread in the eighteenth century.

Heavenly Agent. A maggid (voice, angel, or spirit) would communicate supernatural illumination to the mystic. In the sixteenth century, maggidism was considered as one of the normal forms of charismatic life (which included the appearance of the prophet Elijah or celestial angels and inspiration by the holy spirit). The term maggid usually referred to a heavenly voice speaking through the mouth of the mystic. Many kabbalists had maggidim, the best-known instance being that of R. Yosef *Karo.

MAGIC, ritual acts, including the pronouncing of spells, performed for the purpose of influencing things and events beyond the ordinary range of human capacity by means of resort to occult powers. The Bible forbids the practice of magic; the penalty for transgressing this prohibition is death. Sorcerers are usually referred to in the feminine, and the Talmud implies (San. 67a) that magic was mostly practiced by women. The most complete list of the various forms of magic is to be found in Deuteronomy 18.10–11. The story of Saul and the "witch" (more accurately, necromancer; 1 Sm. 28) illustrates the extent to which magic was practiced in early times, despite the biblical prohibition. The Talmud, however, seems to differentiate between what might be called "black magic" and "white magic," depending on the source of the occult powers. Thus, on the basis of Joshua 13.22, "Balaam the soothsayer" is considered a sorcerer by the Talmud (San. 106a–b); other magical acts, for example those ascribed to R. Hanina' and to R. Osha'yah (San. 65b) were held to be unobjectionable. The prohibition against magic as an "abomination unto the Lord" (Dt. 18.12) does not necessarily imply denial of its efficacy, though rationalist thinkers including Maimonides (Hilkhot 'Avodah Zarah 11.15) dismissed it as a foolish superstition. Some medieval authorities even interpreted the story of Saul in 1 Samuel 28 as the account not of an actual event but of a dream. Nevertheless, folk belief in magic persisted until a late date, and ancient magical traditions (spells, amulets) and belief in the power of combinations of letters constituting divine names were further strengthened by the Kabbalah. Exorcism of evil spirits has been practiced up to modern times. See also AMULETS; DEMONS; WITCHCRAFT.

MAHALOQET (מַחְלוּקֶת; division), a term that signifies both dissension and difference of opinion. The former is deplored by the rabbis, who rule, for instance, that a man coming to a new locality must abide by local custom, even if he disagrees with it, "lest he cause mahaloqet" (Pes. 4.1). One may speak badly of people who cause mahaloqet (Y., Pe'ah 1), for they are the emissaries of Satan (Git. 52a). On the other hand, a genuine difference of opinion (for example, the many variant Talmudic interpretations of the tanna'im and amora'im), based upon principle, especially regarding the elucidation of the meaning of scripture, is also called mahaloqet. The two kinds of mahaloqet are exemplified in Avot 5.19: the former by the story of Korah and Moses (Nm. 16); the latter, "mahaloqet for the sake of heaven," by the controversies between Hillel and Shamm'ai.

MAHAZOR (מַחְזֹר; cycle), a term first used for lists of special synagogal readings from the Torah and the Prophets or for collections of poetic embellishments of the public prayers (see PRYUT) arranged according to the Torah-reading cycle or the cycle of the liturgical year. In the Middle Ages, mahazor became a name for a comprehensive *prayer book, like a siddur, for all liturgical occasions of the year (e.g., Mahazor Vitry). Only in the Ashkenazi sphere and especially since the advent of printing has the mahazor become more and more identified with the *festival prayers, in contrast to the siddur, the prayer book for daily and weekly use. In medieval northern Europe and Italy the mahazor became a major object of book illumination. Sephardim call their prayer books for the Shalosh Regalim mo'adim.

MAH NISHTANNAH (מַה נִּשְׁתַּנָּה; "How does [this night] differ?"), the opening words of the four questions (arba' qushyot) asked at the Pesah Seder, usually by the youngest child. Originally the Haggadah was recited after the meal, and the questions were prompted by what the child had already observed. The Mishnah (Pes. 10.4, 116a) reflects both the earlier custom of leaving it to the child's spontaneous curiosity to inquire about the meaning of the Seder ceremonies and the later use of a formalized version of the four questions, to which the leader of the Seder replies with the recital of the Haggadah, telling the story of the Exodus from Egypt. The questions relate to the use of unleavened bread, bitter herbs, the dipping of herbs, and the custom of reclining (there are differences in order in some rites). Palestinian recensions of the Mishnah point to early three-question versions. Not all homes used the same questions, and until the late medieval period the four-question set was asked by the leader of the Seder, not a child.

MAH TOVU (מַה טוֹב; How Goodly), title and opening words of the prayer recited in the Ashkenazi rite upon entering the synagogue. It is composed of biblical verses all taken from Psalms and mentioning prayer or a house of prayer, the one exception being the quotation from *Balaam, "How goodly are your tents, O Jacob, your dwellings, O Israel" (Nm. 24.5), though this too is interpreted (San. 105b) as referring to the synagogue and beit midrash. In the Sephardi rite, one verse (Ps. 5.8) is generally said upon entering and another (Ps. 5.9) upon leaving the synagogue. Mah Tovv was set to music and was sung in many synagogues as a major choir piece.

MAHZIKE HA-DAS (Upholders of the Faith), name first adopted by an organization established in 1879 to promote strict *Orthodoxy and combat modernism in Galicia. The organization held conferences, published a Hebrew-language weekly (Qol Mahziqe ha-Dat), and drew mass support from Hasidic Jews loyal to Yehoshu'a Roqeah, the rabbi of Belz. As titular head of this movement, Shim'on Sofer of Kraków, a son of Mosheh (Hatam) Sofer (see SOFER FAMILY), was elected to the Austrian parliament. Transformed into a conservative, anti-Zionist party, the Mahzike ha-Das competed with Agudat Israel in pre-Hitler Poland. Its Lithuanian counterpart, nicknamed Ha-Lishkah ha-Shehorah (the Black Bureau), waged an all-out campaign against Zionism in czarist Russia between the years 1890 and 1903.

Machzike Hadath was also the name given to an independent religious community founded in London's East End (1891) by eastern European Jews dissatisfied with the "compromising Orthodoxy" of Hermann Adler and the United Synagogue. After conducting a prolonged and successful campaign against their standards of shehitah, Machzike Hadath was headed for a time (1916–1919) by A. Y. Kook, the future Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Palestine. There are other Mahzike ha-Das communities in Antwerp, Copenhagen, Toronto, and Vienna.

MAIMON BEN YOSEF (died c.1165), Spanish rabbinical scholar and authority; the father and teacher of Moses *Maimonides. He was a dayyan in Cordova until forced to flee as a result of the edict of forced conversion issued by the Almohades in 1145. After ten years of wandering, he and his family reached Fez in North Africa. After a few years, he went with his sons to Erets Yisra'el and died either there or in Egypt. He was a distinguished and influential scholar. His Iggeret ha-Nehamah (original Arabic in Jewish Quarterly Review 2 [1890]: 62–66, 335–369; Heb. translation by B. Klar [1945]) was directed especially to forced converts to Islam. He wrote that Islam is not to be regarded as idolatry; he was therefore opposed to martyrdom as a means of avoiding forced conversion to Islam. His other works include Talmud commentaries, which are known from citations in the writings of Maimonides.

MAIMONIDEAN CONTROVERSY, a theological controversy that raged from the end of the twelfth to the fourteenth century, ostensibly over the writings of Moses *Maimonides, whose immense authority as a ha-lakhist and codifier also gave his philosophical work a prestige and influence that could not be ignored. In actual fact it was a clash between traditional, fideistic orthodoxy and rationalist, philosophical (mainly Aristotelian) theology. The first criticism of Maimonides—during his lifetime—was directed at his halakhic method and rulings rather than his philosophy. Three decades after his death, his theology, especially his reserved attitude to the doctrine of the *resurrection of the dead, came under heavy attack in southern France (Provence), more particularly in rabbinic circles close to the emerging Kabbalah, whose members did not shrink from enlisting the help of the Inquisition to burn the “heretical” writings of Maimonides in 1232. This manifestation of extreme fanaticism, however, shocked Jewry to such an extent that the controversy subsided for some time. It flared up again early in the fourteenth century and focused on the allegorical, that is, “rationalist,” interpretation of biblical texts. The leading rabbinic authority in Spain, R. Shelomoh ben Avraham *Adret of Barcelona, gave formal expression to the feeling of unease regarding the dangers implicit in the teachings of the by now generally revered Maimonides by issuing a ban in 1305 prohibiting the study of philosophy by students under the age of twenty-five.

The issues that formed the crux of the Maimonidean controversy did not die with Adret's ban, but changing circumstances, both external (including the increasingly aggressive Christian attempts to bring about the conversion of Jews in Iberia) and internal (such as the rise of Kabbalah) led to a softening of the intensity of the debates. For all intents and purposes, the issue died with the expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492.

MAIMONIDES, ABRAHAM BEN MOSES. See AVRAHAM BEN MOSHEH BEN MAIMON.

MAIMONIDES, MOSES (1135–1204), philosopher and codifier. Born in Spain into a distinguished family, he lived most of his life in Egypt, where he was physician to the court and leader of the Jewish community. Moses Maimonides is the Latinized form of Mosheh ben Maimon, and he is known by his acronym as Rambam. At the age of twenty-three he composed a treatise on logic. At the age of thirty he completed his commentary on the Mishnah, in which, unlike *Rashi, who explains each sentence separately, he gave a short review of the Talmudic treatise on the Mishnah, explained individual words, and determined the law, so that the student could obtain a clear picture of the whole subject. His commentary, written in Arabic, was widely appreciated, and several Hebrew translations were produced. As an introduction to his major work Mishneh Torah, Maimonides wrote Sefer ha-Mitsvot, consisting of an enumeration and definition of the 613 mitsvot. This work, too, was written in Arabic, while the Mishneh Torah was written in Mishnaic Hebrew. His objective in all his halakhic work was to define the law as it stood, in the most concise manner possible. Drawing upon the whole range of rabbinic literature, where subjects occur in the most unexpected contexts, Maimonides sifted his material from the “*sea of the Talmud,” grouped it under appropriate headings, and extracted the final halakhah from the labyrinth of numerous and complicated discussions. Maimonides rejected customs based on a belief in demons or other superstitions; he expressed his stance on the matter with the motto “Man should never cast his sound reason behind him, for the eyes are in front and not in back.” His work, the first of its kind, provoked much criticism, both because it codified the whole oral law and especially because it did so without indicating sources. R.* Avraham ben David of Posquières was its most outspoken opponent, and Maimonides, in a letter to one of his critics, expressed regret at not having listed out-of-the-way sources in a separate work. He indicated that he intended to compile such a reference book, though he never did. Numerous attempts have been made by later scholars to trace Maimonides' sources and reconstruct the arguments that led to his decisions. Nevertheless, many passages in the Mishneh Torah still remain unaccounted for, and very often its decisions run counter to the Talmud itself. It appears that Maimonides occasionally deviated from the opinion of early teachers, following instead the plain meaning of the biblical text (see Hilkhot Ned. 12.1); he also added laws not mentioned in any source but which accorded with his medical knowledge and could be deduced from the Mishnah (e.g., Hilkhot Shehitah 8.23). Maimonides included in his legal code a number of theological and philosophical ideas, as well as moral and practical rules, which, he held, formed part of the aggadic teaching of the oral law. The Mishneh Torah became a standard work of Jewish law and a major source for subsequent codes. The standing of Maimonides as a communal leader and rabbinic authority is evident from the epistles he addressed to Yemen and other parts of the Diaspora. Even more significant, in many respects, was Maimonides' philosophical Guide of the Perplexed (Moreh Nevukhim), thus entitled because it was intended neither for the ordinary pious folk, nor for those who occupied themselves exclusively with the study of Torah, but for those who followed both Torah and philosophy and who were “perplexed” by the contradictions between the teachings of the two. In interpreting the Torah in the light of philosophy, Maimonides rejects the literal understanding of certain texts, particularly *anthropomorphism. Phrases ascribing human qualities to God merely represent human language used by the Torah as metaphors for his actions. Faith is, ideally, a matter of conviction based on philosophical understanding. Maimonides' reconciliation of philosophy with Jewish tradition was based on his assumption that Aristotle's philosophy was the truth. However, he rejected the Aristotelian theory of the eternity of the universe, which he held to be unproved, and accepted the biblical doctrine of creatio ex nihilo. Prophecy, according to Maimonides, is that state of intellectual and moral perfection in which the human mind becomes illuminated by "active intellect" proceeding from God. All prophets received the divine message in a vision; only the prophecy of Moses came immediately from God. To know God and his relationship to creation, one must understand the nature of the universe and its parts. Man's free will is not affected by God's omniscience and foreknowledge; hence man remains responsible for his actions. The divine commandments are not arbitrary decrees but serve a rational purpose: to develop and perfect man's moral and intellectual potentialities, though some precepts are beyond human understanding. Maimonides defined certain propositions as prerequisites of Jewish religion. His list became known as the "Thirteen Principles of Faith and found its way into the liturgy in poetical form (*Yigdal). The Guide of the Perplexed was twice translated into Hebrew soon after its composition and thus came immediately to the notice of Jewish communities outside the Arab world. A Latin translation brought it to the notice of Christian scholastics as well. The Guide dominated the subsequent development of Jewish thought, although immediately upon its publication it provoked a storm of protest. Maimonides and his followers were accused of excessive rationalism, bordering on—or at least encouraging—heresy, and of undermining the belief in revelation, and thus the basis for following Jewish law. For over a century the conflict between Maimonists and anti-Maimonists almost rent Judaism into two camps (see MAIMONIDEAN CONTROVERSY), but ultimately the name of Maimonides became established as the symbol of the pure and orthodox faith. The popular evaluation was expressed by the later inscription on his tombstone: "From Moses to Moses there was none like unto Moses."

MAINTENANCE. A husband's obligation to provide his wife with food and clothing is a biblical law (Ex. 21.10), and it is extended by the Talmud to a number of other areas, including medical expenses and the use of the matrimonial home throughout widowhood (Ket. 46b–47a, 52b). Under rabbinic law, a husband is also required to provide funds for the maintenance of a domestic household and for any regular expenses of a personal nature incurred by his wife (Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 70.3). In return for her maintenance, the husband is entitled to his earnings for work done outside the home (Ket. 58b). The beit din is obliged to force a husband to maintain his wife in accordance with his potential earning capacity and not merely with his actual earnings (Rema', Even ha-'Ezer 70.3). A husband who is, however, unable to work and lives in penury for reasons beyond his control is only obliged to share what little he has with his wife (Pithei Teshuvah, Even ha-'Ezer 70.2). Normally, the obligation to maintain only applies if the wife lives in the matrimonial home. If the husband is responsible for his wife leaving the home, her claim for maintenance is unaffected by her departure from the common dwelling (Rema', Even ha-'Ezer 70.12). A widow may choose between receiving maintenance from her husband's estate or collecting the lump sum in her ketubbah. There is a fundamental difference between Sephardi and Ashkenazi authorities with regard to the question of whether the choice in this situation is the widow's or the heirs' (Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 93.3). Under Talmudic law, the maintenance of children is obligatory only until they reach the age of six years. It is, however, regarded as an act of cruelty to refuse to maintain children beyond this age (Ket. 49b). In any case, there is a general obligation to support all close relations under the laws of charity (Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 71.1; Yoreh De'ah 254.4). Daughters are entitled to receive maintenance from their dead mother's ketubbah out of the estate of their deceased father (Ket. 52b).

MAKHSHIRIN (מַכְשִׁירִין; Render Susceptible [to Ritual Impurity]), tractate in Mishnah order Tohorot, with related material in the Tosefta. There is no gemara in either Talmud. According to biblical law, foods are rendered susceptible to ritual contamination only after coming into contact with water (Lev. 11.34, 38). The laws governing the role of liquids in transmission of impurity were a major point of sectarian contention during Second Temple times, which helps to explain why the Mishnah devoted an entire tractate of six chapters to this subject.

The opening and closing laws of the tractate highlight its dominant conceptual theme: intention. The opening law of the tractate establishes intention as an essential component of the contact made between the liquid and the food. A discussion of the seven liquids that render food susceptible to impurity closes Makhshirin.

The focus on intention is characteristic of Pharisaic halakhah and is absent from the halakhic traditions of other sects, which tended to be much stricter in defining the laws of impurity. Much of the tractate is devoted to defining the boundaries between intended and unintended contact between food and liquid. In a series of disputes between Beit Hillel* and Beit Shamm'ai, Beit Hillel leniently requires a higher degree of intention than does Beit Shamm'ai in order to render food susceptible to impurity.

An English translation of the Mishnah tractate is in Herbert Danby's The Mishnah (Oxford, 1933).

MAKKOT (מִקּוֹט; Flogging), tractate consisting of three chapters in Mishnah order *Neziqin, with related material in the Tosefta' and in both Talmuds. Makkot, which was originally the end of tractate Sanhedrin*, concludes Sanhedrin's discussion of the laws of *capital punishment by dealing with several ancillary topics: the laws of false witnesses (Dt. 19.15–21), who are sometimes put to death; the exile of unintentional murderers to cities of refuge (Nm. 35.9–28; Dt. 19.1–10); and *flogging (Dt. 25.1–3), from which the name of the tractate is derived.

The biblical provision that a false witness be punished "as he intended to do to his friend" (Dt. 19.19) served as a major point of contention between Pharisees and Sadducees (Mak. 1.6, 5b), especially regarding capital cases. According to Pharisaic law, followed by Makkot, false witnesses are punished after their testimony has led to conviction of the defendant and prior to his actual execution. False testimony thus emerges as a unique case in Jewish law, in which a transgressor is punished for criminal intent, although the crime was not successfully executed. Makkot discusses the conditions for punishing false witnesses and the manner of punishment of witnesses to whom the principle of an "eye for an eye" (Dt. 19.21) is inapplicable.

The laws regarding the exile of murderers to cities of refuge focus on the legal determination of different levels of intent and of negligence as well as on the manner and conditions of the penalty of exile. Makkot's discussion reflects the dual character of exile as protection of the person who has committed manslaughter from the blood avenger (Nm. 35.26–27; Mak. 2.7) and as atonement for criminal negligence (Mak. 2b).

Makkot lists transgressions for which the penalty of flogging is prescribed and describes the manner in which the flogging is carried out, stressing the care that must be taken to avoid the criminal's accidental death. The sages' aversion to carrying out capital punishment is underscored by Makkot's characterization of any court that executed more than one criminal every seven (and, in one tradition, seventy) years as a "destructive court" (Mak. 1.10). The redactor of Makkot emphasizes the merciful and affirmative thrust of Jewish law (Mak. 1.7, 3.15) by concluding the Mishnaic discussion of punishments with the declaration that the plenitude of commandments stems from God's desire "to benefit Israel" (Mak. 3.16).

The Talmud Bavli tractate was translated into English by H. M. Lazarus in the Soncino Talmud (London, 1935).

MALACHI (Heb. Mal'akhi), postexilic prophet in the kingdom of Judah whose oracles appear in the book named after him. The existence of a prophet by this name is disputed because the name literally means "my messenger" and may be derived from the statement in Malachi 3.1, "Behold, I send my messenger to prepare the way before me." Furthermore, Malachi 2.7 identifies the priest as "the messenger of the Lord of Hosts." The Talmud as well as the Aramaic Targum Jonathan consider Malachi a proper name (Meg. 15a) and identify him with Ezra the scribe (R. ha-Sh. 19b). The message of the prophet presupposes the destruction of Edom and the rebuilding of the Temple in the late sixth and early fifth centuries BCE. He portrays a period of decline in the Jewish community in which intermarriage and lax Temple observance are prevalent. He exhorts the priests and the people to maintain the Torah and covenant with God, comparing that with marriage and marital fidelity. Just as he rejects divorce, so he rejects infidelity to the covenant. He foresees the "Day of the Lord," preceded by the appearance of the prophet Elijah, when God will punish the wicked and restore the righteous (KJV, Mal. 4.5–6).

The Book of Malachi is the twelfth and last book of the Minor Prophets. A characteristic stylistic feature of Malachi's prophecies is the employment of disputation speeches. The book consists of the preamble (1.1–5), in which God assures the people of his permanent relationship with them; a rebuke of the priests for treating the Temple disrespectfully (1.6–2.9); a denunciation of mixed marriages and divorce (2.10–16); a promise of divine retribution for those who engage in sorcery, adultery, perjury, and exploitation of the weaker classes (2.17–3.5); an accusation against the people for defrauding God of the payment of tithes (3.6–12); a condemnation of those who charge that the wicked and arrogant are not punished (3.13–4.3); and an exhortation to the people to be mindful of the Torah of Moses (4.4–6), for the prophet Elijah is about to come and herald the final "Day of the Lord." The closing verses of Malachi have also been interpreted as the conclusion of the entire prophetic section of the Bible. The book is commonly dated to the mid-fifth century BCE.

MALAKH, HAYYIM (c.1655–1717), radical Shabbatean kabbalist. Born in Poland, he adhered to Shabbateanism under the influence of mystic Yehoshu'a Heshel *Tsoref of Vilna. In 1690 Malakh moved to Italy, where he associated with the clandestine Shabbatean activists Avraham Rovigo and Binyamin ha-Kohen, from whom he received the esoteric writings of Natan of Gaza. In Poland, Malakh spread Shabbatean ideas and later stayed in Adrianople with Shabbetai Tsevi's secretary Shemu'el Primo. In 1700 Malakh joined *Yehudah Hasid ha-Levi's group, which went to Jerusalem in expectation of the imminent advent of the Messiah. After Yehudah's sudden death, Malakh led the group but was expelled from Jerusalem by the rabbis. He moved to Salonika where he maintained contacts with the apostates of the *Dönme sect. In Podolia, Poland, he led the radical Shabbatean sect from which the Frankist movement emanated. None of his writings survived. He was strongly opposed by Avraham Miguel Cardoso (see CARDOSO FAMILY), the Shabbatean thinker, who rejected the radical Shabbateans' antinomianism and belief in the apotheosis of the Messiah.

MALBIM, ME'IR LEIBUSH (1809–1879), rabbi, preacher, and biblical commentator. Malbim was born in Volochisk, Volhynia. He studied in Warsaw, and eventually became the rabbi of Bucharest and then the chief rabbi of Romania in 1858, where he was involved in the battles over religious reform. His strong anti-Reform stand led to his dismissal from that position. Malbim's biblical commentaries on Esther (1845), Isaiah (1849), Leviticus and Song of Songs (1860), and other books of the Bible (1867–1876), contain his polemics against modern methods of Bible study. Against the reformers, Malbim asserted that the words of the rabbis in the oral law were given from heaven, that there were no superfluous words in scripture, and that the rabbis had developed the basic foundations of grammar and logic. His commentaries achieved great popularity. In addition to his biblical commentaries, Malbim composed treatises on Talmudic law, commentaries on rabbinic codifications, and works on language, poetry, and logic.

MALKHUYOT (מַלְכוּתִים; Sovereignities), first of the middle three sections (the other being *Zikhronot and *Shofarot) of the *Amidah additional service of the *Ro'sh ha-Shanah liturgy, devoted to the theme of God's sovereignty. The theme is expressed by appropriate biblical verses—three each from the Pentateuch, the Prophets, and the Hagiographa, with the concluding verse from the Pentateuch (as laid down in R. ha-Sh. 4.6)—*Aleinu, and a prayer. After Malkhuyot, the *shofar is sounded (except on a Sabbath)—in the Sephardi rite, during both the silent Amidah and its repetition by the cantor; in the Ashkenazi rite, during the repetition only.

MAMRAM (Hebraized form of Lat. membrana [parchment]), promissory note; first described by Jewish authorities in sixteenth-century Poland. It was designed to allow a person to write out authorization to another to pay the bearer of the note a fixed amount of money, and in certain ways was similar to a bond or a check. It is first described in the halakhic literature by R. Mordechai ben Avraham Jaffe in his work Levushim, although some believe it dates to the fourteenth century.

MAMZER (מַמְזֵר), the product of an adulterous or an incestuous union. Under biblical law it is forbidden for a mamzer to marry another Jew (Dt. 23.3; Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 4.13). Marriage between two mamzerim is permitted, as is a marriage between a mamzer and a convert, and their children will be mamzerim (Yev. 45b, 79b; Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 4.22–24). If, despite the prohibition, a Jew contracts a marriage with a mamzer, the offspring is a mamzer since the rule is that in prohibited unions, the children adopt the status of the "tainted" parent. The child of a mamzer and a non-Jewish woman will, however, be a non-Jew (Qid. 67a) and the product of an adulterous union between a Jewish woman and a non-Jewish man is not a mamzer (Yev. 45b). Although the term mamzer is often translated as "bastard," under Jewish law, a child born out of wedlock is in fact not a mamzer, and his or her personal status is legally unimpeachable. Except with regard to marriage, a mamzer does not suffer from any legal disadvantage. The inheritance rights of a mamzer are the same as those of any other heir and he may be appointed to high public office. According to the Mishnah, "a scholarly mamzer takes precedence over an ignorant High Priest" (Hor. 3.8). It is a general principle of rabbinic law that the creation of mamzerim ought to be avoided and, in practice, various methods are used in order to ensure that the taint, if it has been established in a particular family, does not persist throughout the generations. See also ADULTERY; INCEST.

MANASSEH (Heb. Menasheh), *Joseph's firstborn son and the name of one of the twelve tribes of Israel. Manasseh and *Ephraim were born to Joseph and his Egyptian wife, Asenath, in Egypt. Although Manasseh was the elder son, *Jacob put Ephraim first in his blessing (Gn. 48.20). Joseph was allotted two tribal territories, one for each of his sons. The territories of Manasseh and Ephraim were located in the central hill country; Manasseh's lay north of Ephraim's, half of it west of the Jordan River, half on its eastern bank. The earliest Israelite settlement sites are found in the territories of Manasseh and Ephraim. Mount Ebal in Manasseh was perhaps the site of the first Israelite cult center (Jos. 8.30). In the Midrash, Manasseh is identified as the interpreter between Joseph and his brothers (Gn. Rab. 91.8).

MANASSEH, PRAYER OF. See PRAYER OF MANASSEH.

MANASSEH BEN ISRAEL (1604–1657), Marrano-born Dutch scholar. His family left Portugal for the freedom of Amsterdam, where they embraced Judaism and where Manasseh embarked on a multifaceted career. He served the Sephardi communities of Amsterdam as chief preacher, rabbi, schoolteacher, and principal, and he founded the city's first Hebrew printing press. Manasseh wrote many works in Hebrew, Spanish, Portuguese, and Latin. Some were addressed to the needs of returning Marranos (Thesouro dos dinim; Nishmat Hayyim). Other works include Conciliador (1632), on the reconciliation of apparent contradictions between biblical passages; De creatione problemata (1635), on creation; and De resurrectione mortuorum (1636), on resurrection. Manasseh had a wide reputation among learned Christians, who came to hear him preach, corresponded with him, and cultivated his personal acquaintance; these included the jurist Hugo Grotius and Rembrandt, who painted his portrait. In his Miqveh Yisra'el (1650), Manasseh lent credibility and millenarian significance to the purported discovery of the ten lost tribes in South America.

In 1655 Manasseh traveled to England, where he petitioned Oliver Cromwell to readmit Jews. While the terms of Manasseh's petition were never formally granted, it paved the way for the eventual return of open Jewish life to England. While there he wrote a polemical defense of Judaism, Vindiciae Judaearum (1656), a response to a work by William Prynne, who was opposed to the return of Jews to England.

MANICHAISM, dualistic religion, incorporating elements of gnosticism, founded by Mani (c.216–276). Mani seems to have spent part of his youth in Judeo-Christian circles (see EBIONITES) and was active mainly in the Persian empire, where, after initial successes, he was finally martyred by order of the Sassanian king Bahram I. Manichaeism was a missionary religion and seems to have had wide appeal, gaining adherents in North Africa, the Near East, Persia, Central Asia, and even China before being brutally stamped out. Scholars detect Manichaean influence in various medieval gnostic-dualistic heresies, including the Albigenses (Catharans) in twelfth-century southern France. The possibility of Catharan influence on *Kabbalah, particularly the doctrine of *transmigration, exists, but there is no conclusive evidence. The polemics of *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on (882–942) against dualistic beliefs and also against the belief in transmigration were probably directed at Jewish proponents of Manichaeism.

MANNA, food miraculously provided for the Israelites during their wandering in the wilderness (Ex. 16.4–35). It is described as a thin layer of seedlike substance, akin to hoarfrost (Ex. 16.14) or coriander seed, suitable for varied processing (Nm. 11.6–8). A double portion was gathered every Friday, the only time manna remained fresh until the next day (from which derives the custom of placing two loaves on the Sabbath-eve table). Only when the Israelites had crossed the Jordan River did manna cease to appear, but as a memorial, a jar of manna was placed in the Sanctuary. Its spiritual significance was explained in the passage “. . . and gave you manna to eat . . . in order to teach you that man does not live on bread only, but that man may live on anything that the Lord decrees . . .” (Dt. 8.3). The rabbis suggested that manna was created on the first Sabbath eve (Avot 5.9).

The physical nature of the manna was a perplexing question for the Israelites themselves; the Hebrew phrase in Exodus 16.15, man hu', means both “what is it?” and “it is manna.” The metaphorical descriptions “food from heaven” (Ex. 16.4) and “heavenly grain” (Ps. 78.24, cf. Ps. 105.40) are figurative and expressive but tell nothing of the physical properties of the manna. Exodus 16 and Numbers 11 provide some physical details, but several of the technical terms involved are themselves enigmatic, since they occur hardly anywhere else in the Bible. After comparison with other ancient Near Eastern texts, the manna may be described as an edible substance, white in color, abundant and fine like frost on the ground, with a sweet, rich, creamy taste, generally similar in nature to the seed of the more common (white) coriander herb.

MANNHEIMER, ISAAC NOAH (1793–1865), preacher whose name is associated with the Wiener minhag (Viennese rite), a compromise between *Orthodoxy and *Reform Judaism. The son of a Hungarian cantor, Mannheimer was born and educated in Copenhagen, where he endeavored to promote a reformed style of worship between 1817 and 1820. When Vienna's elegant new Stadttempel (City Temple) was consecrated in 1826, Mannheimer, director of the religious school (i.e., minister-preacher), officiated. Initially, his reluctance to antagonize most regular worshipers deflected him from his original path. By 1830, however, Mannheimer had become ideologically more conservative. Together with Salomon *Sulzer, the Stadttempel's young cantor-composer, he developed an aesthetically "improved" choral service with German-language sermons but few changes in the traditional liturgy. Prayers were recited in Hebrew, those expressing the hope for Israel's national restoration in Zion were retained, and organ music was excluded on Sabbaths and festivals. While this form of worship did not satisfy more-Orthodox Jews, it prevented a split in the community and—as the Wiener minhag—was adopted by many congregations throughout the Habsburg empire. Though not an ordained rabbi, Mannheimer excelled as a preacher and became renowned for his pastoral and philanthropic work. In later years he vigorously defended circumcision, boycotted Reform congresses in Germany, and issued a prayer book with translation (1840) that appeared in several editions. During the revolutions of 1848, he was elected to parliament and called for Jewish emancipation and the abolition of capital punishment.

MA'OZ TSUR (מַעֲזַת צֹר; O Fortress, Rock [of My Salvation]), hymn sung on *Hanukkah after the kindling of lights in the Ashkenazi ritual, but not the Sephardi one (although now widely sung by all communities in Israel). Ma'oz Tsur was composed by a certain Mordekhai (possibly 13th cent.), whose name appears in acrostic. Originally intended for the home, the song has been also transferred to the synagogue. Its stirring tune, adapted from an old German folk song, forms a fitting accompaniment to its theme of the Jewish people's salvation from the oppression of the Egyptians, Babylonians, Haman, and the Syrian Greeks.

MAR (Aram.; מַר; master), honorific title given in Babylonia to the exilarchs and to some amora'im; for example, a son quoting his scholarly father was told to refer to him as "my father, my mar" (Qid. 31b). Sometimes the title was used in preference to "Rabbi," notably for the scholars Mar *Shemu'el, Mar Zutra' (6th cent. exilarch), and Mar 'Ukba' (10th cent. exilarch). In the course of a Talmudic discussion, when the words "mar said" are used, the meaning is "one [of the disputants mentioned earlier] said." In Modern Hebrew, "Mar" is used as "Mr."

MARBITS TORAH (מַרְבִּיץ תּוֹרָה; Torah teacher), a type of communal religious leader in Mediterranean lands from the sixteenth through the eighteenth century. When the Spanish refugees reached the Ottoman empire at the end of the fifteenth century, they called their local spiritual leaders marbits Torah. His authority was limited to a single community or province. Though a highly respected figure, there were often conflicts between the marbits Torah and the communities over halakhic issues, the heredity of the position, and the salary. The position was known in Turkey and Italy until the end of the seventeenth century and was still in existence in Tangiers at the end of the eighteenth century.

MARGALIT, MOSHEH (c.1719–1780), rabbi and Talmudic commentator. Margalit was born near Kovno, Lithuania, and later served as rabbi in several Lithuanian communities. He wrote one of the most important commentaries on the Talmud Yerushalmi. Part one, entitled Penei Mosheh, gives a running explanation of the text; the second part, Mar'eh ha-Panim, notes the differences between the Talmud Yerushalmi and the Talmud Bavli, and here Margalit shows great textual acumen, offering numerous emendations, based in part on evidence from the Tosefta. Together with David Franckel's Qorban ha-'Edah, Margalit's commentary continues to appear in almost every edition of the Talmud Yerushalmi. Margalit enrolled at the University of Frankfurt in 1779, shortly before his death, in order to study botany, presumably to understand better the Jewish agricultural laws. The tradition that Eliyahu ben Shelomoh Zalman of Vilna was, in his youth, Margalit's student is almost certainly apocryphal, and the former knew nothing of Margalit's commentaries, many of which were not published until after his death. Margalit wrote commentaries on the Torah and a few tractates of Talmud Bavli, but they were never published.

MARGOLIES, MOSES ZEVULUN (1851–1936), Orthodox rabbi in the United States. He was born in Kroja, Russia, and attended yeshivot in Bialystok and Kovno before serving as rabbi in Slobodka from 1877 to 1899. He then migrated to America and served as Boston's unofficial chief rabbi until 1905, when he moved to New York's Congregation Kehilath Jeshurun, where he served until his death.

Although he was a leader of the *Union of Orthodox Rabbis of the United States and Canada, which actively opposed immigrant religious acculturation, Margolies supported the *Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America, the modernization of the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary, and the modern Talmud Torah movement, all of which promoted Americanized Orthodoxy. MAROR (מרור; bitter herb), bitter herb eaten at the *Seder service. The regulations for the paschal lamb include the injunction, "With unleavened bread and with bitter herbs shall they eat it" (Ex. 12.8). Originally a condiment eaten with meat, maror was invested with symbolic significance as a memorial of the fact that the Egyptians "embittered the lives" of the children of Israel (Ex. 1.14).

With the destruction of the Temple, the paschal sacrifice ceased, but both unleavened bread and bitter herbs became an integral part of the Seder service. The Haggadah is to be recited only "when matsah and maror are lying before you," and the maror is ceremoniously eaten twice, once with haroset* and once with matsah in the form of a sandwich in recollection of the custom of *Hillel, who made a sandwich of the paschal offering together with matsah and maror. The Mishnah (Pes. 2.5) lists five plants that may be used for the bitter herb: hazeret (lettuce), olshin* (chicory), tamkha' (identification uncertain), harhavinah (a plant of the Umbelliferae family), and maror (possibly Sonchus oleraceus; Arab. murar). In eastern Europe it became customary to use the root of horseradish. According to the custom of Yitshaq ben Shelomoh *Luria, followed by the Sephardim, the maror is in the center of the Seder plate; according to R. *Eliyahu ben Shelomoh Zalman, the Vilna Ga'on, followed by Ashkenazim, it is at the top of the plate.

MARRANOS, crypto-Jews of Spain and Portugal, forcibly converted to Christianity in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Beginning with violent anti-Jewish persecutions in 1391, followed by anti-Jewish legislation, compulsory conversionary sermons in synagogues, and a religious disputation in Tortosa in the early fifteenth century, over one hundred thousand Jews in Spain either reluctantly sought baptism or were forcibly converted to Christianity. They were known as conversos or New Christians. Some became sincere Christians, while others continued to adhere to Jewish practices in secret. The latter were soon derisively called Marranos, meaning swine. The Marranos of the Balearic Islands were known as Chuetas*. The converts hoped to weather the storm and return to Judaism, only to discover that their baptism was considered indelible by church authorities and that any further practice of Judaism would be regarded as the criminal offense of Judaizing or heresy. With their conversions, these former Jews were no longer barred from many areas of the Iberian economy or society, and they soon distinguished themselves in commerce, statecraft, and even within the church. They constituted a discernible and influential class of society.

In 1449 anti-Jewish popular sentiments were deflected into anti-Marrano riots. Laws were promulgated barring New Christians from advancement on the basis of their origins (racial laws known as limpieza de sangre [purity of blood]). In 1480 the Inquisition was established in the kingdom of Aragon; New Christians, particularly wealthier families, were its major target at first. The ranks of the Marrano population swelled with the expulsion of Jews from Spain in 1492 and the forced conversion of the Jewish community of Portugal in 1497.

Many of the latter were exiles from Spain who had chosen immigration over conversion only a few years previously. The Inquisition was introduced into Portugal in 1540. Marranism virtually ceased in Spain by the middle of the sixteenth century. Upon the annexation of Portugal by Spain in 1580, thousands of Marranos from Portugal fled back to Spain, assured by the authorities that the Spanish Inquisition would not try them for "crimes" committed in Portugal. Spanish society once again faced the issue of crypto-Judaism. With the passage of time traces of Judaism grew fainter among the Marranos. They constituted a secret society pervaded by fear of detection and Inquisitorial prosecution. After 1540, the Portuguese Inquisition was especially zealous in ferreting out Marranos. Eventually many Marranos escaped to England, Holland, France, the Ottoman empire, or the New World (where the Inquisition followed them) and returned to Judaism. They formed a diaspora stretching from Brazil to Goa, linked by family ties, shared tragedy, and often commerce. Rabbinical authorities tended to be lenient with these former Marranos, regarding them as Jews who were not to be reminded of their tragic past. Crypto-Judaism persisted in the Iberian Peninsula for centuries. Deprived of rabbinical authorities, access to knowledge of Hebrew, and access to post-biblical sources, as well as the sustenance of a living community, it became a radically altered religion. Nevertheless, Marranos and their descendants, who had long since forgotten why they retained some of their distinctive practices, continued to be stereotyped and stigmatized despite their strict adherence to Catholicism. Until its abolition in Portugal in the eighteenth century and in Spain in the nineteenth century, the Inquisition continued to prosecute Marranos. Remnants of Marrano practices persist in northeastern towns and villages in Portugal. Recently an entire community of Marranos in Belmonte, Portugal, returned to Judaism.

MARRIAGE. The married state is emphatically regarded in Judaism as a social, moral, and religious ideal, and as a necessary condition of spiritual perfection. *Celibacy was frowned upon, and even ascetic and mystical writers never suggested that the perfect life was possible without marriage. The rabbis eloquently extolled the virtues of marriage: "He who dwells without a wife dwells without joy, without blessing, without good, and without happiness" (Yev. 62b); and "He who has no wife is less than a man" (Yev. 67a). Marriage is a religious duty, as the first biblical commandment enjoined: "Be fruitful and multiply" (Gn. 1.28); the purpose of marriage is procreation, and ten years of childless marriage was regarded as a valid and natural cause for *divorce. Although monogamy was envisaged as the ideal state (see Gn. 1 and 2) and seems to have been the norm, the legal system presupposed *polygamy. It was not until the time of R. *Gershom ben Yehudah (c.960–1028) that monogamy became legally binding upon Ashkenazi Jews, but the decree enforcing it seems to have been the legal formulation of existing practice rather than a reform. The ideal relationship between God and Israel is depicted by the biblical prophets, as well as in later agadic literature and liturgical poetry, not so much in the language of erotic love (as in the allegorical exegesis of the Song of Songs) as in imagery drawn from the marriage bond between husband and wife. MARRIAGES, PROHIBITED. There are two main categories of prohibited marriages in Jewish law: void and valid. The former category consists of adulterous unions, incestuous unions, and unions with non-Jews. In the case of adultery (on the wife's part) and incest the offspring are mamzerim (see MAMZER). While an adulterous woman must be divorced by her husband, such a step does not need to be taken in the case of incest or in the case of marriage with a non-Jew since these marriages are void ab initio. The halakhic status of the children of mixed marriages is determined by the matrilineal principle. Valid prohibited marriages are generally those involving lesser biblical offenses than incest and unions between the secondary degrees of consanguinity prohibited by the rabbis (Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 44.6–7). In the case of such marriages, pressure is applied to the couple to secure a divorce, even if they were unaware of the prohibition at the time of their nuptials. Examples of valid prohibited marriages include an adulteress and her lover, even after the woman's divorce from her husband or his death (Yev. 24b); a priest and a woman whom he is forbidden to marry (Rema', Even ha-'Ezer 3.6); marriage between a divorcee who has remarried and her first husband, after her second husband has divorced her or died, (Dr. 24.4); and a bigamous union under the decree of R. Gershom. In general, if the husband was unaware at the time of marriage that his wife was prohibited to him, then both parties will be exempt from their marital obligations under the law. Voluntary obligations such as the tosefet ketubbah (see ALIMONY) will, however, remain in force (Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 116.1–3). Where the husband was aware of the impediment at the time of marriage, a balance is struck between compelling him to fulfill all the obligations imposed upon him by the law and creating a situation in which the couple will be encouraged to divorce. The wife's knowledge is of no legal significance in this area of Jewish law. In most cases where the principle of equality is at issue, the Reform movement rejects the notion of a prohibited marriage.

MARTYRDOM. The Hebrew idiom for martyrdom is qiddush ha-Shem (death for “the sanctification of the Name [of God]”; see Lv. 22.32), a term stemming from the belief that any worthy action on the part of a Jew that enhances the prestige of Judaism in the eyes of gentiles thereby also “sanctifies” the name of God as embodied in his revelation and covenant to Israel (similarly, its opposite, hillul ha-Shem*, an unworthy act, desecrates the Name). Qiddush ha-Shem came to have the more specific meaning of martyrdom, since the sacrifice of one’s life for God’s Torah was regarded as the ultimate sanctification of God’s name. This supreme act of faith was final proof of man’s willingness to “Love the Lord your God with all your soul (Dt. 6.5)—even though he take your soul” (Ber. 61b). The ideal of martyrdom in Judaism has its roots in the aqedah*, God’s test of Abraham through a command to offer up his only son Isaac; in that case, the supreme sacrifice was not exacted, and essentially martyrdom thus represents the willingness to make such a sacrifice. The martyr “sanctifies the name of God in public” and he is called qadosh (holy one). On the other hand suicide*, the deliberate throwing away of life without reason, is regarded as the most heinous of crimes, and the various regulations in Talmudic and post-Talmudic literature attempting to establish those instances when martyrdom is justified are designed to show, as far as possible, the frontiers between the two acts. The duty of preserving life is paramount in Judaism, and it is a general rule that in order to save life one may transgress all the commandments of the Torah with the exception of the three cardinal sins of idolatry, shedding of innocent blood, and major sexual transgressions (adultery and incest). In the case of these three, one should endure martyrdom rather than transgress. However, in times of religious persecution, when the observance of the Torah becomes a public demonstration of religious loyalty, the Jew was obliged to submit to martyrdom rather than transgress even the most insignificant commandment (San. 74a). During the Middle Ages, mostly in connection with the massacres that accompanied the Crusades*, whole communities underwent self-immolation at the behest of their leaders rather than submit to baptism (the example of the Jewish community of York in 1190 is outstanding). These tragic episodes are usually regarded as the classic examples of martyrdom in Jewish thought and history, and to this day a prayer is recited on the Sabbath for “the holy congregations who laid down their lives for the sanctification of the divine name,” and Sephardi communities recite a special memorial prayer (Hashkavah) in memory of the victims of the Inquisition. According to Jewish law, the wife of a martyr may not remarry. Medieval pietists and especially the kabbalists recommended that when faced with martyrdom, it should be met in contemplation while reciting the Shema*. The Aleinu* prayer was also often recited by martyrs. See also MEMORBUKH; TEN MARTYRS.

MASHGIAH (מִשְׁגִּיחַ; supervisor), a title applied to two types of religious supervisors. A meshgiah is assigned by a rabbinic authority to supervise the kashrut of food products and in this role is known in Hebrew as a meshgiah kashrut. This person is responsible for ensuring that the food products of a factory, store, restaurant, or hotel are in compliance with the dietary laws*. Besides being a halakhic expert on kashrut, the meshgiah must be God-fearing and trustworthy. The ignorant and those motivated solely by financial gain are precluded from serving as meshgiah. A meshgiah is also assigned in a yeshivah* to supervise the spiritual development and well-being of the students; this person is known as the meshgiah ruhani.

MASHIV HA-RUAH U-MORID HA-GESHEM (מַשִּׁיב הָרוּחַ וּמוֹרִיד הַגֶּשֶׁם; “[He] who causes the wind to blow and the rain to fall”), phrase (taken from Ta’an. 1.1) introduced in all rites as part of the second benediction of the Amidah*. The onset of the fall and winter rainy season in Erets Yisra’el is marked by strong winds. The phrase is recited between Shemini Atseret* (when first recited in the prayer for rain [see TEFILLAT GESHEM]) and the first day of Pesah*, after which the Sephardi (but not the Ashkenazi) rite replaces it with morid ha-tal, “[He] who causes the dew to fall” (see TEFILLAT TAL). In Israel, most Ashkenazim follow the Sephardi practice.

MASKIL (מַסְקִיל; intelligent, knowing), originally, particularly in Sephardi usage, a title of honor for a learned man. In the Middle Ages, the term also meant (depending on the circle in which it was used) either a philosopher or a kabbalist. In the nineteenth century, the term came to designate a follower of the Haskalah* (Enlightenment) movement; hence it had a pejorative implication when used by the Orthodox.

MASORAH (מסורה; traditional text), a term that in the narrow and technical sense refers to an apparatus for the writing and reading of the biblical text (see BIBLE TEXT). The Masoretic Text is written around the consonantal framework of the biblical text as handed down for centuries by the schools of the Masoretes. There is no consensus concerning the vocalization of the word masorah and its exact meaning. According to some, it derives from the root asar (fetter; cf. masoret, Ez. 30.37); more likely the word derives from the verb masar (hand down, in the sense of traditional transmission). In the wider sense of the term, the Masorah consists also of the *vocalization, *accents, and certain other elements of the text. The Masorah had its origin in the period of the soferim (see SOFER), though some of its earliest features may date back to the time of *Ezra. The purpose of the Masoretes was to safeguard the integrity of the biblical text and to facilitate its study. Since scriptures as a whole, and the Torah in particular, were regarded as divinely inspired and considered the ultimate source of Jewish doctrine and observance, the slightest change could have far-reaching consequences (cf. 'Eruv. 13a). In order to achieve uniformity, the Masoretes compiled, first orally and subsequently in writing, numerous notes and rules with which to "fence round" the correct text and especially the exact spellings of the words—hence, the various masoretic treatises laying down the rules of spelling (full or defective) and marginal notes in Aramaic regarding the exceptions to these rules. As an additional precaution, the Masoretes would note how many times a certain spelling occurred in a given biblical book or in the Bible as a whole. Originally, it seems, the Bible was written in continuous script. The Masoretes, therefore, also directed their attention to such details of the text as the division into words, sentences, and paragraphs; vocalization and accents; and determining which letters must be written large (Gn. 1.1), small (Lv. 1.1), suspended (Jgs. 18.30), inverted (Nm. 10.35 ff.), or dotted (Dt. 29.28). The Masorah counted the letters, words, and verses in the individual books and in the Bible as a whole and printed out differences between pronunciation (qeri [what is read]) and spelling (ketiv [what is written]). The term sevirin (what could be suggested) referred to possible but not acceptable alternatives, though the text was left unchanged. The Masorah also mentions corrections of the scribes (tiqqunet soferim*), which, however, seem to represent Midrashic exegesis rather than emendations. These masoretic notes are placed on the side margins (Minor Masorah), while the notes on the tops and bottoms of pages (Major Masorah) list in detail the particulars mentioned by way of allusion in the Minor Masorah. Still longer annotations, included in medieval manuscripts and the Second Rabbinate Bible (Venice, 1525–1526), are reserved for the end of the Bible (Final Masorah). The Masoretes worked over many centuries (probably from 500 until 1000), especially in Erets Yisra'el but also in Babylonia and elsewhere. The accepted text was determined by Aharon ben Mosheh ben Asher of the school of Tiberias. The masoretic apparatuses were developed far beyond the activity of the first generations of Masoretes into collections of notes written in separate volumes or handbooks of detailed observations on the biblical text, above all, about spelling, including Okhlah ve-Okhlah*; Minhat Shai, by Shelomoh Yedidyah (16th cent.); and Masoret ha-Masoret, by Eliyahu *Levita (1538). The precise form of the Masorah, which was culled from various manuscripts by Ya'aqov Hayyim ibn Adoniyahu for the Second Rabbinate Bible, has become the accepted text of the Masorah, although scholars prefer to use the Masorah of individual manuscripts, such as that of the Aleppo Codex published by Loewinger (1977) or that of the Codex Leningrad B19^a published by Weil (1971).

MASSEKHET (מסכת; Aram. masekhta; woven fabric), a tractate of the Mishnah or of other rabbinic works (To-sefta', Talmud, Mekhilta'). Usually a massekhet deals with a specific subject and is subdivided into chapters, with the exception of 'Eduyyot, which is organized associatively. Originally the Mishnah had sixty tractates (Sg. Rab. 6.9; Nm. Rab. 18.21), but the division of tractate Neziqin into three subsections and the separation of Makkot from Sanhedrin raised the number to sixty-three. The Talmud Yerushalmi has thirty-nine tractates; the Talmud Bavli thirty-seven.

MATMID (מתמיד; from Heb. tamid [perpetual]), one who persists, particularly in his study of the Talmud. Among those studying in yeshivot, the matmid has always been the most admired of all students, a true matmid may spend as many as eighteen hours a day, or more, poring over the Talmud texts, leaving his books only for the three daily prayer services, meals, and a few hours of sleep. The fervent student who devotes days and nights to Talmudic learning has been immortalized in Hebrew literature by Hayyim Nahman Bialik's poem Nahman ha-Matmid.

MATRIARCHS (Heb. immahot), *Sarah, *Rebekah, *Leah, and *Rachel, the wives of the three *patriarchs. Unlike the patriarchs they are not mentioned in the traditional daily prayers, but they are now named along with the patriarchs in many non-Orthodox congregations and prayer books. Prayers for women who are ill and women after childbirth invoke the matriarchs, and blessings for girls mention their names. Rabbinic legends contain many stories about the four matriarchs, extolling their virtues.

MATRIMONY. Matrimonial law developed in the patriarchal society of the ancient Middle East. The husband was the dominant party in the relationship, though the wife had a high status in the home and already in the stories of the *matriarchs often played an independent role. The biblical precedent set the tone for Talmudic law, codified in Maimonides' Mishneh Torah and in the Shulḥan 'Arukh (Hilkhot Ishut 12.1–4; Shulḥan 'Arukh; Even ha-'Ezer 69.1–3). The husband was obligated to provide sustenance, clothing, and housing. He was also to decide where the couple would live, although if either wished to live in Erets Yisra'el and the other objected, such an objection was grounds for divorce. The husband was to cohabit with his wife (see SEX), to provide her a ketubbah*, to be responsible for her medical needs, to ransom her from captivity, and to ensure that she had a proper burial. Allowance was also to be made for her maintenance in the event of his death. The husband was entitled to inherit his wife's property (see INHERITANCE). Reform Jews do not recognize these laws as binding; Conservative congregations have modified them in accord with modern outlooks.

Jewish literature abounds with expressions of *family values and of the unique nature of the husband-wife relationship (see WOMEN), seen as fundamental and integral to the whole structure of Judaism. God's presence dwells in a home that is loving and pure (Sot. 17a). See also BETROTHAL; MARRIAGE.

MATSAB (מַצֶּבֶת), unleavened bread. Since it does not require fermentation of the dough, matsab can be baked hurriedly and is therefore specified as the bread prepared for unexpected visitors (cf. Gn. 19.3). For the same reason it became the bread of the *Exodus: "And they baked unleavened cakes of the dough . . . for it was not leavened, because they were thrust out of Egypt and could not tarry" (Ex. 12.39). It therefore also became known as "the bread of affliction." As a result, the main ritual in the observance of Pesah (also called the Festival of Matsot), is the prohibition against eating any ḥamets* (leaven) and the religious duty of eating matsab. The two regulations are not identical; the positive duty of eating matsab applies only on the first night (the first two nights in the Diaspora), when the eating of matsab is a central feature of the *Seder, while the prohibition against leaven applies to the whole period of the festival. Matsab may be eaten all year, but it became a custom not to eat it in the period preceding Pesah. The principal regulation concerning the baking of matsab is that the ingredients be only specially prepared flour (made from one of the "five species of grain," that is, wheat, rye, barley, oats, spelt; cf. Pes. 35a) and cooled water. The addition of salt is prohibited for no clear reason, and the dough must be continuously kneaded and baked with such rapidity as to prevent any possibility of fermentation. Eighteen minutes is usually regarded as the maximum amount of time. Normally it is sufficient to exercise care that the flour does not come into contact with moisture from the time of the grinding of the grain. In view of the positive obligation of eating matsab on the first night, many strictly Orthodox Jews bake a specially prepared matsab for that occasion. This is called shemurah matsab or matsab shemurah (i.e., matsab that has been specially guarded), and the flour for this matsab is supervised from the time the grain is harvested. Spiritually and allegorically, leaven is regarded as the symbol of impurity and matsab that of purity (Ber. 17a). All the meal offerings in the Temple were of matsab and were disqualified in the event of fermentation. The laws concerning matsab are to be found in the tractate Pesahim, in Hilkhot Ḥamets u-Matsab in Maimonides' Mishneh Torah, and in the Shulḥan 'Arukh (Orah Ḥayyim 53–462).

MATSEVAH (מַצֵּבָה; monument), originally, a raised stone. According to the Bible, matsevoth served as memorial stones for the dead (Gn. 35.20; 2 Sm. 18.18) and commemorated treaties or border agreements (Gn. 31.45–52; Jos. 4.4–9). They were connected with the worship of the Lord, as is clear from the early narratives of Jacob at Bethel (Gn. 28.18, 22, 35.14). In general, however, they were viewed negatively, since they were also employed as part of the cultic worship of other gods, especially the Canaanite-Phoenician Baal (1 Kgs. 14.23; 2 Kgs. 3.2). Thus, the Israelites were commanded to destroy them (Ex. 23.24, 34.13; Dt. 7.5, 12.3) and were prohibited from using them (Dt. 16.22). They have been identified with the larger stones or groups of stones found in archeological excavations throughout Israel dating from many of the early periods. In Jewish usage, the term subsequently signified a tombstone (see TOMBS).

MAYIM AĦARONIM (מַיִם אֲחֵרֹנִים; latter waters), the washing of hands after meals. Before beginning a meal at which bread is served, the hands must be washed and the appropriate blessing recited. The water used for this first ablution is called mayim ri'shonim (first waters). After the meal it is customary, though not obligatory, to dip the hands into a vessel containing mayim aḥaronim in order to cleanse the hands before reciting the *Birkat ha-Mazon. No blessing is recited over this post-prandial washing (Shulhan 'Arukh, Oraḥ Ḥayyim 181.f).

MAZZAL (מַזָּל), literally, a "constellation," the word has come to mean "luck." *Astrology is based on the belief that the fate of each person is determined by the constellation under whose influence he or she was born; hence, the Talmudic dictum ein mazzal le-Yisra'el, namely, Israel is ruled by divine providence and is not subject to the rule of the stars (i.e., fate). The word mazzal now is completely devoid of any such astrological significance. Since fortune can be either good or bad, the Talmud differentiates between mazzal tov (good luck) and mazzal bish (bad luck). Today mazzal tov is a formal expression of congratulation (see GREETINGS AND CONGRATULATIONS).

MEAL OFFERING (Heb. minḥah), one of the *sacrifices; also called a cereal or grain offering. The word minḥah actually means gift, in the sense of a tribute paid to a superior (e.g., Gn. 32.14, 22) or a ruler (e.g., Jgs. 3.15ff.; 1 Sm. 10.27), and could be used to refer to sacrifices in general (Gn. 4.3; cf. 1 Sm. 26.19; 1 Kgs. 18.36). Usually, however, the minḥah is a specific type of sacrifice: a cereal offering, as opposed to an animal sacrifice. The ingredients of the minḥah are semolina and oil. The various types are enumerated in Leviticus 2. The simplest is the uncooked mixture, requiring the addition of frankincense. The remaining types all involve some preparation of unleavened cakes: oven-baked (as loaves or wafers), griddle-toasted (and crumbled), and pan-fried. Only a small, representative portion (azkarah) was placed on the altar, the larger remainder was eaten by the priest (Lv. 6.11, 7.9). Conceptually, it was as though God had given the priests a portion of his own gift of food (Lv. 6.9–11). A special meal offering was made by the high priest (Lv. 6.12–16), according to some authorities, daily; according to others, on the day of his investiture. An individual would be moved to make a meal offering for a multitude of reasons, among them reverence, homage, gratitude, and propitiation. The meal offering shared the same functions as the *burnt offering for those whose means did not enable them to offer an animal. In the public sacrificial system, meal offerings accompanied the daily, Sabbath, Ro'sh Ḥodesh, and festival offerings (Nm. 15.1–16, 28–29). The public minḥah, especially that which was part of the daily evening sacrifice, eventually gave its name to the afternoon prayer service (see MINḤAH). The laws of the meal offering as expounded by the rabbinic authorities are found in tractate *Menaḥot.

MEAT (Heb. basar), animal flesh, as opposed to the bones, sinews, horns, or hoofs of an animal. The flesh of fowl and birds is considered meat in rabbinic law but not in the Bible. The flesh of fish or permitted insects is not considered meat, nor is blood or forbidden fat. Certain parts of the hide or skin are considered meat, though not after they have been made into leather (Hul. 122a). Meat is mentioned in halakhic discussion in a variety of contexts; for example, in connection with the laws regarding the paschal lamb (Ex. 12.8), sacrificial flesh (Ex. 29.33), meat torn from a living animal (see EIVAR MIN HA-ḤAI), permitted and forbidden animals (Lv. 11), defects that render flesh unfit for consumption (see TEREFAH), the impurities to which flesh is subject (e.g., Dt. 14.21), flesh from which no benefit may be derived (e.g., Ex. 21.28), the prohibition against cooking meat and milk together (based on Ex. 23.19, etc.), the preparation of the meat of permitted animals for consumption, or the determination of what is considered meat as far as vows are concerned (Ned. 54b). Only the meat of permitted animals (Lv. 11) that have been ritually slaughtered (see RITUAL SLAUGHTER) may be eaten. Since, however, the Bible forbids the consumption of certain fats and blood (Lv. 3.17), the meat after slaughter must be porged (see NIQQUR) in order to rid it of forbidden fat and must be made kasher in order to rid it of any remaining blood. This is done by soaking the meat in water for a half hour and then covering it lightly with salt (melihah). The salt must be of a fairly coarse variety so that it will not melt on contact with the meat. Liver must be broiled directly over a flame in order to be rendered kasher. Meat may not be cooked together with milk or in utensils in which dairy foods have been cooked. Such cooking renders the meat and utensils forbidden, and no benefit may be derived from either. Although the Bible says, "You shall not seethe a kid in its mother's milk" (Ex. 23.19), all permitted animals and fowl are included in the meat-milk prohibition. Milk may not be eaten after the partaking of meat; custom varies as to the period of time that should elapse (see DIETARY LAWS). Meat is considered both a substantial food and one that gives joy. It is therefore to be eaten on the Sabbath and festivals. For the same reason, it is not eaten by the mourner on the day of the burial, nor is it eaten during periods of national mourning, such as the nine days that culminate in the fast of Tish'ah be-'Av.

MEDICAL ETHICS. The role of the physician, birth control, feticide, and the treatment of the dying are among the issues that have been dealt with in classical Jewish law and that have been analyzed by halakhists over the centuries. Medical law is a major field of research for modern halakhists as a result of the universal concern with the moral implications of contemporary medicine and biotechnology. The extensive modern literature in this field includes discussions of fetal reduction in artificially assisted reproduction, surrogacy, the mapping of the human genome, the implications of genetic research and therapy, the use of fetal tissue, the treatment of patients in a persistent vegetative state, allocation of costly medical resources, confidentiality between doctor and patient, and professional ethics. The focus of Jewish medical law, which is distinct from Jewish medical ethics, is the nature and scope of relevant halakhic rules and principles. The wishes of the patient, therefore, are only relevant in the interstices of halakhic doctrine; they do not in themselves constitute a halakhically valid norm in biomedical decisions. However, in cases of medical uncertainty or high risk treatment or in cases in which depriving the patient of his or her autonomy is likely to affect health in an adverse manner, the relevant principle in Jewish law is that the patient's wishes are to be respected. The preservation of life, according to Jewish tradition, constitutes the fulfillment of a divine commandment, and only the prohibitions against the three major transgressions of homicide, idolatry, and forbidden sexual relations override the obligation to save life (San. 74a). Under Jewish law, a fetus is only endowed with full legal status, for purposes of criminal law, once it has emerged from the womb; hence, therapeutic abortion is generally treated in a lenient manner in the Jewish tradition (Ohal. 7.6). Such enterprises as the mapping of the human genome and research using genetic material need not clash with halakhic norms, as long as the research is orientated in a therapeutic direction. There are a number of institutions in various countries devoted to research in Jewish medical law and ethics, and there exist a number of publications, such as Assia, which are devoted solely to matters of halakhah and medicine. MEDICINE. The first biblical reference to illness is in Genesis 48.1; the word rofe' (healer, doctor) appears first in Genesis 50.2, but it is applied there to Joseph's Egyptian servants who embalmed his father, Jacob. God is the healer who heals Israel (Ex. 15.26), and he promises to prevent diseases among the people if they keep his commandments (Ex. 23.25). Since it is God who smites with illness and who alone heals (see 1 Sm. 2.6), the practice of medicine became a theological problem, since it represented an attempt to interfere with the ways of God. King Asa was reproved for seeking healing not from God but from physicians (2 Chr. 16.12). The Talmud deduces from Exodus 21.19 that the healing profession is religiously legitimate, but the problem continued to exercise thinkers throughout the Middle Ages when Jews were among the most renowned doctors. Moses *Maimonides, himself a physician, ruled that medical intervention was a religious duty and that every individual was obliged to care for his health in order to serve God (Mishneh Torah, Hilkhot De'ot 3.3). Other authorities (e.g., Nahmanides in his commentary on Lv. 26.11, Avraham ibn Ezra on Ex. 21.19) held different opinions; for example, that permission to seek and to dispense medical care applies to those on a lower spiritual level, that is, the majority, in consideration of their inability to abandon themselves completely to God's providence. The Shulhan 'Arukh (Yoreh De'ah 336) conforms with Maimonides' view that a physician who withholds his services is shedding blood.

According to the Talmud, a scholar, who should be aware of the obligation to care for one's life, may only live in a city where there is a physician and a surgeon (San. 17b). Of special historical interest are many passages in the Talmud testifying to some advanced medical knowledge. Such passages include references to anesthesia (a "sleeping drug") for surgical operations (B. M. 83b), amputations (Y., Naz. 9.5), artificial teeth and limbs (Shab. 6.5, 8), Caesarean sections on living mothers and in subsequent childbirths (Bekh. 8.2), and the feasibility of artificial human conception by impregnation through sperm in tub water (Hag. 15a)—the latter two being the first such references known in the history of medicine. The legal codes devote chapters to the laws of the physician, listing his responsibilities, including visiting and praying for the sick (Yoreh De'ah 335), liabilities, claims to payment (Yoreh De'ah 336), and the conditions under which the Sabbath and other precepts may be violated to protect life and health (Orach Hayyim 228–230, 618, etc.). The Talmud also deals with *abortion, *birth, *circumcision, and *sterilization. Many of the best-known rabbis, philosophers, poets, and grammarians of the Middle Ages were physicians by occupation. Jews have continued to play a prominent part in all branches of medical research and practice. Certain medical developments have raised halakhic concerns, among them the need for *autopsies and dissections both for establishing the causes of death and for the training of medical students.

MEDINA, SHEMU'EL DE (1506–1589), known by the acronym Rashdam; rabbinical authority and community leader in his native Salonika, where he served as dayyan. He was a student of Yosef *Taitazak and was rabbi of two of the most important communities in Salonika. Medina was consulted on halakhic matters by many communities from all parts of the Ottoman empire and beyond, such as Italy and France. He was immersed in halakhah and took no interest in kabbalistic literature or philosophy. Many of his responsa became generally accepted decisions not only in the Ottoman empire but also in eastern Europe and have been quoted in modern times by judges in Israel. His authority and powerful personality were widely respected, and he was called on to decide disputes in the Salonikan and other communities. A selection of his responsa was published in his lifetime (Salonika, 1585?–1587) and a more comprehensive selection, consisting of 626 responsa, appeared after his death (Venice and Salonika, 1594–1595). He headed a large yeshivah, and his best-known student was Avraham ben Mosheh di Boton (see BOTON FAMILY).

MEDINI, HAYYIM HIZQIYYAHU (1833–1905), rabbi and halakhist. Born in Jerusalem, he served as a rabbi for many years in Constantinople and in the Crimea before returning to Erets Yisra'el in 1899. Turning down the possibility of the appointment as chief rabbi of the Sephardi community, he accepted a rabbinical position in Hebron. Medini is best known for his Sedei Hemed (18 vols. [Warsaw, 1891–1912]), an encyclopedia of halakhah that deals with individual legal topics and with the rules of halakhic decision making. The work is used widely in Talmudic studies.

MEDITATION. Jewish meditation entails deep reflection and contemplation of God. A frequently used Hebrew term connoting this is hitbodedut (self-isolation). It refers to withdrawal from social interactions and a turning inward. The Hebrew Bible is replete with spiritual directives that formed the basis of Jewish meditation. “For you, who adhere to the Lord, your God, are all alive today” (Deut. 4.4). From this the rabbis deduced that attachment (devequt*) to God is life-sustaining and will ultimately result in resurrection (cf. San. 90b). The seminal formulation of devequt is: “I have continuously placed [shivviti] the Lord before me” (Psalms 16.8). The sages commented that “one who prays should perceive the divine presence before him” (San. 22a). These verses gave rise to various meditations in which the divine name is visualized, including R. Yitshaq ben Shemu'el of Acre's technique, wherein YHVH is imagined to be written infinitely large, while the heart focuses on the Ein Sof (the Infinite).

There are indications that biblical figures engaged in meditation. According to Genesis 24.63, Isaac ventured into the fields at sunset “la-suah” (to meditate). Isaac served as a model for others to meditate outdoors. In the post-biblical period, various Jewish groups were involved in meditation: the Hasidim Ri'shonim (ancient pietists; Ber. 32b), the *Therapeutae, who included women and were discussed by Philo, and the *Heikhalot mystics.

Jewish meditation has been practiced publicly during the daily liturgy, as well as privately. The most significant communal meditation pertains to the recitation of the *Shema'. Berakhot 13b recommended the protracted pronunciation of the climactic word ehad (one). Each of its letters has been assigned a special significance and accompanying head movement. Kabbalists, like R. *Ezra of Gerona, associated these letters with aspects of the sefirot. Representative of normative halakhah is R. Yehoshu'a Falk's summary: “When reciting the alef, one should consider that God is one; at the het, that he is united in the seven heavens and on earth, which makes eight; and, the dalet alludes to the four directions” (Arba'ah Turim, Oraḥ Hayyim 61.9).

Although the frequency and duration of private meditation is an individual decision, Hasidic masters—including R. Mordekhai of Chernobyl and R. Naḥman of Bratslav—encourage their followers to undertake hitbodedut for an hour or more daily.

Rabbi Hayyim Vital compiled the most comprehensive premodern anthology of meditative techniques in the long-suppressed fourth chapter of his Sha'arei Qodesh. Among the texts quoted is Sha'ar ha-Kavvanah, in which the adept visualizes that he is light and is surrounded by celestial lights. Vital and R. Yehudah al-Botini publicized Avraham Abulafia's methods, in which divine names are chanted and their vocalization is accompanied by head movements. Vital also disseminated the practice of yihudim (unifications), wherein names representing different elements of the divine realm are interwoven and contemplated during prayers.

MEGILLAH (מִגִּילָה), name of an Esther scroll and of a Mishnaic tractate.

Esther Scroll. Megillah is a common designation for a handwritten parchment scroll of the Book of Esther (see ESTHER; HAMESH MEGILLOT), read in the synagogue on *Purim. The illumination of such scrolls has been a favorite Jewish art form. See also SCROLLS.

—BARUCH J. SCHWARTZ

Tractate. The tractate Megillah consists of four chapters in Mishnah order Mo'ed, with related material in the Tosefta' and in both Talmuds. It derives its name from the scroll of Esther, the biblical source for Purim. The rabbis understood the biblical mandate to “commemorate” the two days of Purim (Est. 9.28) as a requirement to read the scroll of Esther as part of the festivities (Meg. 17a, 18a). The tractate deals with the rules for celebrating Purim, primarily the reading of the Megillah, as well as with the synagogal reading of the Torah and laws concerning the sanctity of the synagogue and the public prayer services. Megillah's hierarchy of sanctified objects (3.1) focuses the sanctity of the synagogue on the ark housing the Torah scrolls, much as the sanctity of the Temple focused on the Ark housing the tablets of the Law during biblical times (Ex. 25.21–22; 1 Kgs. 8.3–10).

MEGILLAT ESTER. See ESTHER; ḤAMEŠH MEGILLOT.

MEGILLAT TA'ANIT, an ancient tannaitic chronicle compiled at the beginning of the Common Era and recording thirty-five anniversaries of glorious deeds or joyous events in the Second Temple period (Ta'an. 2.8). Public mourning was forbidden on most of these days; public fasting, on all of them. The scroll, written in Aramaic with Hebrew additions, is divided into twelve chapters coinciding with the months of the year and enumerating the appropriate events. The significance of the dates lapsed in the course of time, and, since the third century, days recorded in Megillat Ta'anit are no longer marked in the calendar.

MEGILLOT, FIVE. See ḤAMEŠH MEGILLOT

MEḤILAH (מְחִילָה; forgiveness), the waiver or renunciation of a claim or right. No specific formalities or considerations are required; one possessing a claim or right, even in written form, may validly waive it by parole. A waiver may similarly be inferred from a creditor's statements or actions. One exception to this rule is a case in which the creditor continues to hold the debtor's written note or his pawn. A written waiver is required, for doubt would otherwise exist as to the genuineness of the creditor's intent.

In principle, the waiver of a future right is equally as valid as that of a present right. However, such a waiver cannot be effected where to do so would contradict the general principle that one cannot exercise legal control over a devar she-lo' ba' la-'olam, "something that has not yet come into existence." In order for an attempted change in a right or obligation to be effective, there must exist some present nexus between the right and the party seeking to make such change. Thus, a prospective husband could not validly waive his future right to usufruct in his wife's estate until after betrothal, which, while not creating a present right to usufruct, is deemed to have established a sufficient basis to allow a valid waiver even before the marriage is finalized.

MEḤITSAH (מְחִיצָה; partition), a division in the synagogue separating men from women during public prayer. In the Temple there was a separate courtyard for women, and the Mishnah (Suk. 5.2) records the special care taken to maintain the separation of the sexes, especially during Sukkot, when the Temple festivities attracted large crowds of worshippers. However, there is no clear recorded reference in ancient times to a meḥitsah in synagogues. Archaeological evidence is ambiguous, but by the beginning of the Middle Ages, the meḥitsah had become a recognized feature (see 'EZRAṬ NASHIM). The meḥitsah takes various forms when the women are not in a balcony but on the same level as the men; iron or wooden grilles or curtains are common. It was customary in Sephardi synagogues to open the curtain during the reading of the Torah. Attempts by worshippers to remove the meḥitsah in synagogues that had been founded as Orthodox and whose charters stated that they must remain Orthodox have gone to the civil courts in the United States, where, in most instances, the rulings stipulated that the meḥitsah had to be kept in place. Reform and Conservative synagogues dispense with the meḥitsah, although there are Conservative synagogues in which men and women sit on opposite sides of a dividing aisle.

In halakhah, meḥitsah is a technical term for a division (e.g., a wall or fence) that creates a separate domain; to be legally effective it must be at least ten handbreadths (approx. 40 inches) in height.

ME'IL. See TORAH ORNAMENTS.

ME'ILAH (מְעִילָה; Misappropriation), tractate consisting of six chapters in Mishnah order *Qodashim, with related material in the Tosefta' and in the Talmud Bavli. It deals with the laws concerning the secular use of objects consecrated to the Temple, which are subject to the penalty of a *reparation offering. In addition, the value of the item together with an additional fifth of the value must be repaid to the Temple (Lv. 5.14–16). The tractate lists the kinds of items and forms of consecration that are subject to the laws of me'ilah, differentiating between those items that were actually utilized in the Temple service and those that were used for maintenance of the Temple structure. The former retained their sanctity even after being misappropriated for secular use, whereas the latter were considered profaned by secular use and therefore not subject to repeated violations (Me'il. 5.3).

An English translation of the tractate appears in the Soncino Talmud (London, 1948).

MEIMRA'. See LOGOS.

ME'IR (2d cent.), tanna', pupil of R. *Aqiva' ben Yosef. During the Hadrianic persecution following the failure of the *Bar Kokhba' Revolt in 135, Me'ir was secretly ordained and was a prominent member of the Sanhedrin established at Usha' in Galilee. Me'ir had a brilliant intellect and was said to have been able to adduce a hundred fifty reasons for declaring an object unclean and another hundred fifty reasons for declaring it clean. He is the authority whose opinions are most frequently found in tannaitic literature. His teaching formed an important basis for the compilation of the *Mishnah by R. Yehudah ha-Nasi', so that traditionally a Mishnaic teaching, the source of which was not specifically named, was ascribed to Me'ir (San. 86a). Nonetheless, in controversies with his contemporaries, Me'ir's opinions were not followed. The reason given by the later amora'im for this anomaly is that, precisely because of his brilliant argumentation, it is difficult to know whether he was seriously disagreeing with or merely debating the issues (Eruv. 13b). He was famous for his parables and fables. Nothing is known of his origins; the name of his father is nowhere given, but he may have come from Asia Minor. Me'ir was a professional scribe of the highest quality. He is described as a man of humility and resignation. His wife *Beruryah is also quoted as a Talmudic authority. Toward the end of his life, he left the Sanhedrin as a result of his opposition to the patriarch R. *Shim'on ben Gamli'el; Me'ir's further statements are introduced as the remarks of "the others" (aherim). Perhaps it is for this reason that his opinions were not held as authoritative.

ME'IR BA'AL HA-NES, name associated with various rabbis, most popularly with the tanna' *Me'ir ('A. Z. 18a–b). A celebration is held at his grave in Tiberias each year on Pesah Sheni (14 Iyyar), and he is venerated by both Ashkenazi and Sephardi Jews. The name Me'ir Ba'al ha-Nes became widespread only in the eighteenth century, when collections throughout the world for charitable causes in the Holy Land were made in boxes labeled "The Charity of R. Me'ir Ba'al ha-Nes." Many rabbis condemned the annual celebration and the association of the collection box with a legendary figure.

• Yizhar Hirschfeld, A Guide to Antiquity Sites in Tiberias (Jerusalem, 1992).

ME'IR BEN BARUKH OF ROTHENBURG (died 1293), German rabbinic authority; died in prison in Alsace, having refused to allow the Jewish community to ransom him and thereby encourage future extortion on the part of the rulers. With his death, the martyrdom of one pupil, R. *Mordekhai ben Hillel (1297), and the flight of another, R. *Asher ben Yehi'el, to Spain in 1305, the period of the German tosafists came to an end. Me'ir himself was not an original glossator (tosafist) of note, but rather a poseq (see POSEQIM), the greatest produced by the Ashkenazi (Franco-German) community of the Middle Ages, and his rulings were viewed for centuries as authoritative. Sensing, perhaps, the impending fate of his community, he began in his academy to gather the responsa literature of the Ashkenazi community of the preceding three hundred years. These collections were assiduously copied in the later Middle Ages, and six volumes were subsequently published. Often going under his name, these influential compilations further enhanced Me'ir's fame. Unlike other Ashkenazi tosafists, who were wholly indifferent to Maimonides' code, Me'ir sought to integrate it with tosafist culture. His pupil, Me'ir ha-Kohen, wrote glosses on all fourteen volumes of Maimonides' work, seeking to provide for that code what Mosheh Isserles was later to do for Yosef Karo's Shulhan 'Arukh, namely, to amend a Sephardi code and render it authoritative in Ashkenaz. Me'ir also wrote liturgical poems, the best known of which, composed after the burning of the Talmud in Paris in 1242, became part of the liturgy of Tish'ah be-'Av.

ME'IR BEN GEDALYAH OF LUBLIN (1558–1616), Talmudist and yeshivah head, known as Maharam (an acronym of Moreinu ha-Rav Me'ir, "Our Teacher Rabbi Me'ir") of Lublin. He attracted hundreds of students to his Kraków and Lublin academies. He wrote Me'ir 'Einei Hakhamim (Venice, 1619; in many standard editions of the Talmud), a commentary on many Talmudic tracts, focusing in particular on the interpretations of Rashi and the tosafists. An independent thinker, Me'ir ben Gedalyah of Lublin criticized the authority of the Shulhan 'Arukh, deeming it to be a collection of rulings rather than a cohesive halakhic work. At times, he preferred the views of later authorities over the more traditionally accepted views of Maimonides and the tosafists. His collection of 140 responsa, Manhir 'Einei Hakhamim (Venice, 1618), provides valuable information about Jewish communal life in sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Poland. He exhibited great leniency in dealing with the problems of 'agunot (see 'AGUNAH) and the socially and economically disadvantaged.

ME'IR BEN SHEMU'EL (c.1060–1135), rabbinic scholar, tosafist. He studied in Worms with R. Yitsḥaq ha-Levi during the period prior to the First Crusade. He also studied with the scholars of Lorraine, with R. Eli'ezer ben Natan of Mainz, and with Rashi, whose daughter Yokheved he married. Three of his sons, who were also his students, Shemu'el, Yitshaq, and Ya'aqov Tam, became well-known through their biblical and Talmudic commentaries and tosafot, while his son-in-law was Shemu'el of Vitry, father of the important tosafist Yitshaq of Dampierre. Rabbi Me'ir himself wrote commentaries and tosafot to the Talmud, some of which are incorporated into the standard editions of Rashi and tosafot. It is likely that he played a crucial role in the transmission of the Talmudic dialectics that were produced at Worms in the last quarter of the eleventh century (found, for example, in the so-called Rashi commentary to tractate Nazir), which were then further developed and expanded by R. Tam and Yitshaq of Dampierre. Rabbi Me'ir lived mainly in the northern French town of Ramerupt and was known in tosafistic literature as Ha-Yashish (The Venerable One) or Avi ha-Rabbanim (Father of the Rabbis). He introduced certain changes in the *Kol Nidrei prayer and was responsible for its final formulation.

ME'IRI, MENAHEM (1249–c.1316), Talmudist from Perpignan, in southern France. His first significant work, written in his youth, was Hibbur ha-Teshuvah (New York, 1950), a compendium of writings dealing with repentance. His magnum opus was Beit ha-Be'irah, about twenty published volumes, noted for their expositions of Talmudic passages with definitive halakhic decisions. In this work, he employed the Talmud Yerushalmi extensively. His introduction to Avot contains a significant essay tracing the chain of tradition from Moses to his own day. He wrote commentaries to the biblical books of Psalms (Jerusalem, 1936) and Proverbs (Portugal, 1492; Jerusalem, 1937) based upon the ethical and wisdom literature of the Middle Ages, midrashim, and the works of noted grammarians. His Kiryat Sefer (İzmir, 1863–1881) contains the laws of writing a Torah scroll, while Magen Avot (London, 1909) defended local Provençal customs against criticism by Moses Nahmanides' disciples who had emigrated to Perpignan. Although Me'iri communicated extensively with R. Shelomoh ben Avraham *Adret, he did not accept the latter's ban on philosophy and maintained his independence of mind and freedom from intervention by outside rabbis. His rationalistic outlook is evidenced by his denial of the existence of evil spirits and of the efficacy of amulets and astrology, which—he said—contradicted human free will.

MEKHILTA' DE-RABBI SHIM'ON BAR YOḤAI, tannaitic midrash on the Book of Exodus (beginning with Ex 3.1) from the school of R. 'Aqiva'. The precise scope of the work is not clear, as it has only been preserved in fragmentary form. It is essentially a halakhic midrash, although parts of the work are aggadic in nature, and its aggadah closely resembles that in the parallel tannaitic midrash, Mekhilta' de-Rabbi Yishma'e'l. Mekhilta' de-Rabbi Shim'on bar Yoḥai is apparently one of the latest halakhic midrashim, although it cannot be dated with certainty. It is written in Rabbinic Hebrew.

MEKHILTA' DE-RABBI YISHMA'E'L, tannaitic midrash on Exodus, produced by the school of R. Yishma'e'l ben Elisha'. The Mekhilta' presents a running commentary on Exodus 12.1–23.19 and concludes with two sections on the Sabbath (on Ex. 31–35). Fragments of another Mekhilta' on Exodus, from the school of R. 'Aqiva' (the so-called Mekhilta' de-Rabbi Shim'on bar Yoḥai*), have also been preserved.

Mekhilta' de-Rabbi Yishma'e'l is first mentioned by name in geonic literature and was apparently unknown, at least in its present form, to the rabbis of the Talmud (although the Talmuds Bavli and Yerushalmi contain similar material). Nevertheless, the work is evidently of Palestinian provenance and was apparently redacted no later than the third century CE. The Mekhilta' is written in Rabbinic Hebrew and contains some Latin and Greek words. While the Mekhilta' is essentially a halakhic midrash, large parts of it deal with aggadic matters. A critical edition in light of genizah fragments was published by M. Kahana in Tarbiz 55 (1986): 545–587, and an English translation was done by J. Z. Lauterbach in 1933.

MELAMMED (מלמד; teacher), usually a teacher of small children (melammed dardegei or melammed tinoqot). The Talmud stresses the melammed's importance. In the course of time, because the term was applied to those on the lowest rung of the teaching profession, it came to have a certain derogatory meaning.

MELAVVEH MALKAH (מלכת המלכה; Accompanying the [Sabbath] Queen), a festive meal and celebration conducted at the termination of the Sabbath and lasting as long as possible in order to retain the Sabbath atmosphere after its conclusion. Just as the Sabbath is welcomed in song as a bride and as a queen (the Sephardi version of Lekhah Dodi* contains a kabbalistic addition ending "Come, O bride, come, O Sabbath queen"), so it is also solemnly bid farewell. Kabbalistic and Hasidic practice (based on the belief of Yitshaq ben Shelomoh *Luria that at the close of the Sabbath wicked souls return to Geihinnom and Sabbath angels to heaven) enhanced the observance of the custom. Authority for the Melavveh Malkah meal is found in the Talmud (Shab. 119b) where R. Ḥanina' enjoins laying the table on Sabbath night even if one is not hungry. Special zemiroth* have been composed for this celebration, of which the most important is in praise of the prophet Elijah, who, according to a popular belief, sits on this night under the tree of life and records the merits of those who have faithfully observed the Sabbath (Ya'aqov ben Mosheh ha-Levi Molin, Hilkhot Shabbat, end). The Melavveh Malkah is also identified with the feast of R. Ḥidqa' (see SE'UDAT RABBI ḤIDQA').

MEMORBUKH, martyrology containing a list of the countries and localities in which massacres took place during the Middle Ages, together with the names of the martyrs (usually confined to scholars and communal leaders) who lost their lives on those occasions. In many European synagogues, on all occasions upon which the memorial prayer for the dead was recited, the martyrologies were solemnly read out loud. The word memorbukh is a Yiddish translation of a phrase in Malachi ("and a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord"—3.16).

MEMORIAL LIGHT (Heb. ner zikkaron), a light kindled, usually for twenty-four hours, to commemorate the death of a family member. The custom is supported by the verse, "The soul of man is the lamp of the Lord" (Prv. 20.27). Although it is usual to light special wax candles that last for an entire day, it is permitted to use an electric light (Gesher ha-Hayyim, vol. 1, pp. 198, 343). In recent years, specially designed electrical memorial lamps have become available. The lighting of memorial lights is post-Talmudic and may have originated in medieval Germany. It is customary to kindle memorial lights on the yortsayt* (anniversary of the death of a close relative), during the shiv'ah* (the seven days of mourning for a close family member), and on Yom Kippur* eve when one memorial light, called the ner neshamah (soul light), commemorates all deceased family members (Orah Hayyim 610.3). Some people observe the custom of keeping a memorial light kindled throughout the entire year of mourning following the death of a parent. Many people now light a memorial light on Yom ha-Sho'ah, the day that commemorates the murder of millions of Jews during the Nazi Holocaust, and in Israel on Yom ha-Zikkaron (4 Iyyar), special flames are lit in public ceremonies that memorialize those who have fallen in Israel's defense.

MENAḤEM BEN AHARON BEN ZERAḤ (c.1310–1385), Spanish codifier. Born in Estalla, Navarre, he moved to Toledo after the 1328 anti-Jewish outbreaks, in which all of his family was killed and he himself was severely injured. He studied with Yosef ben Shu'ayb and Yehudah, son of Asher ben Yehi'el (the Ro'sh). He belonged to a group of sages whose philosophy was influenced by Shelomoh ben Avraham Adret and whose halakhic outlook was influenced by the Ashkenazi traditions of the Asher ben Yehi'el. Like his friend Me'ir Aldabi, MenaḤem used scientific sources and his writings had lexical value. His main work, Tsedah la-Derekh (Ferrara, 1554; Warsaw, 1880), was a legal code meant for study in the batei midrash in Spain. It combines philosophy, halakhic methodology, and logic. Its subject matter concerns everyday life, including a discussion of bigamy, a subject on the communal agenda in those days, and a practice of which MenaḤem disapproved. In his Or Torah, he emphasized the importance of education for women.

MENAḤEM MENDEL BEN YOSEF OF RYMANÓW (died 1815), Hasidic master and author. As one of the three principal disciples of Elimelekh of Lyzhansk, he was an important Hasidic leader in Poland. He is best known for his asceticism and mystical support for Napoleon, whose wars he identified with the battles of Gog and Magog, a tradition associated with the advent of the messianic age. His writings and sermons were posthumously published, notably Sifrei ha-Rahak Rabbi MenaḤem Mendel me-Rymanów (Jerusalem, 1985).

MENAḤEM MENDEL OF KOTSK (1787–1859), Hasidic master; the outstanding figure among the disciples of *Ya'aqov Yitshaq and *Simḥah Bunem of Przysucha. Upon the latter's death in 1827, his closest followers looked to R. Mendel to lead what had become a distinct school of Polish Hasidism. First in Tomaszów, and from 1829 in Kotsk, there gathered around R. Mendel an assemblage of bright and learned young men, the likes of which Hasidism had not seen since the court of *Dov Ber of Mezhirech. The radical search for truth that R. Mendel demanded of his disciples meant an overthrow of convention and a challenging of all tokens of piety not specifically required by Jewish law. Miracles and claims of mystical experience were scoffed at by the Kotsker, who was a rationalist and a legalist within the Hasidic camp. Though some of his values appear contrary to Hasidism, the pursuit of truth became an expression of ecstatic passion. After 1840, R. Mendel became extremely reclusive, and for the last nineteen years of his life he was mostly isolated from his disciples. One of his most important disciples, R. Mordekhai Yosef Leiner, left him for ideological reasons and founded his own Hasidic court at *Izbica. The Kotsker had always insisted on the unique responsibility of each individual, however, and the disciples carried on their tasks of study and devotion without him. After Kotsker's death most of his disciples followed the Ger or Aleksander schools.

MENAHEM MENDEL OF VITEBSK (1730–1788), Hasidic master and author. He was a leading disciple of Dov Ber of Mezhibezh and led a Hasidic group in Minsk. After his master's death in 1772, he became the principal Hasidic leader in Belorussia and Lithuania. Along with his younger colleague, Shneur Zalman of Lyady, he unsuccessfully attempted to justify Hasidism to Eliyahu ben Shelomoh Zalman, the Vilna Ga'on. In 1777 accompanied by two of his closest associates, Avraham of Kalisk and Yisra'el of Polotsk, he led a large group to Erets Yisra'el. He settled in Tiberias and became leader of the Hasidic community there, while continuing to exercise his authority over the Hasidim in Belorussia and Lithuania through correspondence. As a thinker, he was faithful to the extreme spiritual teachings of Dov Ber. Prayer has as its goal only devequt, cleaving to God by means of a contemplative ascent that results in a nullification of one's sense of individuality. Thus the verse "He shall do the will of those that fear him" (Ps. 145.19) is interpreted to mean that the one who prays contemplatively will be permitted to remain on a spiritual plateau even when compelled to descend to the mundane world. Believing that the ecstatic connection to God was paramount, he struggled in his teachings to justify the necessity for physically performing the commandments. He was the author of Peri ha-'Arets (Jerusalem, 1987).

MENAHOT (מִנְחָה; Meal Offerings), second tractate, consisting of thirteen chapters, in Mishnah order Qodashim, with related material in the Tosefta and in the Talmud Bavli. It deals with the regulations concerning *meal offerings, serving as a sequel to the treatment of animal and fowl sacrifices in tractate Zevahim. Just as Zevahim opened with the requirement of intent and closed with a historical-geographical survey of the sanctuaries leading to the Temple in Jerusalem, so, too, Menahot opens with the requirement of intention in the central procedures of meal offerings and concludes with the status of priests who had served in the Temple of Onias in Elephantine, which was not recognized by the sages as a legitimate place of worship (see YEB). The discussion of various types of meal offerings includes a description of the 'Omer service, whose performance on the second day of Pesah was accompanied by great public fanfare, in order to underscore the rabbinic acceptance of the Pharisaic timing of the offering, as opposed to that of the Boethusians (Men. 10.3). Menahot closes with the declaration (13.11): "It matters not whether one offers much or little—providing that one directs his thoughts towards heaven."

An English translation of the tractate appears in the Soncino Talmud (London, 1948).

MENAQQER. See NIOQUR.

MENDELSSOHN, MOSES (1729–1796), German philosopher, communal leader, proponent of Jewish *emancipation, biblical scholar, and translator. Born in Dessau, the son of a Torah scribe, Mendelssohn received a traditional Talmudic education. In 1743 when Mendelssohn's teacher, R. David *Franckel, became chief rabbi of Berlin, Mendelssohn followed him there to pursue his studies. While continuing his study of Talmud and medieval Jewish philosophy, Mendelssohn mastered German, Greek, Latin, French, and English, and turned to the study of modern philosophy, particularly the writings of the English philosopher, John Locke, and the German philosophers, Gottfried Leibniz and Christian Wolff.

With his first work, Philosophical Dialogues (1755), Mendelssohn emerged as one of the leading and most eloquent spokesmen of German enlightenment philosophy. His reputation was cemented by his Treatise on Metaphysical Evidence (1763), which won the essay competition of the Berlin Royal Academy (Immanuel Kant received second place of honor), and by his Phaedon (1767). The latter was modeled on Plato's dialogue by that name and earned him the accolade of "the German Socrates." Mendelssohn professed himself particularly indebted to the Leibniz–Wolffian school, for having rationally demonstrated the fundamental truths of natural religion, namely, God's existence, his providence, and the immortality of the soul. In Phaedon, he drew upon Leibniz and Wolff to prove that the soul is immortal. In addition, arguing for God's goodness, he contended that God must necessarily guarantee that the soul after death will advance along the path to self-perfection and happiness. In his last metaphysical work, Morgenstunden (1785), Mendelssohn focused on proofs for the existence of God, in particular the ontological proof. Mendelssohn wrote on a wide variety of subjects, including aesthetics and psychology.

In the late 1750s, Mendelssohn published a Hebrew weekly (Qohelet Musar), of which only two issues appeared. In addition, he wrote a Hebrew commentary on Maimonides' Treatise on Logic. Although he devoted most of his efforts in the 1760s to his metaphysical works and literary essays, he did not completely abandon his Hebrew writings. In 1768, he wrote a Hebrew commentary on Ecclesiastes, and, in 1769, a Hebrew essay on the immortality of the soul (published after his death), partially based on Phaedon. That same year, he was publicly challenged by a Swiss pastor, Johann Lavater, either to refute an apologetic treatise purporting to prove the truth of Christianity or to convert. Mendelssohn, who had always hoped to avoid having his commitment to Judaism made into a public issue, was shaken by the challenge. True to his principles, he refused to engage in religious polemic, but simply replied that his continued commitment to traditional Judaism was not incompatible with his devotion to rational inquiry. In the 1770s, Mendelssohn made use of his growing reputation as a philosopher to deflect anti-Jewish measures in Germany and Switzerland. For the use of Prussian courts he wrote a précis of Jewish laws bearing upon property rights, somewhat misleadingly titled Ritual Laws of the Jews (1778). Mendelssohn's translation of the Pentateuch into German (using the Hebrew alphabet), together with a Hebrew commentary (Bi'ur), written in collaboration with a group of scholars, was published in the early 1780s. The translation, written in an elegant High German, and the Bi'ur, a skillful distillation of the tradition of medieval plain sense exegesis, supplemented with contemporary poetic and aesthetic observations, together led to a revival of biblical studies among Jews of the time; the work as a whole was described by many young Jews as their first way station along the road to Enlightenment. At the same time, it aroused the opposition of many traditionalist rabbis and narrowly escaped being banned.

In 1781 Mendelssohn, in connection with efforts to protect the Jews of Alsace, prevailed upon the German statesman and scholar, C. W. Dohm to write his path-breaking treatise, On the Civic Improvement of the Jews. In 1782 in the "Preface" to the German translation of Vindiciae Judaearum (written by the Amsterdam rabbi and philosopher *Manasseh ben Israel), Mendelssohn praised Dohm's treatise but criticized his suggestion that the Jewish community should be permitted to retain the right of religious excommunication. In a similar fashion, Mendelssohn also denied the state's right of coercion in matters of conscience. In response to these assertions there appeared an anonymous brochure, The Searching for Light and Right, in which the author, recently identified as August Cranz, a journalist of dubious reputation, asked Mendelssohn how he could combine his opposition to coercion in matters of religion with his continued adherence to Mosaic law, which would appear to sanction coercion. In reply, Mendelssohn, in 1782 and 1783, wrote his classic work, Jerusalem, or On Religious Power and Judaism. In the first section of the work Mendelssohn reaffirmed and elaborated upon his opposition to coercion in matters of conscience, grounding this opposition in the principle of natural law, while in the second section he sought to show that such opposition is in harmony with "authentic" Judaism. In this connection he presented a theory of Judaism in which he sought to differentiate between the eternal truths of natural religion, based solely upon reason and binding upon everyone, and the supernatural revelation of the law, binding upon Jews alone. For Mendelssohn, the original Mosaic constitution no longer holds, and while Mosaic ceremonial law is still binding on account of its religious significance, it has lost the civil status it once possessed. As a result, the ceremonial law may not be imposed through coercion, nor does it serve as a bar against the Jews' civic and political loyalty to the states in which they live.

Mendelssohn has often been called the first modern Jew. His pioneering attempt to combine enlightenment philosophy with traditional Judaism, continued observance of the law with participation in the intellectual streams of European culture, and loyalty to the Jewish community with political emancipation and liberalism has been epochal. In 1886 the centenary of Mendelssohn's death was commemorated by all sections of German Jewry, all of which hailed him as their spiritual godfather.

MENDES, HENRY PEREIRA (1852-1937), U.S. spiritual leader, communal activist, and author. Born in Birmingham, England, he served as rabbi of the Sephardi congregation in Manchester from 1874 to 1877 and then moved to Congregation Shearith Israel, the historic Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue of New York City, which he served until 1920, when he was named rabbi emeritus. He held a medical degree from New York University.

Mendes was the leading spokesman for Sephardi Jewry in the United States, a founder and first president of the *Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America in 1898, and acting president of the *Jewish Theological Seminary of America from 1897 to 1902. MENORAH (מְנוֹרָה; candelabrum). The design of the menorah was revealed to Moses on Mount Sinai. It consisted of seven branches, three on each side of the central shaft, each of which was ornamented with carvings of almond-blossom cups, divided into a knop and flowers. (A depiction of a menorah was discovered on the wall of a villa from Second Temple times in the Jewish Quarter in Jerusalem.)

The Tabernacle Menorah, formed from one ingot of gold, was situated in front of the veil on the south side of the Tabernacle (Ex. 25.31–40, 26.36, 40.24). In Solomon's Temple, there were ten golden candelabra in the large hall of the Temple, five to the right and five to the left of the entrance to the Holy of Holies (1 Kgs. 7.49). These were destroyed by the Babylonians (2 Kgs. 24.13) and do not appear in Ezekiel's vision of the Temple (Ez. 41.14). The Arch of Titus in Rome depicts what purports to be the Menorah of the Second Temple. It has a double-octagon base, but recent research has proved almost conclusively that this is an imaginative reconstruction since the Temple Menorah stood on three legs. Reproduction of the Temple Menorah or its use outside the Temple was forbidden. After the destruction of the Second Temple, traces of the Menorah disappeared, although legends abounded. The first-century philosopher *Philo interpreted the symbolism of the menorah, linking it to the seven planets, the cyclic quality of life, and the concept of time. The seven-branched menorah became one of the most familiar Jewish symbols and is frequently found in synagogue decorations and tombs from the first century CE on. In Kabbalah, the menorah symbolized the tree of life, and its seven branches were held to represent the planets, the firmament, and the days of Creation. The eight-branched Hanukkah candelabrum (hanukkiyyah) was modeled after the Temple Menorah. The Talmud forbids any attempt to replicate the Menorah of the Temple, and few three-dimensional examples are found in Jewish art before modern times. During the Emancipation, many Jews found the menorah too particularistic, and it was replaced by the ma-gen David* as the central Jewish symbol. The menorah reemerged as a Zionist symbol, and the relief on the Arch of Titus was copied in the emblem of the State of Israel.

MENSTRUATION. Sexual intercourse with a menstruant or niddah is forbidden under biblical law and the penalty is karet* (Lv. 20.18). The Bible distinguishes between a niddah (menstruant), who becomes pure after the cessation of her menstrual discharge and a zavah (discharging blood outside her menstrual period), who must wait until seven bloodless days have passed before she is restored to purity (Lv. 15.19–32). In the course of time, this distinction was lost and during the tannaitic period the practice of waiting seven "clean days" after any menstrual discharge was universally accepted (Nid. 66a). On the evening of the conclusion of this seven day period, the woman immerses herself in a ritual bath (miqveh*) and is then permitted to her husband (Shulhan 'Arukh, Yoreh De'ah 197.1–5). Any bleeding or spotting during the seven clean days cancels the whole sequence and the seven day period must be recommenced once the discharge has ceased (Shulhan 'Arukh, Yoreh De'ah 140.1, 196.10). It is accepted halakhah that a woman does not begin counting the seven clean days until at least five days have elapsed since the onset of her menses and the first day of bleeding is included in this period (Rema', Yoreh De'ah 196.11). In practice, therefore, an observant married couple will abstain from intercourse for a minimum of twelve days per menstrual cycle, regardless of the duration of bleeding or spotting. If a woman's first day of menstruation occurs between Saturday night and Sunday evening, she must wait until Thursday when, if the bleeding has ceased, she performs an internal examination before sunset to verify this fact and begins the seven day period that night. Internal examinations are performed every day and if no further discharge occurs, she immerses in a miqveh on the following Thursday evening, after which sexual relations can be resumed (Shulhan 'Arukh, Yoreh De'ah 196.4–5). The idea behind this separation is expressed by R. Me'ir: "If a husband is with his wife constantly, he will come to loathe her, therefore, the Torah provided that she should be separated from him . . . and, thereafter, she will be as dear to him as at the moment she entered the bridal chamber" (Nid. 31b). Conservative Judaism has proposed reducing the minimum number of days from twelve to eleven and, in general, does not lay great stress on the observance of the menstruation laws. Reform Judaism has abolished them.

ME'OT HITTIM (מֵאוֹת הַתִּימָּה; contribution for wheat), money distributed on the eve of Pesah to the poor, enabling them to make the requisite preparations for the festival. The Mishnah and Talmud saw this provision for the needy as a communal obligation, and in medieval times me'ot hittim was accepted as a communal tax. Although monetary gifts have largely supplanted gifts in kind, it is still the practice of some communal organizations and individuals to supply those in need with unleavened bread and wine for the festival.

MERCY. See COMPASSION.

MERITS, rabbinic doctrine that by performing those works commanded by and pleasing to God (meritorious works), one may obtain divine favor, which benefits not only the individual but also others (one's descendants, one's city or people, even the world). Merit (zekhut) is not negative (avoidance of sin) but positive (obedience of the laws and commandments of God). The conception of solidarity that underlies the doctrine of merits also implies, albeit to a lesser degree, a doctrine of demerits; the consequence of sin may fall not only on the sinner but on others as well. The doctrine of zekhut developed naturally out of the biblical notion that God responds to appropriate human behavior and has been frequently criticized by Christian writers as exemplifying the character of Judaism as a religion of works. MESHULLAH (מְשַׁלָּה; messenger), an emissary accredited by the patriarch of the Jewish communities in Erets Yisra'el (termed apostoli by the Roman rulers) whose function was to collect funds to support the Talmudic academies of Erets Yisra'el after the destruction of the Temple. Originally designated in the Talmud (Y., Hag. 1.8) as a shaluah or sheliah Tsiyyon (emissary of Zion; Beits. 25b), these emissaries were also charged with the task of providing spiritual leadership and appointing religious functionaries for the Diaspora communities. They were the precursors of the shadarim (acronym of sheluha' de-rabbanan [Aram.; emissary of the rabbis]), emissary-scholars sent by the yeshivot of the Holy Land to raise money in the Diaspora through the medieval period until the rise of modern Zionism in the late nineteenth century. Besides collecting funds, the shadarim contributed to the maintenance of Hebrew and rabbinic scholarship, as well as to religious revivals in the communities that they visited and that extended as far as Australasia and the New World. Improved forms of communication and the development of banking facilities led to the decline of this ancient institution. On the other hand, in eastern Europe, particularly in Lithuania and Poland, the emergence of the central rather than local yeshivah, whose archetype was the *Volozhin Yeshivah, which drew students from all parts of the Diaspora, saw the revival of the meshullah, who was sent out principally as a fund-raiser but acted also as an itinerant preacher or maggid*. His spiritual influence was, however, limited to the Yiddish-speaking immigrant generation that had fled eastern Europe to settle in western Europe, South Africa, and the Americas.

MESHULLAM BEN MOSHEH (c.1175–1250), scholar of Béziers in southern France and maternal grandson of *Meshullam ben Ya'aqov of Lunel. His nephew was Me'ir ben Shim'on ha-Me'ili of Narbonne, author of Ha-Me'orot. Meshullam was opposed to the study of Kabbalah and supported his nephew's opposition to kabbalistic works. Meshullam corresponded with Moses Nahmanides about halakhic matters and about the Maimonidean controversy during the 1230s. One of Meshullam ben Mosheh's most famous students was Yedayah ben Avraham Bedersi, who left an account of his mentor's wisdom and the program of study in Meshullam's academy. Meshullam is best known for his Sefer ha-Hashlamah, the purpose of which was to complete Yitshaq *Alfasi's code. Meshullam based his work upon the works of earlier Provençal scholars. In it, he explicated the difficult passages of Alfasi's code, added laws that had been left out, updated it with Provençal traditions, and defended it from its critics. He also wrote critical notes to Maimonides' Mishneh Torah.

MESHULLAM BEN YA'AQOV OF LUNEL (c.1090–1160), Provençal scholar. Among his halakhic essays is Issur ve-Hetter (published by Y. Kafaḥ in Teshuvot ha-Rabad [Jerusalem, 1962]), in which he criticized prevalent Provençal ritual slaughtering customs and maintained that they were not in accordance with halakhic literary sources. As a philanthropist, he maintained an academy in Lunel, to which students flocked from southern France and northern Spain. He was the patron of Avraham ben David of Posquières and Zerahyah ben Yitshaq ha-Levi, who were among his outstanding students. Consequently, Lunel became famous as a significant center of study, and its scholars were known as the sages of Lunel. Meshullam was also prominent in secular studies. He sponsored the translation of books on grammar, theology, rhetoric, ethics, and parables. He himself wrote books on parables of wisdom and ethics that are no longer extant.

MESSER LEON FAMILY, family of Jewish scholars.

Yehudah ben Yehi'el Messer Leon (c.1425–c.1495), Italian physician, halakhist, and philosopher. He was born in the town of Montecchio, and lived at various times in Ancona, Bologna, Padua, Venice, and Mantua. In the wake of a dispute with Yosef *Colon, he was expelled from Mantua (c.1475) and settled in Naples. He was a distinguished physician, in recognition of which he was knighted and granted the title Messer by Emperor Frederick III in 1452. His stature was enhanced in 1469 when the same ruler granted him doctoral degrees in medicine and philosophy, allowing him to treat Christians and to grant doctoral degrees to others.

Intellectually, Messer Leon stood on the cusp of the Middle Ages and Renaissance. His philosophic writings, many of which are supercommentaries on Aristotle, Porphyry, and Maimonides, stand within the medieval scholastic tradition. Yet he is best known for Nofet Tsufim (Mantua, 1475), the first Hebrew book published in its author's lifetime, which demonstrates the conformity of the Bible with classical rhetoric. This concern with grammar and rhetoric demonstrates his openness to contemporary Italian humanism. Nevertheless, despite Renaissance traits, recent scholarship has characterized Nofet Tsufim as a medieval work in structure and argument.

Messer Leon's halakhic career was marked by controversy. While Italian halakhic practice was based upon the Mishneh Torah of Maimonides, Messer Leon taught and advocated the adoption by Italian Jewry of the stricter Ashkenazi tradition embodied in Ya'akov ben Asher's Arba'ah Turim and represented by the French and German scholars migrating into northern Italy. Moreover, his rabbinic scholarship, adumbrated by his standing as physician and philosopher, convinced him of his preeminent rabbinic authority. These two factors led him to issue two highly controversial bans in 1455. The first called for the adoption of Ashkenazi strictures in the area of family law. The second banned the Torah Commentary of Gersonides as a measure to protect the Ashkenazim of northern Italy from its influence, which he regarded as subversive and contrary to normative Jewish scholastic thought.

David ben Yehudah Messer Leon (c.1470–1536), son of Yehudah and rabbi in Valena, Albania; after controversies around his halakhic rulings, he retired to Salonika. Like his father, he preferred the halakhic methods of the Ashkenazi to the Sephardi rabbinical scholars. He brought a broad knowledge of general culture, notably philosophy, to his writings on Jewish subjects.

MESSIAH. The verb m sh h (anoint [with oil]) is used in Biblical Hebrew in connection with material objects as well as persons. The noun mashiah (anointed), which is the source of the English word messiah, in due course came to mean a consecrated person charged with a special mission from God (kings, prophets, priests; in one case even the gentile king Cyrus, founder of the Persian empire, is given this title [see Is. 45.1]). More specifically, the term signified the kings of the Davidic dynasty ("David and his seed"), and in particular the future "Son of David," who would deliver Israel from foreign bondage, restore the glories of a former golden age, and inaugurate the ingathering of Israel and God's kingdom of righteousness and peace. From its original Jewish context the term passed into general usage and the term messianism is often used to refer, broadly, to beliefs or theories regarding an ultimate improvement of the state of humanity and the world, or a final consummation of history.

Visions of a happy and blessed future were already expressed by the biblical prophets, especially as the sense of the fulfillment of God's *covenant with his people—living in the land that was promised to the fathers in peace and prosperity—was gradually undermined by negative experiences: the division of the kingdom, the ravages of wars and enemy incursions, and social and moral corruption. The prophets described a vision of a severe judgment, which would be followed by a glorious future, at least for a righteous remnant. However, "messianic" terminology in the eschatological sense is absent from these prophecies even when the reference is clearly to an ideal future king. The message of the prophet known as Deutero-Isaiah is definitely eschatological in character, though not messianic in its vocabulary, and the idea of a Davidic king is absent in this particular case. The usual association of the messianic idea with the Davidic kingship ideology is also illustrated by the Davidic pedigree assigned to Jesus by the writers of the Gospels (Mt. 1.1–17). Messianic terminology, and many of the expectations and hopes expressed by it, developed in the postexilic period and in response to varying historical situations. Thus, the rebuilding of the Temple became a central feature of the "messianic complex" after its destruction. The failure of *Zerubbabel to restore the kingdom of Judah moved the restoration of the Davidic dynasty into the eschatological realm. The period of persecution under Antiochus Epiphanes preceding the Maccabean Revolt seems to have stimulated messianic ferment and contributed to the development of *apocalyptic speculation. Various eschatological ideas (the messianic age, the *kingdom of heaven, the last judgment, the *resurrection of the dead, etc.) were held by different groups in different combinations and with varying emphases already in Second Temple times. The group known as the *Dead Sea (or Qumran) sect held a doctrine (found also in later sects) of a messianic pair: a priestly Messiah of the house of Aaron and a royal Messiah of the house of David. This detail may serve as illustration that the "anointed" one was not necessarily thought of as a savior (as for example, in later Christian thought) but rather as a symbolic figure presiding over an ideal, divinely willed and "messianic" socio-religious order. For others, the "Son-of-David" messianism, with its political or even military implications, was overshadowed by apocalyptic notions of a more mythological character, such as the *"Son of Man" who will descend from heaven to save the elect. Both early rabbinic and medieval Jewish thought exhibit much variety in the elaboration of messianic doctrine, ranging from the apocalyptic and kabbalistic end of the scale to more rationalist thinkers, such as Moses *Maimonides, who emphasized the non-miraculous nature of the messianic era. Medieval Jewish thought was largely concerned with interpreting and harmonizing the different, and occasionally conflicting, traditions enshrined in aggadic literature. A fundamental question was which prophecies should be taken literally and which metaphorically. The heterogeneity of the material also suggested a distinction between two different dispensations: a more this-worldly messianic age (ingathering of the dispersed, restoration of the Davidic kingdom, delivery from bondage, rebuilding of the Temple) and the eschatological "end of days" (day of judgment, resurrection of the dead).

To what extent revolts and uprisings, such as the Bar Kokhba' Revolt, were "messianic" in character has to be examined in detail in every case. The disastrous failure of uprisings had two significant consequences. It strengthened the element of "apocalyptic" catastrophe in the eschatological scheme: the final consummation would be preceded by great suffering (the messianic woes, hevlei mashiach); moral degeneracy; wars and cosmic upheavals (Armageddon, *Gog and Magog); and a messianic "Son of Joseph" (possibly an indirect reference to the ten tribes), who would heroically fall in battle against the forces of evil before the ultimate triumph of the victorious Son of David. Another result was an increasingly quietistic emphasis, accompanied by warnings against attempts "to force the end." Messianic faith came to mean patient waiting, and "calculating the end" by means of interpreting certain biblical numbers (e.g., in the Book of Daniel) was discouraged by the rabbis, though the prohibition was not always obeyed. *Redemption, the rabbis asserted, will be brought about by God in his own time and not by human activity, though its advent could be hastened by ascetic piety, strict observance of the law, penitence and mystical meditation.

Nevertheless the strength and intensity of faith, hope, and yearning, drawing on biblical and rabbinic tradition as well as on the daily prayer book, in combination with constant suffering, persecution and humiliation, and, occasionally, large-scale massacres, frequently produced messianic outbursts. There has been a number of messianic pretenders, also known as "false Messiahs" or "pseudo-Messiahs," in Jewish history, as well as various announcers of the imminent arrival of the Messiah. Most of the movements generated by such individuals were short-lived and of local or regional extent only. The list of pretenders includes *Abu 'Issa al-Isfahani and his disciple Yudghan in the eighth century; David *Alroy in twelfth-century Persia; the propagandists of the agitation among the Jewries of western Europe in the eleventh and twelfth centuries; and the twelfth-century Yemenite pretender who caused Maimonides to write his Epistle to Yemen. The best known of all false Messiahs, whose impact extended beyond the local level, was the pretender *Shabbetai Tsevi, in the seventeenth century. The Sabbataian debacle and its demoralizing aftermath, involving secret adherence and heresy-hunting on the one hand, apostasy and nihilism on the other, cast a cloud over all forms of overt messianic enthusiasm (see *DÖNMEH; *EMDEN, YA'AQOV; *EYBESCHUETZ, YONATAN; *FRANK, YA'AQOV).

The faith in an ultimately redeemed world of peace and justice, and in a messianic future for mankind (as distinct from faith in a personal Messiah), is shared by most trends in modern Jewry. Classical Reform rejected the concept of a personal Messiah, substituting the conviction that humankind was moving toward a messianic era of perfect peace and justice. Similarly, Conservative thinkers have adopted the concept of a messianic period to be achieved without supernatural intervention. Post-Enlightenment secularism identified messianism with either the social and political goals of tolerance, liberalism and full emancipation or, alternatively, socialism, and rejected Zionist nationalism in favor of universalist ideas. Contemporary attitudes toward nationalism and messianism are changing. While secularists might support a Jewish national identity without messianic expectations, Religious Zionism has undergone an ideological messianization. The prayer sanctioned by the chief rabinate of Israel, and recited also in synagogues in the Diaspora, defines the State of Israel as "the beginning of the sprouting of our redemption," wording which implies that the messianic era has begun and that the State of Israel constitutes the beginning of the messianic process. *Habad (Lubavitch) Hasidism has attracted attention in recent years for its explicit expectation of the imminent advent of the Messiah. The implicit suggestion is that the Messiah may be their leader, R. Menahem Schneerson, who died in 1994. See also ESCHATOLOGY; KABBALAH.

METAPHYSICS, the philosophical study of the nature of being. Jewish philosophers have tended to define and defend their faith in the light of current general philosophical positions. In the first century, for example, *Philo of Alexandria interpreted the Torah as using a Platonic world view, and his writings were also influenced by contemporary Stoicism. Similarly *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on was indebted to Aristotelian as well as Muslim Kalam philosophy. In his Emunot ve-De'ot, he argued that basic theological concepts are subject to rational analysis and that human reason is a legitimate source of religious knowledge. Shelomoh *ibn Gabirol understood Judaism in the light of Neoplatonism, while Moses *Maimonides was an Aristotelian. His Guide of the Perplexed was intended as a response to the difficulties of educated Jews who were troubled by the apparent contradictions between rabbinic Judaism and current philosophy.

Other Jewish thinkers, however, were skeptical of metaphysics. In his Kuzari, *Yehudah ha-Levi attempted to demonstrate the inadequacy of Aristotelian philosophy and argued for the superiority of religious revelation. Similarly Hasda'i ben Avraham Crescas, in his Or Adonai, argued strongly against the metaphysics of Maimonides and maintained that the only certainty lay in trusting in the authority of scripture.

METATRON, in Talmudic, Midrashic, and mystical literature the name of one of the supreme powers in the divine realm. He is often associated with the sar hapanim (the prince of the countenance), meaning the power standing face to face with God (while others are to his left, to his right, or behind him). Talmudic literature associates Metatron with the angel sent by God to guide the Israelites in the wilderness, "for my name is in him" (Ex. 23.21). The name is probably based on the Greek tetra (four), referring to the Tetragrammaton, God's four-letter holy name (though other explanations have been offered, based on the references to Metatron as a "messenger"). According to Hagigah 15a, the sage

*Elisha' ben Avuyah lapsed into heresy when in his vision he saw Metatron sitting on a throne in the seventh heaven and judging the world; this led him to the belief that "there are two powers in heaven." Metatron may also be associated with the sar ha-'olam, the prince of the world, an opaque Midrashic reference to a probably demiurgic power. The most detailed description of him in mystical literature is found in the Hebrew Apocalypse of Enoch, in which the gradual transformation of Enoch ben Jared (Gn. 5.18–19) into the power Metatron is described, after which he guides R. Yishma'e'l on a tour of divine worlds. Metatron is called na'ar (youth or servant; 3 En.), the same appellation that is found in gnostic treatises. Gershom Scholem identified him with the angel Yahoel mentioned in the Apocalypse of Abraham. Medieval kabbalists identified Metatron with different aspects of the divine realm, most often with the *Shekhinah.

METURGEMAN (Aram.: מְתוּרְגֵּמָן; interpreter), in early times, the translator of the Torah and Prophets into the vernacular (*Aramaic) when these were read in public in the synagogue service. His translation accompanied the reading (verse by verse for the Torah; three verses at a time for the Prophets) and consisted of the officially approved Aramaic version of the Bible (see TARGUM). He was not allowed to read his translation from a written text or to speak louder than the reader of the Hebrew so as to emphasize the primacy of the latter. On occasions the meturgeman not only translated but added explanation as well. During the Talmudic period, the meturgeman acted as a spokesman for the teachers when they lectured in public. The teacher would speak quietly to the meturgeman who then repeated the discourse to the audience in a loud voice (Qid. 31b; Sot. 40a). The office of meturgeman is still extant among Yemenite Jews.

MEZUZAH (מְזוּזָה; doorpost), small parchment (from the skin of a clean animal) on which are inscribed the first two paragraphs of the *Shema' (Dt. 6.4–9, 11.13–21). The parchment is rolled tightly and placed in a small case, many of which have a small aperture through which the word Shaddai (Almighty), inscribed on the back of the scroll (homiletically explained as an acronym for shomer delatot Yisra'el [guardian of the doors of Israel]), can be seen. This seems to confirm the mezuzah's original apotropaic purpose. Mezuzot are affixed to doorposts in the home in accordance with the prescription in Deuteronomy 6.9. Only a qualified scribe (sofer setam*) may write a mezuzah, and it is to be written with the same care used in the writing of a Torah scroll. The mezuzah is nailed in a sloping position (the top pointing inward; the bottom outward) on the upper right-hand doorpost of the entry to the home and each of its rooms used for human habitation. The sloping position was a compromise reached by Rashi*, who held that it should be vertical, and by his grandson, Ya'aqov ben Me'ir Tam*, who maintained that it should be horizontal. In ancient times a hollow was constructed in the doorpost, and the mezuzah was placed inside. A special blessing is recited when securing the mezuzah to the door. While some interpret mezuzot as protective amulets*, the mezuzah has also been described as the sanctification of the home by the continual reminder of God's omnipresence. Among pious Jews, it became customary to kiss the mezuzah upon entering or leaving a room. Mezuzot are to be checked twice every seven years to confirm their continued fitness. For Karaites*, the mezuzah is optional and consists of a plate in the shape of the two tablets of the Torah without any script. Rabbi Me'ir ben Barukh* of Rothenburg wrote, "No demon can have power over a house upon which the mezuzah is affixed." Names, verses, and figures were added by mystics and kabbalists, but Moses Maimonides* insisted upon not tampering with the text. The mezuzah case has been one of the objects of Jewish ritual artistic expression, especially since the eighteenth century. For example, in North Africa mezuzot covers were elaborately embroidered, and in the center appeared the name of the woman who embroidered the cloth or the recipient. Today, mezuzot are often carried or worn around the neck as charms.

MICAH (fl. 8th cent. BCE), prophet from the southern kingdom of Judah, whose collection of prophecies, directed against both Samaria and Judah, comprises the sixth book in the collection of the Twelve Minor Prophets. He began to preach shortly before the fall of Samaria and was a later contemporary of Hosea and Isaiah. The seven chapters of the prophetic work may be divided into three sections. Chapters 1.1–3.12 are characterized by words of condemnation, in which the prophet denounces deeds of oppression, dishonest business practices, and idolatry, which eventually will bring about the downfall of Samaria (1.6). He also levels attacks against the prophets of his day, who cry "peace" only when they are paid for their oracles, and against the leaders of the people, who are guilty of perversions of justice, which will culminate in the destruction of Jerusalem (3.12).

This is the first prophecy of its kind, and its repercussions were heard over a century later when Jeremiah was almost put to death for uttering a similar threat (Jer. 26.18), only to be saved because of Micah's prophecy. The second section, chapters 4–5, commences with a quote from Isaiah (Is. 2.2–4) predicting a reign of universal peace, with nations streaming to Jerusalem, which is portrayed as an international court of law from which God will issue instructions, thereby resolving all international disputes (4.1–4). Micah envisions the eventual destruction of Israel's enemies and the ingathering of exiles, presided over and shepherded by a descendant of David from Bethlehem (5.1–5), as well as the final extermination of idols (5.9–14). The final section, chapters 6–7, contains oracles of both condemnation and consolation, including Micah's famous pronouncement, "He has told you, O man, what is good and what the Lord requires of you: Only to do justice and to love goodness, and to walk modestly with your God" (6.8). The book concludes with a prayer for forgiveness and consolation, culminating with words that later were incorporated in the New Year custom of Tashlikh*, appealing to God to hurl people's sins "into the depths of the sea" (7.18–20).

MICHAEL (Who Is Like unto God), one of the four archangels; one of the few named angels in the Bible (Dn. 12.1). It is said that he is composed of snow, while Gabriel is composed of fire (Dt. Rab. 5). Michael figures prominently in apocryphal and aggadic literature, in which he is variously described as God's viceregent; celestial high priest, who sacrifices the souls of the righteous on the altar before God (Midrash 'Aseret ha-Dibberot 1); protector and advocate of Israel (Yoma' 77a); and keeper of the heavenly keys. As Satan's* main adversary, Michael also has certain eschatological functions (e.g., calling the dead to the Resurrection).

MICROCOSM. The view that the human being represented an epitome or "miniature version" of the larger universe was widely held in the Middle Ages, and correspondences were asserted between the human organism, the cosmos, and even the Deity in whose image humans were said to have been fashioned. Hence, by knowing one's self, one might also arrive at a better knowledge of God, and the exhortation "know yourself O men, and you shall know your Lord" was taken over from Muslim philosophers by Jewish thinkers. The microcosm-macrocosm analogy was elaborated in Midrashic and philosophical works, of which Yosef ben Ya'aqov ibn Zaddik's 'Olam Qatan (i.e., microcosm) is one of the best known. The microcosm idea was developed and taken to great lengths by the kabbalists in their doctrine of sefirot*. See also ADAM QADMON.

MIDDAH KE-NEGED MIDDAH (מִדָּה כְּנֶגֶד מִדָּה; measure for measure), a term commonly used to describe the method of punishment that is exacted by God directly. One of the earliest references to this concept is found in Mishnah tractate Sotah 8b-9a, "The ways a person measures himself [conducts himself] is how he is measured from above," and the Mishnah continues with several examples of middah ke-neged middah as a form of divine* punishment. The Talmud seems to infer that this type of punishment is implied in Isaiah's comment "by measure and by exile, you contend with them" (Is. 28.7). The Talmud notes that the story of Purim contains within it the theme of middah ke-neged middah (Meg. 12b); it uses this principle to note that certain people will not participate in the resurrection of the dead because they did not believe that the Almighty would resurrect the dead and that all of the attributes of the Lord are measure for measure (San. 80a).

Middah ke-neged middah is not a normative Jewish principle of punishment but is limited to explaining the conduct of God.

MIDDAT SEDOM (מִדַּת סְדוֹם; מִדָּה סְדוֹמִית), when one person denies another a legal benefit, which could have been given without cost or detriment of any kind. The rabbis criticized such behavior as reflecting the immorality of the biblical Sodom, and characterized it as middat Sedom (a quality of Sodom). For example, if upon the dissolution of a partnership in land one partner requests to take his share in a given location, in order to maintain continuity with adjoining parcels owned by him individually, and if all potential shares are in all respects of equal value, the other partners would be guilty of middat Sedom if they refused. The rabbis implemented this moral judgment by imposing a legal obligation upon the uncooperative party to grant the benefit, stating that "one can be compelled to act against the quality of Sodom."

MIDDOT (מִדּוֹת; Measurements). [This entry discusses the tractate Middot; for a discussion of hermeneutics, see HERMENEUTICS.] Tractate Middot consists of five chapters in Mishnah order Qodashim, with no gemara in either Talmud, describing the layout and structure of the Second Temple*. Opening with a list of places where the honor guard of priests and Levites took their posts for the night watch, Middot enumerates the gates, sections, and offices of the Temple, detailing the measurements of each section. Middot intersperses several remarks regarding the symbolic significance of some of the structures discussed: a doorway to the north of the main entrance to the Temple hall remained forever closed "because the Lord God of Israel enters through it [Ez. 44.2]" (Mid. 4.2); the fifteen stairs leading from the women's courtyard to the Israelite courtyard correspond to the fifteen songs of ascension in Psalms 120-134; and the Temple hall is called Ariel (Lion of God; Is. 29.1) due to its trapezoidal structure, similar to "the lion, which is narrow in the rear and broad in the front" (Mid. 4.7). Concluding its description with the "office of hewn-stone," where the Sanhedrin supervised the ritual fitness of the priests, Middot closes with a paean to God, who chose the sons of Aaron to serve before him in the Holy of Holies.

An English translation of the tractate by Herbert Danby is in The Mishnah (Oxford, 1933).

MIDIANITES, tribes of nomads and shepherds in the southern part of Canaan and northern Arabia. According to Genesis 25.2 (cf. 1 Chr. 1.32), Midian was the son of Keturah, Abraham's wife. The Midianites dwelled in the same area as the rest of Abraham's descendants (other than Isaac), south and southeast of Canaan. The Midianites are mentioned as merchants (Gn. 37.28) and as shepherds (Ex. 3.1). In the first chapters of Exodus, Moses finds refuge with Jethro, "priest of Midian," described as a host and an ally to Moses and the people of Israel (Ex. 18; Nm. 10.29). Moses also marries Jethro's daughter, Zipporah. In contrast, the Midianites are mentioned as enemies of Israel during their wandering in the wilderness and allies of Balak, king of Moab (Nm. 22.4, 7), and also in the story of Baal-peor (Nm. 25). Hostilities between Israel and the Midianites are also evident in Canaan, where "the hand of Midian prevailed over Israel" (Jgs. 6.2). Gideon saved the Israelites, and the great victory was engraved in the historical memory of the nation. Reflections of this event can be found in Psalms (83.10) and Isaiah (9.3, 10.26). The peoples of Midian were apparently organized in a five-tribe alliance (Nm. 31.8; Jgs. 8.5; cf. Gn. 25.4). The names of the Midianite leaders (Nm. 31.8; Jos. 13.21; Jgs. 8.12) seem to be of Semitic origin (except Hur [Nm. 31.8], which is an Egyptian name; see also Ex. 17.10, 12). After the Midianite alliance collapsed, some Midianite tribes remained in the area east of the Gulf of Aqaba, where the name Midian is mentioned in Hellenistic sources near the oasis of el-Baddai.

MIDNIGHT TIQQUN. See TIQQUN.

MIDRASH (מִדְרָשׁ), the discovery of meanings other than literal in the Bible; derived from the root darash (inquire), denotes the literature that interprets scripture in order to extract its full implications and meaning. These interpretations often formed a response to the need of a particular age or environment. The term midrash is found in the Bible (cf. 2 Chr. 13.22, 24.27). It is supposed by Jewish tradition that some kind of midrash, in the form of a commentary on the Hebrew Bible—particularly its legal portions—must have existed from earliest times. Indeed it would seem to be required by the *written law, which often omits the details of those observances covered by some general command or prohibition. Thus, the method of slaughtering animals or the kinds of work forbidden on the Sabbath are never specified. In such cases scripture often uses the phrase “as the Lord commanded Moses” to indicate the details of the law. This would suggest the existence of a more detailed legislation, completing and complementing the written word of scripture. Like other branches of the *oral law, therefore, midrash goes back to very early origins. It appears that with the return from Babylon, the soferim headed by *Ezra, who were both scribes and scholars, began to study the traditional interpretation of the written law and apply it to the everyday needs of the community (cf. Ezr. 7.6, 10.11). They seem to have continued in this function up to the time of *Shim'on ha-Tsaddiq, who was both the last of the soferim and the first of the teachers of the Mishnah. Later, midrash was committed to writing. The very early midrashim originated with the same teachers whose sayings are preserved in the Mishnah, and they are for the most part halakhic midrashim, that is, they deal with the Mosaic law. A second type of midrash, the aggadic midrash, expounds the nonlegal parts of scripture, and although traces of this genre are also to be found early, its great period of efflorescence began after the Mishnaic era and continued as late as the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Aggadic midrashim range over the whole of scripture, and their subject matter includes theology, ethical teaching, exhortation, popular philosophy, imaginative exposition, legend, allegory, animal fables, and so on (see AGGADAH). Halakhic midrash and aggadic midrash denote different genres of midrash, as well as collections of Midrashic works. Halakhic midrash applies to the various Midrashic compilations of the tannaitic period. This includes writings on the books Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy (which also contain aggadic midrash in different degrees). Aggadic midrash applies to all Midrashic collections from the amoraic period and after, which contain almost exclusively comments of aggadic nature. As a whole, *Midrashic literature contains some of the most distinctive features of rabbinic Judaism. It was a way of delving more deeply than the literal meaning of the word of scripture and a method of linking the various parts of the Bible together by the discovery of typological patterns, verbal echoes, and rhythms of repetition. This last function is expressed in the phrase, “the happenings of the Fathers are a sign to their posterity.” Thus, the exile of Jacob and his flight from his brother Esau became a symbol for all subsequent Jewish exile and wandering, both in the biblical and post-biblical periods. The aggadic midrashim in particular were an instrument for imparting contemporary relevance to biblical events. In this respect the function of midrash is the opposite of peshat*, which aims at reconstructing the literal meaning of scripture, its local setting, and original system of reference. The balance between midrash and peshat is basic to the rabbinic mentality in its approach to scripture. Whereas the peshat performed its rigorous office of research into the exact meaning of scripture as far as the available historical and lexicographical knowledge allowed, midrash made possible a vivid application of the scriptural word to a later situation or a later system of ideas. It operated according to certain hermeneutic laws of interpretation (see HERMENEUTICS) that were, however, never strictly applied, and frequently the rabbis allowed themselves to indulge in far-fetched interpretations and narratives that were clearly intended to delight the fancy as well as to instruct. Unlike halakhah, where a clear and unequivocal ruling is required, inconsistencies in aggadic dicta are taken for granted.

MIDRASH HA-GADOL, a thirteenth-century Yemenite Midrashic compilation on the Torah, compiled by David ben 'Amram of Aden. Written in a clear Hebrew prose, divided up according to the weekly Torah readings, each section is prefaced with a poem in rhymed verse. The author-compiler did not indicate his sources (unlike the otherwise similar Yalqut Shim'oni*) and at times combined more than one source into a smoothly continuous unit. The work preserves many otherwise unknown early sources in an accurate transmission. With the aid of this work, scholars were able to reconstruct large portions of the lost Mekhilta' de-Rabbi Shim'on bar Yoḥa'i and the Sifrei Zuta' and also the Mekhilta' de-Rabbi Yishma'e'l on Deuteronomy, otherwise called Midrash Tanna'im. Midrash ha-Gadol also preserved accurate readings of early Midrashic texts and Talmudic sources. The compiler made copious use of Maimonides, thus Midrash ha-Gadol is important for Maimonidean studies. It first came to scholarly notice in the second half of the nineteenth century and has been published in a critical edition by a number of scholars: Genesis and Exodus by M. Margalio (Jerusalem, 1947, 1956); Leviticus by A. Steinsaltz (1975); Numbers by Z. M. Rabinowitz (1967); Deuteronomy by S. Fisch (1972).

MIDRASHIC LITERATURE. Whereas halakhic midrashim aim at extracting the practical law from the scriptures, aggadic midrashim penetrate into their ethical and moral background (see MIDRASH). Midrashic interpretations were current from earliest times (cf. Neh. 8.8), but they really began to flourish in the tannaitic period, when teachers expounded the weekly portions of the Pentateuch and Prophets on Sabbaths and festivals during the service in the synagogue (cf. Ber. 28a). At first these expositions were recorded in several booklets called Sifrei de-Aggadeta—even before the halakhah* and gemara were committed to writing (cf. Git. 60a). Subsequently, they were unified and edited in complete works. Some of these midrashim have been lost in the course of time. The principal halakhic midrashim extant today are Sifrei on Numbers and Deuteronomy, Sifra on Leviticus, and Mekhilta* on Exodus, but Maimonides (in the introduction to Mishneh Torah) speaks of Mekhilta on the last four books of the Pentateuch by R. Yishma'e'l and another Mekhilta by R. 'Aqiva. It is now clear that the latter is identical with the Mekhilta de-Rabbi Shim'on bar Yoh'ai and Sifrei Zuta, which originated in the school of R. 'Aqiva. The ancient midrashim and the Mishneh*, Tosefta, and each Talmud*, although mainly halakhic, also contain much aggadic material. The principal midrashim of the amoraic period, almost all of which originated in Erets Yisra'el, are those included in Midrash Rabbah* (a collection of unrelated midrashim to the Pentateuch and the Five Scrolls of different periods and genres) and in the Tanḥuma-Yelammedenu* collections; the Pesiqta de-Rav Kahana and Pesiqta Rab-bati, consisting of Midrashic comments on readings from the Pentateuch and prophetic lessons assigned to holidays and special Sabbaths; and midrashim on other books of the Bible, such as Samuel, Psalms (also known as Shoher Tov) and Proverbs. Classic Midrashic literature came to a close in the late tenth or early eleventh century. Important compilations of Midrashic literature, both halakhic and aggadic, include Yalqut Shim'oni and Midrash ha-Gadol, the authors of which have preserved invaluable and otherwise unknown midrashim.

MIDRASH PROVERBS. See PROVERBS, MIDRASH.

MIDRASH RABBAH, a collection of aggadic midrashim to the Pentateuch and the Five Scrolls. The appellation Rabbah (Great), the origin and meaning of which are obscure, originally applied to only some of these midrashim (notably Genesis Rabbah) and then to all the midrashim on the Pentateuch; finally, as a result of the inclusion of all ten midrashim in one edition (Venice, 1545), the term came to be applied to the entire collection. Despite their appearance together, however, the midrashim so named are separate works, originating in different periods and organized in different ways. Genesis Rabbah is generally considered to be the earliest compilation (completed c.5th cent. CE); from a slightly later date are Leviticus Rabbah and the midrashim to the Five Scrolls. All of these are examples of classical aggadic midrashim, compiled in Erets Yisra'el, and were written in a mixture of Rabbinic Hebrew and Galilean Aramaic. Originating from a later period are the midrashim to Exodus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, which are related to—and at times are identical with—the Tanḥuma-Yelammedenu* collection of midrashim; these were written almost completely in Hebrew. Several of the midrashim (those to Exodus, Numbers, and Esther) are, in their present form, a composite of two works from different periods. Viewed together, the midrashim in Midrash Rabbah present a compendium of rabbinic exegesis and lore on the books of the Bible that were most often read and studied in the synagogue and study hall throughout the Mishnaic, Talmudic, and late Byzantine periods. Of the many commentaries that appear in standard editions of Midrash Rabbah, of special note are Mattenot Kehunnah by Yissakhar Berman Ashkenazi (Poland, 16th cent.), Yefei To'ar and Yefei 'Anaf by Shemu'el Yaffe Ashkenazi (Constantinople, 16th cent.), and Maharzev—a contraction for Maharenu ha-Rav Ze'ev Wolf Einhorn (Vilna, 19th cent.). MIDRASH SHEMU'EL. See SAMUEL, MIDRASH.

MIDRASH TADSHE', pseudepigraphous midrash, also called Baraiyta de-Rabbi Pinhas ben Ya'ir after the second-century tanna' to whom the work was ascribed. In both content and method it resembles certain late Second Temple works, upon which it clearly drew, such as Jubilees and works by Philo. Midrash Tadshe' opens with a commentary on "Let the earth bring forth grass" (tadshe' ha-'arets; Gn. 1.11), hence its title. Midrash Tadshe' contains speculations on the mystical significance of numbers along lines developed in Sefer Yetzirah*, as well as astrological matter. It has been suggested that its author could possibly have been the eleventh-century southern French scholar Moshe ha-Darshan*. It was first published by Adolph Jellinek (Beit ha-Midrash 3 [1928]: 164–193).

MIDRESHEI ESHET HAYIL, midrashim on the biblical acrostic poem Eshet Hayil (Prv. 31.10–31). One group of these midrashim interprets each verse as referring to a different female biblical personality. One of the editions, redacted no later than 1270, has been erroneously appended in various manuscripts and printed editions to Midrash Proverbs. Recently, a critical edition based on the twelve extant manuscripts has been prepared (Yael Levine Katz, "Midreshei Eshet Hayil," Ph.D. dissertation, Bar-Ilan University, 1993). Four editions from Yemen have been preserved in their entirety, the earliest appearing in the Midrash ha-Gadol of the thirteenth century, and there are six genizah fragments extant of undetermined date. The various editions share, for the most part, a common tradition with regard to the women included, though they differ considerably in content. These midrashim draw upon the vast corpus of Talmudic and Midrashic literature but also incorporate sources of unknown origin. They employ the hermeneutic methods of classical midrashim. The women in the first eight derashot are presented in chronological order: Noah's wife, Sarah, Rebekah, Leah, Rachel, Pharaoh's daughter, Jochebed, and Miriam. The remaining women are drawn from the Prophets and Hagiographa, although they do not appear in chronological order. After identifying the women, many of the derashot proceed to extol their virtuous deeds. Several acted on behalf of their husbands. Pharaoh's daughter rescued Moses. A number of derashot offer no further details about the women, focusing instead on their sons or on other male figures. Various derashot mention the rewards the women reaped for their good deeds.

Another group of these midrashim interprets the proverbial poem as referring to a singular biblical personality, Sarah. Three known editions of these midrashim are extant, the earliest of which dates to the ninth or tenth century.

MILAH. See CIRCUMCISION.

MILK (Heb. halav). The only halakhic restrictions on the consumption of milk are that it be drawn from a permitted species of animal and that milk or milk products not be mixed or cooked together with *meat or meat products; it is strictly forbidden even to derive benefit from such a mixture (see DIETARY LAWS). To prevent any doubts regarding a possible admixture of milk from prohibited (unclean) species, an animal should be milked either by a Jew or in the presence of a Jew (see MASH-GIAH). Breast milk may be imbibed only by a suckling but not by a child already weaned or by an adult.

MILLENNIUM, the one-thousand-year period of messianic rule that is to precede the last judgment and the world to come. Though the idea of a messianic period is found in the pseudepigrapha, in rabbinic literature, and in Christian writings, there were many, and conflicting, calculations of when it would begin and how long it would last. In 4 Ezra 7.26–31, for example (see ESDRAS, BOOKS OF), the days of the Messiah are expected to last four hundred years, while in Sanhedrin 99a different rabbis estimate the duration of the period at forty, seventy, four hundred, or a few thousand years. The term millenarianism is often used to refer to such eschatological expectations, regardless of the exact numerical calculations involved. The concept of one thousand years as the duration of the messianic era may have been derived from the idea of a world week, each day of which was to be a thousand years long. Such a notion, which is found, for example, in the Slavonic Apocalypse of Enoch, recurs in rabbinic sources, where it is also connected with Psalms 90.4 ("For a thousand years in your sight are but as yesterday"), interpreted to mean that God's day is a thousand years; just as the days of Creation were six in number, so will the world last for six thousand years, the seventh day being the thousand year reign of the Messiah (cf. San. 97a). The expectation of such a reign was very much alive in the early church (cf. Rv. 20.4–6), and subsequently in millenarian or chiliasitic Christian movements.

MIMUNAH (מִמּוֹנָה), name, of uncertain origin, of a celebration observed by Jews of North Africa and certain other *Adot ha-Mizrah on the day following the conclusion of *Pesah. It is a family festival observed in the home and at communal picnics with a strong emphasis on food, music, and traditional costumes. In Israel it has become a popular holiday among Jews of North African origin.

MIN. See MINIM.

MINHAG (מִנְהָג; custom), a term with two distinct meanings in Jewish tradition, a post-biblical religious custom and a traditional liturgical rite.

A Post-Biblical Religious Custom. Customs not introduced by a rabbinical authority or based on biblical writ often became sacred by virtue of long usage. Accepted custom is one of the formative factors in the development of Jewish law and religious observance. This applies both to local minhag, that is, customs that obtain in one locality only, as well as to customs that have been adopted universally. Minhagim are less binding than formal legal enactments, though in the event of conflict, custom can take precedence over law (Y., Yev. 12.1). The institution of a second day of festivals (see YOM TOV SHENI SHEI GALUYOT) in the Diaspora is a striking example of an obsolete law surviving merely because it qualified as a custom. Originally the second day was instituted because of doubt over the exact day of a festival, since the emissaries of the Sanhedrin could not reach the Jews in the Diaspora in time to notify them of the date of the new moon. When the calendar became fixed by astronomical calculations, this consideration no longer applied. The Talmud Bavli asked, "now that we are acquainted with the calendar, why do we observe two days?" and answered, "Because they sent a directive from Palestine stating, 'Adhere to the minhag of your ancestors that has been transmitted to you'" (Beits. 4b). The *covering of the head is another example of an early custom that became solidly entrenched in traditional practice. Two widespread minhagim are the practice of eating apples and honey on Ro'sh ha-Shanah and the kapparot* rites before Yom Kippur.

According to rabbinic law, local custom is binding not only upon natives of the land but also upon all those who take up residence there, though they come from places where a particular custom may not obtain (Suk. 3.11). Discussing the different minhagim regarding the permissibility of work on the eve of Pesah, the Mishnah lays down the general rule that "in order to obviate conflicts, no one should depart from local minhag," and a person should observe the strict custom of his hometown and the place he is visiting (Pes. 4.1). The Talmud records many differences in custom between the provinces of Judea and Galilee. The varieties of rituals that have developed in various communities are generally referred to as the minhag of such and such a group or community. The rabbinic attitude is summarized in the statement, "Custom is Torah" (tosafot to Men. 20b). Occasionally authoritative and powerful voices were raised in protest against slavish adherence to senseless or even objectionable customs. Thus, Maimonides did not hesitate to say of a prevalent custom, "This is not a minhag, but an error, and even smacks of heresy." Rabbi Ya'akov ben Me'ir Tam declared a certain custom "stupid," adding that the letters of the word minhag read backward as Gehinnom (hell) and that sages need not necessarily uphold foolish customs. Many customs entered Jewish usage from non-Jewish practices, but some of these were subsequently banned by the rabbis (see ḤUQQAT HA-GOYIM).

A Traditional Liturgical Rite. The basic foundations of the liturgy, especially of the Shaḥarit (morning) service, are laid down in Talmud tractate Berakhot. Over the course of centuries, however, individual additions and modifications have been made and considerable and significant differences have developed in the rites of various countries and sects, most notably between the Ashkenazi ritual, which evolved from Palestinian practices, and Sephardi ritual, which evolved from Babylonian usage. Within these broad divisions, however, there are many variations of local minhagim: Byzantine, Italian, Avignon, Polish, German, Eastern Jewish, and Yemenite. Ḥasidim have adopted the ritual of Yitshaq Luria (Nussah Ari), which varies slightly from standard Sephardi usage, while the Jerusalem minhag is based upon the meticulous regulations for prayer laid down by R. Eliyahu ben Shelomoh Zalman of Vilna (the Vilna Ga'on), whose disciples (perushim) established the modern Ashkenazi community of Jerusalem. The greatest difference between the various rites is the choice of High Holy Day piyyutim* (originally for other festivals as well). Considerable modification of the traditional liturgy has been introduced under Reform, Conservative, and Reconstructionist influence. Efforts have been made in the State of Israel (especially in the army) to consolidate a unified prayer rite, acceptable to all communities.

MINHAGIM BOOKS. Books devoted to minhagim (customs; see MINḤAH) can be divided into three categories: collections of minhagim of various communities or of important individuals; minhagim related to specific subjects such as wedding or festival customs; and studies of minhagim that are meant to explain their background and origin. Books of minhagim are antithetical to the nature of customs; minhagim represent life patterns of societies and individuals that, by their very nature, are not recorded in books. The necessity for minhagim books arose from contacts between communities that had different customs. Collections of their minhagim showed, on the one hand, that it was legitimate for each community to follow a different custom and, on the other hand, that each set of customs was authoritative in its own locale. One of the earliest lists of such customs, a comparison of the differences in marriage customs between Judah and Galilee, appears in the Tosefta (Ket. 1.4). The earliest extant work of significant size (Sefer ha-Hillugim, edited by M. Margalit [Jerusalem, 1938]) lists the differences between Palestinian and Babylonian liturgical customs and was compiled in the geonic period. Provence, in southern France, was an area in which Ashkenazi and Spanish scholars frequently met, and several collections of minhagim were composed there. The earliest account of different customs in European communities is Sefer ha-Manhig (critical ed. [Jerusalem, 1978]) by R. *Avraham ben Nathan of Lunel. Around 1200 R. *Asher ben Sha'ul of Lunel compiled a collection of the customs of Lunel and Narbonne, which included sources for the minhagim and was an attempt to protect customs that were falling into disuse. Of great importance is the work of Menahem *Me'iri (1249–1316), also of Provence, published under the title Magen Avot, which defended Provençal customs against the authority of Spanish scholars who tried to impose the Spanish minhag. A modern work on the study of minhagim is the ongoing series by Daniel Sperber entitled Minhagei Yisra'el. This series contains chapters that discuss the meaning and significance of customs, the patterns of their development, and the history of individual customs.

MINḤAH (מִנְחָה; Offering). [This entry discusses the prayer service; for a discussion of the offering, see MEAL OFFERING.] The Minḥah service is the second of the three daily prayer services. After the destruction of the Second Temple, the *Shaharit and Minhah services were regarded as statutory, corresponding to the tamid offering (see PERPETUAL OFFERING) in the Temple, while the evening *Ma'ariv prayer service was not initially obligatory. Minhah is recited any time during the afternoon until sunset and corresponds to the daily evening sacrifice in the Temple (in practice several hours before sunset). Its institution is ascribed by the Talmud (Ber. 26b) to the patriarch *Isaac (on the basis of Gen. 24.63). Minhah consists mainly of the *Amidah (preceded and followed by *Qaddish), which is recited silently by the worshipers and then repeated aloud by the reader. An alternative custom is to have the reader recite aloud the first benediction (including *Qedushah) and the last three benedictions, while the middle section is said silently. It is customary to recite *Ashrei (Psalm 145) by way of opening (Sephardim first recite *Qorbanot, an account of the Temple sacrifices) and to conclude with *Aleinu. On Sabbaths, Yom Kippur, and other public fasts a short reading from the Bible precedes the *Amidah; on Sabbaths, the first part of the following week's portion is read. On fast days, a prophetic reading is also recited in some rites. The *Amidah for Minhah is the same as that for Shaharit, but no Birkat ha-Kohanim is pronounced, except on fast days (by the reader in the Diaspora; by kohanim in Erets Yisra'el); in the Ashkenazi rite Shalom Rav is substituted in the last benediction for Sim Shalom. In many synagogues Minhah is recited late in the afternoon and followed immediately (or after a short interval) by the Ma'ariv service. In geonic times an abbreviated form of the Amidah was widely used. For Minhah, the reader wears the tallit; the congregation dons the tallit for Minhah only on Yom Kippur and Tish'ah be-'Av (and in some western Sephardi congregations on every fast day).

MINIM (מִינִים), term used in the Talmud and Midrash for sectarians, heretics, or Gnostics. Although the etymology of minim is unknown, it may derive from Mani (founder of Manichaeism) or by way of abbreviation from ma'amin Yeshu notseri (believer in Jesus the Nazarene). Although the precise meaning of minim varied with the circumstances—it is used in Talmudic and Midrashic sources for Sadducees, Samaritans, Judeo-Christians, and other heretical sectarians—there is no doubt that it later came to mean Judeo-Christians in particular. The Talmud (Y., San. 10.6) states that at the time of the destruction of the Temple there were twenty-four kinds of minim. "The writings of the minim," said R. Tarfon, "deserve to be burned, even though they may contain the name of God, for sectarianism is more dangerous than paganism" (Shab. 116a). A prayer against the minim, which was added to the *Amidah, was composed by Shemu'el ha-Qatan at the request of the nasi, R. Gamli'el, as part of the Jewish struggle against Christianity, which at the time was considered a Jewish sect (see BIRKAT HA-MINIM). The wording of the prayer underwent repeated changes for fear of censorship and to obviate anti-Jewish criticism; thus, malshinim (informers) was substituted for minim. Maimonides (Mishneh Torah, Teshuvah 3.7) enumerates five classes of minim (in the sense of "heretics") who have no share in the world to come: those who deny the existence of God and his providence; those who believe in several gods; those who attribute to God form and figure; those who believe in the eternity of matter from which God created the world; and those who worship stars, planets, and so on, believing that these act as intermediaries between human beings and God. Minim were disqualified from performing any religious or ritual functions, and their relatives were forbidden to mourn their death and instead instructed to rejoice (Semaḥot 2.10). MINOR PROPHETS, the twelve short prophetic books grouped together in the Bible as the fourth book of the Latter Prophets, following the three "major" prophets, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel. The Minor Prophets is commonly known as Terei 'Asar, Aramaic for "The Twelve," and includes *Hosea, *Joel, *Amos, *Obadiah, *Jonah, *Micah, *Nahum, *Habakkuk, *Zephaniah, *Haggai, *Zechariah, and *Malachi. The arrangement of the books was determined by a combination of their length, chronological sequence as perceived in rabbinic tradition, and lexical associations (B. B. 14b). The collection may well have been edited as a distinct book by the time of Ben Sira (c.180 BCE; cf. Ben Sira 44–49). A Hebrew text of the Minor Prophets from Second Temple times was found at Wadi Murabba'at and a Greek version at Naḥal Hever in the Judean Desert.

MINOR TRACTATES, several tractates not included in the Talmudic canon; also known as toseftot (additional tractates) or hitsonot (external tractates). The existence of such tractates is attested in a number of medieval sources, such as Numbers Rabbah 18.21, which Midrashically explains Song of Songs 6.8, "and damsels without number," as "external mishnah." The appellation "minor," first used in the ninth-century geonic work Halakhot Gedolot (Venice edition, p. 143b), alludes to their extracanonical status and inferior authority (see Iggeret Rav Sherira' Ga'on, French recension, p. 47), rather than to their size. It is unclear exactly which works are referred to by these names. Normally the minor tractates are identified with the fourteen tractates published together following tractate Avot in the Romm (Vilna, 1886) edition of the Talmud Bavli. However early traditions refer to "seven minor tractates" or, occasionally, to "nine external tractates." The lack of a clear tradition regarding the identity of the minor tractates is a sign of their relative neglect, although later medieval authorities occasionally relied on their halakhic rulings.

While the minor tractates all seem to be of Palestinian origin, the nature of their content and the dates of their redaction vary widely. The aggadic Avot de-Rabbi Natan* was apparently redacted during or soon after the tannaitic period, whereas most of the other minor tractates, both halakhic and aggadic, appear to have been compiled during the savoraic or early geonic periods. This dating helps to give a picture of the halakhic activity in Palestine in the centuries following the redaction of the Talmud Yerushalmi.

The minor tractates include Avot de-Rabbi Natan, Sofrim*, Semaḥot (Evel Rabbati*), Kallah*, Kallah Rabbati, Derekh Erets Rabbah*, and Derekh Erets Zuta; a second group of seven minor tractates, organized topically, includes Gerim*, Kutim*, Avadim*, Sefer Torah, Tefillin, Tsitsit, and Mezuzah. A critical edition of Avot de-Rabbi Natan was produced by Solomon Schechter, and Michael Higger produced scholarly editions of all of the remaining minor tractates. Higger's editions of the seven minor tractates and of Derekh Erets contain an English translation. Abraham Cohen produced a translation entitled The Minor Tractates of the Talmud (London, 1965; 2d ed. [1971]).

MINTZ, MOSHEH (15th cent.), rabbinic scholar and authority, communal leader. He studied with R. Yisra'el ben Petahyah Isserlein and with R. Ya'aqov ben Yehudah Weil, and he served as rabbi in Würzburg, Mainz, Landau, Ulm, Bamberg, Nürnberg, and Poznań. He was forced to abandon a planned immigration to Erets Yisra'el for reasons that are unclear.

Mintz is best known for his collection of responsa, which center on civil and matrimonial law. He was heavily involved in the enactment of communal legislation, and he writes of taqqanot of which he approved and of those with which he could not agree. Several of his responsa deal with contemporary prayer and educational practices, and they serve as an important source for the history of the yeshivot of Germany during the fifteenth century. He was involved in a number of controversies concerning the appointments of communal rabbis and academy heads. Mintz referred to and prescribed penitential regimens (tiqqunei teshuvah), which had been developed by the Ḥasidei Ashkenaz.

MINTZ, YEHUDAH (c.1408–1506), Italian rabbi, born in Mainz, from where his family took its name. A student of R. Yisra'el ben Petahyah Isserlein, Mintz settled in Padua, where he headed a renowned yeshivah and was recognized as one of the outstanding halakhic scholars of Italy. The taqqanot (enactments) he imposed upon his community with the approval of the local nonrabbinic leadership testify that, like other communal rabbis of the period in Italy, Mintz exercised a significant degree of rabbinic authority. Sixteen of his responsa were published in 1553 by R. Me'ir ben Yitshaq Katzenellenbogen, the husband of Mintz's granddaughter.

MINYAN (מִנְיָן; counting; hence, quorum), the requisite number of adult Jewish males (i.e., aged 13 or older) for a quorum for various liturgical purposes. Particular parts of the communal prayer, such as Qaddish*, Qedushah*, Barekhu*, the Birkat ha-Kohanim*, and the reader's repetition of the Amidah*, may only be recited in the presence of a minyan. The reading of the Torah and of the haftarah* also require a minyan. A minyan is also needed for Sheva' Berakhot* at the marriage feast, while the presence of a minyan at the Birkat ha-Mazon* requires a change in the text of the invocation to grace. Ten adult males are considered a "community," and thus their presence together permits the recital of the communal prayers. The number of adult males present is the determinant: fewer than ten males, even in a synagogue, may not recite the communal prayers together, while ten or more adult males, even if gathered in a locale other than the synagogue, may recite these prayers. Various explanations have been proposed for the origin of the quorum of ten. For example, of the twelve spies sent by Moses to scout out the land of Canaan, ten came back with a negative report. These ten are referred to as "this evil community" (Nm. 14.27), from which the rabbis deduced that a "community" consists of at least ten adult males. Another explanation refers to the ten righteous men who could have saved Sodom (Gn. 18.32). In areas where it was difficult to raise a quorum, the community would pay "minyan men" or batlanim* to attend services regularly. If a full quorum was not present, the rabbis counted nine adults and a boy as a minyan. Reform Judaism counts "women worshipers in the quorum, while Conservative practice (since 1973) permits women to be counted but leaves the decision to individual congregations.

MIQTSAT MA'ASEI HA-TORAH, one of the Dead Sea Scrolls*. Six copies (4Q394–399) of the document known as MMT were found in Cave 4 at Qumran. The overlapping fragments allowed the editors to reconstruct some 130 lines of the original text. As it stands, the reconstructed text consists of three sections: a solar 364-day calendar, a section of some twenty legal disputes, and an admonitory letter. Originally the editors believed that this letter was written by the founder of the Dead Sea sect, the Teacher of Righteousness*, to his enemy, the Wicked Priest. While one of the two editors (Elisha Qimron) believes it to be a letter or epistle, the other (John Strugnell) questions its genre. The halakhic stance of the three diverse groups represented in MMT on various legal matters (e.g., poured liquid and purity after immersion) are reminiscent of the arguments between the Sadducees ("we") and Pharisees ("they") in rabbinic literature (esp. Yad. 4).

MIQVA'OT (מִקְוֵאוֹת; Ritual Baths), tractate consisting of ten chapters in Mishnah order *Tohorot, with related material in the Tosefta' but with no gemara' in either Talmud. It deals with the rules pertaining to purification by means of ritual immersion. Biblical law provides for ritual purification—"he shall bathe all his flesh in water" (Lv. 15.16); for more extreme forms of impurity, the Bible says, "he shall bathe his flesh in living waters" (Lv. 15.13). Miqva'ot defines these forms of immersion, requiring for both of them water from a natural source that has not been sullied by human intervention. "Living waters" is understood to mean fresh spring water, which purifies while in motion, so long as its flow has not been interrupted by a vessel; whereas a miqveh* purifies only so long as its waters are stationary. The rabbis understood the provision to bathe "all his flesh" (Lv. 15.16) to mean that there should be no impediment separating any part of the body, or any part of a ritually immersed vessel (Nm. 31.23), from the purifying waters. Tractate Miqva'ot pronounces the special presumption of purity attached to baths found in Erets Yisra'el (Miq. 8.1).

An English translation of the Mishnat tractate is found in Herbert Danby's The Mishnah (Oxford, 1933).

MIQVEH (מִקְוֶה; collection [of water]), a collection of water for the purpose of immersion for ritual purification. It is first mentioned in Leviticus 11.36 which states in reference to purification after ritual impurity for individuals and utensils: "Only a spring, cistern, or collection [miqveh] shall be cleansing." In Temple times this law was applied to a variety of causes of *impurity. Subsequently it was applied primarily to women after *menstruation. In order for a miqveh to be fit for use it must be built on site and not transported to it in prefabricated form. The minimum amount of valid water required for a miqveh is forty se'ah, which corresponds to the volume of one square cubit by three cubits ('Eruv. 4b; Tosafot Hag. 11a, s.v. berum; Shulhan 'Arukh, Yoreh De'ah 201.1). Since there is a dispute among halakhic authorities with regard to the size of the biblical cubit (amah), the modern equivalent of forty se'ah ranges from 250 to 1,000 liters of water. A miqveh must also be completely watertight and may not, therefore, be emptied through a hole in the floor. Instead, it is generally emptied from above, by hand, vacuum, or electric pump. Drawn water (mayim she'uvim) is unfit for miqveh use (Miq. 4.1). Natural spring water, rainwater, snow and melted ice are all valid for the purposes of filling a miqveh, but care must be taken that no vessel interferes with the flow of the water from its point of origin to the miqveh. This is because contact with any such vessel, for example, a pump or meter, may easily render the water impure. In order to solve this problem, nonmetal pipes free of any special fittings are used, the last section of which consists of a special trough of absorbent concrete generally resting on either compact earth or gravel. A small hole connects this trough to the miqveh. The process of transporting valid water in this fashion is known as hamshakhah. In practice, the miqveh usually consists of at least two chambers, one of which is a storage tank and the other the immersion pool. The valid water is stored in the tank which is connected to the immersion pool through a small round hole in the wall separating the two structures. This is made possible by the Mishnaic principle that once it contains forty se'ah of valid water, a miqveh is not rendered unfit by virtue of the addition of regular water (Miq. 3.1; Maimonides, Hilkhot Miqva'ot 4.6). It is, therefore, possible to mix valid water with regular water and to maintain a large immersion pool by means of the contact hole. This method is known as hashaqah. The other accepted method is to mix both valid water and regular water in a special tank and to fill the immersion pool with a combination of different types of water (zeri'ah). It is not uncommon to combine both methods in order to ensure a large supply of immersion water that can be changed at regular intervals. In order to ensure its watertightness, a modern miqveh is built of poured concrete, strengthened with steel bars and a dry mix of cement and iron aggregate. The cement is waterproofed by adding to it an expanding clay material or pulverized rock that swells and forms a jelly-like substance when touched by water. There are special procedures for the filling, heating and draining of a miqveh. Miqva'ot answering to the halakhic requirements for their construction have been discovered as early as the Second Temple period and throughout the Middle Ages, in both Ashkenazi and Sephardi countries. There are many references in the Talmud to the ubiquitousness of miqva'ot, especially in Jerusalem and in the Temple environs. In addition to menstruant women, women after childbirth, and converts, the miqveh is used for spiritual ablution and the ritual purification of utensils. In Talmudic times it was also used by men, after intercourse or other emissions of sperm, but this custom was almost totally abandoned subsequently. Maimonides emphasizes the spiritual nature of miqveh immersion and states categorically that "uncleanliness is not mud or filth which water can remove but is dependent upon the intention of the heart. Therefore, the sages said: If a man immerses himself but lacks special intention, then it is as though he has not immersed himself at all" (Hilkhot Miqva'ot 11.12). Regular immersion in a miqveh is a practice of some pious ascetics, and it is a hasidic custom for men to immerse themselves before the Sabbath. The Conservative movement upholds the principle of ritual immersion, although it is not widely observed, except for converts. Reform Judaism does not accept the need for the miqveh with an exception, especially outside the United States, for converts. See also TAHARAT HA-MISHPAHAH.

MIR, a small town in Lithuania famous for its yeshivah. The yeshivah, which was founded in approximately 1815 and flourished until World War II, blended Talmudic scholarship with the Musar teachings of R. Yisra'el *Salanter. During World War II, most of the yeshivah's students managed to flee through Siberia to Japan and ultimately to Shanghai, China, where they reconstituted the yeshivah. To meet the dearth of Jewish religious works in that part of the world, the Shanghai Yeshivah reprinted many of the classics. After the war, teachers and students were able to migrate to various Western countries, especially the United States and Israel, where they founded successor schools to the original yeshivah.

MIRACLES. The more fully developed concept of miracles presupposes a fixed natural order from which the miraculous event is a departure. The religious belief in miracles assumes that God can, for various purposes, set aside the order of nature that he has created, so as to reveal his saving presence or his omnipotence. Many miracles are recorded in scripture, mainly in connection with the history of the Jewish people, including the splitting of the sea after the *Exodus from Egypt, the divine revelation at Sinai, Joshua's stopping of the sun, or the miracles performed by Elijah and Elisha. Miracles are also recorded in rabbinic literature, though the rabbis do not offer a systematic theory or doctrine of the phenomenon. Thus the Mishnah lists a number of miraculous things that were created on the eve of the first Sabbath, that is, before the work of creation ended, and of miraculous phenomena in the Temple. The Talmud recounts miracles performed by saintly men (e.g., *Honi ha-Me'aggel, *Hanina' ben Dosa), and many Talmudic rabbis are described as "experienced in miracles." However, not everything called a miracle by the rabbis is a spectacular or manifestly supernatural event, and the term is sometimes used to denote God's salvation in everyday matters, such as the finding of daily bread or recovery after an illness, as in the language of the *Amidah prayer, "the miracles that are daily with us—morning, noon, and night." The rabbis emphasize that man is surrounded at all times by miracles, many of which he is not even aware. Both usages of the term, however, refer to the work of God, either directly executed by him or through the mediation of a human or natural agency. With the development of the philosophical concepts of natural order and causality, it became increasingly difficult to defend miracles, and the more rationalist medieval thinkers, such as Moses *Maimonides and *Levi ben Gershom, tried to reduce the significance of even biblical miracles to a minimum, explaining most of them as symbolic allegories or dreams. This cautious rationalism of the philosophers stands in marked contrast to the belief in miracles that characterizes popular religion and certain forms of mysticism. Belief in miracles has often bordered on magic and superstition, and it flourished in the Hasidic movement, which ascribed the power to work miracles to the saintly leader or tsaddiq. MIRIAM (Heb. Miryam), sister of *Aaron and *Moses (Nm. 26.59; Mi. 6.4; 1 Chr. 6.3), who is also called a prophet (Ex. 15.20). She helped to save the life of Moses in his infancy (Ex. 2.4–8). A competition over leadership and the status of a prophet seems to inform the incident in Numbers 12, where Moses' superiority as prophet and leader is challenged on two counts: his marriage to a Cushite woman and Miriam and Aaron's claim that their own prophetic powers are analogous to his. When God supports Moses' superiority as prophet and leader, Miriam is punished by a skin disease, and only after a period of isolation does she rejoin the camp. Another indication of her prominence is the attribution of a victory song to her and a women's choir (Ex. 15.20–21) after the Israelites crossed the Sea of Reeds (Ex. 14), paralleling the recital of a poem by Moses and the [male] Israelites (Ex. 15.1–19).

MI SHE-BERAKH (מי שברך; "He who blessed"), the opening words of a synagogal prayer, in various forms, in which God's blessing is requested for any individual(s). Its recitation is customary in most rites during the qeri'at ha-Torah* (reading of the Torah); it is offered by the reader for each person called to the reading, after which that person may request prayers to be added in honor of his (or, in non-Orthodox congregations, her) relations or anyone else. The prayer frequently (although less so today) states that the one requesting it has vowed a sum for charity. Special formulas are introduced for sick people, baby namings, boys at the time of their circumcision, and so on. Variations were also composed to fit different historical circumstances. A general Mi she-Berakh prayer dating from the geonic period calls on God to bless members of the congregation—together with other congregations—and is recited in the morning prayer service on Sabbaths and festivals. While the traditional version of Mi she-Berakh refers to the three *patriarchs, the Sephardi rite has a parallel version for the blessing of women that invokes the four matriarchs. In Israeli synagogues an additional Mi she-Berakh prayer has been added for the welfare of the country's soldiers.

MI SHE-BERAKH LE-ḤOLIM (מִי שֶׁבֵּרַךְ לְחֹלִים) He Who Blesses the Sick, a common form of prayer for the sick. In addition to the eighth benediction of the weekday *'Amidah, which is a petition for the healing of the sick, any individual may offer prayers for sick friends or relatives. These can be added to the above benediction or else to the sixteenth benediction of the 'Amidah (which is used freely as a framework into which personal requests may be inserted). Prayers for the sick may also be offered in the synagogue after the reading of the Torah; it is usual for the person requesting such a prayer to vow an offering to charity (see MI SHE-BERAKH). It is also customary to read psalms for the sake of the sick. Prayers to be recited by a sick person, incorporating psalms and a brief confession of sin, were composed for those who were gravely ill, as were special prayers including the solemn change of *name.

MISHNAH (מִשְׁנָה; oral instruction), oral law compilation dating from approximately 200 CE, which serves as the foundation text for Talmudic law and tradition. The Hebrew verb shanah (repeat) came to be applied specifically to the repetition and memorization of oral traditions, hence to the study of oral law. The term mishnah may designate the method of oral study (in contradistinction to miqra', that is, study of scripture), a specific unit of oral instruction, or a compilation of oral instruction. A sage who expounded mishnah was designated in Talmudic literature as a tanna', deriving from the root teni, the Aramaic equivalent of the Hebrew shanah. During the second century, mishnah collections abounded among the sages of Erets Yisra'el. However, by the turn of the century, one collection, that of R. *Yehudah ha-Nasi'—known as Rabbi—had achieved recognition as the authoritative compilation. From that time forward, the term Mishnah referred to this compilation, and material from all other compilations came to be known as baraiyot (external mishnayyot; from Aram. bar [outside]).

The Mishnah consists of six sedarim (orders), each of which deals with a major division of the oral law: *Zera'im (Seeds), *Mo'ed (Appointed Time), *Nashim (Women), *Neziqin (Damages), *Qodashim (Holy Things), and *Tohorot (Purities). Each of these divisions is subdivided into massekhtot (tractates; from massekhet [woven fabric]), which in turn are divided into chapters and into individual pericopes, called halakhot, or more popularly, mishnayyot. Because of the frequently illogical nature of the division of Mishnah into chapters and halakhot, J. N. Epstein has argued that these divisions are not an organic part of the original Mishnah composition but that they were introduced by the Mishnah reciters of post-Mishnaic times, who needed to break Mishnah into smaller units for purposes of ease in memorization and recitation. However, more recent scholarship has suggested that these divisions are significant in understanding the literary and conceptual structure of Mishnah.

Most scholars, following Iggeret Rav Sherira' Ga'on (10th cent.), understand the Mishnah to be the product of successive stages of redaction, originating around the time of the destruction of the Second Temple, prior to which oral law was transmitted from master to disciple without fixed formulations or fixed order. The late Second Temple origin of Mishnaic forms is based partly on external evidence, such as Talmudic statements (Y., Yoma' 2.3, 39d; Yoma' 16a) attributing tractates Tamid and Middot to tanna'im who lived at the end of the Second Temple period and a statement in the Tosefta' (T., 'Eduy. 1.1) that may be understood as attributing tractate 'Eduyyot to the high court of Yavneh. Internal evidence is also cited, such as the list of names of Temple functionaries in Sheqalim 5.1, which appears to portray the situation existing most probably at the time immediately preceding the Second Temple's destruction.

In the initial stages of formulating and organizing the oral law, the Mishnaic arrangement of material, based on form and content, contended for supremacy with the Midrashic arrangement, based on associating oral traditions with scriptural verses, arranged according to the order of the Torah. A central figure in the history of Mishnah redaction was R. 'Aqiva', whose major contributions to both forms of arranging oral law generated intensive work by his disciples. Rabbi Me'ir's Mishnah arrangement served as the main basis for the Mishnah of Yehudah ha-Nasi'.

Since the medieval period, there have been two schools of thought, based on two conflicting versions of Iggeret Rav Sherira' Ga'on, about whether the Mishnah was redacted orally or was committed to writing. Current scholarly opinion follows the view of Saul Lieberman, who argued that even though there may have been written exemplars of Mishnah, it was transmitted orally throughout the Talmudic and most of the geonic periods and was first published in written form during the geonic period.

Following the widespread acceptance of the Mishnah of R. Yehudah ha-Nasi', the emphasis of the study of oral law shifted to the interpretation and application of the Mishnah, together with other tannaitic materials, focusing not on the mere formulation of the law, as in Mishnah, but on the dialectical and hermeneutical principles on which the law is based (see TALMUD).

Inasmuch as the Mishnah's formulations and structures do not correspond to those that would be expected in a legal codex, scholars have debated issues of the logic and purpose of Mishnaic redaction. Some, such as J. N. Epstein and E. E. Urbach, have sought explanations based on higher criticism for divergences in the Mishnah from the logical order one would expect. Others, such as H. Albeck and A. Goldberg, have suggested that the Mishnah was designed not as a legal code but as an educational device, such that its order is dictated by educational concerns, for example, ease in memorization. Some recent scholars suggest that Mishnaic forms and principles reflect the conceptual foundations of the Mishnah's halakhic thinking. The frequent aggadic pronouncements and anecdotes within the Mishnah, which are interwoven with the halakhic material in a highly sophisticated literary manner, may be seen as supporting this last viewpoint.

There are frequent differences between the text of the Mishnah as preserved in the Talmud Bavli and the Talmud Yerushalmi and in manuscript versions of the Mishnah, which modern linguistic scholarship has traced to Palestinian and Babylonian versions of Mishnaic Hebrew. Insofar as the Mishnah was not, in the Babylonian tradition, studied as an independent text but rather as a part of Talmud study, the Babylonian version of the Mishnah was preserved primarily in manuscripts of the Talmud Bavli. The Palestinian version has been best preserved in three complete Mishnah manuscripts, known as the Kaufman MS (in the library of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences), the Parma MS 138, and the Cambridge MS 73 (published by W. H. Lowe as Matnita' de-Talmuda' di-Venei Ma'arav'a). The editio princeps of the Mishnah is the Naples edition of 1492, containing Maimonides' commentary. Modern editions are based on the Mishnah text as corrected by R. Yom Tov Lipmann Heller, who printed the Mishnah together with his commentary, Tosafot Yom Tov, in Prague from 1614 through 1617. There is as yet no critical edition of the Mishnah as a whole, although critical editions exist for Zera'im, as well as for several tractates from other Mishnah orders. Other important Mishnah commentators include: R. 'Ovadyah Bertinoro (15th cent.), R. Shelomoh Adeni (Melekheth Shelomoh, 17th cent.), R. Yisra'el Lipschutz (Tiferet Yisra'el, 19th cent.), and H. Albeck (1958–1959). English translations include those by H. Danby (1933), P. Blackman (1951–1956), and J. Neusner (1988). In addition, the Mishnah may be found in English translation in the Soncino Talmud translation, as well as in a recent English translation of the commentary to the Mishnah by P. Kehati.

MISHNEH TORAH. See MAIMONIDES, MOSES.

MI-SINAI (מִי־סִינַי; from Sinai), a body of fixed melodies constituting a significant segment of Ashkenazi synagogue tradition that emerged in southwest Germany between the eleventh and fifteenth centuries. The term is used interchangeably with the Yiddish expression scarbova niggunim. Ya'aqov ben Moshe ha-Levi *Molin, a renowned fourteenth-century rabbinic authority and hazzan, decreed that local custom and universal Jewish traditional melodies may not be changed.

Most of the mi-Sinai melodies are associated with the High Holy Days and festivals. The melody that pervades the High Holy Day Ma'ariv service, the chant for Kol Nidrei, and the melody for the Qaddish preceding the prayers for rain and dew (among others) became familiar tunes. The liberal reforms of the nineteenth century removed traditional nussah from the vocabulary of synagogue music, but the mi-Sinai melodies retained their place in the service, even when the texts associated with them were translated or otherwise altered.

MITNAGGEDIM (מִתְנַגְּדִים; opponents), a term for opponents of Hasidism. The first bans of excommunication against Hasidim were issued in 1772 by *Eliyyahu ben Shelomoh Zalman of Vilna, the Vilna Ga'on. A second wave of bans followed the year after the first Hasidic publication, Toledot Ya'aqov Yosef (1780). A third cycle of excommunications ensued after the expansion of Hasidic influence and the publication of the Tanya by Shneur Zalman of Lyady in 1796. In this last phase, the Hasidim and then their opponents sought to enlist the support of Russian government officials. During the 1790s, pamphlets attacking Hasidism were written by two itinerant preachers and zealous opponents of the movement, David of Maków and Israel Löbel of Sluck.

A pamphlet published in 1772 contained most of the key objections of the Mitnaggedim to Hasidic practice: the displacement by simple piety of Talmudic erudition in the hierarchy of values; the establishment of separate places of prayer where a different liturgy was followed and the fixed times of prayer sometimes were not fixed; changes in the method of ritual slaughter of animals (shehitah); excessive lightheartedness ("all their days are like holidays") and consumption of alcohol; a certain Shabbatean aroma; attribution of supernatural powers to their leaders, who bilked their followers of contributions; and the hubris of the Hasidim, who "have little of the bread of oral Torah," yet "enter the rose garden of the Kabbalah." On a different plane, there was the Mitnaggedic perception of the theological dangers associated with Hasidic doctrine and practice: the notion that divinity could be worshiped through material deeds; that "strange thoughts" could be elevated; and that God should be sought through both the evil and the good inclination. In a word, the almost pantheistic teachings of the Hasidic leaders tended toward the confusion of the realms of the sacred and the profane, of good and evil.

During the nineteenth century, the challenge of modernizing trends of thought muted the divisions within the traditional community; being a Mitnagged became merely a private preference within Orthodoxy.

MITSRANUT (מִצְרָנוּת; abutter's rights). In Jewish law, one who owns a property has the right to purchase the property abutting it from the neighbor when the neighbor wishes to or is forced for some reason to sell (B. M. 108a). The neighbor may be compelled to sell to the abutter at the market price; the neighbor may not demand a higher price from an abutter merely because the abutter may be more anxious to buy. On the other hand, Talmudic sages rule that the abutter must purchase the land for personal use and not merely to take advantage of a pressing financial need of the neighbor. When multiple neighbors abut, the one who plans to use the land in the same manner as the seller has precedence.

MITSVAH (מִצְוָה; commandment), religious *duty or obligation; the term also came to be used to mean good deed. The word applies especially to the biblical "commandments and the statutes and the ordinances which I command you" (Dt. 7.11), which in their totality make up the *Torah. They form the basis of Jewish law (halakhah) and behavior. The number of biblical mitsvot is 613 (see COMMANDMENTS, 613), consisting of 365 prohibitions (mitsvot lo' ta'aseh or lav) and 248 positive precepts (mitsvot 'aseh). In addition to the biblical mitsvot (known as de-'oraita' [from the Torah]), there are innumerable mitsvot of rabbinic origin (de-rabbanan; Pes.

10a; Suk. 44a). Some of these rabbinic ordinances are treated as if they had divine authority, and the blessing recited prior to their performance contains the formula otherwise confined to biblical precepts ("Blessed are you, our God, who has sanctified us with his commandments and commanded us to . . ."). These include the mitsvot of washing the hands before meals, kindling the Sabbath and festival lights, making the 'eruv, reciting Hallel on festival days, lighting the Hanukkah lights, and reading the scroll of Esther on Purim. The rabbis allow that there may be differences of importance between various mitsvot (of certain mitsvot, such as tsitsit [Ned. 25a], circumcision [Ned. 32a], and charity [B. B. 9a], it is said that their performance is equal to the observance of the entire Torah) but nevertheless enjoin that one must "be as heedful of a light mitsvah as of an important one, for you never know the reward for the performance of a mitsvah" (Avot 2.1). Many classifications of mitsvot exist, such as those between humans and God and those between one human and another. Mitsvot are also classified by the severity of punishment legislated for their transgression (capital punishment, flogging, sacrifice, etc.). Another distinction is made between mitsvot that can be observed at any time and those that must be fulfilled at a fixed hour (women are exempt from the latter because of household duties). Another considerable category of mitsvot consists of those that can be performed only in Erets Yisra'el.

The opposite of a mitsvah is an 'averah (transgression; see SIN). The rabbis said that a mitsvah that is fulfilled through an 'averah is reckoned as an 'averah (Suk. 30a); that is, with regard to mitsvot, the end does not justify the means. Liability for the performance of mitsvot starts with the attainment of one's religious majority: for a boy, his bar mitsvah*; for a girl her bat mitsvah*. A father is obligated to prepare his children for this responsibility.

A person already engaged in performing a mitsvah is exempt from performing another one that should be done at the same time (Ber. 4a). The sages suggested that mitsvot should be performed aesthetically (in the biblical phrase "This is my God and I will glorify him" [Ex. 15.2], glorify can also be interpreted as beautify). From this derived the traditions, for example, of decorating the sukkah or making Torah scrolls beautiful (Shab. 133b), which inspired Jewish ritual *art. Whether a mitsvah requires kavvanah (*intent), or whether the mere act is sufficient in itself, is a matter of dispute in the Talmud (Ber. 13a).

The question of the meaning and purpose of the mitsvot gave rise to reflection and discussion in Talmudic literature and in medieval and subsequent Jewish thought. A distinction was made between huqqim (ordinances or laws), for which no rational explanation could be given, and commandments, for which reasons could be adduced and that would be observed even without divine revelation as expressions of natural morality (for example, honoring one's parents or the prohibitions against murder, theft, and dishonesty; see COMMANDMENTS, REASONS FOR).

Starting with Maimonides' Sefer ha-Mitsvot (12th cent.), which divided the mitsvot into fourteen categories following the divisions of books in his Mishneh Torah, various works were written listing the mitsvot, including Sefer Mitsvot Gadol by Mosheh ben Ya'aqov of Coucy (13th cent.) and the shorter Sefer Mitsvot Qatan by Yitshaq ben Yosef of Corbeil (13th cent.). MIZRAH (מִזְרָח; east), a plaque, often highly artistic, frequently with only the word mizrah on it, hung on the eastern wall of a synagogue or in a private home when west of Erets Yisra'el, indicating the direction of Jerusalem. Jewish law requires the worshiper when standing in prayer, and especially when reciting the 'Amidah, to face Jerusalem. This is in fulfillment of Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the First Temple: "They shall pray to you toward their land which you gave their fathers, the city which you have chosen and the house which I have built to your name" (1 Kgs. 8.48). Arks in synagogues that are to the west of Erets Yisra'el are traditionally built on the eastern wall, so that worshipers will face the ark and, by extension, Jerusalem, when they pray. To avoid the accusation of worshiping the sun by turning east, the Shulhan 'Arukh* advocates turning in a south easterly direction (Orah Hayyim 94.2). Because of the significance of the east in Jewish ritual, the most prized seats in synagogues were generally those "on the mizrah wall," and these were often reserved for the rabbi and dignitaries.

MIZRAHI, ELIYAHU (1450–1526), rabbi in Constantinople. Born in Constantinople to a Romaniot family (i.e., of Turkish, not Spanish, origin), he was recognized at the end of the century, after the death of Mosheh Capsali, by both the Romaniot and Sephardi Jews as the supreme authority in the Ottoman empire.

Highly regarded for his comprehensive general knowledge and for his halakhic expertise, he also welcomed the refugees from Spain, whose contribution to Jewish culture he greatly appreciated. His approach to the community was democratic; he rejected conferring any special status on the rich and the learned. He ruled that taxation should be based on socioeconomic considerations. He advocated a rapprochement with the Karaites, despite their rejection of rabbinic teachings, and taught them the oral law, although he strictly prohibited intermarriage between Rabbanites and Karaites. His best-known work is his supercommentary on Rashi (Venice, 1527). He also wrote a book on mathematics, Sefer ha-Mispar (Constantinople, 1533), and was versed in Greek and Arabic philosophy. He opposed Kabbalah, especially as a basis for halakhic decisions. In his responsa (Constantinople, 1560) he describes his busy daily life, including his rabbinic duties, heading a yeshivah, and teaching.

MLOKHIM BUKH, a major Yiddish poetic work, setting biblical narrative in a European form, in the manner of the Shemu'el Bukh*. Believed to have been composed in the fifteenth century, and framed in Nibelungen (Hildebrand) stanza, the Mlokhim Bukh comprises stories derived from 1 and 2 Kings, culminating in the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. The anonymous author draws copiously from later Jewish sources as well as his own sense of humor. The language employed is sophisticated and forward-looking. The first printed edition is from Augsburg in 1543.

MNEMONICS, actual or artificial words used as aids in memorizing. A favorite approach was creating an *acronym, by which the initial letters of various words would form a single word (see ABBREVIATIONS). Mnemonics were important in the transmission of oral traditions and the liturgy at a time when the ordinary worshiper did not have a prayer book. Mnemonics were common both in literary compositions (for example, alphabetic and other *acrostics in Psalms and Lamentations and in piyyut*) and for memorizing halakhic discussions and conclusions (cf. yaqnehaz* or—a nonhalakhic example—the three meaningless words quoted in the Seder* service, which constitute a mnemonic for the Ten Plagues [see PLAGUES OF EGYPT]). Mnemonics are also used as a device for remembering grammatical rules (e.g., bagad kefat to indicate the letters that take a dagesh lene). The rabbis advocated the use of mnemonics for study and suggested that the scholars of Judah remembered what they had learned while those of Galilee forgot because the former used mnemonics (Eruv*. 53–54).

MODEH ANI (מוֹדֶה אֲנִי; I Give Thanks), a short prayer said immediately upon waking in the morning. It does not appear in medieval sources and seems to have been composed in the seventeenth century to replace Elohay Neshamah (O My God, the Soul That You Gave Me), which is mentioned in the Talmud, and which was transferred to the Morning Benedictions (*Birkhot ha-Shahar). Modeh Ani does not mention the divine name and could be recited while still in bed and before performing the prescribed morning ablutions. It expresses thanks to the "living and eternal king" for the return of one's soul after sleep and welcomes the presence of God upon waking.

MODENA, LEONE (1571–1648), Italian rabbi and a versatile writer; also known as Yehudah Aryeh. His literary achievements were especially outstanding, and he was one of the most colorful figures in the Venice ghetto. In his apologetic work Historia de' riti Ebraici (Paris, 1637), he wrote as a proud resident of the ghetto but was also influenced by external culture, advocating the introduction of polyphony into synagogue music. He also advocated the harmonization of Jewish and Catholic sensibilities. His sermons attracted distinguished gentile audiences, and helped to alter Christian stereotypes of Judaism by explaining Jewish ritual. His Hayyei Yehudah was translated into English by Mark R. Cohen as The Autobiography of a Seventeenth-Century Venetian Rabbi: Leon Modena's Life of Judah (Princeton, 1988). MO'ED (מוֹעֵד; Appointed Time), second order of the Mishnah, dealing with the laws of Sabbath and festivals. It has twelve tractates, each of which has related material in the Tosefta as well as in both Talmuds (except *Sheqalim, which lacks gemara in the Talmud Bavli). The twelve tractates are *Shabbat, *Eruvin, *Pesachim, *Sheqalim, *Yoma, *Sukkah, *Beitsah, *Ro'sh ha-Shanah, *Ta'anit, *Megillah, *Mo'ed Qatan, and *Hagigah.

MO'ED QATAN (מוֹעֵד קָטָן; Minor Appointed Time), tractate consisting of three chapters in Mishnah order *Mo'ed, with related material in the Tosefta and both Talmuds. An early name for the tractate, taken from its first word, was Mashqin. The name Mo'ed Qatan (in early sources, simply Mo'ed) refers to the subject of the tractate, the laws of mo'ed, a term used in Mo'ed Qatan to indicate the intermediate days of Pesah and Sukkot. Whereas biblical law characterizes only the first and the last days of these festivals as days of refraining from work (Lv. 23.39; cf. Lv. 23.7–8), the rabbinic tradition characterizes the intermediate days as hol ha-mo'ed* (the secular portion of the appointed time), requiring a partial restriction of work activities during these days as well. Mo'ed Qatan outlines the categories of work that are exempted from this prohibition, including activities that are essential to prevent financial loss, as well as activities that are necessary for public welfare or for proper enjoyment of the festival. The prohibition of mourning the death of a relative during the festival leads Mo'ed Qatan, particularly in the Talmud, into a lengthy excursus on the laws of mourning.

The Talmud Bavli tractate was translated into English by H. M. Lazarus in the Soncino Talmud (London, 1938).

MOHEL (מוֹהֵל; circumciser), a person authorized to perform a *circumcision. The duty to circumcise a newborn male rests with the father, but the actual execution is entrusted to a person duly trained and declared competent both in theory and practice. The mohel thus acts as the agent of the parent. Although according to law any competent Jew may perform a circumcision, preference is given to one of genuine piety who performs the act "for the sake of heaven." According to Maimonides (Hilkhot Milah 2.1), a woman, a non-Jew, or even a competent minor may act as mohel where no competent male Jew is available. The Talmud states that a "sage should be able to perform ritual slaughter and circumcision" (Hul. 9a). Reform Jews often have medical doctors perform circumcisions.

MOHILEVER, SHEMU'EL (1824–1898), Russian Zionist and rabbi of Bialystok. He used his considerable rabbinic reputation, enhanced by his wide general knowledge, to unite both secular and Orthodox nationalists in founding the pre-Herzlian Zionist movement of Hībbat Tsiyyon in Warsaw in 1882, convening the first conference of the Hovevei Tsiyyon at Kattowitz in 1884. He succeeded in persuading the Parisian philanthropist Baron Edmond de Rothschild to support their agricultural settlements, monitoring their progress himself in a visit to Palestine in 1890. He headed a rabbinic campaign in 1882 calling on the Jewish masses fleeing from the Russian pogroms to the West to settle instead the ancestral homeland, echoing a Midrashic statement to the effect that God preferred his children to live in their land even without due observance of the Torah than have them observe it properly in the Diaspora. In 1893 he founded Merkaz Ruḥani to spread Zionism among Orthodox Jewry from which the Religious Zionist movement Mizrachi took its name. He enthusiastically supported the political Zionist leader Theodor Herzl and helped him organize the First Zionist Congress in 1897. His message of Zionist ecumenism sent to the congress, which he was too ill to attend, deeply impressed the delegates.

MOLECH, Semitic deity worshiped in biblical times, known from Ugaritic and Mesopotamian sources as Malik. It is likely that Molech figured among the chthonic gods, that is, those associated with death and the underworld. According to biblical tradition, Molech was worshiped by means of child sacrifice, a practice abhorred and strictly forbidden by Israelite belief and law (Ez. 16.21, 20.26, 31, 23.39; Ps. 106.37–38). Child sacrifice is condemned in the Bible, without mention of the god Molech, as a characteristically repulsive form of Canaanite religion, to be shunned by the Israelites (Dt. 12.30–31, 18.10); explicit prohibitions against the worship of Molech are found in Leviticus 18.21 and 20.2–5. Sacrificing to Molech is called “whoring after” him; it desecrates God’s name and pollutes his sanctuary. The penalty is death by stoning for the perpetrator and all of his followers; if the court fails to carry out the sentence, the perpetrator and his family are liable to divine punishment. Though the idolatrous practice of child sacrifice seems to have been introduced into Judah under the reign of Ahaz (2 Kgs. 16.3, 2 Chr. 28.3) and is referred to in connection with Manasseh as well as Hoshea, king of Israel (2 Kgs. 17.7–12, 21.6; 2 Chr. 33.6), the god Molech is mentioned by name in this connection only from the time of Josiah (2 Kgs. 23.10). There seems to have arisen then an institutionalized Molech cult, centered at Topheth in Gei Ben Hinnom near Jerusalem, and despite Josiah’s efforts to eliminate it, it may have continued for some time. Some Israelites seem to have seen it as an acceptable form of worshiping the God of Israel; others connected it with Baal (Jer. 7.31–32, 19.5–6, 32.35). According to some rabbinic interpretation, and a few modern scholars, the burning of children in fire to Molech was symbolic rather than real. Molech is not to be identified with Milcom, god of the Ammonites; though the biblical text mistakenly confused them once (1 Kgs. 11.7), they are everywhere else kept distinct.

MOLIN, YA'AQOV BEN MOSHEH HA-LEVI (c.1360–1427), German rabbi; also known as the Maharil or Mahari Siegel. He was prominent in rebuilding the Jewish community following the Black Death persecutions of 1348 and 1349. Born in Mainz, he studied there with his father and with R. Avraham Klausner and R. Shalom ben Yitshaq in Vienna. Molin became the rabbi of Mainz upon his father’s death and served there for the rest of his life; his yeshivah attracted many students. He was a renowned exponent of minhag Ashkenaz, the customary religious practices of central European Jewry. His version of minhag Ashkenaz is preserved largely in Sefer [Minhagei] ha-Maharil (Sabionetta, 1556), compiled by his student R. Zalman of Saint Goar. The book, which served as a major source for the rulings of R. Moshe Isserles in his glosses on the Shulḥan 'Arukh, also contains some of the teachings of Molin’s teacher, R. Shalom, and of his student, R. Ya’akov ben Yehudah Weil. Molin was the author of numerous halakhic responsa, which have appeared in several recensions, most recently in a critical edition published by Yitshaq Satz in 1979; others remain in manuscript.

MOLKHO, SHELOMOH (c.1500–1532), kabbalist, messianic enthusiast, and martyr. Born to a Marrano family in Portugal, he attained a high position at court but returned to Judaism after his meeting in 1525 with David *Re’uveni. He circumcised himself and subsequently experienced visions. From Lisbon, Molkho escaped to Salonika where he joined Shelomoh *Alkabez and other followers of kabbalist Yosef *Taitazak. From Turkey, Molkho went to Italy. Convinced that he was the Messiah, he spent thirty days in Rome in prayer and fasting among the beggars in front of the pope’s palace, in fulfillment of a Talmudic legend recounting the suffering of the Messiah. This and other messianic gestures alarmed some Jewish leaders, but many Jews and Christians revered Molkho as a man of God and a prophet, especially when his predictions about the flooding of Rome by the Tiber in 1530 and the earthquake in Lisbon in 1531 came to pass. Even Pope Clement VII was greatly impressed by Molkho and protected him from the Inquisition. From Italy Molkho traveled to Regensburg with David Re’uveni to seek an audience with Emperor Charles V to persuade him to arm Marranos to fight against the Turks in Palestine. Charles V had both of them arrested and delivered to the Inquisition. Molkho was burned at the stake in Mantua. His kabbalistic homilies are printed in his Sefer ha-Mefo'ar (first published as Derashot [Salonika, 1529]), which includes his forecast that the Messiah would appear in the year 1540.

MONASTICISM is practically unknown among Jews, although it plays an important role in Christianity and other religions. The only examples in mainstream Jewish history date from the late Second Temple period among the *Essenes, the *Qumran community (identified by many scholars with the Essenes), and the *Therapeutae. *Celibacy is frowned upon by Judaism, and extreme ascetic tendencies (see ASCETICISM), though widespread at certain periods in pietistic circles, were generally counteracted by the social and world-affirming orientation of the Jewish tradition. In general, the idea of monasticism, which requires withdrawal from the world in order to achieve spiritual perfection, is contrary to the Jewish demand of hallowing life in the world by the discipline of *sanctification.

MONEYLENDING. Any charging of interest is strictly forbidden in the Bible (Ex. 22.24; Lv. 25.36–37; Dt. 23.20–21). There are two words used for interest, both found in Leviticus 25.36—neshekh (biting) and tarbit (increase). The Mishnah (B. M. 5.1) differentiates between the two, saying that the former refers to a direct addition to the money or produce lent, the latter to an increase in the value of the produce. The prohibition against interest seems to have been frequently disregarded in biblical times; Psalms 15.5 enumerates among the qualities of the virtuous man that “he puts not out his money on interest.” The law against both accepting and paying interest applies only to Jews, non-Jews being explicitly excluded from the prohibition (Dt. 23.21). Jews circumvented the law by using non-Jews as straw men (cf. B. M. 5.6). The biblical prohibition against moneylending reflects the simple economy of an agricultural society where *loans were needed to provide immediate relief in moments of distress (e.g., failure of crops). The rabbis saw the taking of interest as the transgression of a negative commandment and even developed the concept of avaq ribbit (dust of interest) to prevent the lender from receiving any advantage from a loan, even if he did not receive actual interest. With the development of a money economy, industry, and trade, the ancient prohibitions became economically obsolete. Unable to disregard a plain biblical prohibition, Jewish practice evolved—against long resistance—the legal fiction known as hetter 'isqa', by which a loan is contracted in the form of a partnership. Although this procedure is considered legitimate for business transactions and investments, loans to a fellow man in need should be free of interest (see GEMILUT HESED). The Catholic church in the Middle Ages enforced a prohibition against moneylending between Christians; hence, the Jews, debarred from other occupations, often became moneylenders and usurers. The financial operations of all banks in Israel are covered by a general hetter 'isqa'.

MONOGAMY. See POLYGAMY.

MONOTHEISM, belief in, and worship of, one *God. Monotheism is the decisive characteristic of the Israelite conception of God, although different stages of development and definition are discernible. The composition of the term (Gr. monos and theos) indicates that monotheism is a form of theism, that is, belief in a personal, divine being, but biblical monotheism differs from polytheistic paganism not only quantitatively in the number of gods professed but also qualitatively in its understanding of God as absolutely above nature and in complete mastery of it. The world and its individual parts—stars, sun, earth, and sea—exist solely by God's will; they tremble before him and perform his bidding. The biblical conception of God is nonmythological: God was not born, does not beget other divinities, and is independent of matter or other beings. He cannot be coerced by magic, is omnipotent, and depends on no sacrificial cult to sustain his being. At the same time he enters into a direct, personal relationship with his creatures, is concerned with their plight, and even elects individuals or groups for special purposes. This idea of God is different from philosophical monotheism; it is an original religious intuition rather than the result of intellectual speculation, although the precise moment in the history of Israel at which it came into full blossom is difficult to determine. The rabbis of the Talmudic period ascribed the monotheistic revolution to Abraham. Critical scholarship associated the emergence of monotheism with the literary prophets, but some modern scholars accept the biblical account according to which the monotheistic intuition was arrived at by Moses (cf. Ex. 20.1–6), possibly in the experience of the burning bush, which was not only a prophetic calling but a revelation of the divine name (Ex. 3.14). Whereas in the Pentateuch God demands obedience to a law that is at once ritual and moral; that is, without sharp distinction between the two, prophetic monotheism becomes emphatically moral and at times antiritualistic. The biblical historians do not recognize a gradual evolution of ethical monotheism, but rather a gradual falling away from Israel's pristine faith. Even in the days of Moses there was occasional backsliding, as when the *golden calf was manufactured to serve as a material symbol of God. After the conquest of Canaan, the influence of the local population and its religious cults made itself felt. The Book of Judges describes alternate cycles of faith and faithlessness. The sporadic worship of Baal was followed by a resurgence of monotheism in the time of Saul, David, and Solomon, but *syncretism and *idolatry held sway again from then until the Babylonian exile. After the exile, idolatry diminished among Jews, and Ezra and his successors, unlike the prophets, no longer found it necessary to inveigh against it. Subsequently, the main stages in the history of Jewish monotheism were the struggle of the rabbis against the dualistic tendencies of *gnosticism and the attempts of the medieval philosophers to formulate a monotheism free from the taint of *anthropomorphism. All formulations of the Jewish *creed stressed monotheism, which was the second of Maimonides' *Thirteen Principles of Faith. Medieval apologists frequently contrasted the pure and uncompromising monotheism of Judaism with what seemed to them the polytheism implicit in the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. The kabbalistic doctrine of God (see SEFIROT) has been criticized by its opponents as a departure from strict Jewish monotheism, but the kabbalists held that their mystical theology, which described the dynamic unity of the Godhead in symbolic language, was perfectly monotheistic. Under the influence of Enlightenment rationalism, which emphasized the moral aspects of religion to the neglect of its ritual and irrational aspects, Jewish modernists often described their religion as "ethical monotheism" (see SHEMA').

She was closely involved with the activities of the Women's Industrial Council and the National Council of Women and served as president of both the West Central Jewish Club and the West Central Jewish Day Settlement. With Claude Montefiore, she was a founder of the Union of Liberal and Progressive Synagogues of Great Britain, the more reformed branch of British non-Orthodox Judaism, and was the first chair of its main synagogue, the Liberal Jewish Synagogue of St. John's Wood, London. *Schechter to England as his private tutor. He founded, funded, and edited, together with Israel Abrahams, the scholarly journal the Jewish Quarterly Review. He also founded the Jewish Religious Union, which brought radical Reform to England. From 1926 to 1938 he headed the World Union for Progressive Judaism. He wrote many works on Jewish and Christian topics and was one of the first Jewish scholars to write sympathetically of Jesus and the New Testament, notably in his Synoptic Gospels (2 vols. [1909]), a commentary on the New Testament utilizing Jewish sources, and Judaism and St. Paul (1914). Together with Herbert Loewe, he published A Rabbinic Theology (1938), in which the two men, in addition to presenting a systematized account of rabbinic teachers, conducted an Orthodox-Reform dialogue on the subject matter. Montefiore's emphasis on the universalism of Judaism led him to oppose Zionism as a narrow nationalist particularism. He argued for a progressive Judaism that was ethically compatible with other world religions and collaborated with the Catholic thinker Baron Friedrich von Hügel.

MONTH. See CALENDAR.

MOON. According to Genesis 1.16, the moon was the "lesser light," created together with the *sun on the fourth day of Creation. The moon was regarded throughout the Middle East as a deity; for example, in Ur and Haran, where Abraham spent his early years. Moon worship was, however, strictly forbidden to the Israelites (Dt. 4.19, 17.3). Nevertheless under Assyrian influence, King Manasseh of Judah introduced the moon cult (2 Kgs. 21.3–5), but the altars he built were destroyed by Josiah (2 Kgs. 23.12). In popular belief, the moon was thought to influence fertility, and women wore moon-shaped pendants (Is. 3.18); the moon was also seen as a symbol of permanence (Ps. 72.7). The lunar cycle formed the basis of the monthly *calendar reckoning, and the proclamation of the new moon (see RO'SH HODESH) was a prerogative of the *Sanhedrin. Two major festivals, Pesah and Sukkot, begin on the night of the full moon. The monthly ceremony of blessing the moon (*Qiddush Levanah) generally takes place between the third and fifteenth day of each month when the light of the moon is regarded as being at its strongest. In superstitious beliefs, an eclipse of the moon was regarded as a bad omen (Suk. 29a), and it was believed that the waning and waxing of the moon could affect the human mind, while the period of a waxing moon was deemed auspicious for marriages.

MORAIS, SABATO (1823–1897), American rabbi and communal leader. Born in Leghorn, Italy, Morais served as director of the orphans' school of the Spanish and Portuguese congregation in London. Following five years of service in England, he became the spiritual leader of Congregation Mikveh Israel in Philadelphia in 1851, succeeding Isaac Leiser. Morais served Mikveh Israel for forty-seven years until his death.

He was an eloquent spokesman for American Orthodoxy, well-known for his conciliatory spirit; for example, in unifying Sephardim and Ashkenazim. He was the founding president of the *Jewish Theological Seminary of America (1887–1897) and wrote numerous articles on various aspects of Jewish life and culture. He was a noted Hebraist and biblical scholar. He wrote Italian Hebrew Literature (New York, 1926; repr., 1970).

MORDECAI (Heb. Mordekhai), a descendant of a Benjamite family of Babylonian exiles who saved Persian Jewry from the anti-Jewish scheme of *Haman, the vizier of King Ahasuerus, when he bid Queen *Esther, his daughter by adoption, to intercede with the king. According to the Book of Esther, Mordecai became viceroy of Persia and conferred considerable benefits upon his brethren. To mark the celebration of the victory of the Jews over their enemies, Mordecai sent letters to all of the Jewish communities to celebrate annually on 13 and 14 Adar, which is the holiday of Purim. Talmudic aggadah identified Mordecai with the prophet Malachi (Meg. 10b).

MORDEKHAI BEN HILLEL (d.1298), German rabbi and halakhist; student of R. Me'ir ben Barukh of Rothenburg. He is known chiefly for his Sefer ha-Mordekhai, a digest of the halakhic teachings of his master and of the Ashkenazi sages of earlier generations based loosely upon Halakhot by R. Yitshaq Alfasi. Sefer ha-Mordekhai underwent significant alteration at the hands of students and copyists and exists in two primary recensions, the Rhenish and the Austrian, based on the dominant traditions in each. The book was widely quoted by subsequent authorities, both Sephardi and Ashkenazi. It was printed in the very first edition of the Talmud (Soncino, 1483–1484) and also appeared separately (Riva di Trento, 1559–1560).

MOREDET (מורדת; rebellious wife), a wife who persistently refuses to cohabit with her husband. She may be divorced by her husband after a period of twelve months and also forfeits her ketubbah. The twelve-month period is designated by the Talmud as a “cooling off” period aimed at allowing the wife to reconsider her “rebelliousness” in case it was prompted by sudden anger which she later regrets (Ket. 63b). Under early Talmudic law, there were certain procedural distinctions between a wife who refused to engage in sexual relations with her husband as a result of anger and one who claimed that her husband was physically repulsive to her. In later times, however, the halakhah governing both types of moredet followed the same procedure; that is, a twelve-month mandatory waiting period and divorce without a ketubbah (Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 77.2). Though it was Maimonides' view that, in the case of physical repulsiveness, pressure ought to be applied to the husband to divorce his wife, following the mandatory twelve-month period, on the grounds that “she is not like a captive to have to submit to intercourse with a man whose physical presence she finds unbearable” (Law of Marriage 14.18), this was not accepted by the majority of authorities (Rema', Even ha-'Ezer 77.2–3).

MORENU (מורנו; our teacher), title originally bestowed in Germany (14th cent.) upon exceptionally learned men and upon Torah scholars on their wedding day. Morenu may originally have applied to those learned in the laws of marriage and divorce. Some communities required knowledge of the entire Talmud and Shulhan 'Arukh before one could be granted the title. In some communities, the title could be revoked if the recipient proved unworthy by his conduct. In more recent times in eastern Europe, the title was used broadly as an honorific, though in Germany it was bestowed only by a rabbi upon exceptionally learned and pious laymen.

MORIAH, a land described in Genesis 22.2 as a mountainous area, a three-day journey from Beersheba, where Abraham was commanded to sacrifice his son Isaac. According to later Jewish tradition, Moriah was MORNING. Despite the fact that in the Bible the morning actually begins at sunrise (cf. Jgs. 9.33, "And it shall be in the morning when the sun rises"), halakhically, morning is considered to begin with the appearance of the morning star, even though the sun has not yet risen. This dawn is referred to as "the morning of the night" (Yoma' 20b); that is, the sign of morning that marks the end of the night. There is a difference of opinion in the Talmud as to when morning ends. According to the majority opinion it continues until midday, but R. Yoḥanan ben Zakk'ai holds that it extends only to the end of the fourth hour—the hour in this case being a twelfth part of the period of daylight (Ber. 26b–27a) and, hence, variable with the seasons. The obligatory morning reading, or the Shema', can be carried out from the beginning of daylight until a quarter of the day, that is, a quarter of the hours of daylight, depending on the season of the year. MOSCATO, YEHUDAH (c.1530–1593), Italian rabbinical authority and preacher. Born in Osimo, he had to leave when the Jews were expelled in 1569 and went to Mantua, where he became chief rabbi. He was steeped in classical, medieval, and Renaissance literature and had a fine Hebrew style. His major works were Qol Yehudah (Venice, 1594), a commentary on Yehudah ha-Levi's Kuzari, and a sermonic collection, Nefutsot Yehudah (Venice, 1589). Impressed by classical rhetoric, he looked for similar features in biblical and rabbinic sources. An excellent writer and preacher, he modeled himself on Greek and Roman philosophers such as Plato and Seneca. In his sermon on music, for example, Moscato demonstrates how the fundamental concepts of Renaissance music were based on the terms and formulas found in the Book of Psalms. He drew on his extensive knowledge of Torah, Philo, and Kabbalah in order to identify ethical ideas common to different cultures. He was fond of syncretistic etymology, and he saw Hebrew as the original language of the human race, a natural bridge between civilizations.

MOSER. See DENUNCIATION.

MOSES (Heb. Mosheh), founder and leader of the Israelite nation. The Bible portrays Moses as the greatest of all prophets (a belief formulated in Maimonides' *Thirteen Principles of Faith), who, alone among men, knew God "face to face" (Ex. 33.11) and whom God chose to be the mediator of his revelation on Mount Sinai and the leader who would transform a horde of slaves into a potential "kingdom of priests" and "a treasured people" (Ex. 19.5–6). Moses' life, from birth to death, is depicted as an integral part of the divine design of redemption. According to the biblical account, the future liberator of Israel, son of Amram and Jochebed of the tribe of Levi, was born at the height of the Egyptian persecution (probably in the 13th cent. BCE), when Hebrew male infants were drowned at birth. After a period of concealment, Jochebed placed Moses in a basket among the Nile reeds, entrusting his life to providence, a well-known example of the widespread motif of the abandoned hero. Moses was rescued by Pharaoh's own daughter and brought up in the royal palace. But heredity triumphed over environment; when seeing an Egyptian taskmaster mistreat a Hebrew, Moses slew the Egyptian.

The next day he beheld an Israelite smiting a fellow Israelite. When he intervened, his Hebrew brother betrayed him, and he had to flee to Midian, where he married Zipporah, the daughter of *Jethro, priest of Midian (Ex. 2). At the age of eighty, he was vouchsafed a theophany in the form of a *burning bush that was not consumed, and in which the God of his fathers laid upon him the mission to lead his people out of Egypt. In vain Moses attempted to resist the call (Ex. 3), but finally accepting the divine charge, he appeared, together with his brother Aaron, before Pharaoh and demanded in the Lord's name, "Let my people go!" Ten plagues (see PLAGUES OF EGYPT) reinforced his demand; the last plague, the slaying of the Egyptian firstborn, brought the Hebrews freedom (Ex. 7–11). The urgency with which the Israelites left Egypt was matched by the haste with which Pharaoh sought to recapture his erstwhile bondmen, whom he overtook at the shore of the Sea of Reeds, misnamed the Red Sea. There an event occurred that left an indelible mark on Jewish tradition: the Israelites crossed dry-shod, while the pursuing Egyptians were drowned (Ex. 14–15). The *Exodus was the beginning of the journey that was to lead the Israelites to the Promised Land. The next major event was the giving of the Torah at Mount *Sinai. There the *Ten Commandments, and other legislation, were promulgated, and Moses bound the people in a solemn covenant to the Lord (Ex. 19–24). He also built the first national sanctuary, the *Tabernacle or Tent of Meeting, which was to serve as the visible symbol of the invisible God's presence in their midst (Ex. 25ff.). The unique theophany at Mount Sinai was followed by the anticlimactic sin of the *golden calf. In a burst of anger, Moses shattered the *tablets of the Law but subsequently interceded with God, obtained his pardon for the people, and carved the tablets anew (Ex. 32–34). The camp, however, continued to simmer with rebellion. The tragic climax came when ten of the twelve spies sent to reconnoiter the Promised Land brought back a discouraging report, saying that the Israelites would be unable to defeat the Canaanites (Nm. 13–14). Moses led Israel for forty years through the wilderness, until the elder generation died and a new generation had grown up. After annexing the lands of Sihon and Og in Transjordan, Moses' work drew to its close (Nm. 21). The Lord forbade him to cross the Jordan in punishment for an act of disobedience (Nm. 20.1–13). In three valedictory addresses, delivered on the Plains of Moab, Moses reviewed the story of the Exodus and recapitulated the terms and the laws of the covenant. Then, having exhorted and blessed his people (see MOSES, SONG OF), he died on Mount Nebo in the land of Moab, "but no one knows his burial place to this day" (Dt. 34.6) so that no cult could ever become attached to his person. The ag-gadah embellished the biography of Moses more than that of any other biblical personage. But through all the variegated and often contradictory legends runs the assumption that in spite of his unique career as the faithful "servant of God," Moses always remained a mortal, fallible human being. In modern times the historicity of Moses—and the Exodus tradition as a whole—has been challenged; but many scholars agree that some of the tribes were in fact enslaved in Egypt and freed, that the Israelite religion was founded in law by a solemn covenant, and that a heroic figure like Moses played a central role in these events. However, no critical hypothesis can in any way affect the towering image of Moses as it has developed in biblical, rabbinic, and kabbalistic tradition. Both a historical personality and a spiritual symbol, Moses represents the passionate and self-sacrificing leader, liberator, intercessor, lawgiver, teacher (Mosheh Rabbenu [Moses Our Master]), "faithful shepherd," founder of Judaism, and prophet of monotheism. Tradition attributes to him the authorship of the entire Torah and regards him as the fountainhead of the oral law. Eschatological speculation also ascribed to him a role in the future, messianic redemption.

MOSES, ASSUMPTION OF. See ASSUMPTION OF MOSES.

MOSES, BLESSING OF, the poetic blessing uttered by *Moses in bidding farewell to the children of Israel (Dt. 33). Moses viewed Israel's history from the perspective of later times, after the people had settled in the Promised Land. The core of the poem is the blessings of the individual tribes, in which Moses describes the lives of the tribes in their territories, focusing primarily on the resources and abundance they enjoy and their security and military prowess (Dt. 33. 6–25). Framing this core are an exordium and a coda (Dt. 33.2–5 and 26–29, respectively) that speak of the people as a whole, placing their security and prosperity in the broader context of God's benefactions to Israel. Moses' blessing has little in common with the rest of Deuteronomy, and critical scholars suggest that it was probably composed independently of Deuteronomy. Its psalmic style indicates that it originally had a liturgical function and was perhaps recited at a festival at which all the tribes, or their representatives, gathered. From its language and content, it seems to have been composed sometime between Israel's settlement in the Promised Land, in approximately 1200 BCE, and the exile of the northern tribes in 721 BCE. It would have been incorporated into Deuteronomy because it was attributed to Moses and, by looking back on a successful conquest of the Promised Land, because it foretells the conquest. As one of the last two chapters in the Torah, the blessing is read in the synagogue on *Simḥat Torah.

MOSES, SEAT OF. In Matthew 23.2 Jesus refers to the scribes and Pharisees as "sitting in the seat of Moses"; a further reference to the seat of Moses is found in the Pesiḳta' de-Rav Kahana' 12, quoted in the name of the fourth-century R. Aḥa'. Opinions differed as to the significance of the term—some scholars maintained that the reference was to a place of honor; others, that it was the stand on which the Torah scroll was placed during the service. Examples of seats designated for the most distinguished elder and placed close to the ark have been discovered in ancient synagogues in Dura-Europos, Hammath (near Tiberias), and Chorazin. A bimah* referred to as "the seat of Moses" was found in the synagogue in K'ai-feng, China, and described as "a large elevated seat in the middle of the synagogue, from which the Torah is read every Sabbath day."

MOSES, SONG OF, poem in Deuteronomy 32.1–43, known in Hebrew as Ha'azinu (Give Ear) from its opening word. The poem describes the history of God's relations with Israel, emphasizing God's kindness and faithfulness, Israel's betrayal of him after settling in the Promised Land by worshiping other deities, and his decision to send an enemy to punish Israel but not to obliterate her, lest the enemy infer that its own gods, and not God (YHVH), gave it victory. The poem concludes by inviting listeners to celebrate God's deliverance of Israel and his punishment of the enemy. According to Deuter- onomy 31.16–30, this poem was to be memorized by the people in order to serve as a “witness,” warning Israel in advance and then attesting to God’s justice and Israel’s guilt when punishment came. Critical scholarship considers the poem post-Mosaic since it refers to the settlement in the Promised Land and Israel’s apostasy as past events, is addressed to the guilty generation, and describes the ultimate punishment of the enemy as imminent. Language and content suggest that the poem was composed prior to the fall of the northern kingdom of Israel, in approximately 721 BCE, perhaps as early as the period of the judges (c.1200–1020) or shortly thereafter. It was probably composed after a particular invasion to offer an explanation and hope of deliverance. It could have been incorporated into Deuteronomy because it explained the disaster in theologically meaningful terms. In Second Temple times, the Levites read parts of the poem in the Temple while the additional sacrificial offering (musaf) was being made on the Sabbath. Nowadays, it is read on the Sabbath between Ro’sh ha-Shanah and Yom Kippur. In the Sephardi liturgy, it is recited during the morning service on 9 Av, the anniversary of the destruction of both Temples.

MOSES, SONS OF, legendary Jewish tribe, having their own independent kingdom in some faraway country. According to the ninth century traveler *Eldad ha-Dani, they lived beyond the river *Sambatyon. The legend of the sons of Moses is similar to that of the ten lost tribes (see TRIBES OF ISRAEL).

MOSHEH BEN HANOKH (died c.965), Spanish rabbi. He was one of the four rabbis who, according to a famous story (see FOUR CAPTIVES), were captured by pirates in the Mediterranean and sold to foreign lands, where they spread rabbinic learning. Mosheh brought Talmudic knowledge to Spain, where he founded a yeshivah. Separating truth from legend, it appears that Mosheh reached Spain after 950 and established a yeshivah in Cordova. His authority was regarded as no less than that of the Babylonian ge’onim, and with his arrival the rabbis of Spain curtailed their dependence on the Babylonian academies. Many of Mosheh’s responsa have survived. He was the father of *Hanokh ben Mosheh.

MOSHEH BEN YA’AQOV OF COUCY (13th cent.), codifier and preacher. He is best known for his code Sefer Mitsvot Gadol, popularly known by its acronym as Semag; arranged according to the 613 commandments, it presents the Jewish law applicable to each of them. Maimonides’ Mishneh Torah served as the major source for the work, but Mosheh of Coucy added and gave precedence to his native French and German Jewish traditions. Semag achieved wide popularity and was one of the first Hebrew incunabula (it was published before 1480). As an itinerant preacher, Mosheh of Coucy traveled from France to Spain to urge Spanish Jewry to repent. Lax sexual morality in Spain and the abandonment of Torah study and daily ritual practices prompted his mission. In 1240 he participated in the Disputation of *Paris.

MOSHEH BEN YEHOSHUA OF NARBONNE (died 1362), philosopher. He was born in Perpignan, where he was educated in Bible, rabbinic literature, medicine, and philosophy. In 1344 he moved to Spain and lived in several cities, dying in Soria. An accomplished physician and philosopher, he was the author of over twenty works, including a medical treatise (Orah Hayyim) as well as numerous commentaries on Arabic and Jewish philosophy, most notably his commentary on Maimonides’ Moreh Nevukhim (Vienna, 1852; repr. Jerusalem, 1961) and three works that detail his own opinions on the philosophic questions of his day: Iggeret Shi’ur Qomah, Ma’amar ha-Behirah, and Pirquei Mosheh. He knew Arabic and probably Latin as well. His writings combine philosophy, astrology, and Kabbalah.

MOSHEH BEN YOSEF HA-LEVI (fl. 13th cent.), philosopher. His principal work, Ma’amar Elohi, was originally written in Arabic in Seville. According to Neubauer (Catalogue of Hebrew Manuscripts in the Bodleian Library, no. 1324.5), he relied exclusively on Islamic philosophers such as al-Farabi and Averroës. He was well regarded by several Spanish-Jewish philosophers, including Yits’haq Abravanel, Hasda’i ben Abraham Crescas, and Yosef Albo, all of whom cite him. His treatise deals with the motion of the outermost sphere and the First Cause, which Mosheh contends is the active intellect. Three manuscripts of his work are known to exist, one of which is accompanied by a commentary that is often abusive of his opinions.

MOSHEH DE LEÓN (c.1240–1305), the leading kabbalist in Spain in the last decades of the thirteenth century and the principal author of the most important work of the *Kabbalah, the *Zohar. He was born in León, Castile, and spent many years in other communities in Castile, among them Guadalajara, Avila, Valladolid and Arevalo, where he died. During his travels he met adherents of the various kabbalistic schools of the time. He was familiar with the teachings of the Gerona school, Avraham ben Shemu'el Abulafia, and the Kohen brothers (see KABBALAH; YITSHAQ BEN YA'AQOV OF CASTILE). Some of the great kabbalists of the day were his personal friends, among them R. Yosef ben Avraham *Gikatilla, Yosef ben Todros *Abulafia, and Yitshaq ibn Sahulah. He was familiar with the teachings of Maimonides, and the Guide of the Perplexed was one of his sources of inspiration.

Mosheh de León wrote many kabbalistic treatises in Hebrew. The exact sequence of the writing of the Hebrew works, and their chronological and ideological relationship to the Zohar (which was written in Aramaic), has been presented in different ways by the modern scholars Gershom Scholem, Isaiah Tishby, and Alexander Altmann. According to Scholem, almost all the Hebrew works were written after the completion of the Zohar, which he dated to c.1291, and were intended to publicize the teachings of the Zohar. Tishby believed that Mosheh de León continued to write portions of the Zohar until his death and that the Hebrew works were written parallel to the Zohar. Altmann pointed out that there is evidence that some of the Hebrew works were written before the main part of the Zohar.

The most important of his Hebrew works are Ha-Nefesh ha-Hakhamah, concerning the nature of the soul; Sefer ha-Rimmon, a kabbalistic presentation of the reasons for the commandments; Maskiyyot Kesef, commentary on the prayers; Sheqel ha-Qodesh, on the *sefirot; at least two commentaries on the ten sefirot; and collections of responsa on kabbalistic matters. All these works use terminology and ideas very close to those of the Zohar, and sometimes whole sentences and paragraphs seem to be Hebrew versions of passages in the Zohar.

Concerning the nature of his work, Mosheh de León insisted that the Zohar sections which he published were copied from an old manuscript which reached him from Erets Yisra'el; he offered to show this manuscript to R. Yitshaq ben Shemu'el of Acre, but he died before this could be done. His widow and daughter claimed that there was no such manuscript, and that Mosheh wrote "from his head." No evidence of the existence of a manuscript of the Zohar before Mosheh de León's has been found, and he should be regarded as an original, visionary and creative mystic.

MOSHEH HA-DARSHAN (11th cent.), teacher and scholar of aggadic midrash; from Narbonne, France. He is quoted by Natan ben Yehi'el of Rome (who was his student) in his 'Arukh and by Rashi. Medieval Midrashic works based on Mosheh ha-Darshan's interpretations or those of his school include: Genesis Rabbati, Numbers Rabbah (Part 1, Ba-Midbar and Naso), and Midrash Aggadah (edited by Solomon Buber [1894]). Steven Ballaban (Ph.D. dissertation, Hebrew Union College, 1995) suggests that he originally came from Nisibis in Persia, bringing to the West early traditions that were still circulating in the East.

MOSHEH HALFON HA-KOHEN (1874–1949), leading rabbinical authority in Djerba, an island off the coast of Tunisia with an ancient Jewish community. He served as rabbi and from 1935 to 1949 headed the Djerba beit din. He issued responsa on current questions and issued taqqanot for his community. Author of twenty-eight works, some published, some still in manuscript, he was particularly involved in educational programs, preparing curricula for rabbinical teachers, homiletic criteria, and a reader for Talmud study. He insisted on the comprehensive study of the Talmud and the aggadah.

MOSHEH HAYYIM EFRAYIM OF SUDYLKOW (c.1748–1788), Hasidic author. Rabbi Efrayim, as he is called, was the elder son of Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer *Ba'al Shem Tov's daughter *Odel. Almost nothing is known of his life. He was rabbi of Sudyolkow and is known for his book Degel Mahaneh Efrayim (Korzec [Korets], 1810). Some have sought in this work a direct version of the Ba'al Shem Tov's teachings, that is, one relatively uninfluenced by either *Ya'aqov Yosef ha-Kohen of Polonoye or *Dov Ber of Mezhibezh, but it is difficult to determine whether this is the case. Rabbi Efrayim devoted much attention to key themes of his grandfather's thought: the uplifting of sparks, the raising up of distracting thoughts, and the study of Torah for the sake of God. His book also contains important quotations from other early figures of Hasidism. A brief dream diary is appended to the work.

MOSHEH LEIB OF SASOV (1745–1807), Hasidic master. Although considered a disciple of *Dov Ber of Mezhibezh and *Elimelekh of Lyzhansk, his principal teacher was Shemu'el Shmelke Horowitz of Nikolsburg, and his leading disciples were Menaḥem Mendel of Kosov and Tsevi Hirsh of Zhidachov. He also had a profound influence on the young *Ya'akov Yitsḥaq of Przysucha. Several collections of Moshe Leib's teachings were published posthumously and include both halakhic and Hasidic subjects. As a Hasidic teacher, his approach tended toward the early Hasidic extreme of viewing the material world as not ultimately real. Nevertheless, in many tales told concerning him, an active, compassionate approach toward relieving the sufferings of others predominates. His teachings appear in Hiddushei ha-Ramal (Brooklyn, N.Y., 1991).

MOTHER (Heb. em; Aram. imma). Although legally "the *father takes precedence over the mother in all matters" (Ker. 28a), both the Bible and Talmud insist with unvarying emphasis upon the equal rights of both *parents in the moral and ethical sphere. The Fifth Commandment, which enjoins the duty of honoring one's parents, mentions the father before the mother; in Leviticus 19.3, which enjoins fear (or reverence) for one's parents, the mother is mentioned before the father. This difference in phraseology forms the basis for the rabbinic statement that since God knows that the natural tendency of a child is to honor the mother more than the father and fear the father more than the mother, the order in each case is reversed in order to teach the duty of equal reverence and honor to both parents (Qid. 30b–31a). Similarly, the dire punishment for smiting or cursing parents specifically mentions both father and mother (Ex. 21.15–17). The four mothers, or *matriarchs (Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel, and Leah), rank equally in Jewish sentiment with the three patriarchs (Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob). In valid marriages the child is accorded the status of his father (for example, the son of a priest and an Israelite mother is a priest; the son of an Israelite father and the daughter of a priest is an Israelite [Qid. 3.12]), but with regard to mixed marriages, the child receives the status of the mother (the son of a non-Jewish father and a Jewish mother is considered Jewish). Only the woman bearing the child is regarded as the mother, since *adoption has no validity in Jewish law. The Talmud contains many stories of the extreme respect paid by the rabbis to their mothers; it is related of one rabbi that "when he heard his mother's footsteps, he used to remark, 'I stand up before the divine presence'" (Qid. 31b), and several medieval rabbis declared that their best teachers had been their mothers. Throughout Jewish history, the mother has symbolized home and *family life, which centered around her and which, to a great extent, was regarded as her responsibility. MOUNT OF OLIVES, mount east of Jerusalem and overlooking the city. The Kidron Valley separates it from the Temple mount. In Second Temple times, the *red heifer was burned on its crest (Mid. 2.6) and a bridge connected it to the Temple. It was regarded as holy by both Jews and Christians, based on the prophecy in Zechariah 14.3–4. On it was lit the first of the chain of beacons that brought the official confirmation of the sighting of the new moon to the Diaspora (see RO'SH HODESH; R. ha-Sh. 2.4). In the tenth century, the hill (or part of it) was in Jewish possession and was the site of pilgrimages and prayers. From the hill, the Jews could see into the Temple area, although they were not allowed access to it. On *Hosha'na' Rabbah, seven festive circuits were made round the Mount of Olives. By the Second Temple period, the Mount of Olives was a Jewish burial place; from the Middle Ages onward, it became a major Jewish cemetery. This was linked to the tradition that at the end of days the Messiah would appear on the Mount of Olives, and there Elijah would blow the trumpet heralding the resurrection of the dead; while all other bodies will have to roll from their burial place, those on the Mount of Olives would merely have to arise. Special piyyutim were composed for recitation upon ascending the Mount of Olives.

MOURNING (Heb. avelut). Mourning rites are undertaken in times of both individual loss and national calamity (Jos. 7.6). The first mention of mourning in the Bible is that of Abraham weeping for his wife Sarah (Gn. 23.2). The injunction to Ezekiel after losing his wife bidding him to refrain from excessive lamentation, "you shall not mourn or weep nor shall your tears run down. Sigh, but not aloud; make no mourning for the dead. Bind on your turban, and put your shoes on your feet; do not cover your lips, nor eat the bread of mourners" (Ez. 24.16–17), is the basis for the rites of mourning. The Bible mentions many other such rites, some approvingly, such as rending one's garments (still symbolically observed), wearing sackcloth, and placing earth or ashes upon the head; and others negatively, such as cutting one's flesh or making oneself bald by tearing out one's hair. It was customary in Talmudic times to hire professional mourners to lament and wail (Jer. 9.16ff.). The Bible admonishes mourners against excessive grief, particularly that involving bodily affliction. Various periods for observing mourning are mentioned in the Bible, from thirty days (for Moses, Dt. 34.8) to seven (for Saul, 1 Sm. 31.13). The Egyptians devoted seventy days of mourning to Jacob, who was also mourned for seven more days at the threshing floor of Atad (Gn. 50.3, 10).

Mourning rites are undertaken for immediate relatives, that is, one's father, mother, son, daughter, brother, sister, or spouse. These are the relatives on whose behalf a priest is obliged to defile himself in mourning (Lv. 21.2–3). The biblical obligation to mourn is derived from the remarks of Aaron (Maimonides on Lv. 10.3), but it extends only to the onen, that is, to the mourner on the day of death and burial of a relative (see ANINUT). Upon returning from the *burial, the first food is provided for the mourner by others (Se'udat Havra'ah; see SE'UDAH). The rabbis determined the period of mourning based on the different periods mentioned in the Bible, each suggesting a lesser degree of mourning: "Three days for weeping, seven days for eulogy, thirty days for pressing garments and haircutting" (Mo'ed Q. 27b). The general rabbinic attitude toward mourning is reflected in the statement "it is forbidden to overstress mourning for the departed" (Mo'ed Q. 27b), and the Talmud rules that "the law in matters pertaining to mourning is decided in accordance with the more lenient opinion" (Mo'ed Q. 26b). MOVABLE PROPERTY. Because of a debtor's inability to conceal land from a creditor, only land was considered suitable to stand as security for debt. Thus, the older sources classify immovable property as nekhasim she-yesh lahem aharayut (property that is a security), and movable property as nekhasim she-ein lahem aharayut (property that is not a security). In time, a more general classification was adapted, which distinguished between mitaltelim (movables) and qarqa' (land). Movable property was further subclassified as either kelim (vessels; utensils, intended for repeated use) or perot (fruits; consumables).

Property that is physically movable but is on or under the surface of the ground in its natural state, such as rocks and minerals, is classified as land rather than as movable property. This classification applies also to fruits and vegetation, but there remains a difference of opinion as to when the attachment of produce to the soil may be deemed severed. One opinion is that its classification as land holds only so long as the produce has not yet ripened sufficiently to be fit for harvesting, while other authorities have ruled that all unharvested produce, so long as it remains physically attached to its source of growth, remains classified as land; the latter position is based on the principle kol ha-mehubbar le-qarqa' ke-qarqa', all that is connected to qarqa' is deemed qarqa'.

MUELHAUSEN, YOM TOV LIPMANN (15th cent.), Bohemian rabbi, philosopher, kabbalist, and theologian. Active in various communities including Erfurt and Kraków, he served as head of the rabbinical court in Prague. During his lifetime, that city became a center of the revival of interest in the philosophy of Maimonides, a revival sparked by the arrival of exiles from Provence in the wake of the persecutions of 1348 and 1349 and by the general intellectual ferment surrounding the Hussite rebellion in Bohemia. Muelhausen criticized those rabbis who ignored Maimonides' philosophical writings. He believed that philosophy deserved an honored place in rabbinic study and held the opinion that Maimonides was, in fact, a kabbalist who expressed his mystical ideas through philosophic rhetoric. A noted theological disputant, Muelhausen wrote Sefer ha-Nitsahon (Amsterdam, 1701), a work designed to offer its reader the tools to defend Jewish belief against the attacks of Christian critics. Among his halakhic writings is Tiqqun Sefer Torah, on the laws of the scribe and the Torah scroll.

MUHAMMAD (570–632), founder of *Islam; he grew up in Mecca and was familiar with both Jews and Christians, by whose traditions and lore he was considerably influenced. At first Muhammad had no intention of establishing a new religion. Considering himself the messenger and prophet of God (Allah) to the Arabs, he wished to convert his people to monotheism and to warn them of God's wrath on the Day of Judgment. He believed his revelations to be identical with those given by earlier prophets to Jews and Christians and was therefore disappointed when they rejected his claims. He consequently accused them of intentionally deleting predictions of his advent from the Bible. Rejected at first by his own people, he attempted to win the approval of the large Jewish community, especially that of Medina. In 622, after failing to gain the support of the Meccans, he made his famous flight (Hijrah) to Medina and proclaimed Islam as a new faith, leaning heavily on Judaism for its formulation. However, embittered by the refusal of the Jews to recognize him, he cruelly attacked several Jewish tribes, killing the men and enslaving the women and children in 625. Nevertheless, Muhammad legislated that Jews, like Christians, should not be forced to embrace Islam, but like other "Peoples of the Book," they should be permitted to practice their religion while suffering certain ignominies. MUKAMMIS, DAVID IBN MARWAN (9th–10th cent.), a Babylonian philosopher also known as David ha-Bavli. He was one of the first thinkers to introduce the philosophy of the Arab Kalam school into Jewish thought. His 'Esrin Peraqim (translated into English by Sarah Stroumsa [Leiden, 1989]) deals primarily with proofs for the existence of God, clearly following the Kalam doctrine of divine attributes, which stresses their difference from human attributes. God's attributes are identical with his being and cannot affect his unity. Two of Mukammis's tractates are polemic attacks on Christianity for maintaining that God has form, a view inconsistent with pure monotheism; another tractate (now lost) argued against Islam. Mukammis, who wrote in Arabic, cites Greek and Arab authorities. Excerpts from 'Esrin Peraqim were translated into Hebrew. They were quoted by Yehudah ben Barzillai al-Bargeloni in his commentary on Sefer Yetsirah. Mukammis is cited in works of medieval Jewish thinkers, including Bahya ben Yosef ibn Paquda, Moshheh ibn Ezra, and Ya'akov ben Shelomoh Sarfati, as well as some Karaites. According to Yaqub Qirqisani, Mukammis translated a commentary on Genesis called Book of Creation and a commentary on Ecclesiastes from Christian sources, to whom he was close during part of his life.

MUMAR (מוֹמָר; apostate), one who has forsaken Judaism for a different faith (also called meshummad). At the behest of Christian censors, mumar has often been substituted for the original meshummad to be found in the rabbinic texts. See also APOSTASY.

MUQTSEH (מוֹקְטֵשׁ; set aside, excluded), objects that cannot be moved on Sabbaths and festivals. The Talmud enumerates twelve categories of muqtseh, including objects whose nature renders them unfit for use on the Sabbath (for example, tools or money, because of their connection with secular work); objects not normally used at all (for example, broken crockery or pebbles); nolad, that is, objects that were not in existence or were inaccessible at the commencement of the Sabbath (for example, a newly laid egg or fruit fallen from a tree on the Sabbath); and any object that at the commencement of the Sabbath served as a base for an object forbidden on the Sabbath (for example, a tray upon which the Friday night candles were placed). Although it is forbidden to move a muqtseh object directly, it may be moved indirectly; for example, broken crockery may be cleared away by the use of a broom.

MUSAF (מוֹסַף; Supplement), the name for the additional Temple sacrifice prescribed for Sabbath and festivals (see BURNT OFFERING); in the liturgy it is the name for the additional Sabbath and festival (Ro'sh Hodesh, the Shalosh Regalim, Ro'sh ha-Shanah, Yom Kippur) service. It is usually recited immediately after Shaḥarit and consists of the *Amidah and various concluding prayers, including the *Qaddish. The Musaf 'Amidah is first recited silently by the congregation and then repeated aloud by the reader. It contains only one intermediate benediction referring to the special significance of the day, and special mention is made of the Musaf sacrifices in the Temple. On Ro'sh ha-Shanah, the Musaf 'Amidah contains three intermediate blessings: Malkuyot, Zikhronot, and Shofarot. Numerous and sometimes voluminous poetic embellishments (see PIYYUT) were written for the Musaf 'Amidah, but the recent tendency has been to reduce or discard them. On Yom Kippur, the *Avodah, a poetic description of the atonement service in the Temple, introduced by a detailed story of the creation of the world that demonstrates the cosmic dimension of the act of worship, is recited during the repetition of the Musaf 'Amidah. On the first day of Pesah a prayer for dew (*Tefillat Tal) is inserted into the Musaf 'Amidah; on Shemini 'Atseret a similar prayer for rain (*Tefillat Geshem) is inserted. In the Ashkenazi rite, the priests recite *Birkat ha-Kohanim (Nm. 6.22–24) before the repetition of the last blessing on festival days, whereas in Erets Yisra'el Birkat ha-Kohanim is said on all occasions when Musaf is recited. This emphasizes the way in which the Musaf service was designed to resemble the Temple service and its ideal of worship by offerings. The Musaf is subject to altered formulations or to omission in Reform congregations.

MUSAR LITERATURE. See ETHICS; MUSAR MOVEMENT.

MUSAR MOVEMENT, nineteenth-century movement founded by R. Yisra'el *Salanter in Lithuania to promote the deliberate pursuit of piety (musar means ethics) in the spirit of halakhah among the masses. The movement has been viewed historically as the answer of *Mitnagedim (opponents of Hasidism) to the various weaknesses in the social and religious fabric of Lithuanian Jewry (e.g., arid intellectualism and the gap between elitist Talmudic scholars and the masses) highlighted by the rise of Hasidism. It has also been understood as Salanter's attempt to fortify Jewish tradition in Lithuania from within, to aid it in withstanding the pervasive influence of the Haskalah (the Jewish Enlightenment movement).

Although the Musar movement never achieved the widespread popular appeal envisioned by Salanter, it did gain a foothold in the Lithuanian-style Talmudic academies, where it branched into several streams, each of which stressed some aspect of Salanter's teachings, thereby lending them new directions and interpretations. The most prominent schools are those of R. Simḥah Zissel of Kelme (1829–1898), R. Yosef Yoel Hurwitz of Novogradok (1848–1890), and R. Natan Tsevi Finkel of Slobodka (1849–1927). Later representatives include R. Yosef Bloch (1859–1930) of the Tels Yeshivah and R. Eliyyahu Dessler (1892–1954) of the Gateshead Kolel in England, who later served as a mashgiach ruhani (spiritual guide) of the Ponevezh Yeshivah in Israel.

Initially the Musar movement encountered sharp opposition from some of the traditional yeshivah leadership, who felt that the new emphasis on conscious spiritual exercise detracted from the primacy of Torah learning as the supreme religious activity. But by the beginning of the twentieth century, Musar had become a prevailing trend in the Lithuanian yeshivot.

To this day many yeshivah students regard themselves as disciples of this or that variant of Musar and conduct their lives in accordance with its teachings. The vitality of the movement continues more indirectly in the very structure of contemporary Lithuanian-style yeshivot, in their more or less universal acceptance of periodic Musar sessions as an integral part of the curriculum and in the general practice of appointing a mashgiach ruhani as an indispensable member of the educational staff, whose task is to offer siḥot Musar (Musar talks) and to supervise the spiritual development of each student, as distinct from his intellectual growth. The development and significance attached to what has come to be known as yeshivah ideology (yeshivishe hashkofah), the set of beliefs and attitudes most conducive to ensuring normative behavior, can also be attributed to the influence of Musar teachings. In addition to the living influence of the Musar movement within the confines of the yeshivot, at least a hundred books have been produced since the original writings of Salanter, which are usually transcripts of the discourses of subsequent generations of Musar leaders who have built upon his teachings.

MUSIC. From the earliest recorded references, it is apparent that music has played an integral role in Jewish religious life. Temple and synagogue worship, home-based rituals and life-cycle celebrations of all Jewish communities have used music in styles and genres reflecting the variety of cultures into which Jews have come in contact. The biblical identification of Jubal as "father of those who handle the harp and the pipe" (Gen. 4.21) provides the first clue that music was to play an important role in Jewish life. Biblical figures including Moses (Song of Moses, Ex. 15.1–18) and Deborah (Jgs. 5.2–31) express their gratitude for divine help through song; other biblical references note the use of music in celebrating military victory (e.g., Jgs. 11; 1 Sm. 18.6). Psalms extols God for a variety of blessings bestowed on the Israelite nation, and Psalm 150 exhorts "everything that has breath" to praise God using all manner of musical instruments. The first regular use of music in national religious life appears in the context of the *Temple in Jerusalem.

King David appointed the *Levites to preside over elaborate musical ceremonies surrounding the placement of the Ark of the Covenant in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 15.16–25). Later, when the Jerusalem Temple became the center of Israel's spiritual life, sacrificial rites were accompanied by the choral chanting of antiphonal and responsorial psalms and other passages, and a Temple orchestra of harps and lyres. (By the time of the Second Temple, a water-powered organ, trumpets, and flutes had been added). A minimum of twelve singers and twelve stringed instruments accompanied daily rites, while seemingly unlimited numbers of musicians enhanced the ritual on festive occasions; some four thousand singers and one hundred twenty trumpeters presided at the Temple's dedication (2 Chr. 5.12–13).

Following the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE, the rabbis imposed a national state of mourning, proscribing the use of instruments and attempting to forbid vocal music as well. Unable to enforce fully the latter ban, the rabbis did nevertheless successfully curtail Jewish musical expression: only perfunctory chants were permitted to accompany synagogue rites, and fully joyous musical displays were allowed only for weddings and for the dedication of synagogues and Torah scrolls.

Despite these limitations, evolving synagogue rites invited the creation of certain musical forms. The application of particular modes and patterned motives came to be known as nussah*, which, together with the public chanting of specified biblical books (cantillation; see ACCENTS; CANTORIAL MUSIC), defined the musical parameters of Jewish worship. At the same time, the aftermath of the Temple's destruction saw the dispersion of the Jewish people throughout the nations, and this brought Jewish ritual practice into contact with a vast repertoire of Jewish influences. As each community borrowed both consciously and subconsciously from its surrounding culture, Jewish music took on increasing diversity. The one unified musical tradition of the Jerusalem Temple yielded to hundreds of local variants.

Over time, three overarching ethnic traditions emerged within the Diaspora. Those Jews who remained in the Middle East experienced the least challenge to their existing customs. Surrounded by a similarly inclined Muslim community, the 'Adot ha-Mizrah exploited the improvisational possibilities of melodies influenced by Arabic maqamat (rhymed prose). The musical repertoire of the 'Adot ha-Mizrah focused on liturgical song and the chanting of quasi-liturgical poetry, and, honoring the prohibition against the use of instruments, they developed elaborate rhythmic accompaniments to Sabbath songs and life-cycle ceremonies.

Jews who made their way to the Iberian Peninsula brought with them the traditions of the Middle East, but those came under Western influence with the flowering of secular culture in Europe. The Spanish romancero dominated musical life and entered the repertoire of Sabbath table songs and synagogue chants, even over rabbinic objection. The expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492 saw a bifurcation of Sephardi musical traditions. Those whose exile took a more southern route (into the Balkan and Mediterranean countries) maintained the Eastern flavors of their forebears, favoring melismatic melodies over harmonic invention. Others, whose paths took them to Amsterdam and from there to England and South America, perpetuated a less ornate ritual tradition; their hymns and liturgical tunes combined the flowing melodies of their Eastern roots with the Western penchant for regular metrical patterns and harmonic accompaniment.

The first challenge to the notion that Jewish religious music must necessarily be limited to simple chants came from the Italian composer Salamone Rossi in the early seventeenth century. A court musician, Rossi was eager to exalt his God with all the musical expertise at his disposal. His friend R. Leone Modena, himself an amateur musician, issued a responsum in 1605 that permitted unaccompanied choral singing in the synagogue, and Rossi later published thirty-three settings of liturgical texts for combinations of three to eight voices. By the end of the seventeenth century, vocal and instrumental works by both Jewish and gentile composers were accepted ingredients in the celebration of synagogue dedications, the founding of fraternal societies, and the observance of special Sabbaths and festivals in Sephardi communities in Italy, France, and Amsterdam. In some cases, the regular performance of such works resulted in their assimilation into the popular liturgy, albeit in folklore form.

Between the eleventh and fifteenth centuries, the musical motives and styles of German plainsong provided the inspiration for Ashkenazi nussach and for the mi-Sinai* melodies that became an integral part of the musical culture of Jewish communities from central and eastern Europe. While many of these new traditions emulated the Western penchant for metrical melodies built of disjunct intervals, the hazzanic recitative and at least some of the newly popular melodies of these Ashkenazi communities retained the ornate, melismatic singing of the East. From the sixteenth to the eighteenth century, itinerant hazzanim carried this music throughout the region, often with boy sopranos and bass accompanists in tow, giving concerts and making themselves available to officiate at services on festivals and special Sabbaths. In eastern Europe, Hasidim stressed the role of music in prayer and other religious contexts. Many hasidic leaders created niggunim (see NIGGUN) for their followers to sing.

In the aftermath of political emancipation and the Enlightenment in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, French and German Jews were exposed to a variety of new musical forms. Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven provided new cultural standards, and the seemingly backward Eastern nuances of monophonic synagogue song (and the inability of Western music to accommodate them for harmonic purposes) were driven entirely from the musical vocabulary of new Reform congregations. Having declared most of rabbinic law irrelevant to modern times, the path was paved for cantors in modern temples to produce their own music, complete with the accompaniment of organs. Many cantors were musically untrained. Salomon Sulzer (1804–1890) provided the direction that Reform music needed. A talented musician with a traditional religious background, Sulzer served as cantor in the Stadttempel of Vienna from 1826; his Shir Tsiyyon (published in 1840 and 1866) contained musical settings for every text of the liturgical year, which were eagerly adopted by contemporary cantors. Compositions by Sulzer and his student, Louis Lewandowski, a choral conductor from Berlin, retain a significant role in Ashkenazi services to the present.

While not adopting the liberal reforms of their German coreligionists, composers from eastern Europe also began writing works for (male) choirs featuring virtuosic hazzanic performances. The turn of the century marked the golden age of hazzanut, in which gifted cantor-composers performed their own works, popularizing cantorial music outside the synagogue as well as within it. The wave of east European immigrants to North American shores in the period from 1880 to 1920 brought this new tradition with it, providing an alternative to the music of Reform and even gentile composers that had predominated in America since the German immigration of the mid-nineteenth century. Josef Rosenblatt, Gershon Sirota, and the Kushevsky brothers were among the many whose concertizing on both sides of the Atlantic brought renown to themselves and new opportunities for the music of their tradition.

The American synagogue underwent profound changes in the period following World War II. As the numbers of Orthodox congregations dwindled, the musical styles of the Reform and the Conservative movements gained prominence. Worshipers eager for a more active role in the prayer experience encouraged the creation of singable congregational melodies, and the somewhat exclusive role of the cantor and choir was diminished. This trend accelerated in the aftermath of the Six-Day War in 1967, with a strong identification with the music of Israel, in particular, and various new forms of Jewish music in general. The coincident attempt to attract younger worshipers to synagogues saw the emulation of jazz, folk, and rock genres in new liturgical settings. The newly accepted voice of Jewish women as cantors and composers has also brought new dimensions to ancient views of music and spirituality.

MUSIC, CANTORIAL. See CANTORIAL MUSIC.

MYRTLE. See FOUR SPECIES.

MYSTICISM (from Gr. muein [close]), originally, in religious terminology, secret teachings or rituals which the initiated (mystes) was not allowed to divulge to others. The term is now generally taken to refer to the inner, more intense and spiritual dimension of religious life on the intellectual (e.g., knowledge of God) or experiential (e.g., union or communion with God) level. Mystical traditions can be found, in varying degrees and in a variety of forms, in most of the known religious traditions. Traditional Hebrew has no equivalent term rendering this specific sense. Some of the experiences recounted by the prophets, in Psalms, and in later literature are sometimes described as "mystical," but this obscures a decisive difference between mysticism and biblical prophecy: the latter was never sought for its own sake. The prophets were, often against their will, recipients of a message from God which they had to transmit to the people. Some prophets received the message by means of visions. The non-prophetic type of visionary experience or revelation seems to have developed in the Second Temple period (see APOCALYPSE; APOCRYPHA AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA; ENOCH; EZRA.) The Mishnah (Hag. 2.1) mentions two esoteric disciplines, *Ma'aseh Merkavah and *Ma'aseh Be-Re'shit (see HEIKHALOT). The medieval terms torat ha-sod or torat ha-nistar, that is, secret, hidden, and "esoteric" lore that must not be divulged, seem to be closer to the original meaning of the Greek word. Whether the cosmogonic speculations and teachings of the Sefer Yetsirah* should be considered as mystical is an open question, but there is no doubt that the book greatly influenced later mystical literature. Many mystical systems aspire to the total union of the soul with, and its absorption in, the Godhead as the highest goal. It has been argued that God's utter transcendence was so basic a tenet of Judaism that it inhibited on both the theoretical and the experiential level the more extreme forms of mystical union. Devequt* therefore meant close adherence to and communion with God. While this observation seems correct as a general characterization, there is evidence of contemplatives and mystics experiencing more radical forms of ecstasy and mystical union.

The extant accounts of mystical experiences cover a wide gamut, ranging from the Ma'aseh Merkavah—type of awe and trembling at the vision of the divine glory to the illuminations and light-experiences of the so-called ecstatic and prophetic Kabbalah associated with Avraham *Abulafia.

Forms of spiritual life that were neither ecstatic nor visionary but rather ascetic and contemplative were influenced, especially in Muslim Spain, by *Sufism, with *Bahya ben Yosef ibn Paquda' being the most influential representative of this trend. A different type of theological speculation, devotional life, and mystical piety developed in Germany and western Europe, in the twelfth century (see HASIDEI ASHKENAZ). R. *Yehudah ben Shemu'el he-Hasid and R. *El'azar ben Yehudah of Worms taught an other-worldly asceticism, humility, and equanimity in the face of worldly joys and trials, and the importance of mystical kavvanot (devotions, intentions) accompanying prayer. Their theological speculations centered on the divine light of the "Created Glory" and the mystery of the *cherubim as the manifestations of the otherwise utterly hidden and transcendent *God.

A new spiritual movement, the origins of which are still obscure, emerged in the twelfth century in rabbinic-pletistic circles in the Languedoc area of Provence (southern France), where its first major text, the Sefer ha-Bahir*, made its appearance. From there it passed to northern Spain, where its further evolution culminated in the *Zohar. This particular theosophical system was subsequently called *Kabbalah. Opposed at first as a near-heretical innovation by Talmudic orthodoxy, it nevertheless succeeded in gradually dominating all forms of mystical speculation and practice, and as a result the term, which strictly speaking applies to only one phase of medieval Jewish spirituality, erroneously came to be used as synonymous with Jewish mysticism in general. In the sixteenth century, that is, after the expulsion from Spain and probably not unrelated to that traumatic event, Yitshaq *Luria developed a novel form of Kabbalah which, unlike most forms of mysticism which are supratemporal and hence ahistorical, gave the process of creation and history a mystical interpretation with a powerful messianic charge. The seventeenth century messianic movement unleashed by *Shabbetai Tsevi had Lurianic Kabbalah as its background. Lurianic concepts and terminology also permeate *Hasidism, the novel form of eighteenth century mystical revival in eastern Europe initiated by Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer *Ba'al Shem Tov. The mystical theology of R. Avraham Kook (see KOOK FAMILY) also bears the imprint of the kabbalistic heritage.

NAHEM (נחם; Comfort), prayer instituted in amoraic times and recited in the afternoon service 'Amidah on Tish'ah be-'Av asking for comfort for those who mourn Zion and for the rebuilding of the city. The original version appears in the Talmud Yerushalmi (Y., Ber. 4.1) and underwent various changes in geonic and later prayer books. Yosef *Karo suggested that it is recited at the afternoon service to correspond to the time of the actual destruction of the Temple.

NAHMAN BAR YA'AQOV (3d–4th cent.), Babylonian amora'. Born in Nehardea, his father was the scribe of R. Shemu'el. His primary teacher was R. Abba' ben Avuha. He married Yalta', the daughter of R. Abbahu, the exilarch. Known as one of "the pious ones of Babylonia," he is mentioned countless times in the Talmud Bavli and frequently in the Talmud Yerushalmi. As a highly regarded dayyan (R. Huna' considered him Shemu'el's equal in civil matters), his opinions in legal disputes were viewed as authoritative by sages in subsequent generations (Ket. 13a). He regarded himself as an expert in judgment, whose opinion could outweigh that of the majority (San. 5a), but he was respected for answering questions honestly with, "I don't know" (Shab. 66a; cf. also Eruv. 16b).

NAHMAN BEN YITSHAQ (died 356), Babylonian amora'. He is sometimes mistaken in the sources (in particular, the Talmud Yerushalmi) for his contemporary R. Nahman bar Ya'aqov, since both are often referred to without patronymic. His teachers included his uncle, R. Aha' ben Yosef, and R. Hiyya' ben Avin. Referred to as one of the masters of the Masorah (e.g., Yoma' 38b), he is mentioned frequently in the Talmud in halakhic matters; he taught that "a legal ruling should be as clear as a day when the north wind blows" (Eruv. 65a). He served as the principal lecturer at the semiannual kallah* month sessions in the academy of Rava' in Maḥoza and was the head of the academy in Pumbedita from 352 to 356 (according to the Iggeret Rav Sherira' Ga'on). The Talmud records that his mother, having been warned by astrologers that her son would be a thief, determined that his head would always be covered "so that the fear of Heaven may be upon you" (Shab. 156b). This account was later used in the argument for covering the head. He taught that a transgression performed with good intentions was better than a precept performed with evil intentions (Naz. 23b) and that where there is rejoicing, there must also be reverence (lit., trembling; cf. Ber. 30b to Ps. 2.11).

NAHMANIDES, MOSES (1194–1270), biblical exegete, kabbalist, halakhist, poet, and physician; also known as Mosheh ben Nahman, Nahmani, Ramban, and Bonastrug da Porta. Nahmanides was an intellectual and communal leader of the Jewish community in Catalonia during a crucial period of change. His writings reflect a major synthesis of the two most significant schools of thought: the dialectical tradition of northern French Jewry and the analytic-praxis orientation of Andalusian Jewry.

The broad scope of Nahmanides' learning enabled him to work for peace and stability within communities which were torn by conflicting ideas, originating both from within the Jewish world and from the larger Christian society. In 1232 he attempted to resolve a conflict over the use of the writings of Maimonides (see MAIMONIDEAN CONTROVERSY). He attempted to influence the rabbis of northern France not to enforce a ban, declared by rabbis in southern France, on the study of the writings of Maimonides and other philosophy. He suggested a program of studies that would regulate the study of philosophy, by restricting the age when students could begin to engage in philosophical studies. Because of the heightened emotions on the part of rabbis in southern France and Spain, Nahmanides was unsuccessful in preventing the bans.

Between 1263 and 1265, Nahmanides as the representative of Catalonian Jewry, was called upon by King James I (1213–1267) with regard to the attempts by the mendicant orders to establish their campaign to evangelize the Jewish communities by preaching in synagogues. King James invited Nahmanides to defend the Talmud against the accusations of Pablo Christiani, a Dominican friar, who sought to demonstrate that passages in rabbinic literature revealed Christian truth (see BARCELONA, DISPUTATION OF). Afterwards Nahmanides summarized his view of the issues raised in the debate, in his book Sefer ha-Vikkuah. In this book, he defended his proposition that although the legal portions of the Talmud were obligatory upon all Jews, the speculative views of the aggadah were not. The stories and explanations contained in the aggadah provided useful teachings, but no Jew was obliged to believe them. By April 1265, the Dominicans requested Pope Clement IV to ask the king to punish Nahmanides for the views expressed in Sefer ha-Vikkuah. With the help of the king, Nahmanides left Spain for Erets Yisra'el. After his arrival there in 1267, Nahmanides proceeded to Jerusalem, where he found the community in ruins. His letter to his son Nahman elaborates on his sorrow at the sad state of the Jews in Jerusalem, and on his efforts to acquire property for a synagogue, set up a yeshivah, and organize the community. One year later Nahmanides moved to Acre, where he succeeded R. Yehi'el ben Yosef of Paris as head of the community.

Nahmanides' literary productivity was prolific. More than fifty authentic works of his are extant. The majority are in genres which relate to Talmudic and legal literature. In the genre of *Bible exegesis, Nahmanides wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, on the messianic passages in Daniel (called Sefer ha-Ge'ullah), and on the Book of Job. His Pentateuch commentary, which received its final form after he moved to Erets Yisra'el, reveals respect for the writings of Rashi and Avraham ibn Ezra, but moves beyond their interests in linguistic matters and the synthesis of classical rabbinic literature with the text of scripture. In Nahmanides' commentary, both the plain meaning of the text and the deepest meaning of its laws and narratives—its mystical dimension—are explicated. The description of the creation of the world in the early chapters of Genesis reveals the six ages of world history and the future day of the Lord, and the sequence of the Pentateuchal narratives reveals the meaning of Israel's existence. He opposed Maimonides' attempt to provide rational explanations of miracles wholly within the natural order. Miracles are manifest proof of the reality of God's action within creation. The Pentateuch commentary is the primary source for Nahmanides' kabbalistic thinking. Despite his insistence on Kabbalah as esoteric knowledge, which ought to be confined only to a few initiates, his commentary was the first to reveal theosophic doctrines by explication of Talmudic aggadah.

Nahmanides' concern with theodicy, on the level both of the individual and of the people of Israel, is expressed in the commentary on Job and the Sefer ha-Ge'ullah. The suffering of the individual may be explained, according to the Job commentary, by the doctrine of transmigration of the soul (gilgul nefashot). Israel's suffering in exile among the nations of the world will ultimately be rectified through the coming of the Messiah. In Sefer ha-Ge'ullah, Nahmanides provided a sustained commentary on the messianic passages in Daniel, and arrived at a date for the arrival of redemption.

Nahmanides' extensive halakhic writings reveal his mastery both of the Talmudic text and of the history of post-Talmudic dialectical and juridical traditions. In his novellae (hiddushim) on the three most frequently studied orders of the Mishnah—Mo'ed, Nashim, and Neziqin—he utilized the sources of the Spanish community, in combination with the dialectical methods of the northern French tosafists. He also incorporated the teachings of the halakhists of Provence. Nahmanides also wrote works of criticism in which he defended earlier legal authorities against later views. Some of his monographs codified significant areas of Jewish law: Dinei de-Garmei, on the laws regarding disturbances to neighbors; Mishpetei ha-Ĥerem, on the application of, and release from, the ban administered by the community; and Torat ha-Adam, on the laws relating to illness and death.

NAḤMAN OF BRATSLAV (1772–1810), Hasidic master. One of the most enigmatic figures in the history of Hasidism, R. Nahman has long been viewed with suspicion by Hasidim outside the Bratslav camp, while he has been the subject of intense fascination for moderns attracted to the Hasidic world. A great-grandson of Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer *Ba'al Shem Tov, Nahman grew up during the period when his uncle Barukh of Medzhibozh was working to create the first Hasidic dynasty. Since R. Barukh had no sons, Nahman would have been the natural dynastic heir to the Ba'al Shem Tov's mantle. But even in his youth the deeply introspective Nahman felt that he would not be fit to lead others until he had become a perfect tsaddiq. This required constant struggle against the dark forces of temptation, doubt, and depression that ever sought to overwhelm him. He also came to see the Hasidism of his uncle's court as superficial and inauthentic. It was only after a dramatic and transforming journey to Erets Yisra'el between 1798 and 1799 that Nahman felt prepared to accept disciples, of whom he required an unusually high degree of intense mortification, self-examination, and loyalty to himself as master. There was a deep communion of soul between Nahman and his disciples that formed the very essence of Bratslav Hasidism. Binding themselves to their master, they gained the ability through him to overcome the obstacles that stood before them. In his more elated moments, Nahman came to see himself as the tsaddiq ha-dor, the unique figure within his generation who could solve the world's ills. Nahman's Hasidim, unlike others, refused to crown another master upon his death from tuberculosis at the age of thirty-eight (he did have a son in 1806). They remain forever his personal disciples; it is he and he alone who can help them in their constant struggles for perfection. Signs posted in Bratslav prayer rooms still ask that prayers recited there be bound especially to the soul of this singular master. Nahman insisted that his disciples engage in daily hitbodedut (a state of being alone), which in his case meant an hour-long conversation with God in which the Hasid, speaking aloud and in his native language, would "break his heart" before God. Nahman's teachings are collected in Liqqutei Moharan (Ostròg, 1809; Mogilev, 1811). Nahman is the first (and perhaps the only) Hasidic master to make room for doubt and questioning, even of the most basic sort, within the religious life. Nahman is the author of the fantastic Sippurei Ma'asiyot (Ostròg, 1816), a collection of thirteen stories that sought to create in their hearers a new sort of sacred imagination. His stories have been hailed as classics of Jewish literature. Along with his teachings, these are still studied and venerated by Bratslav Hasidim, today centered in Jerusalem. Rabbi Nahman's grave in Uman, Ukraine, has again become a pilgrimage site, especially on Ro'sh ha-Shanah.

NAHOTEI (Aram.; נְחֻטֵּי; those who descend), sages who traveled from Erets Yisra'el to Babylonia, that is, sages who descended from the Holy Land to a place of lesser spiritual status. Their travels may have been for business reasons or for the purpose of studying with Babylonia's rabbinic scholars. Babylonian scholars who went to Erets Yisra'el to study the teachings and traditions of its academies, and who then reported them back to Babylonia, are also called nahotei. They are primarily significant for their transmission of amoraic traditions between the two main centers of the Talmudic period and are credited with maintaining a living connection between the rabbinic circles of Erets Yisra'el and those of Babylonia. The nahotei were active in the third and fourth centuries CE, and the best-known nahotei include 'Ulla, Dimi, and Ravin.

NAHUM (Heb. Nahum; 7th cent. BCE), prophet in the kingdom of Judah. The superscription of the Book of Nahum identifies him as an "Elkoshite" (1.1), although the location of this place is unknown. The seventh book of the Minor Prophets, Nahum emphasizes God's action in history by describing the fall of Nineveh, the capital of Assyria, in 612 BCE, as a divine act. The book is divided into two parts: God's holiness and judgment against Assyria (vv. 2–10 contain in Hebrew a partially preserved alphabetical acrostic) and consolatory promises of protection to Judah (1.2–15); and a long vivid description of the downfall, sacking of, and curse upon Nineveh, which ends with a song taunting the doomed city (chaps. 2–3). Similar to the tradition preserved by the Greek historians Diodorus and Xenophon, Nahum 2.7 assumes that a flood (of the Tigris) was a major factor in the fall of the city. A pesher or commentary on the Book of Nahum was found among the Dead Sea Scrolls. In addition, Nahum is represented in the Hebrew Minor Prophets scroll from Wadi Murabba'at and the Greek Minor Prophets scroll from Naḥal Ḥever in the Judean desert.

NAHUM OF CHERNOBYL (c.1730–1797), Hasidic author. He was a disciple of *Dov Ber of Mezhiresh and progenitor of the Twersky dynasty (see TWERSKY FAMILY). He lived a life of simplicity and poverty, traveling to preach in towns in the northern and western Ukraine. His teachings are collected in Me'or 'Einayim (1798), considered one of the classics of Hasidic literature. Though a disciple of Dov Ber, many of Nahum's homilies reflect the somewhat simpler mysticism of Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer *Ba'al Shem Tov. The presence of God everywhere and at all times and the human obligation to serve God in every way, both through the commandments and beyond them, are the key themes of Nahum's work. There is also a great emphasis in his homilies on the cultivation of da'at (mindfulness) as the chief purpose of religious life.

NAHUM OF GIMZO (1st–2d cent.), tanna' noted for his learning, poverty, and pious resignation in the face of misfortune (which he accepted with the phrase gam zu le-tovah, "this too is for the best," a pun on the name of his Judean village, Gimzo, near Lydda). Several miraculous events are reported as having happened to him, as a result of his extreme piety. His teachings became influential through his pupil R. *Aqiva, who was responsible for the general acceptance of Nahum's methods for the halakhic interpretation of scripture (see HERMENEUTICS).

NAJARA, YISRA'EL BEN MOSHEH (c.1555–1628), rabbi, kabbalist, and poet in Erets Yisra'el. The outstanding Jewish poet of his period, he composed sacred and secular poems in Hebrew and Aramaic, restoring piyyut* to its former importance. His main themes were praise for God, laments for the sufferings of Israel, and longing for redemption. His poetic description of the mystical union between God and Israel often resorted to erotic imagery that was condemned by other rabbis. Several hundred of his religious poems are extant, including piyyutim for each Sabbath and festival. Many passed into the liturgy, particularly in Italy and Muslim lands. Best known is Yah Ribbon 'Olam, which was incorporated into the Sabbath zemirot in all rites. The outstanding collection of his poems is Zemirot Yisra'el.

NAMES. In many ancient cultures names had a significance for which no parallel exists in the present day. Names represented one's essence, and a person was often given a new name upon entering a new phase of life. The earlier books of the Bible often explain why individuals were called by certain names or why the names of Abram, Sarai, Jacob, and Hoshea were changed to Abraham, Sarah, Israel, and Joshua, the change of name symbolically investing a person's life with new significance. Names of gods often formed a part of personal names, and it was not uncommon at first also for Israelite names to contain the element baal (see BAAL WORSHIP), although this was discontinued under the influence of monotheism, when the elements el, eli, and yeho were substituted. Rabbinic literature abounds in etymologies for the names of biblical persons, places and even animals (who were named by Adam; Gn. 2.19–20). Rabbinic law requires meticulous care in the correct spelling of all names in documents, particularly in bills of divorce, which would be invalidated by a misspelling or an omission. A Jew is known by a Hebrew name plus the name of the father (X son or daughter of Y) and in this form is "called up" to the reading of the Law in the synagogue. A growing custom in the West is to add the mother's name. A baby boy is named at the circumcision ceremony and a girl in the synagogue shortly after her birth. The Talmud states that "the majority of Jews in the Diaspora adopt the non-Jewish names of their environment" (Git. 11a), but the rabbis saw special virtue in the fact that "the children of Israel did not change their names in Egypt; as Reuben and Simeon they descended and as Reuben and Simeon they went out." During the period of the Second Temple, certain non-Jewish names (e.g., Alexander, Hyrcanus) became accepted among Jews. Rabbi El'azar states that a person's name is determined by God and influences his destiny (Ber. 7b). For this reason, names of biblical persons of ill-fate were avoided (Gn. Rab. 49.1). The notion of a connection between name and essence also underlies the rabbinic statement (R. ha-Sh. 16b) that a change of name was one of the four things that could avert the evil decree. This gave rise to the ritual of changing the name of a gravely ill person, usually by adding an auspicious name such as Hayyim (Life) or Yehoshu'a (Salvation). This custom is still extant in Orthodox circles; the change is conferred at a short ceremony in which charity is donated on behalf of the invalid, a blessing is recited, a formula (which differs in the Ashkenazi and Sephardi rites) is read announcing the new (additional) name, and a prayer is recited asking for "new life" for the bearer of the new name. The custom originally had a superstitious element in the belief that the change of name would mislead the angel of death. See also GOD, NAMES OF.

NAPHTALI, the sixth son born to Jacob and the second son of Bilhah, Rachel's maidservant, and the eponymous ancestor of the tribe and territory of that name. Rachel gave Naphtali his name to reflect her trials with her sister Leah: "With wrestlings of God I have wrestled [naf-tulei elohim niftalti] with my sister, and I have prevailed" (Gn. 30.8). During the period of the Judges, the tribe of Naphtali fought, sometimes unsuccessfully, against the local Canaanites (Jgs. 1.33). Its most noted campaign occurred at Mount Tabor under the leadership of the military figure Barak ben Avinoam. Supported by the prophet and judge *Deborah, Barak defeated the northern Canaanite confederation led by Sisera, the general of Jabin who was the king of Hazor, a major city-state in the territory of Naphtali (Jgs. 4–5). The territory of Naphtali was bordered in the north by Dan, to the east by the Jordan River, in the west by Asher, and to the south by Lake Kinneret and the territory of Issachar-Zebulun (Jos. 19.32–39). The city of Kedesh-naphtali was the northernmost Cisjordanian city of refuge (see ASYLUM). During the Solomonic monarchy, Naphtali was an administrative district, governed by the king's son-in-law, an indication of its importance for the Israelite kingdom. Situated on the northern border, it was conquered by Ben-hadad I, the king of Damascus (1 Kgs. 15.20). The Assyrian monarch, Tiglath-pileser III captured "all the land of Naphtali and carried off the people captive to Assyria" (2 Kgs. 15.29). The Second Temple author of the apocryphal *Book of Tobit identifies its hero as a Naphtalian exile dwelling in Nineveh in the time of Sennacherib.

NAQQEDANIM (נִקְּדָנִים; punctuators), scholars who punctuated and accented biblical manuscripts. They were the successors of the Masoretes (see MASORAH), whose work they conserved. The naqqedanim flourished from the ninth century until the invention of printing.

NASHIM (נָשִׁים; Women), third order of the Mishnah, dealing with laws concerning betrothal, marriage, divorce, and marital relationships. NASI' (נָסִי'; prince, or patriarch), title given to authority figures from the biblical period forward. In biblical texts, clan heads, tribal leaders, and kings are referred to as nasi'. At Qumran, the term appears with a monarchic meaning or in reference to the leader of the sect. Second-century CE coins and documents refer to Shim'on *Bar Kokhba' as nesi' Yisra'el. In rabbinic sources, nasi', an official title meaning patriarch, is applied first to one of each of the zugot* (pairs), beginning with *Yosei ben Yo'ezer (c.160 BCE), then to the presiding officer of the *Sanhedrin in the Temple, and finally, through the amoraic period, to the head of the court. Most scholars agree that the rabbinic usage in the early period is anachronistic. Some date the patriarchate to Hillel (c.30 CE), others to Gamli'el the Elder (fl. 85 CE), and still others to R. Yehudah ha-Nasi' (fl. 190 CE). Certainly the patriarchate was not fully established until R. Yehudah ha-Nasi', who was recognized as the political head of the Jewish community by the Roman authorities and supported with money, land, and other privileges. Rabbinic sources describe the varied activities of the nasi: he presided over the Sanhedrin; he and his court determined the calendar by proclaiming the new moon and leap years; and he proclaimed national fast days in emergencies, led certain public prayers, ordained scholars, and appointed judges. The nasi dispatched emissaries to the Diaspora in order to teach, collect funds, and set up courts. The court of the nasi possessed legislative powers, and ordinances issued by the court (taqqanot) were credited to the presiding nasi. Hillel II's formulation of the principles of the calendar (c.350 CE) was the last great taqqanah of the nesi'im. A tradition attributing Davidic lineage to the patriarchs led to messianic speculation regarding them. Some rabbinic figures attacked this position, as did the church fathers in the Byzantine period. The office, which was held by descendants of Hillel, was abolished by the authorities in Palestine in 425 CE. In the Middle Ages, the term nasi was applied to the lay leader of the Jewish community, both within and outside Erets Yisra'el, though at times its usage was honorific. Karaites also used the term to designate their leaders, and in Modern Hebrew, nasi means president.

NATAN BEN YEḤTEL OF ROME (1035–1106), Talmudic lexicographer and, along with his brothers, head of the Roman Talmudic academy. His 'Arukh was one of the few medieval dictionaries of the Talmud and Midrash. A comprehensive and alphabetically arranged work, it explains unclear words in a variety of languages, while also elucidating many difficult passages in rabbinic literature. It is a unique source of geonic and early Ashkenazi literature, containing sources otherwise unknown. Among these are sections of the Mainz Commentaries on the Talmud, which served as a basis for Rashi's commentary. The 'Arukh also preserves variant readings of many classic rabbinic works, as well as important information on contemporary customs. The work was extensively cited in medieval literature and provided one of the bases of subsequent Talmudic lexicography. First published in Rome in 1469, it was edited with an introduction by A. Kohut under the title Arukh Completum (Vienna, 1878–1892).

NATAN BEN YTTSHAQ HA-KOHEN HA-BAVLI (10th cent.), chronicler. He is known for his account of Babylonian Jewry's primary governing institutions, the gaonate and the exilarchate. Theoretically, the gaonate had legislative and judicial authority, while the exilarchate was the executive power; in fact, some of these powers overlapped. The gaonate was divided between the academies of Sura and Pumbedita, although during Natan's time, Sura was the stronger center.

Natan's account gives some information about the exilarch 'Uqba', who left Baghdad for North Africa. It focuses in greater detail, however, on the disputes between the ga'on Kohen Tsedeq and the exilarch David ben Zakk'ai (909–916), and between David ben Zakk'ai and Sa'adyah Ga'on (c.930). The disputes centered on both political and financial prerogatives, according to Natan. His account also describes in some detail the exilarch's "reception Sabbath," attended by the ge'onim of Sura and Pumbedita and their entourages, and the hierarchical arrangements of the geonic academies.

While Natan ha-Bavli's account is relatively short, it is one of the few reports about the later geonic period. It has been used by modern scholars, like Louis Ginzberg, to reconstruct the relationship between the gaonate and the exilarchate.

NATAN HA-BAVLI (2d–3d cent.), fourth- through fifth-generation tanna'. Rabbi Natan migrated from Babylonia to Erets Yisra'el, where he served as av beit din of the Sanhedrin during R. Shim'on ben Gamli'el's presidency (Hor. 13b). The Talmud identifies Natan and Yehudah ha-Nasi' as the last of the tanna'im (B. M. 86b). Many scholars believe that Natan was an exilarch's son. He is mentioned only twice in the Mishnah (Ber. 9.5 and Sheq. 2.5); however, he appears frequently in the Tosefta, Mekhilta, and Sifrei on Numbers. An extracanonical tractate similar to Avot is attributed to him: Avot de-Rabbi Natan*. Modern scholars have revised their assessment of the state and nature of rabbinic learning in Babylonia during the tannaitic period based on R. Natan's scholarship.

NATAN OF GAZA (c.1644–1690), kabbalist and messianic enthusiast. He met Shabbetai Tsevi in 1665 and became his prophet and the theologian of his messianic movement. In his tracts and epistles, Natan of Gaza proclaimed Shabbetai Tsevi's Messiahship and the imminence of redemption. Natan traveled extensively on behalf of the Shabbatean movement and remained faithful to Shabbetai Tsevi even after the latter's conversion to Islam, spending his last years in misery and poverty among fellow Shabbateans in Macedonia. His doctrines were based on a new interpretation of Lurianic Kabbalah (see LURIA, YTTSHAQ). Natan of Gaza taught that the soul of the Messiah must first descend to the realm of darkness and impurity in order to redeem the divine sparks imprisoned there, thereby accomplishing the process of restoration (tiqqun*); only then would the soul of the Messiah be fully revealed in its earthly incarnation. This theory provided an explanation for Shabbetai Tsevi's apostasy and the movement's antinomianism.

NATHAN (Heb. Natan), prophet ministering during the reigns of David and Solomon. His parable of the ewe lamb brought home to King David the wickedness of his crimes of adultery with Bath-sheba and his instigation of her husband Uriah's death on the battlefield. It was also Nathan who informed David that the Temple would be built by his son and not by himself (2 Sm. 7; 1 Chr. 17) and that his own wives would be publicly defiled and that the sword would not disappear from his house (i.e., his sons would revolt against him; 2 Sm. 11–12). The prophet's intervention against Adonijah's usurpation of the throne ensured the anointing of Solomon as king of Israel (1 Kgs. 1.5–39).

NATHANSON, YOSEF SHA'UL (c.1808–1875), Galician rabbi and halakhic authority. As a young married man, Nathanson was supported by his wealthy in-laws and spent many years in fruitful study and collaboration with his brother-in-law Mordekhai Ze'ev Ettinger. The pair published a number of halakhic and Talmudic works. They eventually came to a parting of the ways and even competed against each other for the post of rabbi of Lwów, to which Nathanson was named in 1857. Independently wealthy, Nathanson received no salary from the community. He was involved in all aspects of communal life, from Jewish education to support for the poor. He opposed both Hasidism and the Haskalah, although he maintained cordial relations with the preachers of the local Reform congregation and with some of the Hasidic leaders of the time, quoting the works of the latter in his own books. Nathanson is famed as a decisor in halakhic matters, and he wrote thousands of responsa to questioners around the globe. He participated in the major halakhic controversies of his era, such as those over machine-made matsot and etrogim from Corfu (both of which he permitted). His voluminous responsa appeared under the title Sho'el u-Meshiv (6 vols. [1865–1890]). His other works include Divrei Sha'ul and commentaries on the Pentateuch and Five Scrolls (1877–1878), on the aggadot of the Talmud Bavli (1877), and on the Haggadah of Pesah (1879).

NATIONALISM, a term coined in the nineteenth century to refer to ideologies and political attitudes that centers on the nation as a supreme value. The Latin word from which the term is derived, however, is ancient and has served, together with analogous nouns (derived from Gr. ethnos, Lat. populus, gens; the biblical equivalents are 'am, le'om, goy), to designate groups sharing a sense of collective identity. The Bible considers humanity as a "family of nations" and not as an aggregate of individuals; Israel is a people, albeit a chosen one, among others. The call to humanity to worship God is phrased "Praise the Lord all you nations, extol him all you peoples" (Ps. 117.1; see also Ps. 67). Called to be a "holy nation," Israel was, according to the prophets, also subject to particularly severe judgment as a collective entity. Rabbinic tradition perpetuated this view, using the number seventy as a symbol for the totality of peoples; persecuted Israel, dispersed among nations, was a "sheep among seventy wolves." Judaism as a religion therefore always had a basic ethnic-national component. The classic expression of the unity of these elements was given by the best-known convert, Ruth the Moabite, ancestress of King David and, by implication, of the Messiah: "your people shall be my people and your God my God" (Ru. 1.17). Nineteenth-century *Reform Judaism attempted to eliminate the ethnic-national, and, by implication, also Zion-oriented territorial, elements for the sake of what was held to be a more universalist religious conception but subsequently moved away from this extreme position. In the late nineteenth century, modern nationalism—under the impact of the political environment in Europe—became a strong element in *Jewish identity, expressed in movements such as the socialist Bund and *Zionism. This reached its clearest expression with the establishment of the State of Israel.

NATIONS, SEVENTY, a rabbinic term referring to the totality of humankind (Gn. Rab. 39.11; compare this to the parallel term seventy tongues, Sot. 36b). The concept of seventy distinctive ethno-linguistic groups is based on the number of Noah's descendants listed in Genesis 10. Each of Noah's three sons branched out into particular areas of the ancient Near East. The tradition of seventy primary descendants is also echoed in Canaanite mythology, referring to the sons of the gods El and Asherah.

NATRONA'I BAR HILA'I (9th cent.), ga'on of Sura, perhaps the most prolific and influential ga'on in the period preceding Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on, during which the literary activity of the ge'onim was restricted to the writing of responsa. Over five hundred of the responsa of Natrona'i bar Hila'i have survived; particularly noteworthy are his numerous letters dealing with liturgical customs and those devoted to Talmudic exegesis. He was fiercely opposed to the *Karaites but seems to have had little first-hand knowledge of their practices; he attacked a Seder ritual that he thought was of Karaite origin but that in actuality was probably Palestinian. His responsa were published in 1994 in two volumes by Robert Brody (Teshuvot Rav Natrona'i bar Hila'i).

NATURAL LAW, the law by which *nature, that is, the cosmic order, operates and the moral law inherent in the natural order, discoverable by contemplation of human nature and that of all things around, even without a special *revelation from God. Whereas the rabbinic doctrine of the seven *Noahic laws does not refer to natural law but rather to an original revelation for all humankind, many other rabbinic dicta suggest a vaguely assumed existence of a natural law. Medieval philosophers stressed that revelation was necessary for such ritual regulations or details as would not occur to human beings, or for such insights and precepts as the human intellect might not arrive at unaided. In order not to leave the formulation of the basic rules of religion and morals to the vicissitudes of human intellectual development, God also revealed laws that actually form part of natural law (e.g., the prohibition against murder, or the duty of honoring one's father and mother). Non-philosophical theologians held that the purpose of the *Torah was to lift Israel above natural law to a supernatural order reflected by the revealed law.

NATURE. The concept of nature as a system operating according to fixed laws of its own derives from Greek philosophy rather than from the Bible. The biblical writers, while evincing an appreciation of the regular workings of the universe (cf. Ps. 104 and 148), are nevertheless primarily concerned with the acts of the Creator and his permanent and direct responsibility for the cosmic order (see also Ps. 19). In fact, there is a natural order, but it exists not by itself but is owed to God's covenant with his creation (cf. Gn. 8.22 and Jer. 31.34, 33.20, 33.25). The rabbis held a similar view: the regularity of natural phenomena was an expression of God's will, just as were *miracles. Some medieval thinkers (e.g., *Bahya ben Yosef ibn Paquda) held—under the influence of Sufi thought—that admitting the existence of nature and an autonomous natural law was tantamount to denying the sole and exclusive role of God's will and providence. However, most philosophers argued that there was no contradiction between belief in God as the "First Cause" of all things and an established secondary order ("creation") that he had made to function according to a causality of its own. It was generally admitted that the Creator could suspend or "break through" the natural order by miracles. Modern philosophers of nature often require a theological reformulation of the relationship of nature to God. Whereas most traditional systems agreed that God was "outside"—namely, "above"—nature, some modern "naturalistic" (that is, antisupernaturalistic) doctrines take a different view. *Spinoza's pantheism identified God with nature. The ancient rabbis and medieval thinkers insisted that the contemplation of nature led to a recognition of God, and Abraham is said by the Midrash to have become convinced of the existence of God by speculating on the nature and origin of the universe. He therefore possessed a natural religion, arrived at by natural theology, even before God manifested himself to Abraham and introduced him to the order of revealed religion.

NAZIR (נָזִיר; Nazirite), tractate consisting of nine chapters in Mishnah order Nashim, with related material in the Tosefta and both Talmuds, dealing with the rules of the *Nazirite (Nm. 6.1–21). Nazir's treatment of this topic largely follows the biblical presentation, discussing in turn the three central prohibitions of the Nazirite: defilement through contact with a corpse; consumption of wine or grape products; and cutting hair (Naz. 6.1). Nazir devotes much attention to the definition and formulation of the Nazirite vow, examining permutations and variations of standard Nazirite formulae and their ramifications. Opening with a discussion of the Nazirite in the mold of Samson (Naz. 1.2) and closing with the Nazirite status of Samuel, Nazir alludes to a tension within rabbinic thought between the majestic devotion (Samuel) and the uneasy asceticism (Samson) represented by the figure of the Nazirite.

An English translation of the tractate by B. D. Klien appears in the Soncino Talmud (London, 1936).

NAZIRITE (Heb. nazir [one who abstains]), a man or woman who takes a vow consecrating him- or herself to God by accepting prohibitions beyond those observed by all other Israelites (Nm. 6.1–21). These are prohibitions against drinking wine, products of the vine, or other intoxicants; a prohibition against cutting one's hair; and a prohibition against contracting impurity by contact with a corpse, even that of a close relative. Most Nazirites imposed upon themselves such a vow for a designated period, usually a month, but there are also biblical examples of a person becoming a Nazirite for life (nezir 'olam), namely, Samuel and Samson, who were dedicated from before birth (Jgs. 13.7; 1 Sm. 1.11, 22, especially as stated in the Qumran text; Ben Sira 46.13). The lifelong Nazirite was not subject to the prohibition against corpse contamination (Jgs. 13.14). The Nazirite is consecrated (qadosh) to the Lord (Nm. 6.5, 8), an expression elsewhere used of priests, and the Nazirite's prohibitions resemble those pertaining to a priest. Thus, a male Israelite aspiring to greater sanctity and nearness to God could do so by assuming the priestly severities, even though he could not discharge priestly functions. The unique, distinctive characteristic of the Nazirite is his uncut hair, featuring prominently in the story of Samson (Jgs. 16); the term nazir is connected with nezer, which can also refer to the Nazirite's hair (see Nm. 6.6–7, 12, 18; Jer. 7.29). Biblical legislation concerning the Nazirite deals primarily with two matters: the unexpected interruption of a Nazirite's vow by sudden contamination from a corpse (Nm. 6.9–12) and the sacrificial procedure followed by Nazirites at the end of their terms (Nm. 13–20), by which the Nazirites are desacralized. Nazirites in Judaism do not withdraw from community life nor are they celibate. Nonetheless, the rabbis recommended moderation rather than abstention and limited to a minimum the situations in which a Nazirite vow was desirable. The rabbinic laws concerning the Nazirite are contained in the Talmudic tractate Nazir*.

NECROMANCY, divination through communication with the dead. Necromancy is forbidden in the Bible and is termed “an abomination unto the Lord” (Dt. 18.11–12). The detailed vocabulary used in the Bible suggests the existence of different kinds of necromancy, but the only actual account of its practice is Saul's resort to the witch of En-dor to raise the soul of Samuel (1 Sm. 28.7–20). Most earlier Jewish authorities regarded the practice as efficacious but forbidden, though the more rationalistically inclined thinkers (Pinhas ben Hofni Ga'on, Maimonides, etc.) denounced it as gross superstition and explained the story of Saul at En-dor as an anguished dream. NEDARIM (נדרים; Vows), tractate in Mishnah order Nashim, in eleven chapters, with related material in the Tosefta and in both Talmuds. The tractate deals with *vows and oaths and their annulment (Nm. 30.2–17). In biblical as well as rabbinic thought, oaths and vows were both widespread and fraught with danger; hence, the regulation of these forms of speech was a matter of vital importance. Originally a verbal consecration of an object to the Temple, vows were used to prohibit benefit from an object or an action by conferring upon it a quasi-consecrated status. The often ambiguous or unarticulated language of a vow (Ned. 1.1) was subjected to canons of interpretation. The laws of nedarim seek to strike a balance between the inward intent and the social context of language, enabling the speaker to control his meaning while requiring submissive reverence to the consequences of his utterance.

Biblical laws governing annulment of a woman's vows by her father or husband are rigorously defined. Rabbinic scholars and courts were empowered to annul vows by the creative discovery of ramifications of which the vow's author was unaware.

The tractate in the Talmud Bavli was translated into English by Harry Freedman in the Soncino Talmud (1936).

NEGA'IM (נִגְעִים; Plagues), tractate in Mishnah order Toharot, in fourteen chapters, with related material in the Tosefta. It has no gemara in either Talmud. It deals with the laws concerning the disease described in Leviticus 13–14, usually translated as *leprosy. Nega'im discusses the symptoms that render persons, clothing, or houses leprous and therefore impure; the regulations governing the impure person or object; and the rituals of purification for afflicted persons or objects that have been cured. A modification of the biblical discussion of nega'im relates to the role of the priest in establishing the presence of leprous nega'im. The biblical priest was assumed to be expert in diagnosing nega'im. In rabbinic times, the actual diagnosis would normally be made by a rabbinic expert, while the role of the priest, who was not presumed to possess halakhic expertise, was to issue a ritual proclamation of the patient's impurity (Neg. 3.1; cf. T., Neg. 1.1–2).

Because of their intricacy, the laws of Nega'im, together with those of Ohalot*, were used by the rabbis to symbolize halakhic study of the deepest profundity (San. 67b). Accordingly, Nega'im is marked by a high proportion of pericopes that present Midrashic expositions (see especially Neg. 12.5–7) or halakhic argumentation (e.g., Neg. 10.1–2, 9). Several pericopes refer to the relationship between halakhic reasoning and halakhic traditions (Neg. 7.4, 9.3, 11.7). Some rabbis claim (T., Neg. 6.1) that portions of the laws of nega'im, the laws of leprous houses, have no applicability to reality and are taught only to derive instruction from them. Based on the assumption that the disease of nega'im is divine punishment for human wickedness (T., Neg. 6.7), Nega'im derives from the laws of afflicted houses moral instruction regarding God's consideration for the property even of wicked Jews (Neg. 12.5) and regarding the dangers of having wicked neighbors (Neg. 12.6).

NEGLIGENCE. Charges of negligence arise when an artisan or laborer performs the work given to him poorly or with disregard for the instructions of the owner or ruins the material entrusted to him by the owner. In these instances full compensation must be made by the artisan or laborer. In addition, the halakhah recognizes two other categories of negligence, "negligence that borders upon intention" and "negligence that borders upon accident." In these cases the ordinary penalty for negligence does not apply—in the former instance because the penalty would be too light; in the latter instance because it would be too severe. In the case of movable property given in trust without payment, the bailee (unpaid guardian) is responsible for criminal negligence (peshi'ah) only.

NEHARDEA, Babylonian *academy situated in a city of that name near the junction of the Euphrates River and the Malka Canal. The city's Jewish origins were traditionally traced back to King Jehoiachin, who was said to have erected a synagogue there for which earth and stone were brought from Jerusalem. The ancient academy at Nehardea reached its zenith under the *amora' *Shemu'el; shortly after his death, the city was destroyed by the Palmyrenes (259 CE). The Nehardean tradition of Jewish scholarship was carried on by the academy of *Pumbedita, which was founded by Shemu'el's pupil *Yehudah bar Yehezqel. Although many scholars continued to reside in Nehardea after it was rebuilt, the town never regained its former prominence as a center of Jewish learning. In the geonic period, "Nehardea" was an alternative designation for the academy of Pumbedita.

NEHEMIAH (Heb. Nehemyah; 5th cent. BCE), cup-bearer to the Persian king Artaxerxes I (465–424) by whom he was appointed governor of Judah. Nehemiah arrived in Jerusalem in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes (444 BCE) for the primary purpose of rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, but he skillfully established his position as governor in the face of stiff opposition from his two enemies, Sanballat, governor of Samaria, and Tobiah the Ammonite and others as well. Nehemiah's main period of service lasted twelve years (2.1, 13.6), although the bulk of the narrative in Nehemiah relates only to the activities of his first year or two. Nehemiah's first and most pressing undertaking was rebuilding the city walls, a project that he directed to successful completion in only fifty-two days (6.15), despite the organized interference mounted by his enemies. The narrative describing the wall-building project gives the image of how the builders were "doing work with one hand while the other held a weapon" (4.11). Next, Nehemiah turned his attention to the socioeconomic ills plaguing the Jewish community, in particular moving to rectify the outrage of children and property being taken by creditors as security deposits (chap. 5). Nehemiah also led the drive to repopulate Jerusalem after the city had been depleted of many of its residents by ordering that one out of ten Jews should take up residence there (7.4, 11.1–2). Finally, Nehemiah is mentioned as the first signatory to the famous amanah (pledge, contract) that was drawn up in the wake of *Ezra's public reading of the Torah (10.2). The amanah included provisions forbidding mixed marriages and business dealings on the Sabbath, canceling of debts owed by the poor, and aiding the smooth operation of the Temple cult. Nehemiah was personally involved in enforcing these matters (chap. 13), though his precise administrative and chronological relationship to Ezra, who was active in the same areas of concern, is debated among scholars. Nehemiah's vigor and drive and the success of his campaign testify to a character of singular power, zealously devoted to the cause of God and his people. Nehemiah's own memoirs form the basis of the biblical account. Traditionally regarded as a unit, Ezra-Nehemiah (now divided into two separate works) is tenth in the Hagiographa (see EZRA-NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF). The Talmud credits Nehemiah with the completion of the Book of Chronicles, started by Ezra (B. B. 15a).

NEHER, ANDRÉ (1913–1988), French historian of Jewish thought. He wrote on diverse subjects, ranging from biblical prophecy (Amos, contribution à l'étude du prophétisme [1950]; L'Essence du prophétisme [1955]; Moïse et la vocation juive [1956], translated as Moses and the Vocation of the Jewish People [1959]; The Prophetic Existence [1969]), through Renaissance thought (David Gans, 1541–1613: Disciple du Maharal [1974], translated as Jewish Thought and the Scientific Revolution of the Sixteenth Century [1986]), and including the Enlightenment and modern thought (Ils ont refait leur âme [1979], translated as They Made Their Souls Anew [1990]). His L'Exil de la parole (1970; translated into English in 1981) addresses the theological questions posed by the Holocaust. A leading figure of the post-Holocaust Jewish community of France, he taught Jewish studies at the University of Strasbourg until moving to Jerusalem in 1972. He believed that through the berit (covenant) the Hebrews, and through them all humanity, entered a historic dialogue with the divine.

NEHUNYA' BEN HA-QANAH (1st cent.), tanna' quoted frequently in the Talmud, especially as a halakhist, although only a single halakhah has come down in his name (Pes. 29a). He was regarded as pious and deeply humane, never seeking his own betterment at the expense of others, always forgiving his neighbor before he went to sleep, and forgoing monetary benefits. He may have lived in Emmaus in Judea for some time. He was the teacher of R. *Yishma'el ben Elisha' and taught him the exegetical principle of kelal u-ferat (deducing from the general to the particular). Nehunya' ben ha-Qanah was highly regarded by kabbalists, who ascribed to him Sefer ha-Bahir*, the prayer Anna' ba-Koah*, and other mystical compositions, such as Sefer ha-Qanah*.

NEHUSHTAN (from Heb. nahash [snake] and nehoshet [copper/bronze]), name of the bronze serpent destroyed by King *Hezekiah of Judah (2 Kgs. 18.4) in his campaign for religious reform. Nehushtan was a sacred symbol within Mosaic traditions. Moses fashioned a bronze serpent as a prophylactic agent for the Israelites bitten by serpents (Nm. 21.6–9). By Hezekiah's time (late 8th cent. BCE), it was no longer an acceptable object of worship. Snakes are common in ancient Near Eastern iconography, usually associated with fertility cults. A bronze serpent was found at Midianite Timnah in Sinai, others at Canaanite Gezer, Hazor, and Tel Mevorakh.

NE'ILAH (נְעִילָה; Closing [of the Gates]), originally a prayer offered on all public fast days at sunset, when the Temple gates were closed; now recited only on Yom Kippur. It is the last of the five prayers of Yom Kippur, and its recital is concluded at nightfall, when the fast ends. Ne'ilah is regarded as the last opportunity to pray for forgiveness for transgressions committed during the previous year and is recited with particular solemnity. The medieval poets interpreted the word ne'ilah as referring to the closing of the heavenly gates at the sealing of divine judgment on Yom Kippur. This is reflected in the Amidah*, where the text changes from the previous invocation of the High Holy Days, "inscribe us in the Book of Life," to "seal us in the Book of Life." After Ashrei* (Ps. 145) and U-Va' le-Tsiyyon*, the Amidah*, preceded and followed by Qaddish*, is first said silently by each worshiper and then repeated aloud by the reader. It differs from the other Amidot* of Yom Kippur in that it contains only the shorter confession of sins (Vidui) and not the long version, which is replaced by Attah*

Noten Yad, a prayer extolling God's mercy in forgiving the repentant sinner. The ark remains open during the reader's repetition of the Amidah*. After the Amidah*, the petition Avinu Malkeinu* is repeated for the last time (even when Yom Kippur coincides with Shabbat), the first verse of the Shema* is proclaimed once by the reader and repeated by the congregation, followed by barukh shem kevod malkhuto le-'olam va-'ed*, said three times, and "the Lord is God" (1 Kgs. 18.39), said seven times. After this (if night has fallen), the shofar is sounded with a single long blast, teqi'ah gedolah, to indicate the termination of the solemn fast day. The congregation adds la-shanah ha-ba'ah bi-Yerushalayim*, "next year in Jerusalem." The tallit is worn at Ne'ilah as at all Yom Kippur services. Ne'ilah is followed by Ma'ariv and Havdalah.

NEO-HASIDISM, the application of Hasidic values and teachings to the lives of non-Hasidic, and even non-observant, Jews. Among the first Jews in the West to find inspiration in Hasidism was Martin *Buber, who saw in it, and especially in *Hasidic literature, a great religious creation. Through the influence of Buber and others, attempts were made to bring the spirit of Hasidism to the kibbutz movement, to Zionist youth groups, and to various audiences in Europe and America. In eastern Europe Neo-Hasidism was especially the province of Hillel Zeitlin (1872–1943), who sought an authentically Jewish philosophy of life in his rereading of the Hasidic sources. His potentially important contribution was cut off by the Holocaust. Neo-Hasidism has also been important in Jewish literature; many of Jewry's most important writers in the twentieth century (Peretz, Asch, Agnon, Singer, etc.) depicted Hasidim or employed Hasidic themes in their writings. The same is true of Jewish music, in which adaptations from Hasidism have been widely influential far beyond Hasidic circles. In North America, a Neo-Hasidic approach to Judaism began to develop in the 1960s, partly in response to the great interest in meditation and spirituality in the general culture. The two persons most responsible for this growth were rabbi-folk singer Shlomo Carlebach (died 1994) and R. Zalman Schachter, a former Habad Hasid who founded the Pnai Or Religious Fellowship and has been called the spiritual grandfather of the Jewish counter-culture and havurah* movements.

NEOLOGY, a term borrowed from enlightened Protestant circles in Germany to characterize the Hungarian brand of Reform Judaism*. During the 1840s, Leopold Löw and other rabbis who followed the example of Aharon ben Kalman *Chorin became dominant in ethnic Hungary and Transylvania. Their pressure for religious change and identification with Magyar nationalism led to a clash with Orthodox Jews, headed by the dynasty of Mosheh Sofer (see SOFER FAMILY) in Slovakia and the Hasidim of Galicia. At a rabbinical assembly held in 1865, the traditionalists banned worship in "choir temples" and many other innovations of the Neologists, some of which (e. g., preaching in the vernacular) had already been adopted by the German *Neo-Orthodoxy movement. Two years later, Baron József Eötvös, the architect of Jewish emancipation, who served as minister of religious and educational affairs, helped organize elections to a National Congress of Hungarian Jewry (1868–1869). Held in the Neologist stronghold of Pest, this congress—far from restoring communal harmony—provoked a three-way split between the Neologist majority, Orthodox "Guardians of the Faith," and non-aligned, Status Quo Ante traditionalists.

After Orthodox separatism was recognized by the Hungarian parliament in 1871, leading Neologists feared that their break with the Orthodox might become irreparable. Having thwarted attempts to establish German-style Reform congregations in 1848 and 1884, they sought a modus vivendi with the Orthodox rabbinate by pursuing a discreetly conservative line. Apart from organ accompaniment, Neologist services remained largely traditional, religious observance (e.g., kashrut) was upheld, and graduates of the new Budapest Rabbinical Seminary (1877) often were quite like their Neo-Orthodox counterparts in western Europe. Through Hungarian Neology, during and after World War II, many assimilated Jews rediscovered their traditional roots. The postwar Communist regime brought surviving Neologist and Orthodox communities under one umbrella organization, which (since the democratic reforms of the late 1980s) has revitalized Jewish life in Hungary.

NEO-ORTHODOXY, term designating the stand taken by "modern" traditionalists against *Reform Judaism in Germany. Their platform combined strict observance of Jewish law with a positive approach to Western society and culture. Architects of Neo-Orthodoxy included Isaac *Bernays (Hamburg), Ya'akov *Ettlinger (Altona), Michael Sachs (Berlin), and Shemu'el David *Luzzatto (Italy), as well as Nathan Marcus Adler (Hanover; see ADLER FAMILY), who became England's chief rabbi in 1845. Their enlightened measures ranged from preaching in the vernacular to establishing an Orthodox press (Ettlinger) and one of the first *rabbinical seminaries (Adler).

Samson Raphael *Hirsch, a disciple of Bernays and Ettlinger, created the ideological foundation of Neo-Orthodoxy through his own religious accommodation with modernity and its challenges. Turning the Mishnaic concept of "Torah im derekh erets" (Avot 2.2, 3.21) into a doctrinal slogan—"Torah Judaism in harmony with secular culture"—he aimed to win over middle-class Jews in Frankfurt and elsewhere who were in the process of abandoning traditional norms. While readily adopting the externals of modernism (educational reform, German patriotism, Western dress, and an improvement in the status of women), Hirsch reemphasized the authority of the Shulhan 'Arukh* and the importance of Torah study (albeit in a wider form), and he promoted the development of self-contained Orthodox congregations (see ADASS JISROEL). Hirsch's ideological works and his commentaries on the Bible and prayer book played an especially vital role in this campaign.

Some exponents of Neo-Orthodoxy objected to Hirsch's dogmatic intolerance, his negation of modern scholarly research (Wissenschaft des Judentums*), his lack of interest in the fate of Jews abroad, and his positive view of life in exile (translated into "Israel's universal mission"). From 1876 his advocacy of separatism or secession created a permanent rift not only in the broad communal framework but even within Neo-Orthodoxy itself. Ezriel *Hildesheimer, for example, split with Hirsch over the issues of the Berlin Rabbinical Seminary's establishment, cooperation with the non-Orthodox in matters of general concern, and renewed Jewish settlement in Erets Yisra'el. These divisions would later be reflected in the rift between Orthodox Zionism (Mizrachi) and anti-Zionism (Agudat Israel), also giving rise to the uneasy contemporary coexistence of "modern" (centrist) and "right-wing" (see HAREDIM) Orthodox groups. NEOPLATONISM, a modification of Platonism initiated by Plotinus (3d cent. CE) and his successors, and mediated by Islamic and Christian sources, that made a profound and lasting mark on Jewish thought during the Middle Ages. The philosophical systems of Plato (427–347) proved congenial to many religious minds (for example, *Philo of Alexandria, who sought to reconcile Platonic and Jewish traditions through the use of allegory). The Jewish Neoplatonists identified the Platonic "forms" with the creative thoughts of God, and God was defined as the Good, the First Principle, and "The One," that is, as absolutely singular and self-sufficient. From this ultimate One descended or emanated (see EMANATION; SEFIROT) the world of ideas and the material world. The human soul was a particle from a higher realm of being (the "World Soul" according to Plotinus, the "Throne of Glory" according to the Jewish Neoplatonists) to which it longed to return. Neoplatonism provided a philosophical basis not only for the rational but also for the spiritual and even mystical life. Its aim was to reach the ultimate One lying behind all concrete experience; its method was that of intellectual abstraction (namely, of contemplative ascent), by which it divested experience of all that was specifically human until nothing was left but God. Medieval Neoplatonism received a powerful impetus through the Liber de causis (attributed to Aristotle but actually written in the ninth century by a Muslim philosopher and containing extracts from the fifth-century Neoplatonist Proclus) and deeply affected Jewish philosophical and religious thought. Beginning with Yitshaq *Israeli (c.850–950), Jewish Neoplatonism reached its height with Shelomoh *ibn Gabirol in the purely philosophical sphere, and with *Bahya ben Yosef ibn Paquda' and *Yehudah ha-Levi's Kuzari in the ascetic and theological sphere. Other representatives of Neoplatonism were Avraham *ibn Ezra and Yosef ben Ya'aqov ibn *Zaddik. While Neoplatonism was soon eclipsed by *Aristotelianism in philosophy, Neoplatonism continued to exert a powerful influence on mystical speculation and, in particular, on the emergent *Kabbalah in the thirteenth century, which adapted its theory of emanation. Some modern critics maintain that Neoplatonism, with its monistic tendency, its exaltation of the abstract above the concrete, and its hostility to the material order of creation, is essentially incompatible with biblical teaching and spirituality.

NER TAMID (נֶר תָּמִיד; perpetual or eternal lamp), originally, a lamp, prescribed in Exodus 27.20–21 and Leviticus 24.2 as an essential requirement of the Tabernacle in the wilderness and later in the Temple. The ner tamid had to be placed "outside the veil of testimony in the tabernacle of the congregation" and was part of the seven-branched candelabrum. The priests had to see that it was kept continually burning, and only pure olive oil could be used for it. The ever-burning lamp was taken to symbolize, among other things, God's eternal watchfulness over and providence for his people. The account of the origin of *Hanukkah given in the Talmud (Shab. 21b) centers around the miracle by which a single day's supply of pure oil found in the Temple by the victorious Maccabees burned for eight days as the ner tamid until new oil could be prepared. The eternal lamp was the westernmost branch of the candelabrum and was therefore called "the western lamp" (Tam. 6.1; Shab. 22b). According to the Midrash (Sifra' Emor 13), all seven branches of the candelabrum were filled with the same quantity of oil each night, but while all the other wicks in the branches of the candelabrum burned until the morning, the ner tamid remained alight until the next evening, at which time it was refilled. Since the *synagogue is called a "minor sanctuary" (Meg. 29a), it became customary, but not obligatory, to incorporate a ner tamid into its design. At first, there was considerable objection to the practice of suspending the ner tamid in front of the ark, on the grounds that this was a gentile custom, and it was felt by some that, as in the Temple, the ner tamid should be suspended on the western wall. It was regarded as highly meritorious to provide oil for the ner tamid. Those who did so are blessed in the Sabbath morning *Mi she-Berakh prayer. Today the lamp is usually electric.

NESHAMAH YETERAH (נֶשְׁמָה יְתֵרָה; additional soul), according to legend, a higher soul given by God to Abraham that dwelt within him and elevated him throughout the Sabbath. This soul is granted to every person for the duration of the Sabbath (Beits. 16a), and, according to one source, the custom of smelling *spices during the *Havdalah service at the termination of the Sabbath is meant to comfort individuals for the loss of this extra soul. The kabbalists applied the concept of an additional soul mystically, and in one of the *zemirots ascribed to Yitshaq ben Shelomoh *Luria (Yom Zeh le-Yisra'el), the Sabbath is called "an additional soul for the suffering."

NETAN'EL BEIRAV FAYYUMI (died c.1165), leader of Yemenite Jewry. Maimonides lavishes praise upon him in his Iggeret Teiman, addressed to Netan'el's son, Ya'aqov. In his apologetic work Bustan al-'Uqul (published with an English translation and edited by David Levine [New York, 1908; repr., 1966]), Netan'el presents a Neoplatonic philosophy of Judaism that owes much to Sa'adyah Ga'on, Yehudah ha-Levi, and Bahya ibn Paquda'. Drawing on the Ikhwan al-Safa of the Isma'iliyah, Netan'el maintains that God sends a prophet to every people according to its language and level of spiritual development; hence, Muḥammad was a true prophet and the Qur'an an authentic revelation for the Arabic-speaking peoples. There is some controversy as to whether Fayyumi is a personal or place name, and Netan'el is often referred to as ibn al-Fayyumi.

NETHINIM, the lowest class of Temple servants from the time of Joshua until Ezra. According to one tradition, they were originally the conquered Canaanites ("hewers of wood and drawers of water") given by David to the Levites to perform menial tasks in the sanctuary along with Gibeonites. Nethinim went into the Babylonian exile and returned with Zerubbabel and Ezra. Though subscribing to the commandments as incorporated into Ezra's covenant, they were still regarded as inferior, and intermarriage with them remained forbidden. They did, however, enjoy a special tax exemption, as did the priests and Levites (Ezr. 7.24). They lived in a designated section of Jerusalem (Neh. 3.26) and in other cities of Judah; the Nethinim were still known at the time of R. Yehudah ha-Nasi', while in amoraic times mention is made of a village of Nethinim.

NETUREI QARTA' (Aram.; Guardians of the City), name adopted by a group of Orthodox extremists in Jerusalem who refuse to recognize the existence or the authority of the State of Israel, in view of the secular nature of its creation and orientation. The group first appeared in 1938, splitting off from *Agudat Israel. The name Neturei Qarta' originates from an incident in which R. Yehudah ha-Nasi' sent R. Hiyya' and R. Ashi on a pastoral tour of inspection. In one town, they asked to see the "guardians of the city," and the city guard was paraded before them. They said that these were not the guardians of the city but its destroyers, which prompted the citizens to ask who, then, could be considered the guardians. The rabbis answered, "The scribes and the scholars," referring them to Psalms 127.1 (Y., Hag. 76c).

NEW TESTAMENT, name given to the specifically Christian holy scriptures, as distinct from the Hebrew Bible that Christians call the *Old Testament. The term is derived from Jeremiah 31.31: "Behold the days come, says the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the House of Israel and the House of Judah." Christians applied this verse to accord with their belief in the abrogation of the Law through the fulfillment of the messianic prophecies of *Jesus. To Jews, the term is pejorative, implying that the New Testament has replaced the Old.

The earliest sources of the New Testament are the oral traditions transmitted by Jesus' disciples (probably in Aramaic or Mishnaic Hebrew), which were eventually committed to writing and edited (in Greek) as the Gospels. The chronology of the editing of the Gospels is a matter of scholarly controversy, but it is generally agreed that the final versions date from long after the events described, probably from about the end of the first century CE. The earliest canon dates from the middle of the second century CE. Modern scholars are of the view that attitudes of the period of the editing were interjected into the Gospel stories. By the end of the first century, the Christians were in a state of considerable tension with the Jews and were seeking to curry favor with the Roman overlords. This is reflected in the Gospels, especially in the account of the last days of Jesus.

The New Testament has been seen by Jews as a major source of the teaching of contempt, characterizing Christian *antisemitism. Its anti-Jewish polemic has various aspects. One is Christological—the teaching that God can only be seen in terms of Christ. Another is the supersessionist doctrine, which teaches that the new covenant has replaced the ancient covenant between God and the Jews, with all that this entails. The validity of the Old Testament is solely as a preparation for the New. There is also the defamation of Jews, branded as deicides, with their guilt extending to all future generations.

Modern Jewish scholars have made important contributions to the study of the New Testament, and Christian scholarship has become increasingly aware of the polemic elements. The 1985 Vatican document, "The Common Bond," states: "It cannot be ruled out that some references in the New Testament, hostile or less than favorable to the Jews have their historical context in conflicts between the nascent church and the Jewish community. Certain controversies reflect Christian-Jewish relations long after the time of Jesus. To establish this is of capital importance if we wish to bring out the meaning of certain Gospel texts for Christians today."

NEZIQIN (נִזְקִין; Damages), fourth order of the Mishnah and Tosefta', dealing primarily with monetary subjects and damages that are legally adjudicated. It contains ten tractates: Bava' Qamma', Bava' Metsi'a', Bava' Batra' (these three originally constituted a single tractate called Neziqin), Sanhedrin, Makkot (originally the concluding chapters of tractate Sanhedrin), Shevu'ot, 'Eduyyot, 'Avodah Zarah, Avot, and Horayot. Except for Avot and 'Eduyyot, which have no gemara' in either Talmud, all have gemara' in both Talmuds.

NIDDAH (נִדָּה; Menstruating Woman), tractate in Mishnah order Tohorot, in ten chapters, with related material in the Tosefta', the Talmud Bavli, and partially in the Talmud Yerushalmi. In biblical law, *menstruation renders a woman ritually impure (Lv. 15.19–33), as well as halakhically unfit for sexual relations (Lv. 18.19). Niddah deals almost exclusively with the ritual impurity of a menstruating woman, touching only briefly on the prohibition against sexual relations (Nid. 1.7–2.3, 10.8).

The rabbinic discussion of niddah focuses on uncertainties regarding the status of a woman's purity. Normally in halakhah people are presumed to be pure unless and until they know themselves to have been defiled. Inasmuch as emissions from a woman's genital region are often irregular regarding their timing, their nature, and their source, rabbinic halakhah modified this assumption of purity regarding women during their menstruating years. Hence, a menstruating woman is presumed—with respect to the opinion of Shamm'ai (Nid. 1.1)—to have defiled food or utensils with which she has come in contact for up to twenty-four hours prior to discovering the menstruation, unless her period is highly regular. The rabbis encouraged women to check themselves regularly and frequently, particularly before conjugal relations or handling sanctified food.

Following the biblical equation of the impurity resulting from childbirth with the impurity of niddah (Lv. 12.2), Niddah discusses the halakhic definition of childbirth, defining the stages of development of the fetus as well as the laws governing the halakhic status of children at various stages of their development. Adult status, for males as well as for females, is defined in terms of the attainment of sexual majority.

An English translation of Niddah by I. W. Slotki appears in the Soncino Talmud (London, 1948).

NIETO, DAVID (1654–1728), rabbi of the Spanish-Portuguese community in London from 1701. Born to an ex-converso family in Venice, he studied medicine and philosophy in Padua. Until 1701 he served as member of the rabbinical court in Leghorn. Nieto strongly defended traditional Judaism against neo-Karaite and fundamentalistic trends prevailing among his ex-converso brethren (Matteh Dan [London, 1714]) and vehemently attacked contemporary neo-Shabbatean currents (Esh dat [London, 1715]). Following suspicions that he shared deistic views identifying God with nature, he clarified in his work De la divina providencia (London, 1705) that his theological view concerning divine providence is in accordance with that of the classical Jewish thinkers and biblical interpreters. Nieto's book is considered a significant contribution to contemporary antideistic doctrines.

NIGGUN (נִגּוּן; Yi. nign), one of several words meaning tune; it most commonly denotes one of the wordless melodies first popularized by the Hasidim in the eighteenth century. Table melodies, dance tunes, and marches comprise the primary genres; different Hasidic sects favor particular forms of each. Adapting kabbalistic traditions from Safed, Hasidism viewed music as the key to unlock the gates of heaven. Some niggunim carry liturgical texts in Hebrew or Yiddish, but the absence of text enables the expression of pure emotion through wordless song. The belief that the expression of joy and religious fervor through music is dearer to God than formalistic prayers contributed to the schism between Hasidim and their opponents in the yeshivah community.

NINTH OF AV. See TISH'AH BE-'AV.

NIQQUR (נִקּוּר; porging), the removal of forbidden fat (helev*) from meat. The fat of those species of animals fit to be brought as sacrifices in the Temple was forbidden for consumption (Lv. 7.25) and was burnt on the altar (Lv. 3.3–4). Generally the forbidden fats form a separate solid layer that is surrounded by a skin or membrane, which is easily peeled off. There are, however, some threads of forbidden fat that must be porged out with great skill and care. (The rabbis legislate the porging of 51 out of 121 sinews). Niqqur may be undertaken only by a menaqger who has received practical training from a recognized expert on the subject. It should be performed as soon as possible after the slaughter of an animal to prevent the fats from hardening. The laws of niqqur are found in the Yoreh De'ah section of the Shulhan 'Arukh.

NISAN (נִסָּן), first month of the religious year, seventh of the civil. It has thirty days, and its zodiac sign is Aries (which the rabbis connected with the paschal lamb). In the earlier biblical books its name is given as Abib (see Aviv), Nisan being derived from the Assyrian. According to tradition, Nisan is the month of the creation of the world, the birth of the patriarchs, the Exodus from Egypt, the erection of the Tabernacle, and it will also be the month of redemption. The first day of Nisan was the New Year of Kings, and reigns were reckoned from that date. The fourteenth day of Nisan is the first-born fast, 15 Nisan is the start of *Pesah (which lasts until 21 Nisan in Israel, until 22 Nisan in the Diaspora), and the 'Omer period is counted from 16 Nisan. Nisan is a festive month when public mourning is avoided and *Taḥanun omitted from the daily prayers. Yom ha-Sho'ah (Holocaust Memorial Day) is now observed on 27 Nisan (the date is connected to the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising).

NISSIM BEN RE'UVEN GERONDI (c.1315–1375), leading Spanish Talmudist; also known as the Ran. He was probably born in Gerona but lived most of his life in Barcelona, where he headed a yeshivah and was also court physician. He issued many taqqanot that were applicable to all of Spain, and he sent rulings in response to halakhic queries from places as distant as Erets Yisra'el and Syria. His halakhic writings, for which he was best known, were characterized by their clarity. They included comments and novellae on the Talmud (his commentary to the Talmudic tractate Nedarim replaces that of Rashi in standard editions), a commentary on the halakhot of Yitshaq Alfasi, responsa, and a book of sermons written in a philosophic style but antiphilosophic in content. Similarly his commentary on the Pentateuch stresses the superiority of Torah and prophecy over philosophy.

NISSIM BEN YA'AQOV BEN NISSIM IBN SHAHIN (c.990–1062), North African rabbinic scholar. He lived in Kairouan, where he succeeded his father, Ya'aqov ben Nissim ibn Shahin (died 1006/7), as head of one of the city's two famous academies. Kairouan was the leading Jewish center in North Africa and was deeply influenced by the traditions of the Babylonian academies. Nissim was in correspondence with *Ha'i Ga'on and was also in close contact with *Shemu'el ha-Nagid in Spain. When his daughter married Shemu'el's son, he visited Granada and taught there for a time. Nissim wrote extensively, and three of his major compositions are known. His major scholarly work, Sefer Maftaḥ Man'ulei ha-Talmud (Vienna, 1847, and in the Vilna [Romm] edition of the Talmud), gives sources for quotations in the Talmud and also provides commentaries on many Talmudic themes. Only part has been preserved. It was written in Arabic and translated into Hebrew. Megillat ha-Setarim is a bilingual (Hebrew and Arabic) miscellany covering many subjects of interest to scholars, such as explanations of the biblical text in the contemporary spirit, expositions of sections of the Talmud and Midrash, responsa, and customs. The original has not been preserved, but it was widely quoted and a subject index has been found (by S. Assaf, Tarbiz 11 [1940]: 229–259). The work for which he is best remembered is Hibbur (Yafeh) min ha-Yeshu'ah (Ferrara, 1557; Jerusalem, 1969; English translation by William M. Brinner, An Elegant Composition Concerning Relief After Adversity [New Haven, 1977]). This anthology of entertaining stories and folktales was a pioneering work of its kind, the first medieval Hebrew prose example of belles-lettres, and basically it had an ethical purpose, directed to the lay reader. It was written in Arabic but was translated into Hebrew and became highly popular.

NISSU'IN. See BETROTHAL.

NOAH (Heb. Noah), hero of the biblical story of the Flood; son of Lamech (Gn. 5.28–29). Noah was a just and righteous man who “walked with God” (Gn. 6.9). He, his family, and representatives of all existing species were saved from the annihilation of all living things by the Flood in an ark (see ARK OF NOAH), which he built at God's command. Noah's first act upon leaving the ark, which had come to rest on mountains of Ararat (in Armenia) as the flood waters had receded, was to make a sacrifice to God. His sacrifice was accepted, and the blessing of fertility and dominion previously vouchsafed to Adam was now bestowed in a covenant upon him (Gn. 9.1–17). Unlike the heroes of other ancient accounts of floods, such as the Sumerian Ziusudra or the Babylonian Utnapishtim, for whom escape from the deluge resulted in apotheosis, Noah remained mortal. The biblical tale also stresses the moral dimension of the story; moral corruption caused the eventual annihilation of humankind, and Noah was saved because he was found to be a righteous man (Gn. 6.9). Unlike the other Mesopotamian traditions, the biblical Flood story concludes with the making of a covenant between God and humanity. Noah was remembered in later tradition as being one of the three prototypes of righteousness (together with Daniel and Job; Ez. 14.14, 20). Talmudic controversy over the proper evaluation of Noah's virtue derived from the passage “Noah was a righteous and wholehearted man in his generation” (Gn. 6.9). The rabbis commented that “in his generation” could have either a derogatory or a laudatory implication (San. 108a). He is described as a husbandman, but the story of his planting a vineyard and his subsequent intoxication contributed to the division of opinion among the rabbis as to the strength of his character and virtue. Humanity as a whole descended from Noah's three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth (Gn. 10.1).

NOAHIC LAWS, injunctions traditionally given to *Noah and therefore binding upon Jews and gentiles alike. According to the Talmud, there were seven such laws, or rather categories of laws, derived from the early chapters of Genesis and consisting of prohibitions against blasphemy, idolatry, sexual immorality (including homosexuality), murder (including abortion), robbery, and eating a portion of a living animal, and an injunction concerning the administration of justice (Sanh. 56a). The last of these is interpreted by Nahmanides to include the entire range of social legislation and is also the basis of Maimonides' justification of Simeon and Levi's slaughter of the city of Hamor and Shechem (Gn. 34). Another Talmudic source (Hul. 92a) counts thirty such laws, but they are seen as mere derivations from the basic seven. According to Maimonides a gentile had to acknowledge the divine source of the Noahic laws in order to be regarded as one of the pious of the world. According to the Talmud, gentiles are subject to the death penalty for violating any of the seven Noahic laws, a penalty more severe than that suffered by Jews. There is, however, no evidence that this ruling ever had practical implications. Modern scholars are divided on the date of the conception of the Noahic laws. Louis Finkelstein argued that the laws were formulated to deal with gentiles living under Jewish rule during the Hasmonean period. Hayyim Tchernowitz regarded Noahic law as originating in ancient Hittite law. David Novak has argued that, lacking any real evidence for an earlier dating, the Noahic laws should be regarded as having originated in the post-Temple tannaitic period. Throughout Jewish history the Noahic laws were of only theoretical interest to Jews. However, in the 1980s the Lubavitch movement began missionizing to gentiles in an effort to encourage worldwide observance of these laws.

NOBEL, NEHEMIAH (1871–1922), Orthodox rabbi and Zionist leader in Germany. A Hungarian-born graduate of the Berlin Rabbinical Seminary, he acquired a broad academic education and later studied under Hermann *Cohen in Marburg. After serving the Cologne, Leipzig, and Hamburg communities, Nobel succeeded Marcus Horovitz as communal Orthodox rabbi and av beit din in Frankfurt am Main in 1910. Two of his measures, restoring the eruv to permit carrying on the Sabbath and granting women a vote in communal affairs, angered Orthodox secessionists. Unlike most German rabbis of his time, Nobel was an outspoken Zionist from 1897 and also chaired the first Mizrahi (Religious Zionist) conference in Pressburg in 1904. His sermons, lectures, and personality influenced Franz *Rosenzweig, Martin *Buber, and other young intellectuals. Nobel was elected president of the Union of German Rabbis in 1919, the only Orthodox Jew to be so honored. A collection of Nobel's addresses and learned articles was published in the volume Hagut ve-Halakhah (Jerusalem, 1969), which also includes a biographical study by Yeshayahu Avi'ad.

NOTARIQON (נוטריקון; Gr. notarikon; Lat. notaricum, from "shorthand writer"), representation of a word or phrase by a single letter, usually the initial; also a method of interpreting a word by considering each letter to be the initial of another word, in contrast to gimatriyyah*, a form of interpretation based on the numerical value of a word (each Hebrew letter has a numerical value). Interpretation by notariqon consists of moral and homiletical lessons derived from the reading of a word as composed of initial letters of other words. Thus a rabbinical notariqon explains the word mizbeah (altar) as constituting an *abbreviation of me'ilah, zekhut, berakhah, hayyim (forgiveness, merit, blessing, life). Notariqon was also popular among the kabbalists, who, for example, explained the word tesht (drink) in Judges 13.14 as tefillat shikor to'evah, "the prayer of a drunkard is an abomination" (Avqat Rokhel, last section). Sometimes the words were divided up; thus, the name Reuben (Gn. 29.32) was explained as re'u ben, "see a son" (Pirquei de-Rabbi Eli'ezer 36). Notariqon was recognized by the rabbis as one of the thirty-two methods of homiletical interpretation of the Bible.

NOTHINGNESS (Heb. 'ayin). The Hebrew term 'ayin has had a complex, paradoxical history in Jewish mysticism. Job 28.20, "Whence then does wisdom come" (the word whence in Hebrew is me-'ayin, which could be interpreted as "from nothingness"), was understood, in kabbalistic terms, to mean that the origin of Hokhmah, the second sefirah*, is from 'ayin; because of this, 'ayin became a term for the highest sefirah, Keter, and the source of all existence. Some kabbalists identified it with the hidden, eternal Godhead itself. 'Ayin thus became a term designating true, pure, and eternal existence, unlike the ephemeral and imperfect existence of everything else. In the early Kabbalah, this "nothingness" represents reality. In modern times, the term acquired a central position in the mystical theology of *Habad Hasidism, which postulates that one must turn one's self into nothingness by disregarding worldly phenomena that are meaningless; by negating them and the physical self, union is made with the 'ayin in a bond that is the supreme spiritual achievement.

NUMBERS. Although numbers play a great role in religious symbolism, there are few numbers with special significance in the Bible. The most prominent number is seven (e.g., seven days of Creation; the Sabbath as the seventh day of the week; the seventh—sabbatical—year; the jubilee year after seven cycles of sabbatical years; the 'Omer cycle of seven times seven days; the conquest of Jericho, in which seven priests with seven shofars circled the city for seven days, including seven circuits on the seventh day—Jos. 6.1ff.). Other numbers mentioned frequently in the Bible include ten (the smallest number of men who might save Sodom; the ten plagues of Egypt; the Ten Commandments; the tithes) and forty (the Flood, during which it rained for forty days and forty nights; the forty days and nights that Moses spent on Mount Sinai—twice—receiving the Torah; the forty-day period during which the spies spied out the land of Canaan; the forty-year punishment during which the Jews had to remain in the desert; the forty-lash—in practice reduced to thirty-nine—penalty for various offenses; stretches of forty years of quiet in Erets Yisra'el during different eras of the period of the judges). Although the Hebrew numerical system was a decimal one, its method of calculating time was evidently Babylonian, with a twenty-four-hour day and a sixty-minute hour. The attribution of numerical values to letters of the alphabet encouraged mystical exegesis and speculation as well as magical practice. The fact that every Hebrew word has its numerical equivalent gave rise to interpretation by gimatriyyah*, a method extensively employed in the Midrash for homiletical purposes. Gimatriyyah is the twenty-ninth of the thirty-two hermeneutical rules of R. Yosei ha-Galili. Another of R. Yosei's hermeneutical rules that relates to numbers is his twenty-seventh, which states that whenever the same number appears in two different contexts (e.g., the forty days of the Flood and the forty years in the desert), one may draw parallels between the two events. These methods were developed to extremes in Jewish mystical literature (see SEFER YETSIRAH), particularly in the Kabbalah.

NUMBERS, BOOK OF, the fourth book of the Torah. Its traditional name is Ba-Midbar (In the Wilderness [of Sinai]), taken from the opening verse; the rabbis also called it Homesha ha-Pe'udim (The Fifth of [the Torah Concerning] Those Who Were Counted), referring to the censuses of the Israelites the book recounts; this is the origin of the Greek title Arithmoi, from which the English name Numbers is derived.

Numbers is the direct continuation of Leviticus. A month after the erection of the Tabernacle at Mount Sinai, God orders the Israelites to prepare for the journey to Canaan. The preparations include conducting a census of the Israelites (chap. 1) and the Levites (chap. 3), arranging the tribes for the journey (chap. 2), supplying the Tabernacle with sacrificial implements and ingredients (contributed by the chiefs of each tribe; chap. 7), purifying and dedicating the Levites (chap. 8), and manufacturing silver trumpets for use in mustering the tribes (chap. 10.1–10). Interspersed are instructions concerning the duties of each Levitical family in transporting the Tabernacle (chap. 4), the purity of the camp, atonement for false oaths, the Nazirite, the ordeal of jealousy, the Birkat ha-Kohanim (chaps. 5–6), the Menorah (chap. 8.1–4), and Pesah Sheni (chap. 9.1–14).

Following the pillar of cloud and fire (chap. 9.15–23), guided by Hobab, Moses' father-in-law, and with the Ark of the Covenant leading the way (chap. 10.29–36), the Israelites commence their march. They immediately complain about food and water; God provides amply for their needs but punishes them for their faithlessness (chap. 11). Aaron and Miriam are chastised for questioning Moses' privileged position (chap. 12). Arriving at the edge of the Promised Land, the tribes dispatch scouts, who report that the Canaanites are too fierce, and their cities too highly fortified, for Israel to defeat. The people, convinced that the land is too difficult to conquer, wish to return to Egypt; for this sin, God sentences the entire generation to die in the wilderness, decreeing that only their children will enter the Promised Land (chaps. 13–14).

Few of the events of the next thirty-eight years are related; the most significant is the failed insurrection of Korah and his followers (chaps. 16–17). The process of law giving continues: instructions are received concerning sacrifice, fringes on garments (chap. 15), encroachment on the sanctuary, tithes (chap. 18), and purification from contact with the dead (chap. 19). The accounts of the deaths of Miriam and Aaron and the story of Moses' sin, for which he too is condemned to die in the wilderness, mark the end of this tragic period (chap. 20).

The account is resumed in the thirty-ninth year following the Exodus. Approaching the land of Canaan, Israel is forced to fight against Edom and the king of Arad, as well as against Sihon and Og (chaps. 20–21). Finally they encamp on the Plains of Moab across the Jordan from Jericho, where the alarmed Moabites attempt to invoke the curses of Balaam*. The latter is prevented by God from cursing Israel and blesses them instead (chaps. 22–24). The threat of Midianite apostasy leads to all-out war and the utter defeat of Midian (chaps. 25 and 31). A census of the second generation is conducted (chap. 26), and instructions are given for the distribution of the land of Canaan among the tribes, as well as for the allotment of Levitical cities and cities of refuge (chaps. 27 and 34–36). Joshua is appointed as Moses' successor (chap. 27.12–23). Two and a half tribes convince Moses to allow them to settle east of the Jordan, but only after the conquest of Canaan has been completed (chap. 32). More laws are given, including the laws of daily, Sabbath, new moon, and festival offerings, and those concerning vows (chaps. 28–30); the process of law giving finally completed and the itinerary recorded for posterity (chap. 33), the Israelites are ready for their invasion of Canaan.

Bible critics assign most of Numbers, including almost all of the laws and the chronology, to the Priestly source, but significant portions of the narrative belongs to the epic sources (J and E). Numbers is divided into ten weekly portions, read in the synagogue in early summer, from just before Shavu'ot until shortly before 9 Av.

NUMBERS RABBAH, Midrashic work on the Book of Numbers in the medieval anthology Midrash Rabbah*, composed of two distinct sections. Numbers Rabbah I (chaps. 1–14) is an extensive Midrashic commentary to the annual cycle lections “Ba-Midbar” and “Naso” (Nm. 1–7), which seems to have been edited in the twelfth century CE, probably in Provence. The author-editor made use of both Talmuds Bavli and Yerushalmi, earlier Midrashic works, and, most significantly, the teachings of Moshe ha-Darshan*. Numbers Rabbah II (chaps. 15–23) is essentially the same text as midrash Tanhuma’ to the rest of Numbers (chaps. 8–36). An English translation of the work by J. J. Slotki appeared in the Soncino Midrash (London, 1939).

NUSSAḤ (נִסָּח), a Hebrew term that originally meant “removal” and hence “copying”; it is now used in three different ways, each conveying the idea of “accepted formula”: to refer to textual variants (Rashi and the tosafists, however, employed the word girsā’ to signify different readings); to distinguish the differing liturgical rites of the various communities and groups, also known as minhag*; and to denote the nussah ha-tefillah, the traditional manner in which the prayers are chanted as they have been handed down through the centuries. Sabbaths, festivals, and weekdays have unique melodies that distinguish one occasion from the other. Books such as Lamentations and Esther have their own melodies. Various communities have also chanted the Torah and haftarah readings with unique systems of cantillation. See also MUSIC.

OATH. See VOWS AND OATHS.

OATH MORE JUDAICO, a special oath that Jews had to take when in litigation with non-Jews. As early as the sixth century, Emperor Justinian I legislated that Jews were inadmissible as witnesses against Christians. During the Middle Ages, Jews were permitted to testify under this special oath, which took various forms, very often of a degrading nature. The oath was sometimes accompanied by a humiliating ceremony (for example, standing on the skin of a sow). The model for later legislation was the oath adopted by German courts in 1555, in which the Jewish witness had to call down upon himself all the curses in Leviticus 26, Deuteronomy 28, and the plagues of Egypt. Moses *Mendelssohn succeeded in persuading the Prussian government to modify the oath, but it remained in force in some countries until the beginning of the twentieth century. The imposition of this oath was based upon the false allegation that by the *Kol Nidrei formula the Jew absolves himself from all oaths.

OBADIAH (Heb. 'Ovadyah; 6th cent. BCE), prophet in the kingdom of Judah. The Book of Obadiah, which provides no information about the prophet, consists of oracles against Edom, describing Edom's actions during the fall of Jerusalem in 586 and foretelling Edom's future downfall. Talmudic tradition identifies the prophet as an Idumean proselyte identical with the Obadiah in 1 Kings 18 who hid the prophets during the time of Elijah (San. 39b).

The Book of Obadiah is the fourth book of the Minor Prophets. The shortest book in the entire Bible, it consists of one chapter with twenty-one verses describing the guilt of Edom in connection with the fall of Jerusalem. The Edomites not only rejoiced over the destruction of the city, but intercepted the Judahites when they attempted to flee. In a vivid "Day of the Lord" prophecy, Obadiah predicts that the tables will be turned and that Israel will possess Edom. Obadiah shares many affinities with the oracle against Edom in Jeremiah 49.7–22. Critical opinion is divided as to whether Obadiah is a single work or a composite of two authors (the second part said to consist of the first half of verse 15 and verses 16–21).

ODEL, daughter of Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer *Ba'al Shem Tov. Hasidic tradition says that he derived her soul, and so her name, from the Torah, by constructing it out of the initial letters of Deuteronomy 33.2: "A fiery law unto them" (esh dat lamo). She is known principally from Hasidic legends collected in Shivhei ha-Besht and from letters drawn from a genizah of Hasidic forgeries in Kherson. Some sources characterize her as one of her father's disciples, who gave out magical remedies to the sick; other traditions do not portray her as possessing any spiritual ambition. She married Yehi'el Ashkenazi and was the mother of the renowned Hasidic masters R. Moshe Hayyim Efrayim of Sudylkow and R. Barukh of Medzhibozh. Her daughter Feigeh was the mother of Hasidic master Naḥman of Bratslav, who was quoted as having said of Odel: "All the masters knew her to be endowed with divine inspiration; she was a woman of great intellect."

OFANNIM (אֲנָנִים), class of *angels. The term is derived from Ezekiel's vision of the divine throne-chariot (Ez. 1.15ff.) and originally referred to the wheels that bear the throne. In later literature, ofannim became the designation of an angelic hierarchy, similar to *cherubim, *seraphim, and hayyot. The name was also given to a genre of liturgical prayers inserted by Ashkenazim into the *Yotser prayer on Sabbaths and festivals, describing the angelic praise of God and beginning with the words, "The ofannim and holy hayyot."

OHALOT (אֲהָלוֹת; Tents), tractate in Mishnah order Toharot, in eighteen chapters, with related material in To-sefta'. It has no gemara in either Talmud. It discusses the ritual impurity spread by a corpse, which defiles for seven days anything that touches it, as well as whatever is together with it in one tent (Nm. 19.13–20). The tractate's main topic is the delineation of the rules applying to the impurity transmitted by tents. In rabbinic law, this is understood to include any person, utensil, clothing, or food that passes above or below the corpse, as well as persons or susceptible items that are under the same roof as the corpse. Furthermore, the impurity spreads to openings and passages, following the rule that "the manner of impurity is to go out" (Ohal. 3.7). Therefore, the impurity of a sealed grave (Nm. 19.16) is transmitted to anyone who touches it or passes over it. Places where there is suspicion that corpse parts may be found must be treated as impure.

Ohalot 7 brings together a collection of diverse regulations, ranging from the minimum dimensions of a sealed grave to the conditions for a dead fetus in the womb to contaminate and culminates in the permission to abort the fetus in order to save the life of the mother.

An English translation of the tractate is in Herbert Danby's The Mishnah (London, 1933).

OHEL (אֹהֶל; tent). Numbers 19.14 states that any human beings or utensils in the same tent with a *corpse contract ritual *impurity for a period of seven days. Because priests are not permitted to contract ritual uncleanness, they must not enter a house where a corpse lies, nor may they enter a cemetery. The term ohel is also used for a structure over a tomb and was especially applied to those structures erected over the graves of outstanding Hasidic rabbis.

OIL, together with grain and wine, is listed as one of the three blessings bestowed by God on Erets Yisra'el (Dt. 11.14). In the Tabernacle and Temple only "pure olive oil beaten for the light to cause the lamp [see CANDLES; MENORAH] to burn always" (Ex. 27.20) was permitted for use; among eastern Jews this is still the only oil permitted for the eternal lamp in the synagogue. Rabbi *Tarfon similarly declared that only olive oil could be used for the Sabbath lamps (Shab. 26a), but the accepted ruling is that generally any oil may be used (Shab. 2). Oil was used for the ceremonial *anointing of high priests and kings and in the purification process after leprosy (Lv. 13.45). Candles have largely replaced oil, though many still prefer the use of oil for the Hanukkah lamp. Oil also formed part of some sacrificial offerings, for example, in the burnt offering and cereal offerings (Lv. 2.4). See also KINDLING OF LIGHTS.

OKHLAH VE-OKHLAH, a work based on the *Masorah, probably composed in Babylonia in the tenth century, that catalogs in 398 lists peculiarities and distinctive features in the spelling of the biblical text. The opening list of the book records pairs of words that occur in the Bible only once with and once without the letter vav. The first pair of words is okhlah and ve-okhlah (1 Sm. 1.9 and Gn. 27.19, respectively). In its present form the work includes additions by later Sephardi and Ashkenazi scholars.

'OLAH. See BURNT OFFERING.

'OLAM (עוֹלָם), originally a term with temporal connotation: from unending past to unending future, eternity.

Psalms 106.48 praises God from 'olam to 'olam (for ever and ever). The word also acquired a spatial meaning: world or universe. In the eschatological terminology of the late Second Temple period, *'olam ha-zeh and 'olam ha-ba' signified, respectively, the present age and the future age (i.e., the messianic dispensation, the kingdom of God, etc.), but the terms later came to mean this world in which we live and, like the English word hereafter, a more spatially conceived celestial abode of the soul after death. One of the appellations of God in liturgy and rabbinic literature is ribbono shel 'olam (Lord of the universe). The title melekh ha-'olam (King of the universe), which occurs in every benediction formula, similarly refers to God as creator, ruler, and master of the universe.

'OLAM HA-ZEH AND 'OLAM HA-BA' (עוֹלָם הַזֶּה וְעוֹלָם הַבָּא; this world and the world to come), eschatological concepts developed during the Second Temple period and in subsequent rabbinic literature. Originally, the meaning of the word 'olam was temporal (age) rather than spatial (world), and the terms signified, respectively, the present age, with all its shortcomings and miseries, and the future or messianic age (often identified with the *kingdom of heaven). It was believed that a major event, such as the Day of Judgment, would terminate 'olam ha-zeh and usher in 'olam ha-ba'. The concept of 'olam ha-ba' is thus different from that of *heaven or *paradise (see EDEN, GARDEN OF), which is the abode of departed souls pending the advent of the "coming age." However, the distinction was not always maintained in later literature, and in many rabbinic sayings the "other world" was understood as referring to the celestial realm of blessed souls. Berakhot 17a says, "The world to come is unlike this world. In the world to come there is no eating or drinking or propagation or business or jealousy or hatred or rivalry, but the righteous sit with crowns on their heads, enjoying the radiance of the divine presence." The punishment awaiting certain heretics is deprivation of their "share in the world to come," a state to which every Jew, as well as the righteous gentile, is entitled (San. 10.1). The relationship between 'olam ha-zeh and 'olam ha-ba' is expressed in two Mishnaic statements (Avot 4.21–22): "'olam ha-zeh is like an antechamber to 'olam ha-ba'. Prepare yourself in the antechamber so that you may enter the palace." Thus, 'olam ha-zeh is regarded as the place for performing good deeds and acquiring merits, which are then rewarded in 'olam ha-ba', the place of bliss. The other statement reads, "Better is one hour of repentance and good deeds in 'olam ha-zeh than the whole life of 'olam ha-ba'; and one hour of bliss in 'olam ha-ba' is better than the whole life of 'olam ha-zeh." OLD TESTAMENT, the traditional Christian name for the Jewish sacred scriptures (see BIBLE). The word testament is one of the terms used to translate the Hebrew word berit (covenant), the Bible's designation of the relationship between God and the Israelite people. Jeremiah, who prophesied on the eve of the fall of Judah and the exile to Babylonia, foresaw that the end of Israel's national existence would be followed by its eventual restoration. To express this, the prophet makes use of the concept of berit. God, he says (Jer. 31.30–33), will soon make a "new covenant" with the Israelites, that is, he will reestablish the relationship that had been terminated by the exile, restoring the Israelites to their land and their national sovereignty. The new covenant will be precisely like the old, the prophet says, except for one feature: the Israelites, by failing to keep God's laws, had broken the earlier one; the new one will be unbreakable. This, Jeremiah says, will be the result of God's inscribing the terms of the new covenant "on their hearts," a metaphorical way of saying that obedience to God will become effortless and natural; thus, it will endure forever.

Christian thinkers reinterpreted Jeremiah's prophecy in accord with their belief in God's rejection of the Jews and in the nullification of the commands of the Torah. They saw the term new covenant as an ancient prediction of the Christian promise of salvation through grace (the covenant "in the heart" was reinterpreted to refer to faith rather than practice), thus giving Christian gospel the stamp of prophetic corroboration. Eventually this led to the use of the term new covenant to denote Christian scripture, and ultimately to the use of the term old covenant to denote the sacred scriptures of the Jews. The English word testament (as in last will and testament) tends to emphasize one side of the berit: the promises made by God to Israel, whereas the word covenant (literally, a pact or agreement) emphasizes the mutual obligations imposed. In recent times, religiously neutral terms, such as Hebrew Bible (or Hebrew Scripture) and Christian Scripture, are favored over Old and New Testament (with the pejorative implication that the new replaces the old).

OMEN. See ORACLES.

'OMER (עֹמֶר), a sheaf of newly harvested barley. The children of Israel were commanded to bring an 'omer "on the morrow of the Sabbath," and only after offering the 'omer and the appropriate accompanying sacrifice were they permitted to eat the grain of the new harvest (Lev. 23.10–14). The *Pharisees maintained that the Sabbath mentioned in this verse refers to the first day of Pesah, which is the subject of the previous paragraph; in other words the 'omer was to be offered on the second day of Pesah (16 Nisan) and was to consist of a tenth of an ephah of barley. Seven full weeks were counted from this day, and the fiftieth day was observed as *Shavu'ot.

The *Sadducees, and later the *Karaites, interpreted the Sabbath in the verse as meaning the first Sabbath day during Pesah; therefore, Shavu'ot would always fall on a Sunday. To emphasize the importance of cutting the 'omer on 16 Nisan, the rabbis permitted it even when it fell on a Sabbath (Men. 10.1). The counting, which is observed to the present day, is called the "counting of the 'Omer." The announcement of each day is generally incorporated into the Ma'ariv service (the 'omer was reaped by night) after the recitation of an appropriate benediction, which is followed by a prayer for the restoration of the Temple service. The wall calendar hung in the synagogue to keep track of the counting of the 'Omer was sometimes the object of artistic design. The period between the first harvest and the first fruit harvest, which the counting of the 'Omer commemorates, must originally have been one of joy, but tradition has established it as a period of sadness and semimourning, during which—with the exception of *Lag ba-'Omer—merriment, the celebration of marriages (among Sephardim until Lag ba-'Omer), the cutting of hair, and the wearing of new clothes are all forbidden. The only basis for these abstinences is a vague statement in the Talmud (Yev. 62b) that "12,000 pairs of the disciples of R. Akiva died in one period" and that that period was "between Pesah and Shavu'ot." The passage is taken by most scholars to refer to the Bar Kokhba' Revolt. The ceremonious cutting of the first sheaf of corn on the morrow of the first day of Pesah has been revived in many agricultural settlements in the State of Israel. The Israel chief rabbinate and rabbis in the Diaspora (but not the Haredim) permit *Yom ha-'Atsma'ut (Independence Day) celebrations and the recital of sections of the *Hallel prayer on 5 Iyyar during the 'Omer. Celebrations are also held in Israel on *Yom Yerushalayim (Jerusalem Day; 28 Iyyar).

'ONEG SHABBAT (וְשִׂמְחָה; Sabbath delight), phrase based on Isaiah 58.13—"And you shall call the Sabbath a delight"—expressive of the traditional attitude toward the Sabbath. The rabbis approved of everything that would enhance the "Sabbath delight," recommending that additional dishes be served at the Sabbath meal and insisting on a minimum of three meals in honor of the day. Since the *Se'udah Shelishit (third meal) was the specific additional meal of the Sabbath, it became the principal occasion for 'oneg Shabbat and is marked by the singing of *zemiroth and the delivery of discourses on the biblical lesson of the day. The modern 'Oneg Shabbat, a cultural rather than a strictly religious occasion that attempts to capture the spirit of the Sabbath without necessarily adhering to its ritual forms, was introduced in Tel Aviv by the poet Hayyim Nahman Bialik in the 1920s. It included Bible study, a lecture, and the singing of Sabbath songs. The custom spread throughout Israel and to the Diaspora. In America, the term is often used for a collation after Friday night services.

ONIAS, TEMPLE OF, temple erected in the mid-second century BCE at Leontopolis in Egypt by the deposed high priest Onias III (who had fled to Egypt during persecutions by Antiochus IV Epiphanes in Jerusalem) or possibly by his son Onias IV (see Men. 109a–110b). It was built at the site of the shrine of an Egyptian goddess and seems to have served the local Jewish military colony, which may have included members of the priestly family who had fled with Onias. They offered sacrifices there, but it was never a rival to the Temple in Jerusalem. Among the explanations offered for why Onias built a temple and not a synagogue are personal ambition and Egyptian political aspirations. The temple was closed by the Romans in approximately 71 CE.

OPPENHEIM, DAVID BEN AVRAHAM (1664–1736), rabbinic scholar, halakhist, patron. He was born in Worms and studied in Metz and Landsberg. He served the communities of Nikolsburg and Prague and was named Landesrabbiner of Moravia and later of all Bohemia. He came into conflict with Yonatan Eybeschuetz of Prague, and disturbances between their students prompted Emperor Charles VI to intervene in favor of Oppenheim. Oppenheim was responsible for the collection and transfer of all funds raised in Europe for the benefit of Jews in Jerusalem.

In addition to his recognized erudition in rabbinic and halakhic literature, Oppenheim was a mathematician. He was also a collector of rare manuscripts and books, which he amassed using the wealth that he inherited from a variety of sources. A substantial portion of the Hebrew sections of the Bodleian Library in Oxford consists of items from his library. Oppenheim also was a patron of Jewish scholarship, dispensing numerous publication grants to editors of rabbinic works. Moreover, he allowed publishers access to his manuscripts in order to bring the works to the attention of the wider public. Most of Oppenheim's own work remains unpublished, although his responsa are preserved in a number of leading rabbinic collections of his day, including the responsa of R. Ya'ir Hayyim Bacharach and R. Ya'aqov Reischer.

ORACLES. The custom of consulting an oracle in times of crisis is almost universal. In ancient Mesopotamia, many types of natural phenomena as well as human behavior were considered ominous if interpreted properly, and several mechanical devices, such as oil in water, smoke, the flight of birds, or cracks in bones (shoulder blades) heated by fire, were considered signs of divine communication or signals heralding future events. The standard method of oracular inquiry in Mesopotamia was hepatoscopy, that is, liver divination, in which contours, marks, and colors on the liver of a sacrificial sheep were interpreted as ominous by a diviner (cf. Ez. 21.6). Biblical narratives mention certain methods of divination practiced by neighboring peoples (Nm. 22–24; 1 Sm. 6; Ez. 21.23–28), but their use was prohibited and characterized as an abomination (Lv. 19.25, 31; Dt. 18.9–13). *Necromancy was prohibited and, according to the biblical account, was suppressed by Saul although it seems to have been considered effective not only by Saul himself but by the biblical author (1 Sm. 28). The three acceptable oracular methods in Israel are mentioned in the passage "And when Saul inquired of the Lord, the Lord did not answer him, either by dreams, or by Urim, or by prophets" (1 Sm. 28.6). There are many instances of specific inquiries being answered by means of *dreams (Jgs. 7.13) or prophets (1 Kgs. 14) or other oracular media (2 Sm. 5.24); Urim and Thummim was the only method of divination by mechanical devices officially sanctioned by the Bible. When Joshua was appointed to succeed Moses as national leader, he was told that in the future he was to stand before Eleazar, the high priest, who would "ask counsel of him after the Urim," so as to determine the goings out and comings in of Israel (Nm. 27.21). It has been assumed that when mention is made of asking divine counsel (e.g., Jos. 9.14; Jgs. 1.1–2), it was sought through the Urim and Thummim. The precise nature of the terms and mode of operation are unknown apart from the statement that in putting the breastplate (hoshen) on Aaron, Moses "also put in the breastplate the Urim and Thummim" (Lv. 8.8). Some rabbinic sources as well as modern scholars identify the Urim and Thummim with the twelve gemstones decorating the high priest's breastplate, but these objects are unrelated. The Urim and Thummim probably served as a form of divination by lots that were kept in the breastplate of the high priest, and the procedure seems to be related to forms of oracular divination mentioned elsewhere, such as the *ephod (1 Sm. 23.9) and *lots (goral; Nm. 26.55). The Urim and Thummim were used in the preexilic period but are not mentioned after the time of Solomon. Nehemiah 7.65 states explicitly that they were no longer available in the postexilic age. The oracular use of the ephod is referred to in 1 Samuel 23.9, but this, too, may refer to the Urim and Thummim. Scholars have looked for analogies in extra-biblical sources that might provide answers to several of the enigmas of the Urim and Thummim. One such source is an Akkadian text found at Assur prescribing a ritual for psephomancy, divining by stones. This text bears some similarities to aspects of the Urim and Thummim. In this ritual, simple questions requiring a "yes" or "no" answer are posed, and the answer is provided by two stones that seem to be drawn from a garment. Of these, one is called a "stone of request" and the other a "stone of no request." The stones were white (alabaster) and black (hematite). The Akkadian word for alabaster (gishnugallu) means "the great light," which may correspond with the Hebrew urim (lights), while a popular name for hematite is "stone of truth," which parallels the Hebrew thummim (perfection, righteousness).

ORAH HAYYIM. See SHULHAN 'ARUKH.

ORAL LAW. According to rabbinic tradition, the oral law (torah she-be-'al peh) was given together with the *written law. The proof text for this tradition is the divine charge to Moses to teach the Torah to the Israelites by "putting it in their mouths" (Dt. 31.19), that is, orally.

The standard argument used by medieval authorities to demonstrate the need for the oral law is that in its absence it would be impossible to carry out most of the biblical commandments, since the specific details of their observance are generally missing from the biblical text. Classic examples of this difficulty are the definition of forbidden work on the Sabbath day and the precise nature of the "affliction of the soul" required on Yom Kippur. Dimensions and quantities, which are the lifeblood of halakhah, are entirely missing from the written law and rely upon the oral tradition for their existence (see Maimonides, Introduction to the Mishnah; Yehudah ha-Levi, Kuzari 3.35; R. Mosheh ben Ya'aqov of Coucy, Sefer Mitsvot Gadol, Introduction). The problem of applying biblical laws solely on the basis of their written text is highlighted in scripture itself. Although Moses knew that the penalty for breaking the Sabbath was death, he was unaware of the punishment to be meted out to a person caught gathering sticks on the Sabbath day. God proceeded to inform Moses that the individual concerned was to be put to death, and the precise method of execution was to be "stoning by the whole congregation" (Nm. 15.32–35). Moses also experienced practical difficulties in applying the law of inheritance recorded in the Bible to the family of Zelophehad, which consisted of five daughters, until God gave him the necessary instructions regarding female succession (Nm. 27.1–11). The necessary interdependence of the written and oral laws is expressed in the Talmudic account of a proselyte who had initially refused to accept the oral law. Hillel converted him and then proceeded to demonstrate that he could not possibly understand the written law without also accepting the oral law. The convert took Hillel's point and gave up his opposition to the oral tradition (Shab. 31a). The hermeneutical principles for the development of the written law eventually crystallized into the thirteen middot of R. Yishma'e'l ben Eli-sha', and it is these middot that constitute the basis of the legal nexus between the written and the oral laws (see HERMENEUTICS). Although the appellation oral is prescriptive as well as descriptive (Git. 60b), it is evident from the Talmud itself that halakhic material derived from the written law by the hermeneutical principles, together with rabbinic legislation and rational principles, was written down in scroll form for reference purposes (Shab. 6b; Rashi on Shabbat 6b, s.v. megillat setarim; B. M. 92a). The reasons offered for the prohibition against committing the oral law to writing include the jurisprudential need for flexibility in adapting the Torah to changing conditions (Sefer ha-Iqqarim 3.23) and the theological claim that the authentic interpretation of scripture is embodied in the oral law, which is the sole possession of Israel, as opposed to the other nations (Midrash Tanhuma, "Ki Tissa", no. 34). The Talmud links the permission to commit the oral law to writing in the period of R. Yehudah ha-Nasi' with the impossibility of remembering the vast body of oral halakhah that was in existence at that time. In justifying the elimination of the prohibition against the writing down of the oral law, the rabbis cite a verse in Psalms 119.126, "It is a time to act for the Lord for they have violated your Torah," interpreting it to mean "when it is time to act for the Lord, your Torah may be violated," that is, "it is better that one letter of the Torah should be uprooted so that the entire Torah will not be forgotten by Israel" (Git. 60a; Tem. 14b). The classical text of the oral law is the *Mishnah, but there is a scholarly debate as to whether or not it was actually put into writing contemporaneously with its redaction by R. Yehudah ha-Nasi' in the second century CE. The Babylonian and the Jerusalem Talmuds contain the bulk of the oral law, and this body of work has been added to over the ages by innumerable commentators and codifiers. According to the oral tradition, the rabbis have the power to suspend the provisions of the written law itself, albeit on a temporary basis (Maimonides, Hilkhot Mamrim 2.4). The Sadducees and the Essenes possessed different systems of oral law during the Second Temple period, but neither one survived the destruction of the Temple. The Karaite sect in the Middle Ages also rejected the oral law and preached a return to pure scriptural Judaism. The oral law was opposed by classical Reform Judaism, but in recent years it has been restored to favor as a result of a quest for Reform halakhah.

ORDEAL OF JEALOUSY (Heb. torat ha-gena'ot), ritual procedure prescribed in the Bible (Nm. 5.11–31) for determining the guilt or innocence of a married woman suspected by her husband of having committed adultery (sotah), so named because of its similarity to the trial by ordeal known in various cultures. In the Bible, unlike some of the other ancient Near Eastern legal compilations, adultery is considered to be a major crime not only against the husband but also against God and therefore could not go unpunished. Yet, because it is unwitting, it is normally impossible to prosecute. The Torah, therefore, actually encourages a husband plagued by a "spirit of jealousy," that is, an instinctive suspicion concerning his wife's behavior, to have her undergo the ordeal of jealousy. The primary element of this ordeal, along with a sacrifice of jealousy presented by the woman, is for her to answer amen to a curse administered by the priest, calling for divine punishment if she is guilty. Then the words of the curse, which have been written down, are "wiped off" into a solution of sacred water and earth from the floor of the Tabernacle. The woman then drinks the "water of bitterness that causes the curse" (may ha-marim hame'arerim), thus activating the spell. God's involvement is direct: the spell will act only if she is guilty; if she is not, the waters will have no effect. Though those convicted of adultery in court are punished by death (Lv. 20.10, Dt. 22.22), punishment in this case takes the form of the "swelling of belly and collapse of thigh." When the suspected wife is innocent, "she is cleared and can then conceive" (Nm. 5.28). The pertinent laws are discussed in the Talmudic tractate Sotah*, so named because the Bible refers to the suspected adulteress as one who may have "strayed" (Nm. 5.12). According to rabbinic tradition, the ordeal of jealousy was practiced until Second Temple times (Sot. 1.5; 'Eduy. 5.6), when it was abolished by R. Yoḥanan ben Zakk'ai (Sot. 9.9). The case of the sotah is the only clear example of trial by ordeal to be found in Judaism.

ORDINANCE. See TAQQANAH.

ORDINATION, in rabbinic law, the formal transmission of judicial rabbinic authority. It is traditionally believed that the original rabbinic authority was granted by God to Moses. Before his death, Moses asked God to appoint a successor, and Joshua was selected with the words "Take you Joshua the son of Nun . . . and lay your hand [semikhah*] upon him" (Nm. 27.18). Nowhere else in the Bible is there mention of this manner of the transfer of authority, but Jewish tradition accepts that the ordination conferred upon Joshua was in turn transferred by him to his successor, and so on, in an unbroken chain throughout the centuries up to the period of the Second Temple. The Mishnaic statement concerning the transmission of the tradition, "Moses received the Torah from Sinai and handed it down to Joshua, and Joshua to the elders, the elders to the prophets, and the prophets handed it to the Men of the Great Assembly" (Avot 1.1), was interpreted as referring to the succession of authority. Only a duly ordained person was empowered in turn to ordain others. During the Hadrianic persecution, which followed the defeat of Bar Kokhba' in 135 CE, the Romans, wanting to destroy Jewish religious authority, decreed capital punishment for those conferring or receiving ordination. One of the Ten Martyrs*, Yehudah ben Bava', was stabbed to death by Roman soldiers who surprised him in the act of ordaining five of his disciples (San. 14a). Rabbinic law stated that ordination could be conferred only in Erets Yisra'el, in order to ensure its continuation as the spiritual center of Jewry. Only ordained rabbis could determine the calendar, judge certain cases, or impose fines. After the time of Hillel, the title of rabbi was awarded to those who had been ordained; Babylonian amora'im were given the title of rav, rather than rabbi. As a result of the political, spiritual, and economic decline of Erets Yisra'el Jewry in the fourth century, ordination came to an end. Theoretically, once the chain had been broken, it could not be reestablished. Maimonides (Hilkhos Sanhedrin 4.2) explicitly ruled that semikhah did not imply actual laying on of hands (as is still practiced in Christian churches). He specified that the only literal semikhah was when Moses laid his hands on Joshua (cf. Dt. 34.9; Hilkhos Sanhedrin 4.1). Maimonides suggested the possibility of renewing ordination by the unanimous decision of all the rabbis assembled in Erets Yisra'el, who could invest one of their number with this authority, and he, in turn, would then be able to ordain others (Hilkhos Sanhedrin 4.11). It was on the basis of this suggestion that in 1538 Ya'aqov Berab*, motivated by messianic hopes, made an attempt in Safed to reintroduce ordination and had it conferred upon himself. A violent controversy ensued, and the attempt failed because of the determined opposition of R. Levi ibn Ḥaviv, the rabbi of Jerusalem, who had not been consulted and who rallied other scholars to his view that the undertaking was illegitimate.

Modern discussions on the possibility of reestablishing the *Sanhedrin, which depends upon ordination, center around this incident, in which almost all possible arguments for and against had been brought forward and discussed. The ordination conferred upon a rabbi today is not the same as the ancient semikhah and does not confer the judicial authority that resides in Talmudic semikhah alone. It is rather hattarat hora'ah (permission to teach), which replaced the ancient semikhah, and which certifies competence to serve as a rabbi. Maimonides (Hilkhot Sanhedrin 4.8) lists four different levels of ordination, each dealing with a specific area of rabbinic expertise. Of these, only two are in effect today. These are yoreh yoreh, permission to rule in matters dealing with religious practice and kashrut, and yadin yadin, which involves permission to rule in civil matters, such as torts. Yoreh yoreh is generally regarded as a higher level of ordination, and in most cases one who has achieved this level is granted a dual certificate of yoreh yoreh yadin yadin. In the United States today, some of the largest rabbinic seminaries require candidates for ordination to have a university degree, often at the master's level. The Reform, Conservative, and Reconstructionist movements now permit women to be ordained. In Israel, the chief rabbinate has formalized the requirements for ordination, and candidates must pass a series of written examinations before being ordained by that body. While Protestant ordination of clergy is done by denominational authorities and Catholic ordination of priests is done by local bishops or heads of orders, rabbis are ordained by a court of three rabbis or, in modern times, by seminaries. In contrast to Christians, who can be stripped of their status as ordines at any time by the authorities in charge of such matters, once a rabbi is ordained he or she is a rabbi for life, although for reasons of moral, ritual, or institutional impropriety he or she might be denied continuing membership and privileges in the rabbinic organizations of the various movements.

ORGANS. The Talmud Bavli and other ancient sources provide conflicting and ambiguous descriptions of an organlike instrument called the magrefah that was said to have been in use in the Jerusalem Temple ('Arakh. 10b–11). It is considered by most to have been a sort of water-powered organ, identical with the Greek hydraulis and capable of producing as many as a hundred sounds of great volume. In the aftermath of the Temple's destruction, however, the rabbis instituted a state of mourning and proscribed the use of the magrefah and all other instruments in synagogues. Accordingly, instrumental music was virtually absent from the traditional synagogue service as it developed in the Middle Ages. The suggestion that the modern pipe organ be admitted into this service constituted a main subject of contention between Orthodox and Reform factions in the nineteenth century. In Germany, the organ was first introduced by Israel Jacobson at Seesen in 1810 and Berlin in 1815. Orthodox opponents led by Mosheh Sofer and 'Aqiva' Eger objected that its use on the Sabbath would violate halakhic restrictions and that, in any case, its strong identification with Christian worship made its use in the synagogue assimilationist and inappropriate. Nevertheless, the use of the organ became increasingly common in Reform congregations; a Christian organist was engaged by the Hamburg reformers in 1818, and in the United States, an organ was introduced in the Reform temple at Charleston, South Carolina, in 1841. The use of the organ has since become a regular feature in Reform services but occasioned renewed debate when its use was first suggested among Conservative Jews in the United States. Some argued that the presence of an organ in the Jerusalem Temple legitimized its reintroduction to the Jewish service; others pointed to the uncertainty regarding the nature or even existence of a Temple organ and repeated the Orthodox claim that its use represented huqqat ha-goy, the inappropriate imitation of a practice associated with non-Jewish worship. The conflict continues, but today organs are often found in Conservative congregations, though their use may be limited to certain services (e.g., Sabbath evening, but not morning). Orthodox congregations continue to forbid the use of the organ, or any other instrument, during worship services.

ORHOT HAYYIM, title of an *ethical will first printed in 1544; also called Tsavva'at Rabbi Eli'ezer. It begins with a citation from the Talmud Bavli (San. 68a) describing the final illness of Eli'ezer ben Hurqanos. In it, he promises that before he dies he will teach his son "the paths of life," from which the title of this work is derived. Opinions are divided as to its date of composition; some maintain that it was written in the eleventh century or even earlier. Others, such as Gershom Scholem, have noted the similarity of the second half of the work (titled Seder Gan 'Eden) to the Zohar and argue that it was composed some time after the middle of the fourteenth century. The issue of authorship, too, has not been settled. Some attribute it to Eli'ezer ben Hurqanos, who lived in the first and second centuries CE. Others attribute it to R. Eli'ezer ben Yitshaq of Worms (fl. 1050). It was printed in Venice in 1544 and has been reprinted many times since. An English translation appears in Hebrew Ethical Wills by Israel Abrahams (Philadelphia, 1926), vol. 2, pp. 31–49.

ORHOT TSADDIQIM, an anonymous work on ethics written in Germany; called Sefer ha-Middot by the author. The work contains a reference to the expulsion of the Jews from France in 1394 and may date from a generation or two afterwards. It emphasizes practical behavior and reflects the attitudes of the *Ḥasidei Ashkenaz. The author criticizes the students of his own generation as lazy and given to idleness. A partial Judeo-German version was published in Isny in 1542. The first Hebrew version appeared in 1581 in Prague. It became extremely popular and has been frequently reprinted. An English translation with pointed Hebrew text by Seymour J. Cohen was published in New York in 1969.

ORIENTAL JEWS. See 'ADOT HA-MIZRAḤ.

'ORLAH (עֲרֵלָה), name of the foreskin, an agrarian law, and a Mishnaic tractate.

Foreskin. The 'orlah is the part cut off of the penis during *circumcision. The term was applied metaphorically to the uncircumcised (cf. Ex. 6.12, "uncircumcised lips"; Ez. 44.7, 44.9, "uncircumcised heart").

Agrarian Law. The term is applied to the fruit of young trees during their first three years of producing; such fruit is forbidden for use. In the fourth year the fruit was to be taken to Jerusalem to be consumed amid praise and thanksgiving. This fruit, called neta' reva'i (planting of the fourth year), could, however, be redeemed and used outside Jerusalem, while the money value plus a fifth was to be taken to Jerusalem and spent there. Today neta' reva'i is regarded as the same as 'orlah, and the fruit is wholly permitted only from the fifth year on. 'Orlah is one of the few *agrarian laws that apply even outside of Erets Yisra'el.

Tractate. The tractate 'Orlah is in Mishnah order Zera'im, in three chapters, with related material in the Tosefta and the Talmud Yerushalmi. It deals with the laws of 'orlah, according to which the fruit of a newly planted tree or vine is regarded as uncircumcised, hence forbidden for consumption (cf. Lv. 19.23–25). Opening with a discussion of the parameters of planting, including questionable cases such as replanting or grafting, 'Orlah proceeds to define the precise nature of the 'orlah prohibition—the parts of the tree that are prohibited, use of the tree for purposes other than food, and so forth. The second chapter contains a discussion of the laws of forbidden foods that have been mixed with other foods. Although 'orlah differs from most other agricultural laws insofar as it applies both inside and outside Erets Yisra'el (Qid. 1.9), the opening ('Orl. 1.2) and closing of the tractate both underscore the special connection of this commandment to Erets Yisra'el (cf. Qid. 38b).

An English translation of the tractate is in Herbert Danby's The Mishnah (London, 1933).

ORNSTEIN, YA'AQOV MESHULLAM (1775–1839), Galician rabbi and author of halakhic works. After serving five years as rabbi of Zólkiew (1801–1805), Ornstein was named rabbi of Lwów, a post he held until his death. Known as one of the great halakhic minds of his generation, he was consulted by rabbis from far and wide on difficult halakhic issues. In Lwów, the independently wealthy Ornstein involved himself in all areas of communal affairs. He came into conflict with the nascent Haskalah presence in the city, even issuing a ban of excommunication against the Maskilim in 1816, which Austrian officials forced him to retract. Ornstein gained fame in rabbinic circles with the publication of his multivolume pilpulistic commentary and analysis of the Shulḥan 'Arukh entitled Yeshe'ot Ya'aqov (1809–1835; reprinted 1863, 1960, 1976). He also wrote a commentary on the Pentateuch and responsa under the same title.

OROBIO DE CASTRO, ISAAC (1617–1687). Born in Braganza, Spain, of a converso family, he studied medicine and theology in the Universities of Osuna and Alcalá de Henares. Accused of Judaizing, he was arrested in 1654 together with his family, tortured, and condemned by the Inquisition in Seville. In 1660 he escaped from Spain and reached Bayonne, France, where he joined his father and other escaping conversos. Later he took a position at the University of Toulouse as professor of medicine. In 1662 he decided to return openly to Judaism and, together with his family, became a member of the prosperous Jewish Spanish-Portuguese community of Amsterdam. There, beside his medical career, he was intensively engaged in intellectual and cultural activities. His main contribution to Jewish scholarship was in apologetics. He strongly defended rabbinical Judaism against deistic heretics, such as Juan Prado, an ex-converso colleague and student of his in Alcalá de Henares who shared with *Spinoza the fate of being excommunicated by the community of Amsterdam. Like other thinkers of converso origin, Orobio challenged the racial theory that considered the limpieza de sangre (purity of blood) as a decisive factor in determining the supremacy of the "old Christians" against the "new Christians" of Jewish origin. Instead, he strongly advocated the view that Israel is the chosen people. He maintained close contacts with Calvinist thinkers, particularly with Philip van Limburg. In many of his writings, Orobio zealously propounded what he considered to be the Jewish truths in contrast to the Christian distortions. His deep academic acquaintance with Christian theology gave weight to his apologetic argumentation.

ORPHAN, together with the *widow and the *stranger, in the social and economic system of ancient Israel, a helpless member of society and hence a special object of solicitude in biblical legislation, which emphasized the claims of orphans to justice (Dt. 24.17; Is. 1.17; Ps. 82.3), protection from oppression (Ex. 22.22), and charity (Dt. 16.11, 14). In their denunciation of evil, the prophets frequently singled out the exploitation and inconsiderate treatment of orphans (Is. 1.23, 10.2; Ez. 22.7; Mal. 3.5). God himself, "the father of orphans" (Ps. 68.6), is the guardian of their rights (Dt. 10.18); he hears their cries, and his judgment may turn those who oppress them into orphans themselves (Ex. 22.22–23). In Talmudic law the general biblical injunctions are elaborated and expanded to grant orphans many legal privileges and concessions. Orphans are exempt from taxation (B. B. 8a); they are not required to pay compensation for damage caused by their animals under certain conditions (B. Q. 39a); they need no perozbol* to claim the repayment of loans after the sabbatical year (Git. 37a); and their property is regarded as equivalent to sacred property (B. M. 56b). Altogether, one should treat orphans with special gentleness and dignity, address them in soft words, and guard their possessions as zealously as one's own. All these regulations apply to rich as well as to poor orphans, and there is no age limit (Maimonides' Mishneh Torah, De'ot 6.10). It is particularly meritorious to provide a home for orphans, and whoever brings up an orphan is regarded as his parent (San. 19b). Upon losing a parent, one is required to observe a full year's mourning and to say Qaddish* for eleven months.

ORTHODOXY, the modern designation for the traditional section of Jewry that maintains the halakhic way of life based on a divinely ordained Torah. The term itself is borrowed from Christian usage and was first applied in the nineteenth century by Reform Jews to describe, somewhat disparagingly, those who remained rigidly faithful to traditional Judaism. Though Orthodoxy is widely diversified among its many religious groupings and nuances of belief and practice (e.g., Ḥasidim and Mitnaggedim; Jews following Ashkenazi and Sephardi rites, etc.), all Orthodox Jews are united in their belief in the historical event of revelation at Sinai, as described in the Torah; in their acceptance of the divine law, in its written and oral forms, as immutable and binding for all times; in their acknowledgment of the authority of duly qualified rabbis—who themselves recognize the validity of the Talmud, the Shulḥan 'Arukh, and all other traditional sources of the hala- khah—to interpret and administer Jewish law; and in their adherence to traditional Jewish beliefs.

Unlike Reform and Liberal groups, Orthodoxy rejects the doctrine of progressive revelation, denies the assumptions and conclusions of Higher Criticism, especially with regard to the Pentateuch, and generally opposes radical departures from traditional attitudes and practices. Thus Orthodoxy opposes proselytizing propaganda and objects to organ music and to mixed seating of men and women in synagogue worship. Its halakhic observance does not admit distinction between ethical versus merely ceremonial precepts. Orthodoxy has exhibited a reluctance to cooperate with non-Orthodox groups in religious areas. The relations between Orthodox and non-Orthodox are especially troubled by Orthodox refusal to recognize the marriages, divorces, and conversions carried out by rabbis who do not submit to the authority of traditional Jewish law. To distinguish the "modern" type of Orthodoxy as developed in Germany during the second half of the nineteenth century under the guidance of Samson Raphael Hirsch and Ezriel Hildesheimer (modern dress, use of the vernacular, study of secular sciences, and participation in the general culture) from the early ghetto-type of Orthodoxy, the term Neo-Orthodoxy has been used.

Today Orthodox Jews constitute a minority among Jewish religious denominations. Although found in all principal areas of Jewish settlement, they are primarily resident in the United States, Israel, and western Europe. In the United States, where they number about 425,000, the Orthodox are, according to the 1990 National Jewish Population Survey, approximately 7 percent of the Jewish population. Most of these are those called centrist Orthodox, Jews who choose a middle way between wholehearted acculturation to America and insulation from its influences. These are Jews who, although attached to halakhah, value and receive a general education in addition to an intensive Jewish one (commonly by means of attendance at a Jewish day school), attend university, and embrace middle-class aspirations of professional career and residence. They share strong feelings for Israel and, more than any other Jewish denomination, entertain the idea of moving there. American centrist Orthodox Jews tend to have just under three children per family, giving them about a 33 percent higher fertility rate than the rest of American Jewry. Located mostly along the northeast corridor of the United States, they are also established in Los Angeles, southern Florida, Cleveland, and Chicago.

In addition to centrists, about 25 percent, or 105,000, of American Orthodox Jews qualify as *Ḥaredim, sometimes called ultra-Orthodox or strictly Orthodox. Most Ḥaredim affiliate with Hasidism—followers of a particular charismatic leader or rebbe—but some are instead associated with the Lithuanian-style yeshivah world, the Mitnaggedim. While the differences between these two categories of Ḥaredim are significant, when compared with other American Jews, the similarities between them are striking. In general, Ḥaredim—the most noticeable of Orthodox Jews—eschew the values and many of the lifestyles of contemporary secular society and emphasize instead a punctiliousness in religious ritual, a cultural separation from what they view as the corrupting influences of the outside world, and an attachment to the idea of preserving sacred tradition containing venerable truths and practices that may not be abrogated.

In Israel, the numbers of Orthodox Jews are greatest, but the definitions of precisely who is to be included are far more ambiguous. In addition to Haredim, there are those who define themselves as Dati, roughly equivalent to the centrist Orthodox. But there are also those who identify themselves as Masorati (traditional), who abide by some of the religious and ritual restrictions but not others. Many of these Jews support religious political parties but are somewhat more religiously lax in their personal practices and lifestyles. It has been estimated that about 14 percent of the Jewish population in Israel, or 630,000 Jews, can be identified as Dati, Masorati, or Haredi.

Important secondary Orthodox Jewish communities are located in Greater Toronto and Montréal in Canada; Melbourne, Australia; Antwerp, Belgium; and countries of the former Soviet Union. Altogether, there are probably about a hundred thousand Orthodox Jews in these locales.

OSSUARIES, containers for the bones of the dead. The Mishnah mentions the custom of gathering up the bones of the dead after decomposition of the flesh (San. 6.6) and giving them a second burial in an ossuary (Pes. 8.8; Mo'ed Q. 1.5). Contrary to the accepted opinion that relatives observe that day as one of mourning, R. Me'ir suggests that since the act of giving the dead their final burial is a cause of satisfaction, it may even be performed on the intermediate days of festivals (Mo'ed Q. 8a). The bones were collected in a sheet and then deposited in stone ossuaries, sometimes with decorations, many examples of which have been found dating from the second and third centuries, with inscriptions in Hebrew, Aramaic, or Greek.

Born in Jerusalem to a prominent Sephardi family, he was elected chief rabbi of Jaffa and its environs in 1911. For two years, from 1921 to 1923, he served as chief rabbi of Salonika, Greece, and during the British Mandate, from 1923 to 1939, was chief rabbi of Tel Aviv and Jaffa. PANTHEISM, term used since the eighteenth century to designate the belief that the entire universe or nature is God. Among the various types of pantheism are such individual views as God is everything (theopanism); everything that exists is divine; and God is immanent in everything. A modified version of pantheism holds that, although reality and God are not identical, all reality is in God (panentheism). *Neoplatonism, which holds that all being flows out of God (see EMANATION), is much closer to pantheism than is Aristotelianism. Mysticism, by obliterating the difference between God and the human soul in the ecstasy of mystical union, also tends toward pantheism. All forms of pantheism are opposed to classical theism, which assumes the nonidentity of Creator and creation and thus the nonidentity of God and the human soul. For theism the relationship between God and the soul is not one of ultimate unity, but an I-Thou confrontation. Jewish Orthodoxy has always adhered to the basic pattern of biblical theism, and pantheism was considered heretical. Kabbalistic doctrines often exhibited pantheistic tendencies and were consequently regarded with suspicion. The classical kabbalistic statement of a limited pantheism was formulated by Mosheh ben Ya'aqov *Cordovero: "God is all reality, but not all reality is God." The formula "Elohim (God) equals ha-teva' (nature)" (the numerical value of the two words are identical) does not imply genuine pantheism. See also HASIDISM; KABBALAH; SPINOZA, BARUCH.

PAPA' (died c.376), prominent amora'. He was one of the major fifth-generation Babylonian amoraic figures and the most prominent student of Rava'. Throughout his life, Papa' studied with his colleague Huna' ben Yehoshu'a, who was also his neighbor and business partner. After Rava' died, many students followed Papa' to Naresh, where he established a yeshivah. His personal wealth allowed him to support many of his students.

Traditions followed by Papa' appear frequently throughout the Talmud. He seems to have favored a harmonizing approach and suggested observance patterns that would satisfy several differing opinions or ways in which apparent differences among earlier sages might be minimized.

Papa' headed the Naresh academy for nineteen years, until his death.

PARABLES, a didactic device occasionally found in the Hebrew Bible. The most outstanding example is Nathan's parable of the poor man's lamb (2 Sm. 12.1-4). Jehoash's story of the thornbush and cedar (2 Kgs. 14.9) might fall into this category, and Isaiah's song of the vineyard (Is. 5.1-6) can be regarded as an example of either *allegory or parable. The parable is a frequent ingredient of the rabbinical sermon in aggadic literature, introduced by the standard phrase: mashal, le-mah ha-davar domeh, "a parable: to what is the matter to be compared?" However, neither biblical nor Talmudic literature differentiate between allegory, parable, or fable, which are all included under the general term mashal. For example, the view was advanced that "Job never existed but was an allegory or parable" (B. B. 15a). A knowledge of parables was regarded as a basic rabbinic accomplishment (Suk. 28a), part of the universal store of wisdom literature. *Maimonides regarded prophetic visions that could not be taken literally as parables or allegories (Guide of the Perplexed 2. 46-47). Parables continued to be used by medieval Jewish preachers and moralists. One of the best-known exponents of this genre was R. Ya'aqov ben Wolf *Kranz (1741-1804), also known as the Dubno Maggid.

PARADISE (from Gr. paradeisos [garden]), common designation for the abode of the blessed after death, based on the Septuagint translation of the biblical garden of *Eden as "paradise." The Hebrew equivalent of paradise, pardes*, occurs three times in the Bible; in the Talmud (Hag. 14b), the word is applied to the realm of celestial visions and the mystical ascent of the soul. It was thought that the souls of the righteous would enjoy celestial bliss in a heavenly garden of Eden. The Apocrypha and Midrashic literature contain many descriptions of both earthly paradise and the heavenly paradise of souls. The latter is usually described as a place of spiritual delights. See also AFTERLIFE; HEAVEN; 'OLAM HA-ZEH AND 'OLAM HA-BA'.

PARAH (פָּרָה; Cow), tractate in Mishnah order Tohorot, in twelve chapters, with related material in Tosefta'. It has no gemara' in either Talmud. The impurity engendered by contact with a corpse is unique in its severity, requiring for its purification the special ceremony of sprinkling water mixed with the ashes of the *red heifer (Nm. 19). Parah describes the red heifer ceremony and its regulations, as well as the laws governing purification by means of the red heifer ashes. The burning of the red heifer, in Second Temple times, was a public ceremony carried out with great pomp. Considerable care was taken to ensure that the ceremony be carried out under conditions of optimal purity, leading one rabbi to protest that some of the measures taken were excessive (Par. 3.3). Because the Sadducees insisted on absolute purity, the rabbis required that the priest, hitherto protectively isolated from all forms of defilement for seven days (Par. 3.1), be defiled and immersed immediately prior to the burning of the heifer, thus firmly demonstrating the authority of Pharisaic halakhah.

The paradoxical nature of the red heifer, which "purified the impure . . . [whereas] all who handled it from beginning to end defiled their clothes" (Pesiqta' de-Rav Kahana 4.1; cf. Par. 4.4, 8.3), engendered the rabbinic conception of the laws of parah as paradigmatic of divine decrees unfathomable to the human mind (Pesiqta' de-Rav Kahana 3).

An English translation of the tractate is to be found in Herbert Danby's The Mishnah (London, 1933).

PARDES (פָּרְדֵּס; orchard), Hebrew word used as an acronym-mnemonic to suggest four different approaches to understanding the Bible. P signifies the word peshat*, which refers to the plain meaning of the text; r signifies remez (allusion), connoting some veiled reference in the biblical text that can be discovered by the numerical value of the letters (gimatriyyah*) or by an acronym (notariqon*); d signifies derash*, or homiletical interpretation; and s signifies sod (secret), which suggests a mystical or kabbalistic interpretation. Although these terms all occur in classical rabbinic literature, they were not used to organize biblical commentary systematically until the thirteenth century, in the commentaries of Bahya ben Asher of Saragossa of Spain. Pardes may suggest some comparisons with the classical Christian "Four-fold senses of Scripture." In an early mystical text found in the Talmud (Hag. 14b), the word pardes is used for divine wisdom.

PARENTAL BLESSING. See BLESSING OF CHILDREN.

PARENTS. Biblical Hebrew uses no generic word to denote parents but refers to them always as father* and mother* (e.g., Ex. 20.12; Lv. 19.3; Prv. 1.9). Later Hebrew adopted the word horim, which occurs only once in the Bible (Gn. 49.26) and probably means forebears. Respect for parents is enjoined by the Decalogue (see TEN COMMANDMENTS) and was affirmed by the rabbis. Rabbinic law permits only two exceptions to the duty of unquestioning obedience: parents must be disobeyed when they order their children to transgress the Torah (B. M. 2.10), and a son may ignore his parents' wishes in choosing a wife (Isserles, Yoreh De'ah 250.25). Otherwise the duty of honoring and revering parents knows no bounds. The Talmud specifies "The son should not stand nor sit in his father's place nor contradict him. He must provide for his father's material wants and lead him in and out" (Qid. 31b). According to Jewish law, the parent should repay the expenses incurred by the son in caring for the parents' needs, unless the parent is impoverished (Qid. 32a; Shulhan 'Arukh, Yoreh De'ah 240.5). The father has the legal duty to support his children up to the age of six; after that his support is regarded as an act of charity (Ket. 49b, 65b). The mother is not obliged to maintain her children. Traditionally, a parent's most important obligation to his children is to teach them Torah, but a father must also teach his son a trade (Qid. 29a, 30b), and the parents must get the child accustomed to fulfilling the commandments (Suk. 42a; Hag. 4a). The egalitarian approach widespread today extends full obligations to both mothers and daughters. The father is permitted to chastise his children, but only while they are minors (Mo'ed Q. 17a). Father and mother are equal in terms of the duties owed to them by the child, and their special status is affirmed in the statement that in every man's life "there are three partners: his father, his mother, and God" (Qid. 30b). Respect for parents extends after their death and is expressed ritually in the recitation of Qaddish* and yortsayt*.

PARIS, DISPUTATION OF, Jewish-Christian public disputation*, held in 1240. In the course of the 1230s, a Jewish convert to Christianity, Nicholas Donin, began a campaign against Judaism based primarily upon citations from rabbinic literature. Donin prepared a Latin digest of Talmudic material and succeeded in obtaining papal support for an investigation into the allegedly offensive work that lay at the heart of medieval Judaism.

Donin charged that the Talmud was replete with foolishness and theological improprieties, that it discriminated against Christians and urged their murder, and that it blasphemed Jesus and Mary. Even more fundamentally, Donin argued that the classic justification for tolerating Jews as the preservers of the old law was ill-conceived: Jews had replaced the Hebrew Bible with Talmudic law; consequently, they were a people without faith, and should not be tolerated in the Christian world.

In 1240 Donin confronted R. Yehi'el of Paris and several other rabbis at a trial of the Talmud. Rabbi Yehi'el responded to the wide array of charges with a variety of strategies: he defended the reasonableness of Talmudic passages, demonstrated that scripture itself contained assertions similar to those mocked by Donin, pointed to the willful distortion of the statement that allegedly encouraged the killing of gentiles, maintained the need for a work that would clarify the legal code of the Bible, insisted that the pagans of the Talmud were legally distinct from contemporary Christians, and made the striking claim that the Jesus occasionally denounced by the Talmud lived before the Christian Jesus and consequently had nothing to do with the founder of Christianity.

In the short run, the effort to defend the Talmud failed; cartloads of Jewish books were burned on the streets of Paris a few years after the disputation. In the long run, the Talmud was censored but tolerated by church authorities, who recognized that it could not be outlawed without banning Judaism itself.

PARNAS (פָּרָנָס; provider), generally, a leader or guide of a whole generation; more specifically, a religious and administrative functionary. The word would seem to imply that at first the office involved disbursing funds to the needy. The Talmud describes Moses, Aaron, and Miriam as "three good parnasim of Israel" (Ta'an. 9a) and applied the term also to David (Yoma 86b). Rabbi Yehoshu'a ben Hananyah referred to R. Gamli'el as "the parnas of his generation," yet, because of Gamli'el's imperious manner, added, "Woe to the generation whose parnas you are!" (Ber. 28a). The parnas was chosen by the sages, but approval was needed from the public at large (Ber. 55a). In the sixteenth century, in most communities the term parnas came to mean the lay leader—generally a wealthy individual—of a community or congregation rather than a rabbinic leader. Though supposed to be learned men (cf. "Who is a scholar worthy of being appointed parnas? He who is asked about a law from any source—even from the tractate of Hallah— and is able to answer," Shab. 114a), parnasim were not necessarily chosen from the aristocracy of learning or because of their exemplary conduct; there are many references in the Talmud and later sources to their autocratic behavior. The heads of the Council of the Four Lands, which guided the Jewish communities of Poland and Lithuania in the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, were called parnasim; in some communities the office went by monthly rotation. In modern times, the word is used in western Sephardi congregations to refer to members of the governing board of a congregation, headed by a parnas presidente. Among Ashkenazim, the parnas is usually the president of the synagogue.

PAROKHET (פָּרוֹכֶת; curtain), the curtain of the Sanctuary, made of "blue and purple and scarlet and fine twined linen" (Ex. 26.31). It was placed in the Sanctuary to mark the division "between the holy place and the most holy" (Ex. 26.33). In the Temple the task of making the Parokhet was entrusted to women (Ket. 106b). The Parokhet in the Sanctuary and Temple is the model for the parokhet of the Ashkenazi synagogue, which is placed in front of the ark. On the High Holy Days and on *Hosha'na' Rabbah a white parokhet is used; otherwise it may be of any color, and there are many magnificent examples of embroidered parokhot. The term parokhet is used only by Ashkenazi Jews. The Sephardi rite has no parokhet, except on Tish'ah be-'Av, when the ark is draped with a black curtain; the Ashkenazi custom is to remove the parokhet altogether.

PARTITION. See MEḤITSAH.

PARTNERSHIP (Heb. shutafut), a relationship established by joint acquisition or inheritance, or joint investment, even if only one of the partners is active. The partnership is effected by means of an act of *acquisition (qinyan), and the conditions are usually set down in writing. Unless agreed otherwise, capital gains or losses are shared equally. Each partner can obligate the partnership through his contracts. A partnership may be dissolved by mutual agreement or on the basis of predetermined conditions, involving actual partition or by allowing one partner the option of buying or selling a half share for an agreed sum. The death of a partner immediately voids the partnership.

PASCHAL LAMB (Heb. qorban pesah or zevach pesah), Pesah sacrifice offered by the Israelites from the time of the *Exodus until the destruction of the Second Temple. Shortly before the Exodus from Egypt, the children of Israel were commanded to take a male lamb in the first year of its life on the tenth day of the month of Nisan and to slaughter it on the eve of the fourteenth. The Israelites were to sprinkle some of the lamb's blood on the two side posts and on the lintel of the doors of their residences. The animal was to be roasted and eaten in haste as the people made ready for the Exodus that night (Ex. 12).

Thereafter, and throughout the period of the First and Second Temples, the eating of the paschal lamb was the central feature of the observance of the Pesah festival. The animal was to be wholly roasted (it could not be eaten half-roasted or boiled), and it had to be eaten that night; anything remaining had to be burned. The meat was eaten together with some matsah (unleavened bread) and bitter herbs. The entire procedure was interpreted as a reminder of the redemption from the bitter slavery in Egypt through the Exodus. Non-Jews or the uncircumcised could not participate, and since the meat of the paschal lamb was regarded as holy food, it could be eaten only by those who were in a state of ritual purity.

So important was the ritual of the paschal lamb that biblical law gave those who were unable to participate on the correct date, 14 Nisan, a second chance to observe the ceremony one month later, on 14 Iyyar (Nm. 9.6–12; see PESAH SHENI).

After the destruction of the Temple and the cessation of sacrifices, the laws of the paschal lamb fell into disuse. Because of this, some Jews follow the custom of not eating roasted meat at the *Seder meal (Shulhan 'Arukh, Oraḥ Hayyim 469, 476). A reminder of the eating of the paschal lamb as the last meal of the people prior to the Exodus is preserved by the eating of the afiqoman* following the Seder meal, after which nothing more may be eaten. The roasted bone on the ceremonial Seder plate is a visible symbol of the paschal lamb of Temple days.

*Samaritans still follow the biblical practice of slaughtering a lamb on the eve of Pesah on Mount Gerizim in Samaria. Ethiopian Jews and some descendants of Marrano Jews in Mexico maintain the observance of sprinkling some blood from a slaughtered lamb on the doorposts of their houses. The regulations concerning the killing and consumption of the paschal lamb are found in Pesahim, chapters 5 through 9.

PATERNITY. In Jewish law, the offspring of a married woman is always presumed to be the child of her husband since, "for the most part, a woman cohabits with her husband" (Hul. 11b). This presumption may, however, be vitiated by objective evidence such as a twelve-month period of absence of the husband prior to the birth of the child. The husband's denial is also an effective bar to paternity, provided that there is no evidence, either expressly or by implication, of his having adopted a paternal role with regard to the child. A denial of paternity is effective even if the result is to make the children of the marriage mamzerim (see MAMZER). This would not, however, be the case if there were grandchildren, who would also suffer the taint of mamzerut as a result of such a denial. In the case of an unmarried woman, a paternity suit would only succeed if it were supported by the admission of the putative father or by objective evidence of paternal conduct. Blood tests are not always recognized in paternity suits before rabbinical courts. It is generally agreed that the father of an artificially inseminated child is the sperm donor.

PATER SYNAGOGAE (Lat.; father of the synagogue), title conferred in the classical period on an outstanding member of the congregation. The office was probably honorary and involved no active duties, although there is an opposing view that the term was the equivalent of parnas*. The term pater synagogae has been found in the Diaspora (in both Greek and Latin inscriptions) but not in Erets Yisra'el. A parallel title of honor—mater synagogae (mother of the synagogue)—was applied on occasion to a leading female member of the congregation.

PATRIARCHATE. See NASI.

PATRIARCHS (Heb. avot), the founding fathers of the Jewish people, *Abraham, *Isaac, and *Jacob. The patriarchs were divinely elected and were the human parties to God's *covenant. Their descendants, the children of Israel, inherited their blessings, promises, and duties (i.e., the land of Canaan, the Torah, and the obligation to walk in the ways of God). Abraham, the first patriarch, is in his own category, as is reflected in the first paragraph of the 'Amidah (called Avot [i.e., Patriarchs]), which mentions all three patriarchs by name, but which concludes, "Blessed are you, O God, shield of Abraham." The morning prayer service is traditionally regarded as having been instituted by Abraham, the afternoon prayer service by Isaac, and the evening prayer service by Jacob. The significance of the patriarchs and their enduring merits are constant themes of synagogal poetry. See also MATRIARCHS; ZEKHUT AVOT.

PATRILINEAL DESCENT. Many Israelite men such as Moses and Solomon are recorded as having married foreign women; patrilineal descent seems to have been the rule in biblical times. By marrying an Israelite man, the woman automatically became part of her husband's people, as there was not yet any ritual ceremony of conversion. Moreover, the priesthood also descended by patrilineal consideration. By the Mishnaic period, however, Jewish law established that children's religious identity was determined by the mother (matrilineal descent). The Talmud states "Your son by an Israelite mother is called your son, but your son by a heathen woman is not called your son" (Qid. 68b).

Various theories have been offered to account for the development from patrilineal descent to matrilineal descent. Some have pointed to Ezra's crusade against intermarriage as the first evidence of the matrilineal principle. Others regard the adoption of matrilineal descent as an act of pity by the rabbis in the face of the rapes of Jewish women by Roman soldiers in the first and second centuries CE. Shaye J. D. Cohen has identified the influence of Roman law in the transition from patrilineal to matrilineal descent. He has also suggested that the matrilineal principle is parallel to a Mishnaic opinion that classifies mixed breed animals in accordance with the mother's species.

In 1982 the Reform movement decided to recognize patrilineal descent: a person who is born of a Jewish father and a non-Jewish mother is recognized as a Jew if he or she so desires and observes certain Jewish obligations, without having to go through a process of conversion. The decision was accepted the next year by Reconstructionist Jews. However, it proved controversial even in the Reform movement and was accepted only in the United States and Britain and not, for example, in Canada or Israel. In 1984 the issue was debated by the Conservative movement and rejected. Orthodox Judaism unqualifiedly rejects patrilineal descent.

PAUL, the "apostle to the gentiles," originally a Jew named Saul from Tarsus in Asia Minor. He studied for some time under the patriarch *Gamli'el the Elder (Acts 22.3), but his spiritual background was Hellenism rather than Palestinian Judaism. Paul wrote in Greek, and his Bible quotations are drawn from the *Septuagint. At first a zealous adherent of the Pharisaic party and a violent opponent of *Christianity (at that time a Jewish sect), he became an enthusiastic convert as a result of a visionary experience on the road to Damascus, while on a mission to put down the nascent Christian movement in that city. Changing his name from Saul to Paul, he embarked on missionary journeys to Asia Minor, Greece, and Rome. Paul's activity was largely instrumental in bringing about the development of Christianity from a Jewish sect to a world religion. He not only founded the church of the "gentiles" but also evolved the theology of the new dispensation, according to which the Law of Moses and the promises of the prophets had been fulfilled in *Jesus. Thus, in his view Israel and its law were now superseded by the church and faith in Christ. Many of the terms in which Paul elaborated his thought go back to sectarian, non-Pharisaic Jewish sources; for example, the notions of children of light versus children of darkness, flesh versus spirit, election of grace, predestination, and so forth that are prominent in the *Dead Sea Scrolls. Paul's epistles became part of the New Testament and his Epistle to the Romans is a crucial statement of his attitude toward the Jews. He discerns great continuities between the church and Israel but finds the effective discontinuity much greater. Hence, his ideas regarding the Torah (he held that the law could not lead to true salvation but only to consciousness of man's innate sinfulness) have decisively influenced Christian attitudes toward Judaism. Modern Christian scholars (K. Stendahl, E. P. Sanders) do not see Paul's position as placing the teaching of Jesus in opposition to Judaism but as showing how Christ fulfilled the Torah.

PAYYETAN (פַּיִיטָן), author of sophisticated prayer-poems for the Jewish *liturgy (see PRYUT). The word payyetan comes from the Greek poietai (poet), and the payyetanim wrote elaborate poetical compositions filled with recondite allusions, intended to supplement the statutory prayers by injecting an element of novelty into the standard devotions. The first known payyetan was *Yosei ben Yosei, who may have lived and worked as early as the fifth century CE. The prolific poet *Yann'ai—some eight hundred of his compositions are extant—lived in Palestine around 550 CE. His pupil El'azar *Kallir, also Palestinian, wrote intricate compositions that were frequently criticized for the liberties that he took with Hebrew grammar and for his neologisms. Other payyetanim of renown include, for the Ashkenazi rite, Shim'on ben Yitshaq ben Abun (11th cent.), and, among the Sephardim, Shelomoh *ibn Gabirol, Mosheh *ibn Ezra, *Yehudah ha-Levi, and Avraham *ibn Ezra.

PEACE (Heb. shalom), a term in Biblical Hebrew signifying well-being in the widest sense and the full, undisturbed unfolding of the blessed life. In a narrower sense it means the absence of war and violence. The passion for peace as the summum bonum runs throughout Jewish literature and thought. It applies both to the messianic vision of universal peace when "nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more" (Is. 2.4; Mi. 4.3) and to the more homely sphere of domestic peace between man and his fellow man and between husband and wife (see SHELOM BAYIT). Shalom is also considered to be one of the names of God, and punctilious observance prohibits the pronouncement of the word in an unclean place or bathroom. "Aaron is regarded as the prototype of those who 'love peace and pursue peace and love all creatures,'" and every Jew is enjoined to follow his example (Avot 1.12). R. Shim'on ben Ḥalafta' said, "God could find no better vessel of blessing for Israel than peace" (Uqts. 3.12). Indeed, peace is the ultimate purpose of the Torah (Tanhuma' Shofetim 18) according to the sages. Every single prayer of importance (e.g., Birkat ha-Kohanim, the Qaddish, the 'Amidah, the Birkat ha-Mazon) ends with a prayer for peace and the hope that the same peace that exists among the heavenly spheres shall also reign on earth. The original, full signification of the term is preserved in the traditional Jewish greeting "peace unto you" (shalom aleikhem); the shorter version, shalom, is the usual formula of greeting in Modern Hebrew. See also JUSTICE; WAR.

PEACE OFFERING (Heb. zevah shelamim), one of the *sacrifices (Lv. 3; 7.11–34). Its distinctive features were that only the blood and the representative fatty portions of the animal were placed on the altar and the prescribed portions of the flesh were eaten by the priests; the sacrifice itself was consumed by the offerer and his invited guests as a festive meal "before the Lord." According to one widespread biblical tradition, no meat could be eaten from the flock or the herd unless it was offered as a shelamim sacrifice (Lv. 17.3–7). According to Deuteronomy, however (12.15ff.), the profane slaughter of sheep, goats, and cattle was permitted, a concession that became operative in Judaism. Peace offerings sacrificed by individuals were of three types: spontaneous offerings of devotion (nedavah; see FREE-WILL OFFERING), those made in fulfillment of a vow (neder), and those offered in thanksgiving (todah; see THANKSGIVING OFFERING); they were never a means of atonement. Peace offerings were thus the natural expression of joy and gladness in ancient Israel; the worshiper celebrated by enjoying the uplifting experience of feasting in the presence of God in acknowledgment of his lovingkindness.

PE'AH (פֶּאֶה; Corner), tractate in Mishnah order Zera'im, in eight chapters, with related material in the Tosefta' and the Talmud Yerushalmi. It deals with gifts to the poor, primarily those given from agricultural produce. The owner of a field is biblically enjoined, while harvesting, to allow the poor to gather from pe'ah, a corner of the field designated for the poor (Lv. 19.9); loose grains dropped by the harvester (Lv. 19.9); sheaves forgotten in the field (Dt. 24.19); and scattered grapes growing unclustered on the vine (Lv. 19.10; see LEQET, SHIKHḤAH, AND PE'AH). These forms of charity allow the poor free access to the field during the time of harvest (cf. Ru. 2). Pe'ah stresses that these gifts are not to be distributed—unless the poor unanimously agree (Pe'ah 4.1)—but are to be left for the poor to pick for themselves, despite the quarreling that may be anticipated (see Pe'ah 4.4). The idea that the owners' sovereignty over their fields is not absolute is reflected in the opening pericope of Pe'ah, which groups pe'ah, as a "matter which has no mandated quantity," together with other commandments—first fruits and pilgrimage offerings—that express divine sovereignty.

The last chapter of Pe'ah discusses the poor *tithe, defining the minimum amount that must be distributed to each individual, as well as establishing a definitive poverty line for all the gifts described in Pe'ah. Pe'ah stresses at its conclusion, as in its opening, the theological significance of the laws of charity. The rabbis regarded pe'ah as a unique moral achievement of Jewish ethics (Lv. Rab. 29.2) and required prospective converts to be instructed specifically regarding the laws of pe'ah (Yev. 46a).

An English translation of the tractate is to be found in Herbert Danby's The Mishnah (London, 1933).

PENAL LAW. Jewish law contains within it a complete criminal law code governing all areas of criminal law. There are numerous substantive offenses designed to cover the spectrum of human vices (such as murder, incest, gambling), as well as detailed *criminal procedure rules designed to determine whether sufficient substantiation has been adduced to prove commission of a crime. Finally there are *punishments, from death to fines, designed to condemn and deter criminal activity.

Jewish law required that the source of each criminal statute be clearly spelled out, both as to the crime and the punishment. Crimes may not be inferred, even when such inferences would appear logical.

As a general rule, Jewish law required intent to commit crimes, and any action for which the intent could not be shown could not be criminally punished. Thus, there were categories of people who were exempt from criminal punishment: minors, the mentally unstable, and the mentally retarded; so too, certain actions committed under duress were exempt. Perhaps unique was the belief that ignorance of the law was a valid defense to criminal prosecution, and thus a system by which people were warned prior to punishment was followed. Witnesses were required to verify that the person in question actually committed the crime.

A court had exigency jurisdiction to punish criminals in circumstances in which the procedural safeguards allowed those who were repeat violators to escape punishment. All post-Talmudic invocation of criminal law is predicated on this exigency jurisdiction, and punishments meted out were not in accordance with Talmudic legal requirements. Thus, people were punished without warning or based on evidence other than that given by two male witnesses or in other ways not found in Jewish law. Deadly force may be employed to protect one's own life or the life of another when it is illegally threatened. A burglar who robs at night can be preemptively killed when it is clear that the robber is prepared to use deadly force if challenged. In those areas of civil law that govern illicit activity self-help may be used. Thus, one may snatch back items taken from one's possession by a thief and need not resort to the authorities prior to invoking that remedy.

PEOPLE OF ISRAEL (Heb. 'am Yisra'el). This particular term is relatively late, although the perception of Israel as a "people" ('am) or a "nation" (le'om) has always been taken for granted (see NATIONALISM). The most frequent biblical terms are "people of God" and "house of Israel," but "your people Israel" is also found; for example, in David's prayer, "who is like your people Israel, a nation one in the earth" (2 Sm. 7.23). The phrase 'am Yisra'el hay (the people of Israel live) has become almost a slogan, affirming the eternal life of the people.

PE'OT (רְיָנִים; corners), side locks. According to the Bible (Lv. 19.27), it was forbidden to remove the hair at the corners of the head, possibly to distinguish Israelite practice from that of certain pagan priests. The rabbis interpret this regulation as meaning that the temples must not be rendered as smooth as the forehead (Mak. 20b). The length of the pe'ot is not specified, but it is understood to be the length of a line drawn from the top of the forehead to the base of the ear lobe and long enough to be grasped by two fingers. The custom arose among Orthodox Jews (at first in Hungary and Galicia) of allowing the sideburns to grow completely uncut. Yemenite Jews follow a similar custom, but this originated in a decree forbidding Jews to cut their sideburns in order to distinguish them from Muslims. The biblical injunction not to "mat the corners of the beard" (Lv. 19.27) has been traditionally interpreted as a prohibition against shaving. Mystics of the Lurianic school found significance in the fact that the *gimatriyyah (numerical value) of pe'ot was eighty-six, the same as Elohim (God). Women are exempt from the regulations of pe'ot (Qid. 1.7). See also BEARDS.

PEREQ HA-SHALOM, an aggadic chapter, devoted to the value of peace, which originated as an independent work but was appended to the tractate Derekh Erets Zuta. The sayings in Perek ha-Shalom, most of which open with "Great is peace . . .," present peace as a value that finds expression on many levels: peace is one of the pillars on which the world stands; it is the name of God himself; and peace serves as the basis for relationships within the household, within society, and among nations. The chapter was translated into English by Daniel Sperber (Jerusalem, 1976).

PEREQ SHIRAH (פֶּרֶק שִׁירָה; Chapter of Song), a collection of hymns of praise to the Creator as sung by the heavenly bodies, the earth, animals and birds, and vegetation. The idea that all creation praises God is frequently expressed in the Bible (e.g., Ps. 148) and seems to have given rise to the selection of appropriate scriptural verses to represent the "hymnal of creation." Perek Shirah is only indirectly mentioned in the Talmud, but it appears to be an ancient baraita known to have existed in the geonic period, although the version extant today is certainly late. Its authorship was variously ascribed to R. Eli'ezer ben Ya'aqov, to R. Yehudah ha-Nasi, and even to David. It is printed in several editions of the prayer book and is recited by some as a private devotion after the morning service. Several manuscripts show its development in three versions: Askenazi, Sephardi, and 'Adot ha-Mizrah. It was first printed in Venice in 1576 with a commentary by Mosheh ben Yosef di Trani. Its incorporation in the prayer book was inspired by the kabbalists of Safed.

PERJURY, the violation of an oath (see VOWS AND OATHS), regarded as a great sin (see Zec. 5.4) punishable only by God. If a man admitted to committing perjury in a civil transaction, he could atone by means of a special offering (Lv. 5). Witnesses are not obligated to take an oath guaranteeing the truth of their *evidence. See also FALSE WITNESS.

PEROZBOL (פרוזבול; from Gr. prosbolē, meaning "for the court," or "official notice"), a legal instrument annulling the sabbatical release of debts (see SHEMAH). All private loans were automatically remitted in the sabbatical year (Dt. 15.2); hence, it became difficult to obtain loans immediately before the onset of that year. In order to avoid hardship and encourage lending, *Hillel instituted the perozbol (Shevi'it 10.3), which is a declaration made before a court of law by the creditor, and signed by witnesses, stating that all debts due to him are given over to the court for collection. Since the remission of loans during the seventh year applies only to individuals but not to public loans, the effect of the perozbol is to render the individual's loan public, and it is therefore not nullified (see DISPENSATION). The amora'im criticized the perozbol as a circumvention of biblical law, but the authority of Hillel ensured its retention.

PERPETUAL LIGHT. See NER TAMID.

PERPETUAL OFFERING (Heb. tamid), the regularly recurring ritual acts performed in the Tabernacle and later in the Temple that make up a systematic method of symbolically paying homage to God, envisaged as enshrined in his earthly abode, at the same time as petitioning him on Israel's behalf. These rituals were the entry of the high priest into the heikhal (holy place) each morning and evening, wearing the *priestly vestments, as a representative of the Israelite people "before the Lord"; the lighting of the lamp (see NER TAMID) by the high priest each evening and its refueling each morning; the offering of *incense on the golden altar each morning and evening; and the placement of the *showbread on the table each week. The term tamid is also used to refer to the daily *burnt offering (Ex. 29.38–42; Nm. 28.1–8; see SACRIFICES).

The first group of the Ga'on's disciples began arriving in 1808. Their leader, Menahem Mendel of Shklov (died 1827), established a yeshivah, Kolel ha-Perushim, in Safed, where he was joined in 1809 by the Talmudist Yisra'el ben Shemu'el of Shklov (died 1839). Following a plague in Safed in 1812, they relocated to Jerusalem, where they were instrumental in reviving the Ashkenazi community.

PESAH (פסח; Passover), the first of the *Shalosh Regalim, observed for eight days in the Diaspora (see YOM TOV SHENI SHEL GALUYTOT) and seven days in Erets Yisra'el and by Reform Jews. The festival commemorates the *Exodus of the children of Israel from Egypt; hence, it is also called the Festival of Freedom. The term pesah, which indicates the "passing over" or sparing of the houses of the children of Israel during the plague of the killing of the firstborn (Ex. 12.13), is used in the Bible solely with respect to the sacrifice of the *paschal lamb, which took place on the eve of the Exodus (14 Nisan). The day before the festival is observed as *Ta'anit Bekhorim. The seven-day festival that follows (15–22 Nisan) is called in the Bible "the festival of unleavened bread" (Hag ha-Matsot; cf. Lv. 23.5–6: "On the fourteenth day of the first month at even is the Lord's Passover. And on the fifteenth day of the same month is the feast of unleavened bread to the Lord"). The agricultural aspect of the festival is connected with the spring season and the beginning of the barley harvest and was expressed in ancient times by the offering of the *omer in the Temple on the second day of the festival. Both the first and last day (first two days and last two days in the Diaspora) are considered holy days, and all work is prohibited. The intermediate days are *hol ha-mo'ed. The dietary laws require the eating of matsah on the first night(s) and prohibit the eating of any hamets (leaven) throughout the holiday. The rabbis added extra stringency to the first of these regulations by ordaining that, unlike other accidental admixtures of prohibited food that may be disregarded if the quantity is less than a sixtieth of the total, the tiniest amount of leaven in food renders it unfit for use on Pesah. Hence, the most rigid care must be exercised in the preparation of food and utensils for Pesah. The rabbis also ruled that hamets that has been in the possession of a Jew during Pesah remains forbidden even after the festival, therefore it must be sold beforehand. A pre-Pesah ceremony is performed in the home to ensure that all hamets has been removed (see BEDIQAT HAMETS; BI'UR HAMETS). The Pesah Seder (see HAG-GADAH OF PESAH), celebrated on the first night(s) of the festival, is one of the most important home ceremonies of the liturgical year. The laws of the festival are discussed in tractate *Pesahim. After the first day(s) of Pesah, only the shorter form of *Hallel is said in the synagogue. A prayer for dew (see TEFILLAT TAL), recited on the first day of the festival, marks the end of the winter season and the beginning of spring. On the intermediate Sabbath of Pesah, *Song of Songs is recited in Ashkenazi synagogues. Allegorically this book represents the bond established at the Exodus between God and the children of Israel, but the spirit of spring with which it is infused

(cf. Song. 2.11–13) serves as a reminder of the agricultural aspect of the festival. In Temple times, those unable to observe the festival had another opportunity to offer the paschal sacrifice a month later (see PESAḤ SHENI). The coincidence of Pesah with Easter led, in the Middle Ages, to the linking of the *blood libel with the Pesah festival. Jews of North Africa (and certain other 'Adot ha-Mizrah) celebrate a family festival on the day following the conclusion of Pesah (*Mimunah). It has become a popular holiday among Jews of North African descent in Israel. *Samaritans still sacrifice a paschal lamb at their annual Pesah ceremony in Shechem (Nablus). *Marranos observed the festival a day later so as to avoid suspicion of keeping Jewish holidays. PESAḤIM (פסחים; Paschal Lambs), tractate in Mishnah order Mo'ed, in ten chapters, with related material in the Tosefta and both Talmuds. It deals with the laws of the paschal sacrificial order and the *Pesah festival. The biblical injunctions against eating leavened bread (Ex. 12.20, 13.3) during the festival or maintaining it in one's possession (Ex. 12.15, 13.7) are defined and expanded. Much of the day preceding Pesah is devoted to the elimination of leavened items, commencing with a meticulous candlelight inspection on the night of 14 Nisan (see BEDIQAT ḤAMETS) and concluding with the burning of the leaven the next morning (see BI'UR ḤAMETS). Many of these practices stem from Second Temple times; the burning of the leaven, although not required by all authorities (Pes. 2.1), seems to have been the normal practice (Pes. 1.4). Pesaḥim dwells on the similarity between burning leaven and burning sacred foods that have been defiled (Pes. 1.5–6) or disqualified due to time lapse (Pes. 1.4), suggesting that the symbolic significance of forbidding leaven on Pesah may be related to the prohibition against using leaven in sacrificial offerings (Lv. 2.11).

Whereas the paschal blood was smeared on the door posts at the time of the Exodus, the blood of the Second Temple offering described in Pesaḥim was poured onto the altar in an impressive communal ceremony. The Second Temple paschal offering was, however, clearly a commemoration, indeed a reenactment (Pes. 10.5), of the redemption from Egypt. This is further reinforced by the description in Pesaḥim 10 of the festive Pesah-night meal, in which the paschal lamb, along with the foods that accompany it—unleavened bread and bitter herbs—serve as the focal point of the recounting and celebration of the Exodus.

The tractate in Talmud Bavli was translated into English by Harry Freedman in the Soncino Talmud (London, 1938).

PESAḤ SHENI (פסח שני; Second Passover), a celebration introduced for those who, through ritual uncleanness or unavoidable absence from Jerusalem, were unable to sacrifice the paschal lamb on the proper date, 14 Nisan (Nm. 9.9–25). A concession was made to enable such persons to offer the sacrifice a month later. The only recorded instance of the celebration of Pesah Sheni was by King *Hezekiah, after consultation with "the princes of the congregation in Israel" (2 Chr. 30.2). Pesah Sheni (on 14 Iyar) is marked today by the omission of supplicatory prayers (*Taḥanun) in the synagogue service and in some communities by eating a piece of matzah. Some Orthodox Jews put aside three pieces of matzah on Pesah and save them to be eaten on Pesah Sheni.

PESHAT (פשוט), simple or literal meaning, associated with the exegesis of biblical texts. In classical rabbinic literature and medieval commentaries, peshat is contrasted with the term derash* in referring to the literal as opposed to the homiletical meaning of the Bible. Many scholars have focused on the Talmudic use of the phrase ein miqra' yotse' middei peshuto (Shab. 63a; Yev. 11b, 24a) as evidence that the rabbis insisted that their derivation of practice should be grounded in the literal meaning. The dialectic of peshat and derash became especially significant in the biblical commentaries of the Middle Ages, when Rashi and his school as well as R. Abraham ibn Ezra focused their efforts on grounding all interpretation in peshat.

PESHER (פרש; interpretation), the technical term for commentary on scripture used in the writings of the Qumran community. Continuous pesharim cite successive verses from one biblical book; thematic pesharim cite nonconsecutive verses from several biblical books. The bible text is followed by its interpretation. Typically, each interpretation is introduced by a formula featuring the word peshet. Exegetical techniques (allegory, puns, notarikon, analogy between verses, etc.) are used to apply the prophetic citations to the history and eschatological beliefs of the Qumran community. The interpretations reveal the mysteries of the end of days hidden in biblical prophecy and are held to be the product of divine inspiration granted to a chosen interpreter.

While the term peshtarim refers primarily to the literary genre described above, it sometimes designates units of similar form and content embedded in other types of compositions.

PESHITTA', the Syriac translation of the Bible (including the New Testament), called Peshitta' or Peshitto (simple [translation]) because the Syriac translation was considered natural in contrast to the Syro-Hexapla version (a Syriac version of Origen's Hexapla) which, as a literal Syriac translation of the Greek, had an unnatural flavor in Syriac. The greater part of the translation, which was produced by many translators working at different periods, is of Jewish origin and still retains traces of rabbinical interpretations; it differs occasionally from the Masoretic Text. The Peshitta' may have been initiated in the second or even in the first century CE. Although it was intended for use by Jews, by the third century it had become the Bible of the Syriac-speaking Christians. The translations of Genesis, Isaiah, the Minor Prophets, and Psalms in the Peshitta' accord closely with the Septuagint, while Ezekiel and Proverbs accord closely with the *Targum. The Peshitta' did not include Esther, Ezra, Nehemiah, Chronicles, or books of the Apocrypha; these books were added later.

PESIQTĀ' (Aram.; ܡܫܝܩܬܐ; section) cycle of Palestinian midrashim, so called because it deals only with selected passages from the Pentateuch and the Prophets. Two versions are extant. The first is usually referred to as the Pesiqta' de-Rav Kahana' (the opening section begins with his name). Though much of it dates from approximately the fifth century CE, the work as a whole was probably completed in the seventh century. The other version—Pesiqta' Rabbati—is still later (after 815 with later glosses from the 13th cent.). It draws upon the Pesiqta' de-Rav Kahana' and *Tanḥuma'-Yelammedenu literature. It also includes a section (20–24) called Midrash Mattan Torah by medieval authorities, which differs in style and structure from the rest of the work and seems to constitute a separate unit; it reflects the influence of early mystical sources. Earlier scholars confused the two versions of the Pesiqta' with each other and with the eleventh-century midrash Leqah Tov*, which was also known as Pesiqta' Zutarta'. The Pesiqta' follows the cycle of the Jewish calendar, beginning with Ro'sh ha-Shanah and concluding with the Sabbath before Ro'sh ha-Shanah. In addition to aggadah, the Pesiqta' contains a great deal of important halakhic material. The Pesiqta' de-Rav Kahana' was published by Bernard Mandelbaum (New York, 1962). A critical edition of Pesiqta' Rabbati, edited by Me'ir Friedman, appeared in 1880 and was translated into English by William G. Braude in 1968.

PESUQEI DE-ZIMRA' (פְּסוּקֵי דְזִמְרָא; Verses of Song or Praise), a collection of biblical hymns recited daily at the beginning of the morning service. Sephardim refer to them as Zemirot (songs). They are preceded and followed by a benediction (Barukh she-'Amar and Yishtabbaḥ respectively). The Pesukei de-Zimra' are not mentioned in the Talmud, though they or a similar selection of hymns were probably already recited then by pious worshippers. The Pesukei de-Zimra' are found in the ninth-century prayer book of R. *Amram bar Sheshna'. The main components are Psalm 145 through Psalm 150 (see HALLEL) and Exodus 15. On Sabbaths and festivals several more psalms are added, and the hymn of praise, Nishmat Kol Hai, precedes the opening blessing (see BIRKAT HA-SHIR). The Pesukei de-Zimra' are followed by the Short *Qaddish and *Barekhu. In the Ashkenazi service, usually worshippers read the Pesukei de-Zimra' silently, while the reader chants only the opening or concluding verses of each section; in other rites, the Pesukei de-Zimra' are often recited aloud, either in unison or antiphonally. No minyān* is required for the recitation of the Pesukei de-Zimra', and their insertion into the early part of the morning service is in accord with the rabbinic teaching that man should first praise God and then present his own petitions (Ber. 32a).

PETIḤAH (פְּתִיחָה; opening or proem), a formula, found at the beginning of a parashah (section) in aggadic midrashim. It presents an exposition of a verse (called the petiḥah verse), frequently culled from the Hagiographa, unconnected to the biblical passage at hand, ultimately relating it to the first significant verse of the passage (called the parashah verse). Petiḥot may be attributed to a particular sage. In early aggadic midrashim (viz., Genesis Rabbah, Leviticus Rabbah, Pesiqta' de-Rav Kahana'), several petiḥot to the same parashah verse are found at the beginning of almost every section; in other midrashim (notably Lamentations Rabbah), a large collection of petiḥot introduce the entire work. Many petiḥot are enlarged through the insertion of Midrashic material (exegesis, stories, parables, and the like), which may then serve as an artful homiletical bridge leading from the petiḥah verse to the parashah verse. The origin of the petiḥah is still debated; a widely held view is that the form originated in the oral homilies delivered in the synagogue on the Sabbath and holy days, where it served as an introduction to the Torah reading.

PETUCHOWSKI, JAKOB JOSEF (1925–1991), Reform thinker. Petuchowski was born in Berlin but emigrated from Nazi Germany before World War II. In 1956 he began teaching rabbinics at Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati. He wrote or edited more than thirty books including Ever since Sinai (1961), Zion Reconsidered (1966), and Prayer Book Reform in Europe (1968). Initially critical of secular Zionism, he became more positive after the 1967 Six-Day War. He maintained a belief in the authority of revelation, but as a Reform Jew, he understood both halakhah and revelation in the light of evolutionary theory and saw Reform Judaism as merely one stage in the ongoing development of the Jewish tradition. His views influenced several generations of rabbis whom he taught in Cincinnati.

PFEFFERKORN, JOHANNES (1469–c.1521), apostate. A butcher by trade, he converted to Christianity in approximately 1504 and, encouraged by the Dominicans, denounced Jewish literature for containing anti-Christian blasphemies. Emperor Maximilian I empowered him to examine all Jewish books in Germany except the Bible and to destroy any that were anti-Christian. The order was eventually rescinded after a bitter dispute in which several Christians took part; Pfefferkorn's sponsors (the Obscurantists) were opposed by the Humanists led by Johannes Reuchlin.

PHARAOH (Heb. par'oh), Egyptian word meaning literally "great house," referring to the palace of the king, which in time came to be used to designate the king himself. Various pharaohs are mentioned in the Bible. Though in the earlier books of Genesis and Exodus their personal names are not given, in the later historical sources of Kings and Jeremiah, the individual pharaohs' names are generally recorded. Most scholars agree that the pharaoh who enslaved the Israelites (Ex. 1.8–11) is Ramses II (c.1279–1212), whose inscriptions mention the use of 'Apiru (see HEBREWS) slaves for building projects. His name endures in the name of one of the stone cities, Ramses, built by the Israelites (Ex. 1.11). The pharaoh under whom Joseph served would thus be a predecessor of this monarch, but he cannot be identified with any confidence. Ramses II's son and successor, Merneptah (c.1212–1202), left an inscription from his fifth year that mentions for the first time outside of the Bible Israel as a people. Many scholars relate this reference to the period after the Israelites had entered Canaan. Solomon married the daughter of a pharaoh

(1 Kgs. 3.1), usually identified as Siamun (c.978–959). Other pharaohs mentioned in the Bible include Shishak (1 Kgs. 14.25), Necho (2 Kgs. 23.29–34), and Hophra (Jer. 44.30), all well-known figures from Egyptian sources.

PHARISEES (Heb. Perushim [Separatists]), one of the three main Jewish sects in the Second Temple period, said by *Josephus Flavius to have comprised at one point six thousand members and to have been supported by the majority of Jews. Their origins, in the second century BCE, are obscure, although they may be related to the *Hasideans. Josephus writes that the Pharisees were distinguished from other sects by their acceptance of the *oral law, and they were acknowledged to be skillful interpreters of the Torah. According to Josephus, whose account is not completely reliable, the Pharisees differed in their theology from the *Sadducees in maintaining a belief in the immortality of the soul (in actual fact the Pharisees taught the resurrection of the dead), in the existence of angels, and in divine providence. Unlike the *Essenes, who emphasized predetermination, the Pharisees asserted freedom of will. They also differed from the other groups in their halakhic rulings, although not all of these differences can be reconstructed from the extant sources. In rabbinic literature, which views the Pharisees as the predecessors of tannaitic Judaism, they were depicted as punctilious observers of the laws of purity and priestly tithings, separating themselves from the common people who were less strict in their observance of these laws. Josephus reports that the Pharisees were deeply involved in the inner-Jewish disputes of the Hasmonean period (see HASMONEANS), and their views won the largest following among the Jewish masses. However, neither the Pharisees nor other Jewish movements were political parties, and their involvement in politics stemmed mainly from their insistence that the nation, and the high priests in particular, should follow their religious precepts. Thus, they were at odds with several of the Hasmonean rulers, especially Alexander Yannai (r. 103–76), but were influential with other members of that dynasty, such as Yannai's wife and successor, Salome Alexandra (r. 76–67). Given the paucity of sources and their possible tendentiousness (Josephus, for example, claims to have been a Pharisee, and his description of the Pharisees is far from objective), it is not easy to assess the Pharisees' real influence over the wider Jewish population (especially since Josephus is not entirely consistent on this point), but it seems that they had a wider appeal than that of either the Sadducees or the Essenes. Moreover, the Pharisees' central position in the Jewish community of the time is also apparent from other sources, including the *Dead Sea Scrolls (in which "the seekers of smooth things" is probably a pejorative reference to the Pharisees) and the *New Testament, where they are often denounced in the most bitter terms.

This hostile description of the Pharisees in early Christian literature, which is the source of the negative connotation that the term Pharisee has acquired in many European languages, may reflect the Pharisees' relative importance at the time when *Jesus' followers were trying to spread their master's message among the Jewish masses. Recent church documents (such as the Vatican's 1985 Notes on the Teaching of Judaism) have been aimed at changing traditional Christian condemnation of the Pharisees.

PHILANTHROPY. See CHARITY.

PHILISTINES, people who settled on the southern coast of Canaan in the twelfth century BCE. Their ethnic identification is debated. They originated in the Aegean and were not circumcised (unlike most others in the land of Canaan), which suggests they were not Semitic but may have been Indo-European. Their god, however, was Dagon, an old Semitic deity, and the Bible assumes that Israelites and Philistines could communicate without difficulty, suggesting that their language was a dialect of Canaanite. However, no Philistine texts have been discovered. The first reference to the Philistines occurs in a series of Egyptian historical texts from the reign of Ramses III (c.1182–1151), when the Philistines led an alliance of nations called the Sea Peoples in an attack against Egypt. The Egyptians repulsed the invaders, who then settled in Canaan. The Bible agrees with this picture, as it consistently portrays the Philistines as originating in Caphtor, a name used either for the Aegean in general or for Crete in particular (see, e.g., Am. 9.7). The Philistine arrival on the Canaanite coast coincided with the arrival and settlement of the Israelites in the central hill country of Canaan. A short while later, when both groups attempted to expand their territories, tensions arose and they became enemies. Two biblical judges, Shamgar (Jgs. 3.31) and Samson (Jgs. 14–16), fought against the Philistines in the late twelfth and early eleventh centuries BCE. Major battles occurred later in the eleventh century BCE. In one encounter, the Philistines captured the Ark (1 Sm. 4–6). Although they later returned the Ark, this event resulted in the Israelites pressing their leader Samuel to establish a monarchy (1 Sm. 8). The first king, Saul, was initially victorious against the Philistines, but in the end he was defeated by them and met his death on the battlefield at Gilboa (1 Sm. 31). When David became king of Israel about 1000 BCE, he set out to rid his nation of the Philistine menace. He was successful (2 Sm. 5.17–25, 8.1, 21.15–22, 23.9–17), and never again do the Philistines appear in the Bible as a major threat to the Israelites. They eventually came under Assyrian rule in 734 BCE. The Bible also refers to Philistines living in Canaan at the time of the Patriarchs (Gn. 20 and 26). These Philistines either belong to an earlier wave that came from the Aegean or it is an anachronism. The Philistines in Genesis differ in many ways from the Philistines in Judges and Samuel: they live in Gerar, not in the five city-states of Gath, Gaza, Ekron, Ashdod, and Ashkelon, called the Pentapolis; they are ruled by a king, not by lords (Heb. seranim, probably of Philistine origin); and they make peace with the Israelites instead of appearing as belligerent. Recent excavations at several of the cities of the Pentapolis (Ashdod, Ashkelon, and Ekron), as well as Tel Qasile on the Mediterranean coast at Tel Aviv, have revealed many aspects of the material culture of the Philistines.

PHILO (c.20 BCE–50 CE), Alexandrian philosopher and exegete. Little is known about his life beyond the fact that he came from a wealthy and influential family, some of whose members gave up the Jewish way of life, and that he participated in a Jewish embassy to Caligula in Rome between 39 and 40. Fully at home in Greek culture, Philo interpreted the Greek version of the Torah, the *Septuagint, within the conceptual framework and methodologies of Hellenistic philosophy. He was convinced that the books of Moses were actually the fountainhead of Greek philosophy, and most of his work was in the form of a detailed exegesis of the Torah, which he believed was almost entirely allegorical, aimed at penetrating through the surface narrative and exploring its spiritual depths. Thus, the biblical story of Abraham, Sarah, and Hagar (Gn. 16.1ff.) really describes the way to wisdom. The devoted learner (Abraham) must first obtain a basic education (of grammar, rhetoric, music, and so forth), which is the handmaiden (Hagar) of virtue, before possessing virtue (Sarah) itself. While interpreting even the legal sections of the Torah in a like manner, Philo insisted on the necessity of keeping the commandments according to their literal meaning; their deeper, allegorical sense was no substitute for actual observance. Though his biblical interpretation is basically universalistic, he stressed Jewish uniqueness and the significance of the Jewish people as mediators between humanity and the creator God, whose creation is so perfectly embodied in the Torah of Moses. Philo's exegesis contains much numerical speculation, since numbers possess special qualities, the knowledge of which is important for the full understanding of Moses' message, and exhibits an interest in the physical world, which was created by God and fully understood by Moses. Philo nowhere systematically expounds his philosophical system, which is clearly indebted to pre-Neoplatonism and Stoicism. The main tenets of his thought include a belief in one, absolutely perfect God, who operates in the world through a mediating *Logos. God formed the world from primordial matter and breathed his spirit into humans; humanity's goal is to gain release from the shackles of bodily needs and desires by philosophical contemplation, which will enable the soul to soar, in divine ecstasy, into the heavenly realm. While Christian thinkers found some of Philo's ideas (e.g., his emphasis on the allegorical nature of the Bible, and particularly his doctrine of the mediating Logos) particularly congenial, his influence within Judaism was limited. Josephus knew of him and had read some of his works, but he is not referred to in rabbinic literature nor by medieval Jewish philosophers. Philo's impact on modern Jewish thinkers is minimal, perhaps because his allegorical technique, his numerical mysticism, and his repetitive style make him unattractive to modern readers. Nevertheless, his attempt to fuse the Jewish and Greek cultures makes him one of the most intriguing intellectuals of the ancient world.

PHILOSOPHY. The Weltanschauung of the Bible and the rabbis was to be found scattered through Jewish literature. It was only as a result of external stimulation—Hellenism, Muslim Neoplatonism, Aristotelianism, post-Kantian idealism, and modern existentialism—that a philosophical outlook was systematized. The categories of contemporary philosophies were applied as a means of arriving at a philosophical understanding of Judaism. Indeed it took until the Middle Ages for the first Jewish creedal formulations to appear (see CREED; DOGMA).

The development of philosophical writing in Jewish circles led to deep rifts between a fundamentalist school, which condemned philosophy as a vain exercise of human reason that should be guided solely by 'revelation, and a rationalist approach exalting philosophy as the index of the truth or error of religious doctrines. Philosophy has often been called upon to prove, confirm, or buttress religious doctrines or to elucidate their implications and presuppositions in the light of philosophical understanding. Although the Bible is essentially nonphilosophical in character, there are underlying ideas and concepts that lend themselves to philosophic elaboration: God, revelation, transcendence, monotheism, theodicy, creation, the relationship between God and humankind, and so on. The ancient rabbis occasionally raised philosophical problems but in epigrammatic form without philosophic discussion.

The effective beginning of Jewish philosophy came only during the Middle Ages, but it was anticipated in Hellenistic times by *Philo of Alexandria and a number of minor writers of whom little is known. Philo interpreted Judaism in terms of Platonic and Stoic ideas, basing his efforts at reconciliation on an allegorical approach. However, Philo was soon forgotten in Jewish circles, and his main impact was on Christian thought.

Of far greater significance was the medieval revival of Greek philosophy among the Muslims and the use to which it was put by the theological schools of *Islam (*Kalam). The fact that two competing universal religions, both rejecting Judaism, claimed exclusive validity, as well as the rationalist criticism of religion in general, gave an enormous impulse to the theological attempts to prove the validity of religion by rational means. The first major Jewish medieval philosopher, *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on, depended on the Kalam school, as did David ibn Marwan *Mukammis and many others, both Rabbanites and Karaites. But whereas Mukammis's philosophy remained in the Mu'tazili tradition, rabbinic thought developed under the decisive influence of the two main streams of Greco-Arabic philosophy, Neoplatonism and Aristotelianism. Neoplatonism was the major influence in the thought of Yitshaq *Israeli and in Shelomoh *ibn Gabirol's Meqor Hayyim; its moral theology can also be seen in the Hovot ha-Levavot of *Bahya ben Yosef ibn Paquda, in Yosef ben Ya'aqov ibn *Zaddik's Sefer ha-'Olam ha-Qatan, and in *Yehudah ha-Levi's Kuzari (although Yehudah ha-Levi did not seek to reconcile Judaism with philosophy but to demonstrate the superiority of revelation). Aristotelianism, however, proved the more powerful trend. It appeared in the thinking of Avraham *ibn Daud and reached its peak in Moses *Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed, which offers the most comprehensive justification and reconciliation of philosophy and Judaism along Aristotelian lines. Most subsequent writings either commented on or developed Maimonides' ideas or criticized and combated them. The controversy engendered by Maimonides' writings (see MAIMONIDEAN CONTROVERSY) rent Jewry into two hostile camps, one of the most dramatic examples of the constant tension between those who advocated a philosophic approach and those who were convinced that it threatened Judaism and so forbade or limited its study. The controversy could not in the long run prevent the victory of Maimonides' philosophy. This was exemplified in the works of Yitshaq *Albalag and *Levi ben Gershom, who continued to build on the Aristotelian foundations laid by Maimonides and who were further influenced by Arabic sources, notably Averroës. Hasda'i ben Avraham *Crescas and his pupil Yosef *Albo were critical of Aristotelianism but wrote within its tradition. Most of the philosophers mentioned lived in or came from Spain, but this ended with the expulsion of 1492, its last representative being the prolific and versatile Yitshaq Abravanel (see ABRAVANEL FAMILY). The tradition was cultivated in Italy, where Jews philosophized in a Christian environment at least from the time of *Hillel ben Shemu'el.

There was little further writing of a philosophical nature until the modern period was inaugurated by Moses *Mendelssohn. His object was to bridge the German Enlightenment and traditional Judaism; he taught that Judaism was not a revealed religion but a revealed law. His thought, in many ways typical of the *Haskalah, was soon superseded by the triumph of German idealism, applied to Judaism by Salomon *Formstecher and Samuel Hirsch (see HIRSCH FAMILY). Nahman *Krochmal in his Guide of the Perplexed of the Time used historical research in the service of an ambitious philosophy of history with distinct Hegelian overtones. Salomon Ludwig *Steinheim propounded an antirationalist philosophy of revelation. The end of the twentieth century witnessed a revival of Kantianism, exemplified by Moritz *Lazarus's Ethik des Judentums and particularly by the work of Hermann *Cohen. Existentialist trends came to the fore in Franz *Rosenzweig's Star of Redemption, and the last decades of German Jewry were marked by the activities of other leading thinkers such as Martin *Buber (whose philosophy of dialogue was influential in Christian circles) and Leo *Baeck. Jewish nationalism was an outgrowth of the Haskalah movement. The outstanding Zionist philosophical essayist was *Ahad ha-'Am, whose doctrine of Zion as a spiritual center was opposed by the historian Simon *Dubnow, whose theories of successive social and cultural centers affirmed life in the Diaspora as a legitimate form of Jewish existence. Jacob *Klatzkin preached a radical "negation of the Diaspora." *Holo-caust theology probed the relation between God and Israel. The destruction of German Jewry meant the end of its hegemony in Jewish philosophy. Successors have been found in France (Emmanuel Levinas, André *Neher) but mainly in the United States (Abraham Joshua *Heschel, Yosef Dov Soloveichik [see SOLOVEICHIK FAMILY], Mordecai Menahem *Kaplan, Eugene Borowitz) and Israel (Yesha'yahu *Leibowitz). The establishment of the State of Israel led to a greater emphasis on the philosophical problems of statehood and political existence (such as the philosophy of history and individual and collective destiny).

PHINEHAS (Heb. Pinḥas), son of Eleazar and grandson of Aaron the high priest. When the Israelites began to offer sacrifices to the Moabite god Baal-peor and engaged in harlotry with the daughters of Moab, Phinehas ran a spear through Zimri, a chief of the tribe of Simeon, who had defiantly entered the encampment at Shittim with a Midianite woman. Phinehas's zeal persuaded God to end the plague that was ravaging Israel in punishment for their infidelity, and Phinehas and his offspring were rewarded with eternal priesthood (Nm. 25.10–13). Later, when Moses waged war against the Midianites, Phinehas was entrusted with the sacred utensils and "the trumpets for sounding the blasts" (Nm. 31.6). The Zaddokites traced their descent to him. Rabbinic aggadah identifies Phinehas with the prophet Elijah, both of whose deeds exemplified zealous action in the name of the Lord.

PHOENICIANS, Greek name for the peoples of the Levant (greater Canaan), especially the coastal region, and used by scholars today to refer to the Canaanites of such major city-states as Byblos, Tyre, and Sidon from c.1200 BCE onward. The Bible portrays the Phoenicians as being on friendly political terms with the Israelites. For example, King Hiram I of Tyre (c.980 BCE) made a treaty with David and Solomon, and the Phoenicians supplied the architects, workmen, and raw materials (cedar of Lebanon, especially) for the construction of David's and Solomon's palaces and for the Temple in Jerusalem (2 Sm. 5.11; 1 Kgs. 5.15–32, 7.13–14). The detailed biblical description of the Temple dovetails with the data from the archeological discovery of various Phoenician temples, clearly demonstrating that Solomon's Temple was built according to the design of a Phoenician-Canaanite prototype. Solomon and Hiram also had joint maritime ventures from the Red Sea port of Ezion-geber (near Elat) to develop trade with regions to the far south and east (perhaps East Africa and India; 1 Kgs. 9.26–28, 10.11, 10.22). Later, King Ethbaal I of Sidon (c.880 BCE) appears to have entered into a treaty with Omri, marked by the marriage of their children, Ahab, later king of Israel, and Jezebel, the Phoenician princess (1 Kgs. 16.31). These alliances, especially the latter, resulted in the introduction of Phoenician worship, especially the cult of Baal (see BAAL WORSHIP), into Israelite circles (1 Kgs. 16.31–32) and the subsequent confrontation of *Elijah with the Baal worshipers to preserve the purity of the Israelite religion. The Phoenicians were well known for their extensive trade with and colonization of the entire Mediterranean basin. They developed the linear alphabet, which then was taken over by the Israelites and many others in the Near East. Similarly, the Greeks (and through them all other Europeans) borrowed the use of alphabetic writing from the Phoenicians.

PIETY (Heb. hasidut), a concept, frequent in Talmudic and Midrashic literature, denoting devotion to worship beyond the demands of halakhah. In this sense, it is essentially a legal term, referring to individuals and groups who devote themselves to transcending the demands of the law, which they regard as minimal rather than optimal. Thus the Mishnah refers to a group that practiced spiritual concentration before and after statutory prayers beyond the time required as the Early Pietists (Ḥasidim ha-Ri'shonim). The meaning of the term ḥasidut was extended to include the concept of sacrifice: a ḥasid is one who dedicates much more to the performance of ritual and ethical precepts than is expected from others. In the Middle Ages, especially in the Rhineland, this term was used almost synonymously with qadosh (martyr). Another word used to denote a pious individual is tsaddiq* (righteous); in the Bible, the words ḥasid and tsaddiq are used almost interchangeably to refer to the faithful, obedient, and righteous servant of God. In later literature, a distinction developed, but there is no systematic definition that separates a ḥasid from a tsaddiq. In some writings, a ḥasid is one who tries; the tsaddiq is one who has achieved. However, this distinction has not been consistently maintained throughout Hebrew religious literature. In the writings of Judeo-Arabic spiritual authors the ḥasid is very similar to the Sufi ascetic and mystic.

The terms ḥasidut and ḥasid did not usually designate a movement or an organization, but rather an individual pietist; the cases in which the term has been used to describe movements were exceptions rather than the rule. One biblical example is the Hasideans* (Gr. Asidaioi), who are mentioned in Maccabees. As far as the early Ḥasidim are concerned, it is unclear whether they were part of a cohesive movement. In the Middle Ages, there was one movement to which this term was applied—the Ḥasidei Ashkenaz*—which received the name mainly because its leaders were known by this term (R. Shemu'el he-Ḥasid, R. Yehudah he-Ḥasid), as was its central work, the Sefer Ḥasidim. On the other hand, the nineteenth-century Musar* (ethics) movement could well be described as pietistic, though it was not referred to by that term. In the context of the modern Hasidic movement, the term ḥasid has lost its original meaning; today it means follower or adherent of a tsaddiq, rather than an individual pietist. See also HASIDISM.

PIGGUL (פִּיגּוּל), term applied to the flesh of a peace offering*, specifically a free-will offering* or votive offering, that was eaten beyond the prescribed two-day period following the sacrifice (Lv. 7.18, 19.7–8). The definition of the term piggul is unknown; perhaps it means foul, offensive, or otherwise desecrated. Rabbinic usage employed the term to include as well the flesh of the thanksgiving offering* eaten beyond its one-day period. The sacred meal had to be consumed reasonably close in time to the sacrifice itself and not become a separate, thereby secular, occasion; also, only the freshest, that is, the most desirable, meat was acceptable. Eating piggul invalidated the sacrifice. In the Bible, this is said to occur retroactively, desecrating what is sacred to the Lord two days after the sacrifice was performed. The rabbis, however, reinterpreted the passage to mean that the sacrificer, already at the time of slaughter, intends ultimately to partake of the flesh beyond its allotted time or outside of its proper place (Zev. 2.2–5, 3.6).

PIGS, cloven-hoofed quadrupeds that are forbidden as food since they do not chew their cud (Lv. 11.7; Dt. 14.8). Since they also wallow in dirt, pigs became for Jews a symbol of filth and of all that is unseemly and abominable. The use of pigs in pagan sacrifices, which some pagan rulers attempted to force upon Jews, may also have contributed to the particular abhorrence with which Jews view pigs. Pigs became so repugnant that they were often referred to not by name but as "the other things." One who raises swine is considered accursed (Men. 64b), and it was forbidden to trade in or derive benefit from them. Some authorities (for example, Maimonides) interpreted the ban as being based on physical considerations, but others, including the kabbalists, stressed the spiritual aspect of the ban.

PILGRIMAGE (Heb., 'aliyyat regel; see 'ALIYYAH). The duty to journey to a central shrine "at the place the Lord shall choose" (Dt. 16.16) from all parts of Erets Yisra'el and beyond to offer prayer and sacrifice and to participate in a whole gamut of religious activities, "that you may learn to fear the Lord your God" (Dt. 14.23; Is. 2.3; B. B. 21b), was already central in the Mosaic code. This prescribed that every Jewish male "appear before the Lord" on the annual Shalosh Regalim* (Ex. 23.17; Dt. 16.16). In addition, voluntary sacrifices and obligatory sin, purificatory, thanksgiving, and postparturition offerings had to be brought to the Temple. Major litigation had to be heard at the Temple court (Dt. 17.8). The first fruits, second tithes, or their proceeds were only to be enjoyed within the precincts of the central shrine (Dt. 14.22–27), subsequently delineated as within the walls of Jerusalem. All this ensured a steady stream of pilgrims—men, women, and children—making their way to the holy city throughout the year. It was promised (Ex. 34.24) that no one would covet the land the pilgrim might leave unattended in fulfillment of this duty. In the period of the judges, before the building of the Temple, the people went to Shiloh (1 Sm. 1.3). Solomon, in his dedicatory prayer, underlined the role of the Temple as the focus of pilgrimage for Jews and gentiles (1 Kgs. 8.41, 8.48). When the northern kingdom of Israel was established, Jeroboam attempted to set up rival shrines to attract pilgrims to Bethel and Dan (1 Kgs. 12.26–33).

The most impressive record of mass pilgrimage to Jerusalem was during the Second Temple period, from both the Erets Yisra'el and the Diaspora, and is described in tannaitic literature (e.g., Bik. 3.2–4), as well as in Philo (De specialibus legibus 1.69–70) and Josephus (Antiquities of the Jews 18.9.1; The Jewish War 19.11), which emphasizes the crucial unifying, social, religious, and national educational function of pilgrimage. The Mishnah (Pe'ah 1.1) includes re'ayyon, "appearing" before God, together with the bringing of the first fruits, leaving the corner of the field for the poor, acts of charity, and Torah study as things for which no maximum measure was prescribed. The local population was obliged by religious law (Yoma 12a) to provide free accommodations for the pilgrims in return for the skins of their sacrifices. The prayer for rain in the fall was postponed for fifteen days after Sukkot to enable the pilgrims from the Babylonian Diaspora "to reach the Euphrates" (Ta'an. 1.3). Josephus (The Jewish War 6.9) reported that on the eve of the Jewish rebellion against the Romans in 66 CE the official census recorded the sacrifice of 255,600 paschal lambs, each of which was partaken of by a whole family and friends (cf. T., Pes. 4.3).

The institution of pilgrimage retained its hold even after the destruction of the Temple and the dispersion. Talmudic rulings (Yev. 6b) emphasized that the Temple ruins were to be approached with the same reverence as the Temple itself, since the divine presence—"He who gave the commandment 'to revere my holy place'" (Lv. 19.30)—continues to reside there. Even during the most difficult periods of persecution and Jewish depopulation, the *Holy Land remained a center of pilgrimage for individuals and groups from all parts of the Diaspora. From the Middle Ages onward, there began a process of marking the graves of prophets and Talmudic sages as Jewish pilgrim sites. In the sixteenth century Yitshaq Luria and his followers claimed to have identified many graves of Talmudic rabbis in Galilee, and pious Jews would make pilgrimages to the Holy Land to prostrate themselves on these tombs. Prayers and guide books were composed for the pilgrims. The Safed mystics in the seventeenth century proclaimed nearby Mount Meron, the site of R. *Shim'on bar Yoh'ai's grave (he is regarded as the father of the Kabbalah) a major site of Jewish pilgrimage and feasting on Lag ba-'Omer, in spite of rabbinic disapproval (Responso Hatam Sofer, Yoreh De'ah 233), and to this day Mount Meron attracts thousands of Jews, mainly Sephardi and Hasidic. For the latter, fervent and carnival-like festivities at the graves, reputed or real, of distinguished rabbis and biblical figures remains an essential part of their folk culture, and organized groups regularly make pilgrimages to eastern Europe and elsewhere to visit the tombs of their *rebbe*s on the anniversaries of their deaths. In Muslim lands, it often became customary for Jews to make pilgrimages to graves, real or reputed, of biblical figures (such as Ezra and Daniel in Mesopotamia) and rabbis revered as saints, and to special synagogues (in Jerba, Tunisia). Lately, Jews from Muslim lands have begun making annual pilgrimages on 3 Shevat to Netivot to the tomb of Yisra'el Abi-Hasira (Baba Sali), a reputed saint of North African origin who died on that date.

Maimonides and subsequent halakhists forbade any feasting at actual gravesides and frowned on organized prayer at cemeteries, except that associated with fasting and mourning to arouse the people to repentance. Subsequently, the surviving *Western Wall of the Temple mount became the focal point of Jewish pilgrimage and has remained so to this day.

PILLAR OF CLOUD AND FIRE. According to the Bible, the method by which God led the Israelites after their Exodus from Egypt on their way through the desert to Canaan was in the form of a cloud by day and of fire by night (Ex. 13.21–22). The Midrash interprets the double description as referring to two separate entities, a fiery pillar rising at night and replacing the setting cloud (Mekhilta "Be-Shallah," p. 82); the biblical text suggests a pillar of cloud containing the divine presence by day and a pillar of fire by night. While the non-Priestly tradition confines the function of the cloud of fire to guidance through the desert, apparently envisioning it as a cloud led by an angel (Ex. 14.19), the Priestly source sees it as a means of divine revelation throughout the wilderness wanderings. This account reaches a climax when the cloud of fire, visible to all Israelites, alights on Mount *Sinai and Moses is summoned to enter it (Ex. 19.1, 24.15–18). After the construction of the *Tabernacle, the cloud, signifying the divine presence, enters and takes up permanent residence in the Sanctuary (Ex. 40.34–35). Thereafter, its periodic ascents and descents indicate to the Israelites when the march is to be resumed or interrupted (Ex. 40.36–38; Nm. 15–23). Though Moses is said to have met directly with God in the Tabernacle on numerous occasions (Ex. 25.22, 29.42–43, 30.6, 30.36, 34.34–35; and esp. Nm. 7.89), it was believed to be fatal for ordinary humans to gaze on the deity in its cloud of fire (Lv. 16.2, 16.13).

PILPUL (פִּלְפּוּל), the process of dialectical reasoning applied in the study of the oral law. Pilpul can mean the application of hermeneutics to the halakhic parts of the Bible, but more particularly it signifies the logical analysis and argumentation characteristic of legal casuistry. Originally, pilpul was considered a legitimate method of Talmudic study, and it was listed in the Talmud as the twelfth of forty-eight methods by which Torah learning is acquired (Avot 6.6). The process was occasionally carried to extremes in order to sharpen the acumen of students (Eruv. 13a), but because of the misuse to which unrestrained dialectic could be put (Sot. 47b), the pilpulistic method was eventually condemned by various rabbis. The use of pilpul to demonstrate intellectual brilliance for its own sake aroused the disapproval of scholars of all ages. Following the methodology of R. Ya'akov *Pollak of Kraków, the pilpulistic approach was highly developed by eastern European yeshivot, despite the protests of some leading Talmudists. Eventually, pilpul was replaced as the principal avenue of Talmudic study by the logical method of study pioneered by *Eliyyahu ben Shelomoh Zalman of Vilna, the Vilna Ga'on, and spread by his disciples.

PINHAS BEN YA'IR (2d–3d cent.), Palestinian tanna'. The son-in-law of R. Shim'on bar Yoḥ'ai (according to the Zohar, the father-in-law) and a respected contemporary of R. Yehudah ha-Nasi' (Hul. 7b), he resided in Lydda and was an ascetic who, while known for his brilliance (Shab. 33b), was especially famed for his saintly living (e.g., Hul. 7b; Dt. Rab. 3.3) and miraculous powers. Although he is most frequently mentioned in aggadic contexts, halakhic disputes are preserved in which he leaned towards stringency (cf. T., Ohal. 18.18). He spoke of the spiritual decline of the generations after the destruction of the Temple (Sot. 9.15), and coined the oft-quoted saying that zeal (for Torah, others, good works) leads to fastidiousness, fastidiousness to cleanness, cleanness to abstinence, to holiness, to modesty, to fear of sin, to piety, to the Holy Spirit, to the resurrection of the dead, which comes through Elijah. This saying took on special significance in the Musar movement. Midrash Tadshe'* is sometimes incorrectly attributed to him based on his introductory comments to the work.

PIRQEI DE-RABBI ELI'EZER, pseudepigraphous narrative midrash written in Hebrew and ascribed to the tanna' *Eli'ezer ben Hurqanos (1st–2d cent.), whose life story is told in the first chapter; in fact, however, the composition of much of the work has been dated to the eighth century. Pirquei de-Rabbi Eli'ezer is an aggadic midrash, the avowed purpose of which is to "declare the glory of God." Many sections are devoted to the Creation chapters of Genesis and the early history of the patriarchs; its sudden conclusion with the punishment of Miriam for slandering Moses indicates that the work was unfinished or that part of it has been lost. Three chapters (chaps. 6–9) are devoted to the calendar, others to topics such as the Sabbath (chap. 18), repentance (chap. 43), and circumcision (chap. 29). The author often relates certain precepts to events in the lives of the patriarchs and draws upon a broad range of rabbinic sources, midrashim, the Talmud, the Palestinian targumim, and so on. He was also deeply influenced by the apocryphal literature, especially the Enoch cycle. He cites Arabic legends and gives a remarkable description of the Muslim Omayyad dynasty, looking forward to its fall, which he sees as an omen of the end of the exile. Pirquei de-Rabbi Eli'ezer cites many halakhic customs current in Erets Yisra'el at the beginning of the geonic period. This proves that the work is Palestinian in origin and dates from the first half of the eighth century CE, just prior to the fall of the Omayyad dynasty but before the rise of the Abbasid dynasty. It was first published in Constantinople in 1514 and translated into English by Gerald Friedlander in 1916.

PIRQOI BEN BABOI (fl. c.800 CE), Babylonian scholar who described himself as a disciple of *Rabba' bar Nahmani (or *Rava') and *Yehuda'i ben Nahman Ga'on. He is known only as the author of a polemical tract in Hebrew, large portions of which have been published during the course of the twentieth century by a number of scholars. Pirqoi's epistle, addressed to the Jewish communities of North Africa and Spain, contains an unbridled attack on various Palestinian customs, notably the poetic elaborations of the liturgy that were an extremely important element of Palestinian Jewish tradition (see PRYUT). According to Pirqoi's one-sided and historically suspect presentation, only Babylonian Jewry had maintained an uninterrupted tradition from the Talmudic period (and earlier), while Palestinian tradition had been totally disrupted as a result of Christian persecutions and could no longer assert a claim to continuity or authority with regard either to customary practice or to literary sources (especially the Talmud Yerushalmi). Pirqoi was a great admirer of Yehuda'i Ga'on, whom he describes as an arch-conservative who prided himself on never asserting a halakhic position unless he could support it both by Talmudic sources and by direct tradition from his teachers. Pirqoi further claims that Yehuda'i preceded him in the struggle against Palestinian customs and had gone so far as to attempt to convince the Palestinian Jews themselves to abandon their traditional practices in favor of Babylonian ones.

PITTSBURGH PLATFORM, program adopted by a conference of American Reform rabbis who met in Pittsburgh in 1885. It provided the guidelines for the Reform movement in the United States for fifty years until superseded by the *Columbus platform. The Pittsburgh platform was based on a "Declaration of Principles" formulated by Kaufmann *Kohler, who was the moving spirit in convening the conference. Kohler had been challenged by the traditionalist rabbi Alexander *Kohut to define the principles of Reform Judaism. There had been sharp differences in outlook between the more radical Reform, led by David *Einhorn, and those led by Isaac Mayer *Wise who propounded a more moderate Reform. Wise presided over the conference, which presented a compromise between the two groups, but with Kohler's views predominating.

The Pittsburgh platform consisted of eight paragraphs. While recognizing the significance of other faiths, it held that Judaism taught the highest concept of God; it extolled the Bible as an instrument of moral and religious instruction, while stating that the Bible often reflected the primitive ideas of its own age; it recognized only the moral Mosaic laws and those ceremonies that were elevating, rejecting the dietary laws and regulations concerning priestly purity; it stated that the Jews were not a nation but a religious community, who had no expectation to return to Palestine or to restore the Temple; it affirmed the immortality of the soul but rejected the doctrines of resurrection and reward and punishment in the hereafter; and it asserted that the mission of Israel was to bring the world to a universal morality. The platform was adopted by the *Central Conference of American Rabbis in 1889.

PITTUM HA-QETORET (פִּתּוּם הַקֶּטֶרֶת; Compound Forming the Incense), baraiyta' (Ker. 6a; also Y., Yoma' 4.5) describing the preparation of incense in the Temple (Ex. 30.34–38) recited at the end of the morning service or—among Sephardim and Yemenites—also prior to the afternoon service. The recitation of Pittum ha-Qetoret goes back to the time of R. *Amram bar Sheshna' (9th cent.), when it was recited morning and evening (corresponding to the times when the incense was offered in the Temple). In the Provençal rite, it was said at the end of Sabbath. The mystics attached great significance to its meticulous recitation, and for fear that the worshiper might be negligent in his recital on weekday mornings, they restricted the passage to the liturgy of Sabbaths and festivals, a practice that has remained the Ashkenazi custom in the Diaspora.

PIYYUT (פִּיּוּט), a poem, especially a liturgical poem inserted into a statutory prayer. The genre originated in Palestine around the fifth century. Subsequently, piyyutim were composed to a minor extent in Babylonia, and then again abundantly in Germany, France, Spain, and Italy. Though continuing until the eighteenth century, the writing of such poetry reached its height by the fourteenth, after which, payyetanim (composers of piyyutim; see PAYYETAN) were less prolific, and their piyyutim were rarely incorporated into the *liturgy. By then, readily available mass-printed prayer books had virtually closed off the opportunity for new creations to be admitted into the official liturgical corpus. By 1924 Israel Davidson (Thesaurus of Medieval Poetry) had enumerated some 35,000 piyyutim and listed nearly 3,000 poets; many more have been discovered since then.

The rise of the genre has been variously explained as a result of either persecution or natural liturgical creativity. *Yehudah ben Barzillai al-Bargeloni (12th-cent. Barcelona) traces poetic composition dealing with Jewish holy day regulations to an unspecified ban on the study of Torah—perhaps a 553 edict of Justinian prohibiting the study of Deuterosis (a word taken to mean Judaism's oral law). Samau'al ibn Yahya' al-Magribi (known also as Shemu'el ben Yehudah ibn Abbas), a convert to Islam, provides a similar report locating piyyutim as a response to Persian persecution—taken by some to mean the Sassanian dynasty of the fifth through the sixth century. The majority opinion today discounts both views as fanciful ex post facto etiologies and explains piyyut instead as a natural outgrowth of the synagogue service, which had begun as a creative oral art but was assuming greater linguistic fixity by the third and fourth centuries. The piyyutim represent an attempt to retain liturgical creativity. The earliest compositions were modest and their authors remain anonymous, but they culminated in a classical Palestinian period (c.5th–7th cent.), represented most prolifically by *Yosei ben Yosei, *Yann'ai, and El'azar *Kallir. They reflect a Jewish mosaic of words, akin to the surrounding Byzantine poetry, and a verbal analogue to Byzantine mosaic architecture.

These poets composed epic poems called qerovot (later garbled by medieval copyists as grovets; see QEROVAH) for each and every Sabbath, linking the *Amidah prayer to the weekly Torah reading. Since the cycle of readings, to which holiday readings were added, was triennial, the poetic output amounted to some 150 to 200 poems, each of which had many highly formalized stanzas inserted according to complex rules into the various paragraphs (or blessings) of the prayer in question. They also wrote poetry for other liturgical staples, including yotserot (see YOTSER) and ma'aravot* (insertions in the morning and evening Shema' and its blessings, taking their name from the liturgical staples in which they are placed and the time of day of the service). Their piyyutim for holy days included 'avodot (for Yom Kippur afternoon; see AVODAH); seliḥot* (penitential poems for the High Holy Day period); hosha'not* (poetry recited while circumambulating the synagogue on Sukkot); azharot* (poetry for Shavu'ot); and qinot (elegies for Tish'ah be-'Av; see QINAH). Relatively little of their work was ultimately included in the canonized prayer service, however, because the Babylonian prayer book of Amram Ga'on (9th cent.) became normative throughout the Jewish world, and Babylonian liturgy had frowned on Palestinian practice in general and on Palestinian poetry in particular. After the coming of Islam, piyyutim were composed also in Babylonian, especially by *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on, who, however, hailed from Egypt and the Palestinian cultural orbit. Other Babylonian poets from the ninth to the eleventh century left little overall impact on the genre.

Thereafter, Spanish payyetanim dominated. They experimented early on with the application of Arabic meter to Hebrew and produced a galaxy of famous poets notable for their religious and secular output. Among other things, they are known for creating seliḥot for the entire month of Elul. Especially noteworthy are Shelomoh *ibn Gabirol and *Yehudah ha-Levi. The parallel Ashkenazi school began in ninth-century Italy, then moved north to Germany, but, lacking the impact of Islamic culture, never achieved the independence from the classic style nor the Hebrew poetic sophistication that marked Spain. With the decline of western European culture and the expulsions of Jews from newly sovereign states (England, 1290; France, 1305; Spain, 1492), poetry moved east to Poland or the eastern Mediterranean countries, especially those under Ottoman control. However, despite some notable exceptions, especially among the sixteenth-century kabbalists of Safed, the service was rapidly being standardized and would soon be fixed by the printing press. New poetry was relegated to extrasynagogue settings, such as Sabbath eve table songs (see ZEMIROT).

Elementary rhythmic patterns can be found already in the earliest anonymous piyyutim, but it was the Spanish school that created advanced metrical schemes, such as measuring out a fixed number of syllables per line. Experiments in rhyme dominate the classical Palestinian era, especially with Yann'ai and more spectacularly, with Kallir. The latter also took enormous liberty with inventing or altering words for poetic ends, often to make his poems accord with acrostics that follow the alphabet or spell out the poet's name. Eventually, more and more critics (e.g., Avraham ibn Ezra, commentary to Ecc. 5.1) attacked the poets for linguistic obscurity and grammatical obfuscation. Maimonides objected to what he considered theologically objectionable imagery for God. In the eighteenth century, Ya'aqov *Emden summed up negative opinion saying that the piyyutim are so prolix that "even the angels do not understand them."

Nonetheless, piyyutim became staples of holiday worship in particular, and collections were eventually codified de facto by traditional usage and then by printers, who made available standard sets of poems as part of their prayer books. By the nineteenth century, Enlightenment aesthetics and theology intensified objections to poetry that was increasingly seen as hard to understand and serving only to add tedium and length to the worship service. Liturgical reformers streamlined the liturgy by shortening or eliminating all but the most popular offerings, which were retained as often as not only because of their musical features, which attracted people who rarely understood the Hebrew lyrics themselves.

Scholarship, on the other hand, has always found the piyyutim attractive. Nineteenth-century founders of modern scholarship saw them as evidence of Jewish culture beyond stereotypical medieval rabbinics, particularly from the Spanish golden age. Rites were classified geographically, according to the particular selection of poems incorporated, and poems were classified not only according to liturgical place and calendrical occasion, but also by style. Commentaries tried valiantly to provide keys to poetic allusions and to decipher word plays. With the discovery of the Cairo Genizah, thousands of new poems came to light, expanding the scope of known Jewish creativity far beyond what anyone had imagined. The poetry that began as a practical means to embellish the liturgy has largely fallen into liturgical ill favor and has instead become the domain of specialized scholarship intent on rounding out knowledge of Jewish creativity over the centuries.

PLAGUES OF EGYPT (Heb. 'eser ha-makkot), the series of afflictions brought upon the Egyptians by God in order to coerce Pharaoh into releasing the Israelites from slavery (Ex. 3.20, 7.8–11.10, 12.12–13, 29–30). Various traditions seem to have existed regarding the exact number and sequence of plagues (see Ps. 78.44–51, 105.28–36, in which the number of plagues is less than ten); the detailed version in Exodus mentions ten plagues, arranged in three groups of three plus a final, decisive one. In each of the three groups, the first two plagues were unleashed after a warning by Moses, while the third followed unannounced. In this account all the water in Egypt is transformed into blood, swarms of frogs cover all of Egypt, lice infest the entire land, Egypt is invaded by swarms of insects (others say wild beasts), a pestilence kills off Egypt's livestock, a skin inflammation (boils) afflicts man and beast, hail destroys the crops and surviving livestock, swarms of locusts darken the skies and consume all vegetation, darkness descends and covers the land for three days, and all the firstborn sons of Egypt are struck dead by the Lord himself. In each of the plagues, the Israelites themselves are unharmed. Following several of the plagues, Pharaoh temporarily agrees to release the Israelites, only to change his mind immediately after the plague is terminated; otherwise, he is simply unmoved. Pharaoh's stubborn refusal to set the Israelites free is God's own doing; he hardens Pharaoh's heart, making him incapable of giving in (Ex. 4.21, 9.12, 10.1, 20, 11.10). This is in order that God may exert and display his might, thus proclaiming his lordship and providing an object lesson for future generations (Ex. 9.15–16, 20.1–2). This is what is meant by the often repeated statement that God redeemed Israel from Egypt "with a strong hand and an outstretched arm" (Dt. 4.34 and elsewhere). Later commentators attenuated this by arguing that only after the sixth plague does God harden Pharaoh's heart; before this, his obstinacy is said to be his own doing (compare Ex. 8.11, 28 with Ex. 9.12, 10.20); Maimonides contended that God's preventing Pharaoh's repentance was the punishment for his initial stubbornness (Hilkhot Teshuvah 6.3). (But to inflict suffering on Pharaoh without enabling him to relent is only unfair at first glance; as far as the Bible is concerned, whatever calamities befall the Egyptians are richly deserved. Actually, the notion that the Egyptians might go unpunished for the brutality of the long enslavement would be a far greater injustice.) The Pesah Seder includes the recital of the ten plagues, followed by several Midrashic arguments enlarging their number.

PLATONISM. See NEOPLATONISM.

PLEDGES (Heb. mashkon), personal property offered as security against the repayment of a debt that may be given when the debt originates or when repayment is due (as a security); it may also be given to the creditor for his use. The pledge may be any object belonging to the borrower. The creditor may not enter the home of the debtor to choose or to take the pledge but must accept whatever pledge the debtor chooses to give him. The debtor's tools of trade (Dt. 24.6) or necessary clothes or covering (Ex. 22.26) cannot be taken during the time of day or night when they are normally used, nor may the clothing of a widow or vessels required to prepare food be taken as a pledge (Dt. 24.10–17). If a debt is not repaid when it falls due, the pledge may be sold, and the proceeds accrue to the creditor. The indiscriminate taking of pledges was severely denounced by the prophets. See also LIEN.

• Yisroel Reisman, The Laws of Ribbis: The Laws of Interest and Their Application to Everyday Life and Business (Brooklyn, N.Y., 1995).

PLURALISM, RELIGIOUS, the view that different, or even contradictory, forms of religious belief and behavior could or even should coexist. The problem with religious pluralism arises, when one particular tradition (the mainstream) dominates society, denying the legitimacy of other streams and marginalizing them as sectarian phenomena.

In the latter part of the Second Temple period and in the absence of one dominant orthodoxy, *Sadducees, *Pharisees, and *Essenes existed side by side in Judea, while Hellenized Jews flourished in Alexandria and elsewhere in the Diaspora. When, after the destruction of the Temple, the Pharisaic-rabbinic tradition came to predominate, the internal rabbinic controversies became part of the corpus of rabbinic literature. The Mish-nah (San. 10.1) presents a first attempt to define those who are excluded from the community: among those who "have no share in the world to come" are those who deny that the Torah enjoins belief in the resurrection of the dead, those who deny that the Torah was divinely revealed, and the "Epicurean" (who presumably denied that there was a divine judge). More important than these exclusions was the basic unity created by the possession and study of the same sacred and authoritative sources (especially the Talmud) and the use of a common prayer book.

Inevitably, considerable liturgical and other divergences developed in the Diaspora (see ASHKENAZIM; SEPHARDIM), but these were never felt to endanger the unity of the Jewish people as a community of faith, although attempts were made from time to time, especially in some of the codes of religious law, to impose more uniformity (see SHULHAN 'ARUKH). The most disruptive schism was that of the *Karaites, who rejected the authority of the rabbinic tradition and disavowed the Talmud. But even in this case, the separation between Karaites and Rabbanites was not total, and intermarriages between the two groups were frequent. Attempts by some philosophers, such as Maimonides, to define principles of faith that would constitute minimum requirements for religious identity were opposed by other authorities. Kabbalists developed remarkably unorthodox concepts of divinity and ritual, but these in turn became the Orthodox standard. A similar conflict, which almost led to a schism, occurred toward the end of the eighteenth century in eastern Europe, with the spread of the Hasidic movement (see HASIDISM). Rabbinic attempts to excommunicate the new "sect" were of no avail, and in due course the two camps closed ranks against their common enemy: Enlightenment modernism and religious reform.

In nineteenth-century Germany and America, separate denominational tendencies crystallized around the modern view of Torah and tradition as products of historical development and the widely felt need for changes as a result of the political emancipation of Jews and the cultural challenges of modern civilization. The modern emphasis on personal freedom ran counter to a traditional system based on obedience to inherited patterns of thought and action. A main difference between *Reform Judaism on the one hand and *Conservative Judaism and *Orthodoxy on the other was the centrality of halakhah in defining correct Jewish practice. Although they consider rabbinic tradition an invaluable resource, Reform (and Reconstructionist) Judaism feels free to reject much of halakhah as not binding. Conservative Judaism acknowledges the need for greater flexibility and even innovation in halakhah to meet the conditions of modern life, which Orthodox authorities, especially the Haredim, deny. The Orthodox consider the non-Orthodox as deviating from a divinely ordained system of belief and practice; proponents of adaptation and change argue that the very concept of Orthodoxy is a modern construction imposed on a heterogeneous Jewish past and that the Orthodox rejection of religious pluralism should be viewed as a modern rather than traditional position. Especially divisive are the halakhic rules defining who is a Jew, conversion to Judaism, and requirements for a Jewish marriage (see DIVORCE; JEW, WHO IS A?, CONTROVERSY; PATRILINEAL DESCENT; PROSELYTE).

A related set of issues affecting religious pluralism has arisen as a result of modern *Zionism and the establishment of the State of Israel (see SECULARISM). In America, where adherents to the non-Orthodox forms of Judaism are the majority, religious pluralism is a fact, and efforts have been made to define a "civil religion" of American Jews that embraces the wide range of behaviors and beliefs that are considered acceptable by most Jews. In Israel, Orthodox Judaism is politically powerful, although secular Jewish identity is prevalent. There the non-Orthodox religious movements are much smaller and have been denied recognition and support by the Orthodox religious establishments, although their rights (e.g., the validity of their conversions) have often been upheld by the civil courts.

POETRY. Biblical literature can be divided into two categories: poetry and prose. The Torah and the Former Prophets are prose except for certain poetic compositions (Gn. 49, the Testament of Jacob; Ex. 15, the Song of Moses; Nm. 23.7–10, 18–24, 24.3–9, 15–24, the Sayings of Balaam; Dt. 32, the Song of Moses; Dt. 33, the Testament of Moses; Jgs. 5, the Song of Deborah; 1 Sm. 2, the Prayer of Hannah; 2 Sm. 1, the Elegy of David; and 2 Sm. 22/Ps. 18, the Royal Psalm of Thanksgiving) and smaller units that may be either partial quotations of unpreserved poetic works or incipits (e.g., Gn. 4.23–24; Ex. 15.21; Nm. 21.17–18, 27–30; Jos. 10.12–13; 1 Sm. 18.7, 21.12, 29.5; and 1 Kgs. 8.12–13). In the Latter Prophets most chapters are an admixture of poetry and prose (although some chapters may be purely prose, such as Jonah 1, 3, 4, while others may be purely poetic, such as Jonah 2.3–10 and Hb. 3). In the Hagiographa, the books of Psalms, Proverbs, and Job, and part of the *Hamesh Megillot, are poetry, while the rest are mostly prose. Scholars such as David Noel Freedman have used statistical analysis to distinguish definitively between prose and poetry, but it is clear that poetic units in the Bible are characterized by two main poetic features: some sort of poetic meter or rhythm involving the basic division between two or more stichs; and poetic parallelism between two or more stichs. Both Ugaritic and Biblical Hebrew poetic parallelism can best be defined as the relationship between two or more stichs, whereby the second stich expresses more or less the same concept as the first, usually in different words.

Alphabetical and nominal acrostics were favorite devices in post-biblical poetry and served mnemonic purposes as well, since books were not generally available and the congregation had to pray by heart. During the geonic period, largely under Arabic influence, rhyme became a prominent feature of Hebrew poetry. Dunash ben Labrat (10th cent.) applied Arabic poetic forms to Hebrew poetry, which led to the development of meter. Hebrew sacred poetry flourished from the fifth through the fourteenth century, starting with the period of payyetanim (see PAYYETAN), when many of the best known piyyutim, selihot, and qinot were composed. Outstanding poets in medieval Spain included Shelomoh ibn Gabirol (whose Keter Malkhut is a classic of religious poetry); Mosheh ibn Ezra (whose selihot received wide currency); Yehudah ha-Levi (whose sacred poems were imbued with national sentiments and the love of Zion); and Avraham ibn Ezra. Distinguished religious poets in Italy, France, and Germany carried on the ancient Palestinian tradition. The Crusader massacres inspired many moving dirges, some of which found permanent places in the prayer service. From the thirteenth century, sacred poetry was marked by quantity rather than originality. Among the exceptions were the kabbalist poets of Safed (Yisra'el ben Mosheh Najara, Shelomoh Alkabez) and the Yemenite poet Shalom ben Yosef Shabbazi. Few poetic additions to the liturgy have won a permanent place in recent centuries, although the Reconstructionist prayer book includes poems by modern Hebrew poets.

POLEMICS (from Gr. polemos [war]), controversies conducted either verbally or in writing.

Jewish-Christian Polemics. The Jewish-Christian debate can be said to be as old as Christianity; that is, when the first Christians, who were Jews, tried to convince other Jews that Jesus was the Messiah. Most Jews rejected this claim, maintaining that messianic promises continued to be unfulfilled. Christian treatises polemicizing specifically against Judaism go back at least to the second century (most notably Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho). Many church fathers, including Tertullian, Origen, and Augustine, wrote anti-Jewish polemical works. Polemics could be conducted on the purely literary level or in personal encounters. In the later Middle Ages, the latter were occasionally staged with pomp and circumstance at the initiative of the aggressively dominant (i.e., Christian) side, held in the presence of the king or other ruling authorities, and imposed on the Jews who were limited in their freedom to respond (see DISPUTATIONS).

The first Jewish compositions aimed at refuting Christianity date only from the ninth century and were written in Muslim countries in Arabic. One of those works was translated into Hebrew as The Book of Nestor the Priest and greatly influenced medieval Jewish polemical writings in Christian Europe, including the first such treatises; namely Ya'aqov ben Re'uven's Milhamot Adonai and Yosef Kimḥi's Sefer ha-Berit (both 1170).

The Jewish-Christian debate took a decisive turn in the thirteenth century when Christians began using rabbinic literature for polemical purposes. This use was expressed in two ways, either as an attack on the Talmud as nonsensical and blasphemous (as in the Disputation of *Paris of 1240, after which the Talmud was burned), or as part of the claim that rabbinic literature supports the truth of Christianity (as in the Disputation of *Barcelona of 1263 between Nahmanides and the former Jew Pablo Christiani, and in Raymund Martini's Pugio fidei [1278]). The employment of the Talmud for polemical purposes was not merely an academic exercise, but part of a larger, intensified anti-Jewish missionary campaign.

The deterioration in Jewish status in late fourteenth- and fifteenth-century Spain saw a flourishing of Jewish polemical works, most notably Profiat Duran's Al Tehi ka-'Avotekha (c.1393) and Kelimat ha-Goyyim (c.1397), and Hasda'i Crescas's Refutation of the Christian Principles. These works were marked by both a close knowledge of Christian theology and the use of philosophy to refute it. The last great public disputation was held in *Tortosa, Spain, in 1413 and 1414.

Jewish-Christian polemics continued also after the Protestant Reformation, with Martin *Luther setting the tone. Johann Christoph Wagenseil and Johann Andreas Eisenmenger (Judaism Revealed [1700]) wrote notorious examples. Anti-Jewish polemics became "academic" in the nineteenth century; in the latter part of the century, they were joined with modern non-theological antisemitism. The Jewish response, in the form of theological and philosophical writings, was usually apologetic (see APOLOGETICS) in intent and only rarely aggressive, depending on the readership intended; compare Toledot Yeshu, and the Sefer Nitsaḥon of Yom Tov Lipmann *Muelhausen, with the first edition of Leo *Baeck's The Essence of Judaism (1905), in response to the German theologian A. Harnack. More recently, and especially after the Holocaust, attempts are being made on both sides to substitute dialogue in place of polemics.

Jewish-Muslim Polemics. Muslim polemics against Judaism has its beginnings in the Qur'an and certain Ḥadith traditions. In the eleventh and fourteenth centuries it produced a few major and systematic compositions (Ibn Ḥazm, al-Maghribi), but never became a major preoccupation. Jewish response kept a low profile, and the more important polemical reactions (e.g., *Maimonides' Epistle to Yemen) were written for internal consumption. A somewhat special feature was Islam's dogmatic affirmation of earlier prophecy (Moses, Jesus) and revealed scriptures, and hence the special status accorded to the "peoples of the book" (see DHIMMI). Religious polemics have therefore frequently been tripartite (e.g., al-Raqili, but especially Ibn Kammunah's Critical Enquiry into the Three Faiths [1280]). This tradition gave birth to the well-known parable of the Three Rings which passed via Boccaccio's Decameron to G. E. Lessing's Nathan the Wise. In the nineteenth century, European antisemitism began to infiltrate Muslim writings and attitudes, mainly from French sources, and in the twentieth century became joined to anti-Zionist and anti-Israeli polemics.

The most frequent and interesting type of religious polemics expresses conflicts, tensions and developments within religious traditions. These can be innovative or "reforming" attacks on established orthodoxies or, conversely, attacks by traditionalists on what they consider as heretical deviations. Intersectional disputes are often expressed in this idiom (See CONTROVERSIES; KARAITES, MITNAGGEDIM).

POLGAR, YITSHAQ (13th–14th cent.), philosopher and polemicist. He is best known as the principal opponent of Abner of Burgos, a Spanish-Jewish philosopher who converted to Christianity and adopted the name Alfonso de Valladolid. Soon after Abner's conversion, Polgar wrote Iggeret ha-Ḥarifot, a pamphlet of personal attacks against the apostate. In 'Ezer ha-Dat, Polgar defended Judaism along Aristotelian-Averroistic lines, emphasized free will, and opposed astrological beliefs. The book was published with an English summary by Gershon Belasco (London, 1906) and in an annotated edition by Ya'aqov Levinger (Tel Aviv, 1984). Polgar also wrote commentaries on Genesis, Ecclesiastes, and Psalms, and a book on ethics, none of which has been preserved.

POLLAK, YA'AQOV (died c.1530), Polish rabbi. He completed his studies at the Nuremberg Yeshivah and was then appointed rabbi of Prague and, in the 1490s, rabbi of Kraków. In 1503 he was recognized as chief rabbi by the king of Poland and granted extensive judicial authority. According to Polish-Jewish tradition, he was responsible for the transfer of the traditions of Jewish learning from Ashkenaz to eastern Europe and for establishing Poland as a center of the Jewish religious world. One of the leading rabbinical authorities of his day, he is supposed to have invented the method of pilpul-hilluqim (precise distinctions), which transformed pilpul* from a pedagogical tool to a hermeneutic system (for which he was known as ba'al [or avi, i.e., father of] ha-hilluqim). He was a controversial figure, and his decision allowing his sister-in-law to divorce at the age of twelve led to a herem (ban) being placed on him by a number of prominent rabbis. A dispute within the Kraków community in 1522 seems to have been the cause of his leaving Poland and settling in Jerusalem, apparently the place of his death. None of his writings was published, and only a few of his teachings survive in the works of later rabbis. Among his many students was Shalom ben Yosef *Shakna, one of the leading rabbinic authorities of the mid-sixteenth century.

POLYGAMY. Although the Creation account suggests that monogamy was a biblical ideal (Gn. 1.27; 2.18–24), the Bible contains numerous cases of polygamy, including Lamech in Genesis, 4.19, and, most notably, Solomon, in 1 Kings 11.3, and the practice is permitted under biblical law. Polygamy was also recognized by the rabbis as legally valid, though Talmudic society was predominantly monogamous and very few rabbis had more than one wife. The Talmud stipulates that the husband must be capable of fulfilling his marital obligations toward additional wives before he will be permitted to enter into additional marriages. If the first wife's ketubbah contains a stipulation against additional wives, then her husband may not ignore it. Moreover, if the local custom is to practice monogamy then all local ketubbot will be read as if they contained such a stipulation (Shulḥan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 76.8; Ḥelqat Mehoqqeq, Even ha-'Ezer 76.15). A taqqanah attributed to R. Gershom in the tenth century officially banned polygamy among Ashkenazi Jews, unless permission to take an additional wife is granted by one hundred rabbis from three different countries or districts (Shulḥan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 1.10). A breach of this taqqanah constitutes grounds for the first wife to request the beit din to force her husband to divorce the second wife or, alternatively, to give her a get and return her ketubbah (Shulḥan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 154). There was no such taqqanah among Sephardi Jews, although the use of a ketubbah stipulation banning polygamy became widespread, and the consequences of its breach were similar to those incurred by disregarding R. Gershom's taqqanah. The difference between the Ashkenazi and the Sephardi responses to polygamy is clearly a result of the influence of the general cultures in which the two Jewries flourished. The herem of Rabbenu Gershom, as the above-mentioned taqqanah is known, also banned divorce of a wife against her will, and in order to deal with a situation involving an insane or recalcitrant wife, the release by one hundred rabbis was introduced at the same time. Such a step will, however, only be taken if a full investigation of the facts reveals that the release is fully justified. In 1950 the chief rabbis of Israel enacted that monogamy was binding upon all Jews irrespective of their communal affiliations, and polygamy is an offense under Israeli criminal law. The release of the hundred rabbis is, however, still valid if approved by the two chief rabbis of the state.

POOL, DAVID DE SOLA (1885–1970), rabbi, communal leader, and author. Born in London, Pool served as rabbi of Congregation Shearith Israel, known as the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue of New York City, from 1907 to 1956, and then as rabbi emeritus.

Pool was the foremost spokesman of Sephardi Jewry in North America. He founded the Union of Sephardic Congregations (1928), which later published the prayer book he compiled.

From 1920 through 1921, he served in Palestine as regional director for the American Joint Distribution Committee. He was president of the New York Board of Rabbis (1916–1917), the Synagogue Council of America (1938–1940), and the American Jewish Historical Society (1955–1956). Pool was a prolific author, especially on the subject of American Jewish history. His works include Portraits Etched in Stone: Early Jewish Settlers, 1682–1831 (New York, 1952) and An Old Faith in the New World: Portrait of Shearith Israel, 1654–1954 (with Tamar de Sola Pool, New York, 1955).

POOR. See POVERTY.

PORGING. See NIQQUR.

POSEQIM (פוסקים; deciders), scholars who rule on questions of Jewish law, in particular when there is no explicit answer in the sources and the scholar is forced to arrive at the law through his own reasoning. Implicit in the term is that these scholars are recognized as authorities by communities or groups of Jews. An individual rabbi who publishes a book on Jewish law, without such acknowledgment, is not regarded as a poseq. Although many poseqim have written works on Jewish law, this is not essential to the role. Indeed, every Jewish town in premodern times had a poseq, usually the town rabbi. He was required to issue rulings on a wide range of questions of Jewish law, in particular concerning the slaughter of meat and fowl. Many generations have a poseq who stands above all others, and the most difficult questions are submitted to him.

In order to function as a poseq, one must be trained in the classic works of Jewish law, of which Yosef Karo's Shulhan 'Arukh* is the most important. Although all acknowledge the need for a poseq, some capable scholars throughout history refused to assume this role. This was either because they did not want to shoulder the great responsibility or because they frowned upon practical halakhic decision making as the central focus of study, preferring instead the theoretical elements of Talmudic learning.

POST-MORTEM. See AUTOPSIES.

POVERTY. Biblical and rabbinic writers generally regarded poverty as an unmitigated misfortune. God's blessing upon his people is meant to include material prosperity along with the other felicities of life, but because the Bible recognizes that "the poor shall not cease out of the land," it commands those more fortunate to "open your hand wide unto your brother, to the poor, and to the needy in your land" (Dt. 15.11). The prophets repeatedly stress the obligation to succor the poor; failure to do so brings collective punishment. Care and consideration for the poor were not only moral virtues but legal requirements. Although poverty was considered one of the worst afflictions, too much wealth was also regarded as a danger and temptation (cf. Dt. 8.11–18, 32.15), and it was thought most desirable to achieve a mean between poverty and wealth. Nevertheless, other views of poverty are in evidence, too; occasionally the rabbis even praise poverty as a positive virtue. On the verse "I test you in the furnace of affliction" (Is. 48.10), the Talmud comments, "This teaches that the Holy One, blessed be he, went through all the virtues in order to bestow them upon Israel and found none more becoming than poverty" (Hag. 9b). This view of poverty as a positive religious value was expressed by ascetic moralists (e.g., Bahya ben Yosef ibn Paquda*) and mystics (cf. the Sefer Hasidim and the Zohar) but never became dominant. Throughout Jewish history both the community and the individual have been obligated to help the poor. See also CHARITY; WEALTH.

PRAYER. The Bible contains many individual prayers (e.g., of Moses, Nm. 12.13; Hannah, 1 Sm. 2.1–10; Solomon, 1 Kgs. 8.15–23; Hezekiah, 2 Kgs. 19.15–19); in addition, many biblical psalms (see PSALMS, BOOK OF) are, in fact, prayers. The institution of three daily prayer services was legendarily ascribed by the sages to the three patriarchs*, and they attributed the introduction of set formulas for prayer to the Men of the Keneset ha-Gedolah*, although modern scholars question this attribution. Though the Bible makes no statements about the actual nature of prayer, the rabbis found its theological essence expressed in the biblical phrase "serving God with the heart." Whereas avodah* (divine service) had originally signified sacrificial worship in the Temple, corporate prayer as the principal form of worship developed in the Second Temple period when the synagogue* emerged. After the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans in 70 CE, the synagogue—whose functions were often merged with that of the house of study (beit midrash*)—became the center of communal and religious life.

Although occasionally referred to as merely a substitute for the sacrifices of the Temple, prayer has always been considered an essential and major expression of religion. Traditionally prayer has consisted of two essential elements: supplication and petition on the one hand, and praise and thanksgiving on the other. In due course, a fixed pattern emerged, particularly for the pre-eminent prayer, the Amidah*. The full prayer service included opening benedictions*, the recitation of the Shema* with its benedictions, the Amidah*, and the reading of the Torah. (See also FESTIVAL PRAYERS; MA'ARIV; MINḤAH; MUSAF; NE'ILAH; SABBATH PRAYERS; SHAḤARIT). Prayers of various kinds (see PIYYUT; QINAH; SELIḤOT) continued to be composed throughout the ages and were added to the prayer book (siddur). Prayers were regarded as a genuine outpouring of the heart, and even after the introduction of fixed prayers, the rabbis emphasized the need to retain an element of spontaneity. One should pray only in a devout and reverential frame of mind (Ber. 5.1), and "he who makes his prayer a fixed, routine exercise, does not make his prayer a supplication" (Ber. 4.4). The early pietists spent an hour of devotion in preparation for prayer (Ber. 5.1). The Mishnah condemns prayer undertaken as a burden to be discharged or prayer that contains no original thought (Ber. 29b). Prayers should be recited "not in a spirit of sorrow, or of idleness, or of laughter or chatter or frivolity or idle talk, but with the joyousness of the performance of a religious act" (Ber. 31a). The manner of prayer is equally important: "He who raises his voice in prayer is of little faith" (Ber. 24a); rather, one should form the words of the prayer with the lips (Ber. 31a). At the same time, however, prayer obligations can be discharged by listening with devotion to the person conducting the prayer service and answering amen* to his blessings (cf. Ber. 52b. and Shev. 29a). Although, as a general rule, the person who leads the congregation in prayer (sheliḥ tsibbur*) should be of irreproachable moral character and the prayer of the righteous son of a righteous father is more acceptable than that of the righteous son of a sinner (Yev. 64a), the rabbis loved to expiate on incidents illustrating that the prayer of a reprobate who has a single redeeming feature can be more efficacious than that of the most blameless person (cf. Y., Ta'an. 1.64). God is said to "listen to prayer," and the rabbis had no doubts as to its efficacy. Rabbi *Ḥanina' ben Dosa', after praying for the sick, could tell whether or not his prayer would be answered (Ber. 5.5). Prayer has the effect of averting the evil fate decreed for an individual in the new year (R. ha-Sh. 18a), but prayers about past events are considered vain and useless (Ber. 9.3).

The rabbis never systematically discussed the theological and philosophical problems inherent in prayer, and in petitionary prayer in particular (e.g., will an all-knowing and all-good God change his designs—which are, by definition, for the good of his creatures—because the persons praying express their own desires? Should prayer consist only of praise and expressions of thanksgiving to the divine will?). For the medieval mystics prayer was an occasion for specific devotions (kavanot); for others it was a spiritual exercise to increase communion with God. In rabbinic tradition, prayer was primarily the fulfillment of a commandment, that is, part of the wider discipline of serving God: God wants the person praying to bring personal fears and wishes to him, as a child would to his or her father. In this view the philosophical objections are not so much answered as irrelevant. In Hasidism, all of life is to be centered around the daily hours of prayer. The Ḥasid strives to "become nothing" in the act of prayer, to empty his mind of all content so that he may be an empty vessel to be filled by the divine presence. This sort of contemplative passivity was taught by R. *Dov Ber of Mezhirech and remained, with some further development, a key part of *Ḥabad experience. Particular forms of prayer, beyond the universally prescribed liturgy, also exist within Hasidism. These include the abstract hitbonenut (meditation) of Ḥabad worship, the daily hitbodedut (spontaneous verbal outcry) of the Bratslav Ḥasidim, and various original prayer compositions, often in Yiddish, attributed to Hasidic figures ranging from R. *Levi Yitshaq of Berdichev to the twentieth-century R. Arele Roth.

Prayer can be private or corporate, statutory or non-statutory. The most common of the nonstatutory prayers are those for rain in time of drought. Many of the prayers included in the *liturgy for public and statutory worship were originally composed as private prayers. The statutory liturgy should be recited in community (see MINYAN); in private, certain prayers are omitted. When praying, and especially when reciting the 'Amidah, one turns in the direction of Jerusalem and the Temple mount.

PRAYER BOOK (Heb. siddur [order (of prayer)]). The Hebrew prayer book contains the statutory synagogue and home liturgy, along with optional devotional material like zemirot, and even study material such as Pirquei 'Avot. Some contain detailed rules (the halakhot) of prayer and historical or homiletical commentary for edification. Nowadays, a separate prayer book, normally called a maḥazor* (Heb. cycle), exists for each festival.

The first known comprehensive prayer book, a combination siddur and maḥazor, is Seder Rav Amram, by Amram Ga'on of Babylonia (c.860). Its appearance reflects the trend toward centralization typical of the surrounding Islamic caliphate. Directed largely against Palestinian liturgical alternatives, it successfully championed Babylonian custom, which was subsequently adopted worldwide as normative Jewish practice. A second siddur, by Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on (c.920), exercised secondary influence in certain regions. At first, only the prayer leader used a prayer book, but the invention of printing made prayer books widespread, and altered the very nature of worship by changing what had been an oral exercise into one that was dominated by dependence on a given text.

All prayer books contain the same basic liturgical material, but they differ somewhat according to the rite. After the geonic prototypes, the earliest complete texts (still combined as siddur and maḥazor) are Maḥazor Vitry (11th-cent. France), Seder Ḥibbur Berakhot (12th-cent. Italy), and Sefer Abudarham (14th-cent. Spain). Also preserved are fragments of the English order of service prior to the expulsion of 1290, as well as early partial prayer manuscripts from Erets Yisra'el and Egypt and vicinity, going back to geonic times. Kabbalistic tradition adopted its own rite, Minhag Ari, named for the ideological leader of the kabbalistic tradition in Erets Yisra'el, Yitshaq Luria, known also as the Ari. Individual Hasidic communities developed their own variants on that version.

An early attempt to standardize the prayer book emerged in seventeenth-century Poland but failed. To this day, there is no single standardized version that all Jews accept. Instead, movements develop their own books, which reflect ideological and geographical idiosyncrasies and which member congregations may be asked (with greater or lesser success) to use. Privately published versions abound as well, and congregations are free to adopt whatever book they want. The movement approach is rooted in nineteenth-century European and American thought. In Europe, liturgical reform from 1816 onward led to over a hundred fifty new books being published in as many years, each book by a given rabbi who tried to wed tradition and modernity. The earliest and most influential such volume is the 1819 Hamburg Prayer Book, which occasioned charges and countercharges, dividing central European Jewry between reformers and traditionalists. Only in 1929 was an attempt made to unify at least the liberal congregations by means of an Einheitsgebetbuch, but with limited success.

German immigrants to North America soon demanded new books expressive of their new American identity. By the 1860s, Isaac Mayer Wise and David Einhorn, rival liberal rabbis in Cincinnati and Baltimore, respectively, published especially influential volumes. By 1895 the Reform movement had settled on a Union Prayer Book, hoping to differentiate its modern style of worship from that of the eastern European immigrants who were importing customs of which the Germans disapproved. These eastern customs were codified as American Conservative Judaism, which adopted its own official prayer book in 1946. American Orthodox congregations have tended to use privately published volumes, especially one by Philip Birnbaum, which appeared only in 1949.

Similar developments occurred in other countries as part of the modernistic trend toward movement identities. England, for instance, produced the Singer Prayer Book, an authorized siddur for Orthodox Jews, in 1890, while Britain's Reform movement had already adopted the West London Synagogue's Forms of Prayer in 1841. Between 1902 and 1912, an alternative Liberal movement emerged with its own set of worship volumes. As Israeli Jewry has developed alternative movements in the 1960s and beyond, it too has begun to experiment with new prayer books.

Western religion has undergone a virtual liturgical renewal since the 1960s, beginning, perhaps, with Vatican II in 1962. Protestants, Catholics, and Jews have revised their liturgies repeatedly since then, with a resulting plethora of new prayer books. An outstanding example is the Artscroll series, an Orthodox set of volumes that has largely replaced the Birnbaum prayer book and may supersede the venerable Singer Prayer Book in Great Britain. It combines theological ultraconservatism with traditional scholarship, and even restores old liturgical lines once removed by Jewish printers who had either frowned upon certain statements of Jewish faith or feared hostile gentile reaction to them.

Progressive congregations worldwide are in the midst of their own prayer-book revolution, influenced most by the three North American liberal movements, whose recent prayer books feature modern English translations or altogether new creations alongside Hebrew originals; the recapturing of poetry from the gamut of Jewish tradition, especially by Hebrew poets who exemplify a new Jewish cultural consciousness occasioned by Israel's rebirth; creative ritual for the new Jewish holy days of Yom ha-Sho'ah (Holocaust Day) and Yom ha-'Atsma'ut (Israel Independence Day); and an affirmation of gender egalitarianism through gender-inclusive language.

Prayer books have always functioned to express the identity of the worshippers who use them, but their appearance has been dependent on available technology. The original Babylonian book was possible, in part, because of the availability of the codex, rather than scrolls. The printing press served to make volumes available to a mass audience. Inexpensive printing has increasingly multiplied volumes over the last two centuries. The latest development is desk-top publishing, which permits individual congregations to tailor-make a prayer book to their own needs, and then to alter it inexpensively if need be. If the most significant development of the last two hundred years has been movement prayer books, the next development may be their demise, in favor of local and individualized books, reflective of local Jewish identity and custom, a situation perhaps reminiscent of what existed before printing began the long process of standardization.

PRAYER OF MANASSEH, a short, poetic work in Greek, purporting to be the confession of sin and prayer of repentance uttered by Manasseh, king of Judah, during his captivity in Babylon (cf. 2 Chr. 33.12). Though the composition is undoubtedly of Jewish origin, it has been preserved only in Christian sources. The date of its authorship is uncertain, as is its original language (Hebrew, Aramaic, Syriac, or Greek).

PREDESTINATION, the doctrine that one's life, and its ultimate destiny (salvation or damnation) in particular, are determined solely by the inscrutable will of God and not by anything that the individual can do. The doctrine is well known from Islam and Christianity (in the latter religion it is associated more particularly with Paul, Augustine, and Calvin) but has generally been held to be alien to the Jewish tradition. The *Dead Sea Scrolls have shown, however, that predestinarian views were held by Jewish sectarians, and it might be from them that Paul inherited his doctrine. See also ASTROLOGY; DETERMINISM; FREE WILL.

PREEXISTENCE, the presence in time of something before the creation of this universe. The notion of preexistence presupposes belief in a higher, spiritual, and possibly, though not necessarily, eternal sphere in which things can preexist. Thus, according to Platonic and Neoplatonic doctrine, individual souls are not created together with the physical body but are preexistent and merely enter the physical body destined for them. This belief was adopted by the ancient rabbis and underlies the doctrine of *transmigration of souls (gilgul) adopted later by the kabbalists. According to one rabbinic statement (Pes. 54a), seven things were created before the creation of the world: the Torah, repentance, the garden of Eden, Geihinnom, the throne of God's glory, the heavenly temple (of which the Temple in Jerusalem was regarded as an earthly reproduction), and the names of the Messiah. Preexistence does not imply eternity, but that certain things had been created by God before the creation of the world. The most important doctrine, theologically, of preexistence is that of the Torah, which, according to the rabbis, was created by God and then served as a model for creation. This idea was possibly influenced by Platonic notions of the demiurges (creators) using, like an architect, a ground plan. But rabbinic thought (unlike Islamic theology, which holds the Qur'an to be eternal) always considered the Torah, though preexistent, as created.

PREGNANCY. The Bible refers to the pain of pregnancy as the punishment meted out to Eve for eating of the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil in the garden of Eden (Gn. 3.16). The Talmud notes, however, that the process of becoming pregnant is not an unpleasant one and that righteous women are spared Eve's punishment (Sot. 12a). The duration of pregnancy according to the Talmud is 271 to 273 days from conception (Nid. 38a–b), although the possibility of a twelve-month pregnancy is recognized in the context of the laws of adultery (Yev. 80b). A pregnant woman is not a menstruant for the purpose of the laws of niddah (Nid. 9a), and, according to the Midrash, her menstrual blood is the source of the milk in her breasts (Lv. Rab. 14.3). A pregnant woman who is overcome with a desire to break her fast on Yom Kippur may eat, although, initially, she is fed only a small amount. In the final analysis, she is allowed to eat the amount required to restore her health, since a pregnant woman is always considered to be in a dangerous physical state (Yoma' 82a). There is no ban on sexual intercourse during pregnancy (Nid. 31a). A man may not marry a woman who is carrying another man's child (Yev. 36b).

PRIESTHOOD, a hereditary class of Jews to whom specific sacred functions are assigned. The essential role of the priest (kohen) in Israel was to officiate in Temple rituals, where he served as the "palace servant" in the earthly abode of the divine King. Spoken of in frankly anthropomorphic terms, the basic role of the priest was to approach the Lord's table to serve him his food (Lv. 21.6, 17; Ez. 44.15–16; see SACRIFICES; TABERNACLE; TEMPLE). Outside of cultic centers, Israelites in ancient times certainly sacrificed without benefit of priest; with the establishment of cultic centers a priesthood became crucial.

According to tradition, priests are only one family of the Levitical tribe (see LEVITES). According to the Torah, they are the descendants of Aaron; in Ezekiel they are called the sons of Zadok. As related in Exodus 29 and Leviticus 8–9, the priesthood was established when the Tabernacle was built. It consisted of Aaron and his four sons (and later, his grandsons). These original priests were consecrated by means of a seven-day ceremony of investiture: the *priestly vestments were placed upon them, they remained in the Tabernacle, and Moses performed sacrifices from which they received their first priestly dues (see PRIESTLY PRIVILEGES). Immediately thereafter, their ranks were severely diminished, when two of Aaron's sons, Nadab and Abihu were put to death for their sin (Lv. 10).

Ritual acts of the highest sanctity could be performed only by the *high priest; lesser priests would officiate at less sacred offerings performed at the outer altar located in the Temple court. Slaughter of sacrificial animals was not considered a sacred act and could be performed by anyone; still, the priest's expertise probably best qualified him for slaughtering even private sacrifices on behalf of the worshiper. The priest's sacred duty commenced after the slaughter: receiving the blood; placing the prescribed amount on the altar and draining the remainder; placing upon the altar those parts which were to be offered up to God; and correctly disposing of those that became the possession of the priests, those that were eaten by the worshiper, and those that had to be discarded.

The priests were charged with guard duty at the entrance to the Tabernacle, to prevent encroachment by unauthorized persons (Nm. 3.38, 18.1–7), and they took care of the most sacred objects on the journey through the wilderness (Nm. 4.5–16). Of course, with the establishment of the permanent Temple, these tasks were no longer necessary.

Unlike other cultures, the priesthood in Israel was exclusively male (though women married to priests and the daughters of priests benefited from priestly privileges). In order to serve, priests needed to be without physical blemish (Lv. 21.16–24). They were also to avoid all forms of physical impurity and were strictly cautioned against coming into contact with the dead (except for their closest relatives; the high priest was forbidden to come into contact with the corpses even of these; Lv. 21.1–5). They were also limited in their choice of wives; a priest could not marry a divorcee, a harlot (broadly defined by the rabbis to include the convert), or a halallah (interpreted by some to mean a woman who had been raped; traditionally taken to mean a woman born of an illicit priestly marriage; Lv. 21.7). Celibacy was never a feature of Israelite priesthood.

In addition to their primary, sacrificial role, the priests were expected to pronounce God's blessing upon the people (Nm. 6.22–27) and to sound the trumpets on certain occasions (Nm. 10.1–10). They were also to instruct the Israelites on all matters of law and ritual, rendering legal decisions and distinguishing between pure and impure objects and conditions, permissible and forbidden foods, and sacred and profane places, times, and objects (Lv. 9.10; Dt. 17.8–11, 17.18, 19.17, 21.5, 24.8). This role is expressed by the word torah in one of its original meanings (ritual instruction). In particular the priest was required to pronounce as clean or unclean persons or houses afflicted with skin disease (see LEPROSY) and to preside over the *ordeal of jealousy. The priests could also give oracular teaching by means of the Urim and Thummim (Ex. 28.30; Nm. 27.21; Ezr. 2.63; see ORACLES). Although the prophets stressed the educational role of the priests (Jer. 18.18; Ez. 44.23–24; Mal. 2.7) study of the priestly literature in the Bible makes it clear that even in ancient times an elaborate system of legal, historical, and theological doctrine developed in priestly circles.

Though a number of priestly families and villages existed, in time the Israelite priesthood was confined to the Zadokites. By Second Temple times, the priesthood had become more institutionalized and was organized into a strict hierarchy divided into twenty-four divisions that served in rotation in the Temple.

With the destruction of the Temple, the priesthood could have become virtually meaningless, had not certain rights and duties been perpetuated. The rabbis held that the obligation to treat the priests as holy is permanent, and priestly families have steadfastly maintained their identity (often detectable in such surnames as Cohen, Katz, and Azulai). In traditional practice today, priests are called first to lead the *Birkat ha-Mazon and to the reading of the Torah in the synagogue; they continue to pronounce the *Birkat ha-Kohanim as part of the prayer service; they receive the monetary redemption of the *firstborn; the marital restrictions imposed on them are considered to be in effect; and they must refrain from contact with the dead, avoiding cemeteries and closed funeral halls. The festival *Musaf prayer beseeches God to restore the priests to their sacrificial tasks. See also PRIESTLY PRIVILEGES.

PRIESTLY PRIVILEGES (Heb. mattenot kehunnah), the livelihood provided for the priests by the Israelites, on whose behalf they performed their sacred duties. The priests of ancient times (see LEVITES; PRIESTHOOD) were given no land of their own; their sole task was to serve in the Temple and perform its rituals. In all their material needs, the priests were thus dependent on those portions of Israel's sacrifices that they received. These were not gifts or a form of charity. Rather, they were the priests' due, in return for their labors (Nm. 18.31), and they were precisely assigned to them by law. The Torah stresses that God, not the people, provides the priests' portions: the people offer the sacrifices—both public and private offerings—to God; it is he who then presents the priests with a portion thereof (e.g., Lv. 6.10–11, 7.34–35). There are two types of portions: most holy (Heb. qadshei qadashim), which may be consumed only by male priests within the holy precincts, and holy portions (qadashim qallim), which may be consumed anywhere, by all members of priests' families, including household servants, so long as they are ritually pure. In the former category are the priests' share of the *purification offering, the *reparation offering, and the *meal offering. All other priestly emoluments fall into the latter category. These include the priest's share of the *peace offering in all its variations; the two lambs presented on Shavu'ot; firstlings of pure animals; first fruits, oil, and wine; first shorn wool of the flock; the redemption price of firstborn sons and of asses; and the first of the dough (see HALLAH). In addition, a tenth of the tithes of crops given to the Levites was forwarded to the priests. The rabbis set the precise number of priestly privileges at twenty-four; the precise Talmudic enumeration is found in Bava' Qamma 110b and Hullin 133b, and, in the Talmud Yerushalmi, in Hallah 60b.

PRIESTLY VESTMENTS, articles of clothing or ceremonial items worn by the priests when performing their ritual functions in the Temple in ancient times. Ordinary priests wore four white linen garments when performing their ritual tasks: the first three, a fringed tunic, a headdress, and an embroidered sash, were explicitly for "majesty and adornment" (Ex. 28.39–41); the fourth, a set of breeches worn under the tunic, was required for modesty (in order that the priest's genitals not be visible, presumably to the deity, even from below). In addition to these, the high priest was required to don four symbolic items as components of the daily tamid ritual (Ex. 28.6–38). The first two items were the ephod*, a sort of apron worn over the priest's robe, with two lapis lazuli stones on the epaulets upon which the names of the tribes of Israel were engraved; and a square hoshen (breastplate of decision) into which twelve stones were mounted in four rows of three each, one for each of the tribes, engraved with seals bearing their names. These two had basically the same purpose: to serve as a "reminder," that is, a representation, of the Israelite people "before the Lord" (Ex. 28.12, 29); by wearing them when he entered the divine abode, the high priest embodied the entire community on whose behalf he came and called God's attention to their needs. The breastplate contained the oracular Urim and Thummim (Ex. 28.30; see ORACLES). The other two articles were a pure blue robe, the lower hem of which was encircled with tinkling bells so that the high priest could be heard by the deity when he approached the shrine (Ex. 28.35), and a golden diadem set into the high priest's headdress, upon which the words qodesh le-YHVH (holy to YHVH) were inscribed. The diadem was said to secure the divine acceptance of Israel's worship and remove their impurities. The priests were consecrated for service by having the vestments placed upon them (Lv. 8), and their transfer from Aaron to Eleazar signaled the transfer of high priesthood from father to son. The finest wools, linens, gold, and stones, and the most intricate embroidery work, characterized the high priest's vestments, as they belonged, like the high priest himself, to the innermost sphere of the sacred.

PROCREATION. The mitsvah of procreation is the first commandment in the Bible (Gen. 1.28), and its non-fulfillment is tantamount to the diminution of the divine image in the world (Yev. 63b). The minimum requirement for the fulfillment of this mitsvah is begetting a boy and a girl, who are themselves capable of procreation (Yev. 61b), but there is a rabbinic obligation "not to cease being fruitful and multiplying as long as one has the power to do so, because whosoever adds one soul to Israel is considered as if they had built a whole world" (Maimonides, Hilkhot Ishut 15.16). Although Talmudic law restricts the mitsvah to the male sex (Yev. 65b), females receive a share in it by virtue of their vital role in bringing children into the world. The obligation to procreate devolves upon a male in his eighteenth year, and in principle, although not necessarily in practice, he may divorce his wife if she is not capable of conceiving a child and a period of ten years has elapsed since the marriage (Yev. 64a). If a woman in such circumstances refuses to accept a get, then her husband may be granted permission to take a second wife (Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 1.10). Marriage for the purpose of procreation may be financed by selling a Sefer Torah, but marital relations are suspended during a famine or any other public calamity (Ta'an. 11a). The question of the fulfillment of the mitsvah of procreation by means of artificial reproduction techniques is still an open one in Jewish law.

PROFANATION (Heb. hillul), transference from the realm of the sacred to that of the profane or common. The Temple, as the abode of the divine presence, is sacred, as are all its appurtenances: its furnishings, the sacred oil and incense, the priestly garments, animals donated or used for sacrifices and the flesh of such animals, and all monetary and other gifts made to the Temple. Unauthorized profanation is a serious sin. It occurs when something sacred comes into contact with the impure; for instance, when a ministering high priest leaves the Temple precincts or a nonpriest enters them, when a lay person consumes sacred flesh (Lv. 22.15), when a sacrifice is consumed after its designated time (Lv. 19.8), or when the anointing oil is used for everyday purposes (Ex. 30.31–33). Priests are specifically commanded to guard against desecration of sacred offerings, such as by eating them while impure (Lv. 22). Deliberate profanation may subject a person to death or a divine penalty; accidental profanation maybe expiated in some cases by repaying the value of the object plus one-fifth. Legitimate profanation is prescribed when it is necessary to remove an object that has become holy from this state. A sacrificial animal found to have a blemish could be "desanctified" (Lv. 27), as could other consecrated property, persons, or animals. Sacred persons include: the priests, who are declared to have profaned their seed if they fail to observe the priestly marital restrictions (Lv. 21.15) or whose daughters profane them if they engage in prostitution (Lv. 21.9); and the *Nazirite, who returns to his previous, profane state by means of the sacrifices he offers at the end of his term (Nm. 6.14). The Sabbath and festivals are sacred, performing everyday activities on them profanes them (Ex. 31.14; see HILLUL SHABBAT). The name of God (YHVH) is also sacred; misusing it in false oath (Lv. 19.12) or worshiping *Molech (Lv. 18.21) is called "profanation of the name of God" (see HILLUL HA-SHEM). Illegitimate profanation is virtually synonymous with the concept of me'ilah (see SACRILEGE).

PROMISCUITY. Illicit sexual activity is strongly condemned in the Bible and is deemed the major cause of "the defilement of the land" and "the vomiting out of its inhabitants" (Lv. 18.25, 28). Prostitution is banned on the basis of a biblical verse requiring that "there be no harlot of the daughters of Israel" (Dt. 23.18; San. 82a). *Adultery is a capital offense, which is mentioned in the Ten Commandments, and constitutes one of the three cardinal offenses, along with homicide and idolatry, which may not be committed, even at the cost of a person's life (San. 74a). Although adultery in this context is that involving a married woman, sexual relations between a married man and a single woman are forbidden, and in the late Middle Ages it was accepted that they would constitute grounds for *divorce. Maimonides states that sexual relations between single individuals are forbidden on the grounds of the prohibition on harlotry (Laws of Marriage 1.4). Physical contact between the sexes in situations in which forbidden sexual relations may occur is outlawed by the rabbis, as is being alone (yihud*) with such individuals (Maimonides, Laws of Forbidden Intercourse 21–22; Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 22). Yihud with a single woman was specifically outlawed by virtue of a rabbinic decree ('A. Z. 36b). The rabbis formulated a large number of rules and regulations aimed at the prevention of lewd thoughts and immodest conduct, even between spouses (Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 21–25). Indeed, even in the context of marriage itself, the laws of niddah* ensure that spouses exercise self-control and abstain from sexual relations for a significant period during every menstrual cycle (see MENSTRUATION). Maimonides remarks that "for most people there is nothing harder in the entire Torah than to abstain from sex and forbidden sexual relations" (Laws of Forbidden Intercourse 22.18). Jewish tradition does not regard the sex drive as an inherently negative phenomenon but, rather, as a healthy force that must be properly controlled and diverted. Marriage is deemed the correct framework for sexual relations and within that institution, asceticism is discouraged. The Talmud provides that "a man may do with his wife as he pleases" (Ned. 20b), provided that she is a willing partner (Ra'avad, Ba'alei ha-Nefesh; Sha'ar ha-Qedushah), and the refusal of a spouse to remove clothing during intercourse, "in the manner of the Persians," is grounds for divorce in Jewish law (Ket. 48a).

PROPERTY. Jewish law distinguishes between two kinds of property: personal, movable property (mittal-telim), which may be disposed of at will; and fixed property (real estate [qarqa'ot]), which, while it may also be disposed of at will, can never be absolutely alienated in Erets Yisra'el (Lv. 25.23). Beside an individual's right to dispose of property, the courts had full power to divest an individual of property (Git. 36b). The act of possession, without which no commercial transaction is ultimately binding, is called qinyan (see ACQUISITION). Movable property is exchanged by means of the following qinyanim: actual grasping of the object (hagbahah or meshikhah); exchange (sudar or halifin; see BARTER) or the symbolic transfer of the actual goods (cf. Ru. 4.7); the bringing of an object into the territory of the person who has acquired it (hatser [court]); and the transfer of movable goods together with the *real estate upon which they are situated (agav). The laws of transference of property take into account local custom and business practices; handshakes, the handing over of keys, and various other customs are all legally recognized means of acquisition. The forms of qinyan prescribed for the transfer of real estate are payment of the purchase price (or part thereof if the seller is agreeable); composing a document containing the words "my field is sold to you"; and seizure (hazaqah*), that is, performance of an action regarded as a declaration of ownership, or unchallenged occupation of a piece of real estate for a specific period of time (usually three years). Verbal promises regarding gifts of property to the Temple or to charitable institutions required no formal qinyan but were legally binding.

PROPHECY. The Greek word prophētēs means "one who speaks on behalf of [a god]"; this appears to be the meaning of the Hebrew nabi, which is derived from the Akkadian verb nabir (to proclaim; hence, the proclaimer). *Moses is told that he will be "a god" to Pharaoh, and *Aaron will be his nabi (prophet); figuratively speaking, this means that Aaron is Moses' spokesman (Ex. 7.1–2). Thus a nabi is a spokesman for God: "I will raise up a nabi . . . I will put My words in his mouth" (Dt. 18.18). The words of the prophets (apart from Moses, who came to be regarded as the greatest of prophets) are preserved in the historical books of the *Bible and in the books of the *prophets.

The essence of biblical prophecy is not the accurate prediction of future events. Israelite prophets readily admitted that God's threats and promises might or might not materialize, depending on human behavior. Rather, prophecy in the Bible is the communication of the divine word to human beings, by means of chosen messengers, in order to influence their thoughts and actions; the form and content of the actual message vary with circumstances.

Ancient Israel admitted that God communicates with humans in various ways: in dreams, by means of the Urim and Thummim (see ORACLES), and through prophets. Prophets are said to have received their messages in dreams, visionary experiences, ecstatic states, and, in the case of Moses, by direct verbal dialogue with the deity. Other words for prophet in the Bible are ro'eh (seer; which eventually ceased to be used [1 Sm. 9.9]), hozeh (seer; 2 Sm. 24.1; Am. 7.12–13), and ish ha-'Elohim (man of God; 1 Sm. 9.6; 2 Kgs. 4.9). These terms express the prophet's clairvoyance and intimate knowledge of information inaccessible to ordinary humans. Still, it is maintained that the prophet has no natural gifts; God alone is the source of his powers and knowledge. Other means of acquiring knowledge of the occult—omens, sorcery, spells—are prohibited and condemned as strictly pagan practices (Dt. 18.9–22).

Though Abraham is the first to be called a prophet (Gn. 20.7) because of his ability to pray to God on behalf of Abimelech, it is with the career of Moses that prophecy becomes a permanent institution in biblical tradition. Moses is thus referred to in Judaism as the "father of the prophets." His prophecy is said to have been unique in form—only he spoke to God "face to face, as a man speaks to his fellow" (Ex. 33.11), not in riddles and dreams (Nm. 12.6–8)—and in content—his prophetic message was composed almost entirely of commands, laws, and statutes binding for all time. The Torah account takes for granted that God must have open channels of communication with Israel; thus, when Israel is terrified by the prospect of having God speak to them directly, God agrees to their request to use prophetic mediation (Ex. 20.15–18; Dt. 5.19–28, 18.15–17).

Delivering the word of God takes place in two stages: the message is delivered by God to the prophet and then by the prophet to the individual or the people. Since the first stage is always private, the question of the prophet's credibility necessarily arises: why should a person who declares "thus said the Lord" be believed? The Torah asserts that this problem was resolved once and for all at Sinai. God revealed himself in order that the people of Israel might overhear him speaking to Moses, as a result of which they would believe in Moses and his prophetic successors forever after (Ex. 19.9). The problem of false prophecy never ceased to trouble, however (see PROPHETS, FALSE).

The death of Joshua, Moses' successor, marks the beginning of a long break in prophecy in the biblical view.

Though *Deborah is called a prophetess (Jgs. 4.4), in general the lawlessness of the period of the judges is seen as a result of this having been a time when God refrained from communicating with man (1 Sm. 3.1). This divine silence ends with *Samuel, who inaugurates the age of popular prophecy. Samuel's prophetic career, as well as those of *Gad and *Nathan, is associated with the establishment of the monarchy, just as Moses' is associated with the establishment of the sacrificial cult. Kings of the northern kingdom of Israel were anointed and appointed by prophets. The prophetic role is thus held to be superior to that of priest and king, both of the latter positions having been instituted, at God's behest, by prophets.

This period in Israelite prophecy is characterized primarily by popular, mantic, wonderworking prophets. As intimates of God, they were consulted by ordinary Israelites, by kings, and by the community as a whole, for guidance, military oracles, miraculous healing, and even for help in locating lost property. Notable among these are figures such as Samuel, Nathan, Gad, *Elijah, and *Elisha, who are called by God to transcend their popular roles. They are sent on errands of national importance, to condemn severely moral and religious offenses. Occasionally, the Bible speaks of companies or bands of prophets, characterized by ecstatic behavior accompanied by musical performance; they were thought to be possessed of an unusual dose of the "spirit of God." Saul's election to kingship was marked by his being caught in the ecstasy of such a band. Most of the biblical prophets, however, are individuals who have no previous training and are unable to induce trances or ecstatic states on their own. Rather, they are driven by an irresistible compulsion to deliver the divine word, which burns as a fire within them until it is spoken.

The golden age of Israelite prophecy was the period of the classical or literary prophets, beginning with *Hosea and *Amos in the eighth century BCE and ending with the prophets of the return to Zion in the fifth century. The extent of the social and religious critique they delivered, and the highly developed, elaborate literary and rhetorical form of their messages are unique. The literary prophets dwelled on several recurring themes, none entirely new but each one elevated to a level of importance previously unknown. They regularly condemned the lack of social justice—in particular, the plight of the poor, the weak, the widow and orphan, and the corruption of the wealthy, landowning classes; the pervasive contamination of the cult and worship of YHWH, and the repeated backsliding into idolatry; the mistaken idea that God could be satisfied in the cultic sphere alone (see SACRIFICES), while his people continued to oppress the weak and ignore their suffering; haughty, false reliance on human might and political alliances; and the arrogant notion that, despite Israel's wrongdoing, God would never forsake or destroy his people. Classical prophecy's teaching was thus cataclysmic: it maintained that God would not tolerate Israel's sinfulness and that he would put an end to his covenantal relationship with them. The historical background for this development was the rise of the Assyrian and Babylonian empires, which rendered insignificant the tiny Israelite kingdoms and threatened their continued existence.

The threat of national destruction was usually accompanied by the assurance, implicit or direct, that it could be avoided if Israel would realize the error of its ways and return to God. Thus the prophetic message includes the call to repentance and the promise that repentance will avert disaster. The forecast of impending doom was usually counterbalanced by the promise of a glorious future, if only Israel would walk in the paths of righteousness. This was not always the case, however; occasionally the decree of doom is quite irrevocable, the prophet aims not at preventing it but simply at announcing and justifying its inevitability.

From earliest times, even messages of inescapable doom were followed by the promise of subsequent reconciliation. As the destruction of the kingdom drew nearer, and after it came to pass, the prophets never relinquished their vision of the future. Prophetic words of consolation and oracles of national rehabilitation are particularly characteristic of the period of the return to Zion. Thus was born the idea that Israel would ultimately be reunited; its monarchy restored; peace, prosperity, and security established; the exiles of Israel returned; and the peoples of the world converted to the worship of the God of Israel. This complex of ideas gave birth to Jewish messianism.

The Talmudic rabbis perceptively realized that the prophetic oracles preserved in the Bible are but a fraction of the prophecies actually uttered and reasoned that those prophecies that had permanent relevance, that is, that could be recycled when situations arose similar to those in which they were originally uttered, were preserved for future generations. To this may be added the suggestion that prophets whose credentials were impeccable, who had been shown by experience to be true bearers of the divine word, were likely to have had their speeches written down and passed on, on the assumption that their relevance would eventually become apparent. Thus Judaism's sustained interest in the biblical prophecies required shifting the focus from their original intent to some as yet unknown one. The rabbis realized that prophecy belonged to the past. Though occasional reports of revelations and inspiration persisted well into medieval times, the dominant view is that the last of the biblical prophets, *Haggai, *Zechariah, and *Malachi, marked the final departure of the holy spirit from Israel. Thereafter the word of God was to be sought in the Torah and in the prophecies already delivered, which were to be scrutinized and expounded by the sages.

Medieval philosophers offered two different explanations of the nature of biblical prophecy. Rationalistic philosophers such as Maimonides held that the prophet was naturally endowed with perfect reason, imagination, and moral character, coupled with perfect wisdom and knowledge acquired from learning and from contemplation of a philosophical nature. These faculties are activated by God, causing prophetic illumination to occur. Prophecy is thus essentially a projection of the human intellect. Others, such as Yehudah ha-Levi, insisted that prophecy was entirely supernatural, a gift bestowed by God upon deserving mortals and originating entirely in the metaphysical realm.

PROPHETS, BOOKS OF THE (Heb. Nevi'im), the second section of the Bible, preceded by the Pentateuch (Torah) and followed by the Hagiographa (Ketuvim). In Jewish tradition there are eight prophetic books. The first four—Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings (customarily referred to as the Former Prophets)—are historiographical works, but Jewish tradition assigns them to the prophetic division in order to keep the Pentateuch in a class by itself, and because they provide the historical background for the lives and oracles of the literary prophets; they were believed to have been written by prophets (such as Samuel and Jeremiah), and they contain stories about prophets including Samuel, Nathan, Elijah, and Elisha. The other four prophetic books (called the Latter Prophets)—Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve (Minor Prophets)—are primarily literary collections of the speeches of the prophets whose names they bear. The division of Samuel and Kings into two books each is not mentioned in rabbinic sources; it derives from the Septuagint and entered Hebrew Bibles in late medieval times. The twelve minor prophetic collections (Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi) are traditionally considered to be one book. When all biblical books were written on scrolls, these twelve were written on a single scroll, their combined length comprising a text long enough to fill an average scroll. Prescribed selections from the prophetic books are read in the synagogue on Sabbaths, festivals, and fast days (see HAFTARAH).

PROPHETS, FALSE. In Israelite belief, the prophet was God's spokesperson. Prophetic speech and actions, however, could be imitated by anyone. It was therefore a problem to distinguish between the prophet whom God had actually sent and the pretender. The ability to work miracles was no proof; it was readily admitted that even a prophet advocating the worship of foreign gods might successfully produce signs and portents, God himself taking advantage of the opportunity to test Israel's loyalty to him (Dt. 13.2–6). According to Deuteronomy, a prophet whose words come true is God's faithful messenger; one whose predictions fail to materialize is not (Dt. 18.21–22). But even if Israelite prophecy merely had been about predicting the future, which it was not, this would have been insufficient. Questions were raised about how long it was reasonable to wait for the fulfillment of a prophecy and about what if God changed his plans, as he asserts he does constantly in response to human repentance or backsliding (Jer. 18.7–10). In Israel, moreover, prophecy was instruction. This turned the matter into a practical issue, since the words of the true prophet were to be heeded on pain of death, while the false prophet had to be shunned and put to death (Dt. 18.19–20). Following or rejecting the words of a prophet could also have immediate and far-reaching consequences on the individual and national level. Thus, the law in Deuteronomy is inadequate, as it covers only cases in which it is possible to wait and see. Jeremiah's confrontation with the false prophet Hananiah the son of Azzur led to a different formulation (Jer. 28.8–9). The prophet who prophesies doom (and, presumably, urges repentance) is to be given the benefit of the doubt, since only a true prophet would be likely to sacrifice his popularity by harshly scolding his listeners. Jeremiah proposes that the true prophet is the one who is willing to entreat God on his people's behalf (Jer. 27.18). The real prophet recognizes the impending doom and wishes to prevent it. Still, the problem was not solved, as is shown by Jeremiah's entire prophetic career (see Jer. 23). He himself was convicted of false prophecy when he warned that the Temple would be destroyed (Jer. 26.11); Lamentations blames the destruction and exile on the fact that false prophets misled the people (Lam. 2.14). The rabbinic criteria for distinguishing between true and false prophets were codified by Maimonides (Yesodei ha-Torah 8–10).

PROSELYTE (from the Septuagint translation [proselytos] of the Heb. ger [stranger]), person converted to Judaism. The Bible refers to proselytes in Exodus 12.48 and elsewhere (cf., Is. 56.3, 6) and to actual conversion in Ruth 2.12 and Esther 8.17. The rabbis distinguished between two types of proselytes. The half proselyte, called ger toshav (i.e., settler proselyte [Lev. 25.47]) or ger ha-sha'ar (the proselyte of the gate [cf., Ex. 20.10]), undertook in the presence of three haverim (scholars) to observe some of the basic principles (but not the ceremonies) of Judaism, such as the renunciation of idolatry and the keeping of the seven Noahic laws ('A. Z.* 64b); Maimonides calls these "the righteous gentiles." The full proselyte, called ger tsedek (righteous proselyte), converts out of love of Judaism and accepts all its laws and ceremonies. Especially blessed in the thirteenth benediction of the 'Amidah, the full proselyte is to be shown every consideration, and even the forebears of such a convert may not be disparaged. He or she is considered like "a new-born child," and all former family ties are regarded as terminated. He or she is now called "son/daughter of Abraham," who is seen as the father of converts, and takes a Hebrew name (Abraham and Ruth—herself seen as the paragon of conversion—are favored). Sincerity of motive is an indispensable prerequisite for conversion, although Maimonides (Issurei Bi'ah 13.14) accepts as Jews those who convert for personal reasons. To ensure sincerity, initial efforts are made to dissuade a would-be proselyte. Conversion (giyyur) of a full proselyte, but not of a half proselyte, entails a period of study, circumcision (for men), immersion in a ritual bath (for men and women), and (during the existence of the Temple) a sacrifice.

In the early period, active propaganda, though not by professional missionaries, was directed toward gaining proselytes, and according to R. El'azar ben Pedat, this was actually the divine purpose for the dispersion of the Jewish people (Pes. 87b). Thus the rabbis interpret "the souls that they had gotten in Haran" (Gen. 12.5) as referring to the proselytes made by Abraham (Sifrei on Dt. 6.5). Hillel's lenient attitude toward intending proselytes, in contrast to the somewhat sterner approach of Shamm'ai (Shab. 31a), most probably reflected the dominant view. Immediately before and after the destruction of the Second Temple, many converts were made both among the masses and the upper classes. Josephus states that there was no city anywhere into which Jewish observances had not penetrated (Against Apion 2.40), that almost all the women in Damascus were "addicted to the Jewish religion" (The Jewish War 2.20.2), and that Queen Helena and her son King Izates of Adiabene were converted to Judaism (Antiquities of the Jews 20.2.1–4). Rabbinic literature tells, for example, of many converts in Maḥoza in Babylonia (Qid. 73a), while among scholars of note, R. Me'ir, Shema'yah, Avtalyon, R. 'Aqiva, and Onkelos, the author of the Targum on the Pentateuch, were regarded as proselytes or descendants of proselytes. When, however, *Christianity began to gain successes among proselytes and half proselytes, the Jewish attitude to proselytism changed. Josephus (Against Apion 2.11) reported that of the many Greek proselytes only some had remained faithful, while others had forsaken Judaism. This may have prompted R. Eli'ezer ben Hurqanos to speak of the unreliability of proselytes (B. M. 59b). It was said that spies, under the guise of proselytes, were planted among the Jews by the Romans, which was doubtless a major reason that conversion was difficult "in these days" (Yev. 47a, probably referring to the period of the Hadrianic persecutions). Bitter historical experiences led to the statement of R. Ḥelbo (Qid. 70b) that proselytes are as grievous to Israel as a scab on the skin. To this inner resistance against proselytes were added the outer restrictions imposed by Christianity, which in the fourth and fifth centuries prohibited conversion to Judaism as a criminal offense, punishable at first by the confiscation of property and later by the death of the proselytizing Jew. During the following centuries, there were comparatively few proselytes, although Dhu Nuwas, the Jewish king of Yemen (6th cent.), and the Khazars in southern Russia (8th cent.) are important exceptions. In the Middle Ages occasional conversions to Judaism, even by clerics, occurred in Europe. Once formally converted (following a period of instruction in the teachings and practices of Judaism and approval by a beit din [religious court]), the proselyte ranks as a full member of the Jewish people; the only halakhic disability is the prohibition on a priest marrying a female proselyte. A proselyte is permitted to marry a mamzer*.

In modern times, the halakhic rules concerning conversion have been eased by Reform Judaism, which often does not require circumcision and ritual immersion but bases its conversion process on study and a ceremony. Reform actively encourages proselytization especially among non-Jewish partners in mixed marriages. The Orthodox do not recognize Reform conversions in view of its nonhalakhic aspects and also because of what they regard as the unsuitability of Reform rabbis to constitute a beit din, and this has been a major source of friction between the Orthodox and non-Orthodox (the Orthodox also reject Conservative conversion, although the Conservatives adhere to halakhic regulations). This has led to major confrontations over the eligibility of non-Orthodox converts to be covered by Israel's *Law of Return (see JEW, WHO IS A?, CONTROVERSY). The Orthodox rabbinate in many places has adopted a particularly stringent attitude and in some countries refuses to convert non-Jews to Judaism. Converts today often refer to themselves as "Jews by choice."

PROSTRATION, casting oneself flat on the ground. Like bowing and kneeling, prostration is a gesture of reverence to God and was practiced in the ancient Temple. Four forms of prayer are mentioned in the Talmud: berikhhah, bending the knee (Y., Ber. 1.8); qidah, bowing with one's face to the ground; keri'ah, kneeling; hishtahavvayah, prostration with outstretched hands and feet (Ber. 34b). Practiced also in biblical times, hishtahavvayah was performed by the priests and people in the Temple at thirteen different locations (corresponding to the thirteen Temple-court gates; Sheq. 6.3; Mid. 2.3) when the high priest pronounced the Tetragrammaton during the Yom Kippur service (Yoma 6.2). A form of prostration is still practiced in the Ashkenazi rite during the recital of the Yom Kippur Avodah* and during the Aleinu* prayer on Ro'sh ha-Shanah and Yom Kippur. A still more modified form is performed (seated, with the head resting on the arm) when Tahanun* is said in the presence of a Torah scroll.

PROTESTANTISM, a movement begun in the sixteenth century by Martin Luther and other Reformers when they split from the Roman Catholic church. At the beginning of his career as a Reformer, Luther hoped for the conversion of the Jews to his new, reformed version of Christianity. When this did not materialize, he expressed anger and hatred toward the Jews. Theologically, Protestantism followed the traditional Christian claim to be the true Israel and denied the legitimacy of Jewish existence independent of the church. However, some of the smaller, more radical groups of the Reformation did view the Jews as historical Israel. Moreover Protestant theology was free of some of the anti-Jewish teachings of the Catholic church, while its devotion to the Old Testament led to new perspectives on Judaism and the Jewish people that had been closed to Catholics. Pietistic European and British Puritan groups that emerged in the seventeenth century viewed the Jews as the chosen people and the object of biblical prophecies. Influenced by a more literal reading of the Bible, they anticipated the return of the Jews to their land. Such philosemitic notions influenced the decision in the mid-seventeenth century to allow Jews to settle in England. A new wave of Protestant interest in the Jews, based on messianic expectations, took place among pietists and evangelical Protestants in the nineteenth century. It inspired among other things proto-Zionist initiatives and later on support for the developing Zionist movement. The evangelical understanding of the Jews as the true Israel was at the same time the impetus for extensive missionary work among Jews.

A dramatic change in Protestant attitudes toward Jews took place in the decades following World War II. A spirit of interfaith dialogue, as well as a realization that the Nazi persecution of Jews was nourished by Christian antisemitism, caused many Protestant churches to reevaluate their position on the Jewish people. During the 1970s and 1980s, a series of liberal Protestant churches, among them Anglicans, Lutherans, Presbyterians, and Methodists, issued statements in which they rejected the deicide charge and recognized Judaism as a legitimate religion alongside Christianity. Statements by the World Council of Churches reflected changes in liberal Protestant theological thinking. The declarations also expressed regret for Christian harassment of Jews throughout the ages. Liberal churches have given up on missionizing among Jews. Conservative evangelical Christianity did not join in dialogue, insisting that only those persons who accepted Jesus as their personal Savior could be saved. Evangelical Protestantism continues to carry on extensive missionary work among Jews. An important dimension of the Protestant-Jewish encounter since 1948 has been Protestant attitudes toward Israel. Liberal Protestants recognize the right of Israel to exist. However, particularly after 1967, they often adopted a critical position toward Israeli policies. Evangelical Protestants, on the other hand, have rendered enthusiastic support for Israel, believing that its creation was divinely ascribed and indicates that the arrival of the Messiah is near. See also INTERFAITH RELATIONS.

PROVERBS (Heb. meshalim). There are two uses of the term in the Bible. The first refers to didactic sayings, such as those of Balaam concerning Israel's security and military strength (Nm. 23–24) and those of Ezekiel concerning the brushland of the Negev (Ez. 21.1–5), or such compositions as the parable of Jotham (Jgs. 9), as well as pithy aphorisms, such as "like mother, like daughter" (Ez. 16.44), or one-line "wisdom sentences" (especially in Prv. 10–22, 25–29), such as, "A wise son brings joy to his father, a dull son is his mother's sorrow" (Prv. 10.1). The term meshal also means a model of derision and is used in respect of nations (e.g., Dt. 28.37), people (e.g., Ps. 69.12), or even the destroyed Temple (2 Chr. 7.20), which exemplify shame for future generations. The noun meshal (model, saying) is derived from the Hebrew verb m sh l (be like). In Akkadian, the root mašalu (be like) occurs several times in the Amarna Letters; for example, "My field without plowing is like (mashil) a woman without a husband."

The Book of Ben Sira, in the Apocrypha, is a collection of aphorisms, reminiscent of Proverbs. The Talmud and the Midrash are replete with maxims relating to the cycle of everyday and religious life. Notable examples appear in Avot, Avot de-Rabbi Natan, Derekh Erets Rabbah, and Derekh Erets Zuta. Among later authors who are noted for their collections of proverbs are Ha'i Ga'on, Shemu'el ha-Nagid, and Mosheh ibn Ezra. Both Yiddish and Ladino literature and folklore are rich in proverbs. Examples from the Yiddish include: "One road leads to heaven but a thousand to hell"; "A man without a wife is like a lulav without an etrog"; and "Every Jew has his own Shulhan 'Arukh." The Sephardi vernacular has been punctuated with proverbs such as "He who hesitates will never reach Jerusalem" and "Preach, rabbi, only when you have an audience."

PROVERBS, BOOK OF, second book of the Hagiographa. The work belongs to Hebrew *wisdom literature and exhibits many of the characteristics that that genre shares with ancient Near Eastern literature in general. Proverbs shows Egyptian influence with parallels to Babylonian literature. Its thirty-one chapters contain collections of aphorisms, generally optimistic in tone, exhorting its readers to be mindful of the dictates of wisdom for their own good. In addition to the utilitarian character of its teachings, the book also emphasizes that true wisdom is associated with fear of God (1.7). Though poetically personified (chap. 8), the idea of wisdom in Proverbs is not to be confused with the hypostatized concept of sophia in later gnostic writings. The opening verse ascribes its authorship to Solomon, probably due to his reputation for wisdom and composing proverbs (1 Kgs. 5.9–14). According to the Talmud, the book received its definitive form at the time of Hezekiah and his scribes (B. B. 15a). It teaches that the wise will be duly rewarded and the wicked—in particular, the ignorant—punished. The book consists of praise of wisdom (chaps. 1–9); proverbs of Solomon (10.1–22.16); words of the wise (22.17–24.22); sayings of the wise (24.23–4); proverbs of Solomon that the men of Hezekiah, king of Judah, copied out (25.1–29.27); words of Agur, son of Jakeh (30.1–33); words of King Lemuel's mother (31.1–9); and praise of a virtuous wife (31.10–31; see ESHET HAYIL). Critical scholarship admits the possibility that some of the material in Proverbs may go as far back as King Solomon's court (cf. 1 Kgs. 5.12) but holds that the constituent parts of Proverbs date from various periods, some even from postexilic times. The final redaction of the compilation in written form is attributed to the period of the Keneset ha-Gedolah.

PROVERBS, MIDRASH, Midrashic work on the Book of Proverbs. It elaborates considerably on the opening chapters of Proverbs, less so on the later portions of the book, and includes no derashot on chapters three or eighteen. There is no interpretation of Proverbs 2.13–4.22 and 17.2–18.24; in chapter seven only verses 25–27 are interpreted briefly and in chapter twenty-nine only verse four. It resembles classical Midrashic literature in its exegetical style, though it contains few proems or introductory words. It employs many of the hermeneutic methods of earlier midrashim. Many verses of Proverbs are interpreted as referring to the Torah, and Lady Wisdom is construed almost exclusively in this manner. Midrash Proverbs utilizes material found in the Talmud Bavli as well as such Palestinian sources as the Mishnah, Tosefta, Mekhilta, Genesis Rabbah, and Pesiqa de-Rav Kahana. It is also familiar with both versions of Avot de-Rabbi Natan. Midrash Proverbs makes use of Heikhalot literature. Especially noteworthy is chapter 10, which maps out a Heikhalot curriculum of study. Midrash Proverbs contains some original narrative material, such as the encounter between King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba, as well as four stories of legendary deaths. A different Midrashic work to the final chapter of Proverbs (31; see MIDRASHEI ESHET HAYIL) is found as an addition in the printed editions and in some manuscripts of Midrash Proverbs. It is quoted in works of the eleventh century, though several indications seem to point to a nineteenth-century redaction; among them, liturgical customs mentioned in passing that were evidently in practice in the ninth century and an anti-Karaite polemic, including an apparent dialogue with Daniyye'l ben Mosheh al-Qumisi. There is no conclusive evidence to determine the exact locale of compilation.

PROVIDENCE (Heb. hashgahah), the power that rules both the world and human destiny, sustaining all and guiding everything in accordance with its purposes. Originating in Stoic philosophy, the term providence has been adopted by theistic theologies to designate the fundamental belief that God is "great in counsel and mighty in work" and that his eyes "are open upon all the ways of the sons of men, to give every one according to his ways, and according to the fruits of his doings" (Jer. 32.19). Biblical history is a record of God's immediate participation in the affairs of humankind; in fact, "by him actions are weighed . . . The Lord kills and makes alive . . . makes poor and makes rich; he brings low and lifts up" (2 Sm. 2.3–9). God's providence extends also to the nonhuman part of creation (cf. Ps. 104.21–33, 145.15–16). The ancient rabbis further emphasized these beliefs: "Know what is above you—a seeing eye, and a hearing ear, and all your deeds written in a book" (Avot 2.1), and "no one lifts even a finger here below, unless it is ordained above" (Hul. 7). Belief in a divine providence was confronted by contrary views (scientific, philosophical, or religious) that emphasized the ineluctable rule of necessity in the cosmos. In the Hellenistic period this inflexible cosmic law was identified with the stars, and the rabbis taught that Israel, being under God's immediate providence as his "chosen people," was not subject to the sway of the stars (the mazzal). In medieval times, the emergence of the concepts of nature and natural causality also challenged belief in providence. The tightly knit and autonomous causal nexus seemed to leave room for a divine "First Cause" but not for the exercise of immediate and direct providence (such as miracles, answer to prayer). All medieval philosophers (e.g., *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on, *Bahya ben Yosef ibn Paquda, *Yehudah ha-Levi, Moses *Maimonides) wrestled with this problem, which was further complicated by considerations of people's "free will in relation to God's—possibly determining—foreknowledge. Some thinkers (e.g., Avraham *ibn Ezra) held that divine providence extended only to general categories and processes (general providence) but not to the fate of individuals. Traditional orthodoxy, however, assumed an "individual providence" (Heb. hashgahah peratit). The fact that modern definitions of nature, causality, or God differ from their medieval counterparts does not seem essentially to affect the problem of providence as it was stated by the thinkers of the Middle Ages. The Holocaust led later Jewish thinkers to wrestle with the notion of a divine providence for the Jewish people. See also ASTROLOGY; DETERMINISM; HOLOCAUST THEOLOGY; PRE-DESTINATION.

PSALMODY. The Book of Psalms has been described as the hymn book of the Second Temple, and some prayers are largely compilations of Psalms verses; for example, *Barukh Adonai le-'Olam in the weekday evening service, and Yehi Khavod in the Sabbath morning liturgy. Psalms with special liturgical significance are Psalm 145, which is recited three times daily; and Psalms 146–150, which are recited daily in the morning service, symbolically carrying on an old tradition that the entire Psalter was to be read each day. Other psalms featured in the liturgy are Psalms 113–118 (known as the Egyptian *Hallel), recited on the *Shalosh Regalim and on other joyous occasions, and Psalms 95–99 and 29, which inaugurate the Sabbath. Following the practice of the Second Temple, a different psalm is sung at the conclusion of the morning service every day of the week, each suggesting the events that took place on that particular day of Creation; the cycle culminates with Psalm 92, which bears the superscription, "A Song for the Sabbath Day" (see PSALMS, DAILY). Like the traditional ritual, the Conservative, Reconstructionist, and Reform prayer books make frequent use of Psalms.

PSALMS, BOOK OF, the first book of the Hagiographa, called in Hebrew Tehillim (Songs of Praise). The name Tehillim is first attested in the Psalms Scroll from Qumran (11QPs), in which David is said to have written Tehillim. The Book of Psalms is a collection of religious poetry in which an individual addresses God and expresses faith in God or longing for nearness to God. God is conceived as a personal God, whose ears are attuned to human needs. God executes justice and protects the weak, the poor, and the oppressed.

The Book of Psalms includes one hundred fifty chapters. The Septuagint contains, in addition to the canonical psalms, Psalm 151, not found in the Masoretic Text but known from Qumran 11QPs. This apocryphal psalm tells, in autobiographical terms, of David's youth and election to the kingship. The Book of Psalms is divided into five "books," comprising chapters 1–41; chapters 42–72; chapters 73–89; chapters 90–106; and chapters 107–150. Each of the first four books concludes with a doxology, such as "Blessed be the Lord, the God of Israel, from everlasting and to everlasting. Amen and amen" (Ps. 41.14; cf. Ps. 72.18–19, 89.53, 106.47–48). The psalm concluding the fifth book, Psalm 150, serves as the conclusion of the entire Book of Psalms. It appears that the first three "books" were originally separate collections. The division of the last collection into the fourth and fifth "books" by means of a doxology is artificial and was intended to bring about a five-part division of the Book of Psalms, analogous to the five books of Moses. The rabbinic sages commented on this analogy: "Moses gave the five books of law to Israel and David gave the five books of Psalms to Israel" (Midrash Shohar Tov 1.2).

This attribution to David of the authorship of the work is also mentioned in Qumran 11QF, which states that David composed four thousand fifty psalms. The origin of this tradition is found in the Bible itself, which presents David as a musician and as an inventor of musical instruments (Am. 6.5). He is called "the sweet psalmist of Israel" (2 Sm. 23.1); the Book of Chronicles even represents him as the founder of the cultic singing in the Temple (2 Chr. 23.18). These traditions concur with the appearance of David's name in the titles of seventy-three individual psalms. Thirteen of these make the occasion of their composition a particular event in David's life (Psalm 3, 7, 18, 34, 51, 54, 56, 57, 59, 60, 63, 142). The Hebrew title le-David is problematic, however, in regard to the original meaning of the preposition le, but already in ancient times it was understood to refer to David's authorship of the psalms. The title of Psalm 18 is expounded in the parallel psalm in 2 Samuel 22: "And David spoke unto the Lord the words of this song." Also, in similar psalm titles it seems that the preposition indicates the psalm's author: "of the sons of Korah" (Psalm 42 et al.), "of Asaph" (Psalm 50 et al.), "of Solomon" (Psalm 72), "of Heman the Ezrahite" (Psalm 88), "of Ethan the Ezrahite" (Psalm 89), and "of Moses" (Psalm 90). The colophon of the second book, "The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended" (Ps. 72.20) also points to David's authorship.

It is difficult to date Psalms. The content of some (Psalm 126, 137), or their language (many of the psalms of the fourth and fifth book), testifies to the postexilic period. Nevertheless, many psalms were clearly composed already in the monarchic period (for example, Psalm 2, 24, 45, 74, 110). The Book of Psalms in its present form is the result of a long period of development, beginning with the composition of the individual psalms, continuing with the compilation of small collections, which later crystallized into larger compilations, and finally were collected into one book. The most ancient collection is Psalm 3 through Psalm 41 (Psalm 1 and Psalm 2 function as a general introduction to the Book of Psalms). All the psalms in this group are attributed to David, except for Psalm 10, which may have originally been the continuation of Psalm 9, and Psalm 33, a late psalm added to the collection. The second book is comprised of psalms attributed to various authors. The recurrence in this book of several psalms from the first (Psalm 53 = Psalm 14; Psalm 70 = Psalm 14 through Psalm 18) testifies to the independent existence of the first two books. The concluding comment, "The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended" (Ps. 72.20), derives from the pen of someone unaware of the fact that certain psalms are attributed to other authors in the second book and that eighteen psalms are attributed to David in the fourth and fifth books. The second and third books (Psalm 42 through Psalm 83) contain what is known as the Elohistic psalms. These psalms are characterized by their clear preference for the divine name "Elohim" over "Yahveh." In the second and third books, eleven psalms are attributed to the Levitical family of psalmists, the sons of Korah, and twelve are attributed to Asaph. The fourth and fifth books have common characteristics that distinguish them from the rest of the psalmic books: most of the psalms here are hymns to nature, and in form, they are the only books containing the exclamation "Hallelujah." These last two books contain traces of several smaller collections such as coronation psalms (Psalm 93 and Psalm 95 through Psalm 100) and the songs of ascent (Psalm 120 through Psalm 134).

Three main types of psalms can be distinguished in the Book of Psalms: hymns, songs of God's greatness in nature and in history; complaints, in which the individual or the congregation addresses God and asks for help (cure for illness, deliverance from enemies, victory in war, end of famine or other misfortunes), complaining, rhetorically, against God's anger and typically revealing an absolute faith in God's salvation; and songs of gratitude, which are mostly of an individual nature and contain an exclamation of God's praises out of gratitude for his mercy and answering of the supplicant's prayers. There exist also several secondary types of psalms, such as praises of Zion, royal psalms, and sapiential (wisdom) psalms. Thirteen psalms are characterized as historical, because they contain allusions to historical events mentioned in various places in the Bible: the patriarchs, the Exodus, the parting of the Sea of Reeds, the wandering in the wilderness, the leadership of Moses and Aaron, the conquest, and the period of the judges (Psalm 44, 77, 78, 80, 81, 83, 95, 99, 105, 106, 114, 135, 146). In these psalms, the mention of past history is intended to serve as testimony of God's faithfulness to his people.

Many psalms were used liturgically in the Temple service including a psalm for each day of the week (Tam. 7.4; see PSALMS, DAILY). The songs of ascent (see DEGREES, SONG OF) may have been recited while going up into the Temple compound or as part of a Levitical musical rendition on steps inside the Temple (Suk. 5.4). The meaning of the heading of some of the psalms is uncertain and may contain musical instructions. By Second Temple times, the book was used in the synagogue where it has continued to form an important part of the *liturgy. The *prayer book contains seventy complete psalms and numerous other excerpts. These include the *Hallel, the daily psalms, the *Pesukei de-Zimra', and the *Qabbalat Shabbat. In many Jewish communities, a hevrat tehillim (psalms society) was formed for daily recitation of psalms. Through Christianity, the psalms have had a profound influence on Western culture.

PSALMS, DAILY, psalms recited at the conclusion of *Shaharit, a different one on each day of the week (Sunday—Psalm 24; Monday—48; Tuesday—82; Wednesday—94.1–95.3; Thursday—81; Friday—93; Saturday—92). The same psalms were recited by Levites in the Temple service after the daily sacrifice (Tam. 7.4), and the custom was continued following the destruction of the Temple (Soferim 18.4). The Talmud finds a connection between the contents of the seven psalms and the seven days of Creation (R. ha-Sh. 31a).

PSALMS OF SOLOMON, pseudepigraphous collection of eighteen psalms attributed to King Solomon, extant in Greek and Syriac. Since the psalms refer to the Hasmonean dynasty (see HASMONEANS), to Pompey's conquest of Jerusalem in 63 BCE and the ensuing desecration of the Temple, and to Pompey's death in Egypt in 48 BCE, they probably were composed in the second half of the first century BCE. Originally written in Hebrew, possibly in Jerusalem, the Psalms of Solomon stress the unbridgeable gap between the righteous and the impious, call on God to save his righteous servants, and express longing for the day when God will send the Messiah, Son of David, "to purge Jerusalem of gentiles," gather all the Jews, and raise them high above all the other nations. Certain elements of the psalms' piety as well as their rejection of the Hasmoneans have often led scholars to assume a Pharisaic (see PHARISEES) origin for this work, a hypothesis that is plausible but far from certain.

PSEUDO-JONATHAN, TARGUM, Aramaic translation of the Prophets that frequently paraphrases the text of the Bible and adds homiletical interpretations. The Talmud (Meg. 3a) attributes the targum to Yonatan ben 'Uzzi'el, "from the mouths of Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi," and says that he also intended to translate the Hagiographa but was prevented from doing so by a heavenly voice. Yonatan was a pupil of *Hillel (B. B. 134a); nothing else is known about him. Modern scholars—on stylistic and other grounds—doubt that Yonatan composed the targum, which is therefore named the Targum Pseudo-Jonathan. Its abbreviated name, Taf-Yud (Targum Yerushalmi), has been incorrectly taken to mean Targum Jonathan. A targum of the Pentateuch was also erroneously attributed to Yonatan ben 'Uzzi'el.

PSEUDO-PHILO'S BIBLICAL ANTIQUITIES, a Latin work that relates the history of the Jewish people from Adam to David and combines biblical scenes with numerous legendary expansions. The work, translated from a lost Greek text, which probably was translated from a lost Hebrew original, was most likely written in the first century CE, perhaps in Erets Yisra'el, but its author remains unknown. In the manuscripts it is erroneously attributed to *Philo, hence its name.

PUMBEDITA, city in northern Babylonia on the Euphrates River that was the home of an important *academy rivaled only by that of *Sura. The Pumbedita academy was founded by *Yehudah bar Yehezqel, pupil of *Shemu'el (contemporary of *Rav, the founder of Sura), in approximately 260 CE. The academy continued the traditions of *Nehardea, and the names Nehardea and Pumbedita became virtually synonymous. Yehudah bar Yehezqel was succeeded by *Rabbah bar Nahmani, *Yosef ben Hiyya', *Abbaye, and *Rava', names that appear throughout the Talmud Bavli and bear witness to the enormous part played by Pumbedita in the formulation of this work. With the death of Rava' in 353, decline set in, and many rabbis from Pumbedita, such as *Papa', founded academies in other cities of Babylonia. From the time of *Ashi, Pumbedita took second place to Sura. In the geonic period, Pumbedita supplied several heads for the academy of Sura, of whom the most famous and influential was *Yehuda'i ben Nahman Ga'on. Toward the end of the ninth century, the academy at Pumbedita was relocated to Baghdad, but it retained its traditional title. It regained its dominant position in the late tenth and early eleventh centuries, under *Sherira' ben Hanina' Ga'on and *Ha'i Ga'on, and closed finally a short time after the latter's death in 1038.

PUNCTUATION. See MASORAH; NAOQEDANIM; VOCALIZATION.

PUNISHMENT. Biblical and rabbinic law provide for the following types of punishment: death by stoning, burning, decapitation, or strangulation (see CAPITAL PUNISHMENT); excision (Heb. karet*), which refers to premature death, according to some, or childlessness (cf. Lv. 20.20) according to others; divine punishment*; banishment*; corporal punishment, including makkat mardut (flogging*); fines*; servitude (see SLAVERY); imprisonment*; excommunication* (herem); or "death at the hand of the zealot" (for example, the death of Zimri at the hands of Phinehas; see Nm. 25.6–8 and San. 9.6). Capital punishment is described in the Bible as a deterrent ("All Israel shall hear and fear and shall do no more any such wickedness in your midst," Dt. 13.12), as a means of rooting out evil elements from the nation (Dt. 17.7), and as a means of expiation for wrongdoing (Nm. 35.31–33). Homicide* is considered a crime against the sanctity of the land, and "no expiation can be made . . . for the blood shed therein but by the blood of him that sheds it." In practice, capital punishment was discontinued some time before the destruction of the Second Temple. Corporal punishment (derived from Dt. 25.1–3) is meted out for transgression of biblical prohibitions. Of 365 biblical prohibitions, 207 are punishable by flogging. Property damage is punishable only by the imposition of a fine, as is personal injury. However, if a male thief is unable to make restitution, he is sold to the person from whom he stole and must work off the value of the stolen property (Ex. 22.2). A woman may not be sold into servitude for her theft. A minor is not liable for any punishment. Many of the detailed Talmudic discussions about these subjects date from a period when certain forms of punishment were no longer administered and, therefore, do not necessarily reflect earlier or actual practice. On the other hand, Jewish courts (see BEIT DIN) enjoyed a measure of autonomy throughout the Middle Ages, including the power to impose fines, corporal punishment, and in rare instances death sentences (notably for denunciation*). Already the Talmud had conceded to the courts the power to "administer corporal or other punishment not in accord with biblical law" (Yev. 90b) when circumstances warranted it (see TAQQANAḤ), for example, in the absence of ordained rabbis (see ORDINATION). In modern times, rabbinic courts no longer administer punishment; even excommunication is rare. In Israel the rabbinic courts can refer those who defy its decisions to the civil courts (for example, husbands who refuse to grant a divorce to their wives when ordered by a rabbinic court have been sent to prison by the civil court).

PURIFICATION. See ABLUTION; IMPURITY.

PURIFICATION OFFERING (Heb. hatta't), one of the sacrifices that figures prominently in the sacrificial system. Because its name is connected with het' (sin), it has often been mistakenly translated as sin offering—especially since it was prescribed for inadvertent sinners who upon realizing their guilt desired to make atone-*ment (Lv. 4). In fact, however, its function is purification (Heb. hitte' [to purge, purify]). It is required not only of those guilty of sin but also of those who have been cleansed of major physical impurities (childbirth, Lv. 12; leprosy, Lv. 14; abnormal genital flux, Lv. 15) and even those who have allowed a minor impurity, such as contact with a corpse, to go uncleansed (Lv. 5.2ff.). The purification offering does not cleanse the person: the sinner himself is cleansed by remorse and repentance, and the impure are cleansed by bathing and laundering their garments. The function of the purification offering is to decontaminate the Temple and the sacred objects therein—which are said to have become contaminated by the transgressions and impurities of Israel—thus ensuring the continued presence of God in his earthly abode. The offering was therefore required not only in specific cases of impurity or transgression but also on a regular basis, as part of the regimen of public sacrifice (in particular, on Ro'sh Ḥodesh and during festivals), and on special occasions as well. It was the central ritual of Yom Kippur*. The essence of the purification offering was the sprinkling of its blood—the agent of purification—on the altar (the inner altar, in the case of severe transgressions; the outer altar in normal circumstances) or on Yom Kippur in the Holy of Holies itself. In this basic feature, the purification offering resembles temple cleansing rituals practiced by ancient Israel's neighbors.

PURIM (פּוּרִים, lots), festival commemorating the deliverance of the Jews of the Persian empire from extermination. The story of Purim is told in the biblical *Book of Esther. Haman*, chief minister of Ahasuerus*, plotted to destroy the Jews of the empire. With the king's consent, Haman fixed the date of their doom by lot as 13 Adar. Esther (Hadassah), the king's Jewish wife, encouraged by her cousin Mordecai*, courageously interceded with Ahasuerus; as a result, the king authorized the Jews to defend themselves, and on the appointed day they routed their enemies while Haman himself was hanged. On the next day, the Jews celebrated their victory and called the day Purim, an allusion to the lots Haman had drawn. To commemorate this event, 14 Adar is marked with festivities and rejoicing. In Shushan (Susa), capital of the Persian empire, fighting occurred on 14 Adar as well, and the victory there was celebrated only on 15 Adar. Cities that had already been walled at the time of Joshua (e.g., Jerusalem) observe Purim on that date (Shushan Purim). Ahasuerus is identified with Xerxes I, who ruled Persia from 486 to 465. The first record of the observance of Purim dates from the Hasmonean period.

Many laws and customs as well as a rich folklore are associated with Purim. The regulations for the celebration of Purim are discussed in the tractate Megillah*. As a minor festival, it is not a day on which refraining from work is mandatory. The most important ceremony is the reading of the Book of Esther from a handwritten parchment scroll. Both men and women are obliged to hear the reading of the Megillah (Scroll); children too should hear the story. The Megillah is read both at night and in the morning. Before the reading, three special blessings are pronounced. It is customary to make a din with noisemakers, called gragers*, at every mention of the name of Haman. 'Al ha-Nissim is recited in the 'Amidah and in the Birkat ha-Mazon. The Pentateuchal reading during Shāharit recounts the attack of Amalek* (from whom Haman is said to be descended) on the Jews. One is required to send gifts (mishloah manot) to friends (usually two kinds of sweetmeats), and to the poor (mattanot la-'evyonim) in the form of food or money. An important feature of the celebration is the Purim banquet (se'udah), when inebriation is encouraged. In general a certain amount of levity and popular amusement was permitted on Purim, and masquerades and Purim plays (Purim-shpil) became a widespread feature of the celebration in medieval times (possibly under the influence of the Christian carnival). In some European Talmudic academies it was customary to elect one of the students as rabbi for a day (Purim rabbi). In the State of Israel, Purim is a carnival period, especially for children, and the occasion for the 'adlayada'* procession. In leap years, Purim is observed in the second month of Adar. PURIM QATAN (פּוּרִים קָטָן; minor Purim), the designation during a leap year of the fourteenth (or fifteenth) day of the first month of Adar. In a leap year, there are two months of Adar*, in which case the festival of Purim is celebrated during the second of them, on 14 (or 15) Adar. The corresponding days of the first Adar, Purim Qatan, are not marked by any celebration apart from the fact that supplicatory prayers (Tahanun*) are omitted from the morning and afternoon services, and fasting and funeral eulogies are forbidden.

• Philip Goodman, ed., The Purim Anthology (Philadelphia, 1988).

PURIMS, LOCAL, provincial festivals commemorating a signal deliverance from danger. The custom of celebrating the anniversary of such deliverance—analogue to the festival of Purim*—developed both among individual families and whole communities. The forms of the celebration were often patterned on the original Purim: the particular event would be recorded in a megillah*, special prayers of thanksgiving recited, a banquet held, and the day observed as a holiday. Examples of local Purims are the Purim of Narbonne (29 Adar, instituted in 1236), of Cairo (28 Adar, instituted in 1524), of Frankfurt am Main (20 Adar, instituted in 1616), and of Leghorn (22 Shevat, instituted in 1743). An example of a familial Purim is that observed by the family of Yom Tov Lipmann Heller* to commemorate his release from prison in Vienna on 1 Adar 1629.

QABBALAT SHABBAT (קַבָּלַת שַׁבָּת; Reception of the Sabbath), service preceding Ma'ariv on Friday nights, which developed in late-sixteenth-century kabbalistic circles in Safed. It is now included, though to varying degrees, in all modern rites. It consists mainly of a selection of psalms (in the Ashkenazi rite, Psalms 95–99; among Sephardim, Psalm 29) and the piyyut *Lekhah Dodi. Qabbalat Shabbat became one of the most popular parts of the liturgy.

QADDISH (Aram.; קְדִישׁ; Sanctification; cognate with Heb. *Qiddush and *Qedushah), Aramaic prayer praising God, recited at the conclusion of each principal section of every service. It was originally not part of the fixed liturgy and, despite the fact that it has become best known as a mourner's recitation, was unrelated to mourning. The Qaddish was an expression of praise to God recited by the preacher at the close of his discourse or after the study of aggadah. Its central feature was the congregational response: "May His great name be praised for all eternity" (cf. Dan. 2.20 and Ps. 113.2). There is no clear evidence as to when the Qaddish was composed. It probably achieved something like its present form by the eighth or ninth century, and there is evidence that it was one of several prayers common in the first or second century. A Hebrew version may have existed (cf. Ber. 3a; Sifrei to Dt. 306). As the Qaddish passed from the school to the synagogue and became part of the liturgy, its text was expanded.

There are five forms of Qaddish: the Short, or Half, Qaddish (Ḥatsi Qaddish), recited by the reader before or after certain sections of the service; the Full Qaddish (Qaddish Shalem), recited at the end of the main part of the service and containing the additional sentence, "May the prayers and entreaties of the whole House of Israel be accepted by its Father in heaven"; the Mourner's Qaddish (Qaddish Yatom); the Rabbinical Qaddish (Qaddish de-Rabbanan or Qaddish Titqabbel), recited after the study of rabbinical literature or after a sermon; and the Qaddish of Renewal, or the Great Qaddish (Ha-Qaddish ha-Gadol), used at the conclusion of the study of a Talmudic tractate and at funerals, where it is recited at the graveside immediately after the burial. In its opening section, the messianic prayer is elaborated, and specific requests for the revival of the dead, the rebuilding of the Temple, and so forth are added. According to Maimonides, this Qaddish should be recited after the study of aggadah, a practice followed by some Eastern communities (see 'ADOT HA-MIZRAH).

Qaddish is known as a mourner's prayer from an eighth-century Palestinian source, but its recitation became accepted practice only several centuries later. Its appeal is due to its exhortation to sanctify God's name and glorify his sovereign kingdom, and its expression of hope for the speedy advent of the Messiah. It also conveys the idea of the necessity to accept God's judgment though his ways may be inscrutable. Originally, the mourner would recite the Qaddish during the course of the liturgy. Soon, however, it became customary to place the Mourner's Qaddish at the end of the service. The practice of having it recited by the bereaved son did not gain general acceptance until the High Middle Ages, and its recitation on the yortsayt dates from about the fifteenth century. According to tradition, the punishment of sinners in *Geihinnom lasts for a full year; so as not to make it appear that the deceased was wicked, Qaddish is recited for eleven months and one day only (although Reform Jews say it for a whole year). When there is no son to recite the Qaddish, it may be said by any adult male member of the immediate family or any male Jew who volunteers. The Qaddish can only be recited when a minyan is present. In Conservative, Reconstructionist, Reform, and in a limited number of Orthodox services, it is the practice for female as well as male kin to recite the Qaddish, and it is often recited in unison by the whole congregation.

There are minor differences in wording in various rites. In German liberal congregations, a sentence was added referring to the dead who have departed this world: "For Israel and for the righteous and for all who have departed this world in accord with the will of God, may there be great peace, a good portion in the life of the world to come, and grace and mercy from the Lord of Heaven and earth. And say Amen." The sentence also appears in the Sephardi liturgy in the Hashkavah prayer (see ASHKAVAH) for the dead but not in the Qaddish. It was not accepted in England, but it was included in North American Reform liturgies (Union Prayer Book); in fact, this was the only form of Qaddish found in the Union Prayer Book. However, in Gates of Prayer, the new Reform prayer book, the specific reference to the departed has been deleted and the text as found in the traditional siddur has been restored, as well as the Ḥatsi Qaddish in various places.

QEDESHASH (קִדְּשָׁה; she who is set apart [for sexual services]), a prostitute. The semantic affinity between the term qedeshah and the adjective qadosh (holy) led scholars to assume until recently that the qedeshah functioned as a sacred harlot in temple fertility cults. However, the latest research indicates that the evidence for the qedeshah's sexual role in the cult, both within biblical Israel and outside of it, is extremely tenuous. Thus, the biblical references to the qedeshah are best understood as being synonymous with zonah (prostitute). Such women offered their services either on the highway (Gn. 38.15, 21–22) or in the vicinity of the temples, where they could attract a larger number of clients (Hos. 4.13–14). The practice was strongly condemned and outlawed as an abomination to the Lord, both in the Pentateuch and by the prophets (cf. Dt. 23.18). Reference is also made to male prostitutes (qadesh; cf. 1 Kgs. 15.12).

QEDUSHAH (קִדְּשָׁה; Sanctification). [This entry discusses the Qedushah prayers; for a discussion of holiness, see HOLINESS.] Qedushah is the name given to prayers describing the sanctification of God by the angels in heaven and its imitation on earth. The Qedushah prayers contain the verses Isaiah 6.3 ("Holy, Holy, Holy," etc.) and Ezekiel 3.12 ("Blessed be the glory of the Lord from his place"). One Qedushah, said while sitting (Qedushah de-Yeshivah or de-Yotser), is interwoven with the *Yotser benediction. Another is known as the Qedushah de-Sidra', contained in the prayer *U-Va' le-Tsiyyon. The main Qedushah (Qedushah de-'Amidah) forms part of the third benediction of the 'Amidah when recited aloud by the reader; the congregational responses are more recent than the prayer and probably originated in the geonic period. It opens by expressing Israel's readiness "to sanctify his name in the world, as the angels sanctify it in the heavens above." In the enlarged form of the Qedushah (the Qedushah Rabbah, used in Musaf), Israel, too, joins the angelic choir by professing "Hear, O Israel," and is answered by God himself, who proclaims "I am the Lord, your God." The Qedushah is of early date and its introduction is usually attributed to the Yordei Merkavah (see MA'ASEH MERKAVAH), a group largely responsible for the creation of the *Heikhalot literature, which seems in its earliest form to date from the tannaitic period. The Talmud ascribes the composition of the Qedushah to the Men of the Keneset ha-Gedolah (Ber. 33a). It belongs to the most solemn and exalted portions of the service. The Qedushah as part of the 'Amidah is recited only when a minyan is present. There are differences in formulation between the Ashkenazi and Sephardi versions. Reform prayer books remove all the references to angels. In geonic times, the Qedushah was not a generally accepted practice in the Palestinian rite, except on Sabbaths and festivals; but in the Babylonian rite it became part of the daily liturgy. Many piyutnic compositions elaborated the theme of the Qedushah; some are still in use on Ro'sh ha-Shanah and Yom Kippur. The Qedushah has remained a favorite for synagogue composers, who see it as a particularly apt place to achieve a sense of the transcendent. The basic part of the Qedushah (the Trisagion [Holy, Holy, Holy] and its preface) also became prominent in Christian liturgy.

QEFITSAT HA-DEREKH (קִפְּצַת הַדֶּרֶךְ; path jumping), common motif in classical rabbinic literature and Jewish magical writings. In Sanhedrin 95a–b, a number of biblical figures, including Jacob and Abishai (King David's nephew), experienced a geological miracle in which the ground shrank, and they were instantaneously transported a great distance. In magical literature, beginning with The Sword of Moses and continuing in such medieval works as Berit Menuḥah and Shoshan Yesod 'Olam, magical recipes are recorded for engineering path jumping. Common motifs include purification rites, acquiring a seven-knotted reed, donning a blindfold, and conjuring special angels (e.g., Kaftsiel [God Jumps]). Abraham Baer Gottlob, a nineteenth-century maskil, recounted that in his youth he transcribed a secret amulet and together with a friend accomplished path jumping; however, for many days afterward he was bedridden.

QELIPPOT (קִלְפֹּת; husks or shells), a common name in the Kabbalah for the powers of evil. Following the spread of Lurianic Kabbalah in early modern times, the word was used for everything evil. The origin of the concept is to be found in a short text known as Sod ha-'Egoz, which describes a great nut, presented as a metaphor for the world of the holy chariot, surrounded by four qelippot: a great cloud, an erupting fire, a tempestuous wind, and a splendid light. The Hasidei Ashkenaz wrote several commentaries on this metaphor, and at the same time some Christian writers described Christ using the same images. Early kabbalists developed this concept, and gradually their dualistic conceptions transformed at least the first three qelippot into powers of evil, while the fourth, nogah, is regarded as an intermediate realm between good and evil. The Zohar and subsequent kabbalists continued to develop this metaphor into one of the central terms for the realm of evil in the Kabbalah.

QERI'AT HA-TORAH (קריאת התורה; reading of the Torah), the public reading from the Torah, in the presence of a minyan*, that constitutes part of the synagogue service on Sabbaths, festivals, Ro'sh Hodesh (the new moon), Hanukkah, Purim, and fast days, as well as on ordinary Mondays and Thursdays. The reading of the Torah takes place at the end of Shaharit*; on Sabbaths and fast days the Torah is also read during Minḥah*. Special handwritten parchment scrolls (see SEFER TORAH) must be used; those persons called up to "read" ('aliyyah la-Torah) recite a benediction (Birkat ha-Torah*) both before and after the reading. The handwritten text has no vowels, punctuation, or accents* and requires considerable skill to read. In most congregations (except the Yemenite), the one "called up" no longer reads the portion; instead, the entire text is chanted by an appointed reader. The number of persons to be called is fixed in accordance with the status of the day: on the morning of the Sabbath, at least seven people are called; on Yom Kippur, six; on festivals, five (all of the above apart from the maftir*; see HAFTARAH); on Ro'sh Hodesh and hol ha-mo'ed, four; on all other occasions, three. The Torah was read as part of the service as far back as Temple times (rabbinic tradition ascribes the institution of the Sabbath, festival, and new moon readings to Moses and the readings on Mondays, Thursdays, and during Sabbath Minḥah to Ezra; Meg. 31a; B. Q. 82a), but the portions to be read were not definitively marked out. On festivals, portions appropriate to the day were read (cf. Meg. 3–4); if too short, they were repeated several times.

On Sabbaths, it was usual to begin where the reading had been terminated the previous Sabbath, and a minimum of twenty-one verses had to be read—three for each person called; but there is no indication that even by the Mishnaic period a definite portion had been allocated to each Sabbath. Every verse was translated orally into Aramaic after it had been read in Hebrew (see TARGUM). In some countries of the Diaspora, the reading took place in the vernacular, such as Greek. Two cycles of the reading of the Torah emerged: a triennial* cycle in Erets Yisra'el, which divided the Torah into over 150 sedarim; and an annual cycle in Babylonia, based on a division of 54 parashiyot (some of which are combined in years with less than fifty-four Sabbaths, none of which is also a festival). Eventually the Babylonian cycle prevailed and was adopted by all congregations in the Diaspora and even in Palestine. The annual reading concludes on Simḥat Torah*, whereupon the new cycle is begun. Each Sabbath is known by the name of its portion. For festivals, too, suitable portions were determined, and those are followed by an appropriate passage from Numbers 28–29 for the maftir. On Sabbath afternoons, Mondays, and Thursdays, the beginning of the parashah (portion) of the following Sabbath is read. The scroll is taken out of the ark for qeri'at ha-Torah and is then returned with great ceremony while the congregation stands and recites psalms and hymns. When a kohen is present, he must be called first, followed by a Levite; often the rabbi or some other distinguished person is called third. The maftir is considered a special honor. A boy celebrating his bar mitsvah* (or a girl celebrating her bat mitsvah* in a non-Orthodox congregation) is usually called for maftir and generally reads this portion himself (herself). Reform congregations generally read selected portions only; some Conservative congregations have reintroduced the ancient Palestinian triennial cycle. In many non-Orthodox congregations, women are now called up to the reading of the Torah. See also MI SHE-BERAKH.

QERI'AT SHEMA'. See SHEMA'.

QERI'AT SHEMA' 'AL HA-MITTAH (קריאת שמוע' על המטה; Reading of the 'Shema' in Bed), special night prayers (as distinct from Ma'ariv*, the statutory evening prayer service), including a prayer for undisturbed repose, the first paragraph of the Shema', Psalm 91 and Psalm 3, and, in different rites, other verses and texts. The recitation of the Shema' before sleeping is based on a saying of R. Yehoshu'a ben Levi (Ber. 4b) that "all the demons of the night flee from the person who recites the Shema' in bed." Some of the sections now included were added in medieval times. Young children recite a short version.

* Ismar Elbogen, Jewish Liturgy: A Comprehensive History (Philadelphia, 1993).

QEROVAH (קרובה), a poetic embellishment (piyyut*) of the 'Amidah*, recited by the reader. The term is derived from the Aramaic word qarova meaning "near," applied to the sheliaḥ tsibbur*, who stands close to the ark. The earliest examples go back to Byzantine Erets Yisra'el of the sixth century; new composition in the genre had virtually ceased by the thirteenth century. The aim of the qerovah was to increase the praise of God and to connect the statutory prayer with appointed times in the Jewish calendar or community life. There are two major groups. One occurs prior to the Qedushah* in the third blessing of the Shaharit 'Amidah, mainly on Sabbaths and holidays, and therefore called Qedushta. The other occurs in the Musaf 'Amidah, when, according to the rite of Erets Yisra'el, no Qedushah was recited; it was called Shiv'ata' or Shiv'ah (seven) because it had seven sections. *Yann'ai wrote a complete cycle of qerovah for the Sabbath, according to the cycle of Torah readings. El'azar *Kallir wrote for almost every festive occasion. His work is found in almost all European rites and influenced later authors.

QES (or kahen [priest]), title given to *Beta Israel religious leaders who replaced celibate monks. Among Beta Israel, the priesthood was not hereditary and could be entered by any male from a family whose lineage was not blemished by intermarriage or other faults. The qes filled a wide variety of roles: leading prayers; performing sacrifices; hearing confessions; officiating at circumcisions, weddings, and funerals; and mediating disputes. In exchange for these services, he received remuneration from community members. In each region, one priest was recognized as the high priest. Since the immigration of Ethiopian Jews to Israel, their qessotch have been denied official recognition.

QETSATSAH (קִטְסָטָה; cutting off), term used in the Talmud for a ceremony marking the severance of all connections with a family member who married beneath his rank or sold part of his ancestral estate. The main feature of the qetsatsah ceremony was the breaking of a barrel filled with fruit in the town square and a declaration to the effect that the renegade's children would not be allowed to marry into the family (Ket. 28b). Qetsatsah also served as a form of qinyan* in early times (Y., Qid. 1.5).

QEVER AVOT (קִבְרֵי אֲבוֹת; ancestral graves), a term relating to periodic visits to the burial place of parents or to the graves of sages and religious leaders. It is a widespread custom to visit the grave of a parent before *Ro'sh ha-Shanah (Isserles on Orah Hayyim 581.4), from which the practice was extended to visiting the cemetery during the month of Elul. In some communities in America, rabbis organize a public memorial service in the cemetery, after which an individual goes to visit his or her own parents' graves. Sephardim visit a parent's grave after shiv'ah*, sheloshim*, and on the yortsayt*. The custom among Ashkenazim is not to go to the cemetery after burial until sheloshim. In addition, the fast day of *Tish'ah be-Av is regarded as an appropriate day to observe the practice of qever avot (Orah Hayyim 579). One may not visit a cemetery on the Sabbath or festivals, or even on such minor days as *Ro'sh Hodesh and *Purim (except in the case of a funeral).

The term qever avot also applies to pilgrimages made by the faithful to the graves of the great and the righteous. Jewish folklore describes Caleb praying at the graves of the patriarchs in Hebron, pleading for their intervention to save him from the evil counsel of the other spies (Sot. 34b). Legend also tells how, after the destruction of the First Temple, the prophet Jeremiah went to the graves of the patriarchs and Moses to appeal for their help in pleading with God to save the Jewish people. Similar legends are recorded about the prophet Elijah, who visited the qever avot at the time that *Haman's plot to destroy the Jews of Persia was authorized by the king. Since the Middle Ages, it has been customary to pray at the graves of the pious in order to seek their intercession in times of distress. Visits to graves of holy sages were regarded as highly meritorious by the kabbalistic school of Yitshaq *Luria in Safed, who himself claimed to have identified numerous tombs of Talmudic rabbis in Galilee. In modern times the practice is still continued, particularly in Israel. The Tomb of *Rachel at the approach to Bethlehem is a popular place of pilgrimage on 11 Heshvan, the traditional date of her death; the tomb of *Shim'on ha-Tsaddiq in Jerusalem is visited on *Lag ba-Omer and 7 Sivan; and the tomb of *Shim'on bar Yoh'ai on Mount Meron is the site of mass pilgrimages on Lag ba-Omer.

Hasidim (see HASIDISM) are particularly zealous in following the practice of qever avot (to which their opponents, the *Mitnaggedim, strongly objected). Both in Israel and in the United States, Hasidim visit the graves of their leaders, light candles, write petitions that they leave by the grave, and offer prayers for their leaders' intercession with God on their behalf. Bratslav Hasidim visit the grave of their rabbi *Nahman of Bratslav in Uman in the Ukraine.

In Muslim lands, the custom of making pilgrimages to tombs connected with biblical figures or revered sages is widespread. Visitors pray at the tombs and light candles. See also PILGRIMAGE.

QIBBUTS GALUYOT. See EXILES, INGATHERING OF THE.

QIDDUSH (קִידּוּשׁ; Sanctification), a ceremony and prayer proclaiming the holiness of the Sabbath or a festival as a memorial to Creation and to the Exodus from Egypt. The term is an abbreviation of the Talmudic expression qiddush ha-yom (more properly, qedushat ha-yom [sanctification of the day]). The Qiddush is recited on the Sabbath or festival eve over a cup of wine immediately before the meal. It is chanted by one person, usually the head of the house, while all present identify themselves with the recitation by answering amen. In some homes, it is recited (in unison or separately) by all present. The Talmud specifies that women are obligated to hear or recite the Qiddush (Ber. 20b). The reciter takes the cup into his right hand, preferably in the palm, enclosing the cup with his fingers, chants the Qiddush, drinks, and gives all present a sip of the wine. If no wine is available, the Qiddush may be recited over bread. For those who do not wish to consume alcohol, grape juice may be substituted. Even when wine is used, traditional usage holds that there should be on the table two whole loaves of hallah (covered by a cloth), which symbolize the double portion of manna gathered by the children of Israel each Friday during their forty years in the wilderness. The Qiddush is essentially a home ritual associated with the Sabbath or festival meal, but from early times it has been customary to recite it on these days in the synagogue, at the end of the evening prayer, for the benefit of travelers or the poor who would lodge and eat in the synagogue. When the latter custom fell into disuse, some rites abolished the chanting of the Qiddush in the house of worship, while others retained it as an act of public sanctification of the Sabbath. Scriptural warrant for the Qiddush ceremony is found by the rabbis in Exodus 20.8, "Remember the Sabbath day and keep it holy," which the Talmud interprets as meaning "Remember it over wine" (Pes. 106a). The Qiddush consists of two benedictions: one for the wine (or bread) and one for the Sabbath or festival. The rabbis of the Mishnah differed as to which should be recited first, but Hillel's view that the blessing over wine takes precedence prevailed. In the Qiddush for Friday evening it is customary to recite the account of the Sabbath of Creation (Gn. 2.1–3) before making the blessing. It was formerly omitted in Reform liturgies but has now been widely reintroduced, though generally without the references to the chosen people. On festivals (except for the last days of Pesah), the *She-Heḥeyanu blessing is recited at the conclusion of the evening Qiddush. The Qiddush chanted after the morning service on Sabbaths or festival days is called Qedushah Rabbah (the Great Qiddush), as it may be recited over all kinds of drink and not necessarily wine. It contains no benediction apart from the one recited over wine (or other drink) and is preceded by appropriate Bible passages (on Sabbath, Ex. 20.8–11; on the Shalosh Regalim, Lv. 23.44; and on Ro'sh ha-Shanah, Ps. 81.4–5).

QIDDUSHIN (קידושין; Betrothal), last tractate of Mishnah order Nashim, consisting of four chapters, with related material in the Tosefta' and both Talmuds. *Betrothal, called qiddushin (sanctification) in rabbinic sources, corresponds to the biblical term erus (e.g., Dt. 22.23) and constitutes the first of the two stages of marriage. Following qiddushin, the betrothed woman is consecrated to her husband, and adultery is strictly forbidden; however, she continues to live in her father's household and mutual marital rights do not commence until formalized by the nissu'in, which marks the entry of the bride into the home of her husband. Betrothal is formalized by an act of acquisition, which grants the husband exclusive conjugal rights, and betrothal is first among a list of forms of acquisition that formalize a spectrum of relationships ranging from marriage to property transfer to the consecration of holy objects. Qiddushin emphasizes the need for honesty and mutual understanding in the act of betrothal, as well as the central role of a stable family structure in ensuring the building of an enduring and sanctified society.

The Talmud Bavli tractate was translated into English by H. Freedman in the Soncino Talmud (London, 1936).

QIDDUSH LEVANAH (קידוש לַבְּנֵי הַיָּרֵךְ; Sanctification of the Moon), blessing recited during the period of the moon's waxing following *Ro'sh Hodesh (but not before three nights have elapsed). The regular reappearance of the new moon is regarded as one of those benefits for which praise and thanksgiving should be given to God. A Talmudic passage (San. 42a) and a baraiyya' (Soferim 20.1–2) contain the text of the relevant blessing together with the regulations. Differences in custom exist, but the most prevalent tradition is that the Qiddush Levanah is recited by a minyan in the synagogue courtyard on the Saturday night prior to the tenth day of the lunar month, providing the crescent is visible. Because of its joyous nature, the blessing is not recited in the month of Tishrei prior to Yom Kippur or in Av before Tish'ah be-'Av. The Talmud (R. ha-Sh. 25a) relates that R. *Yehudah ha-Nasi' instructed R. *Ḥiyya' to determine the date of the new moon and to say "David, king of Israel is alive and exists." This phrase, with its undertones of hope for the coming of the Messiah, has therefore been incorporated into the Qiddush Levanah prayers. The benediction (Birkat ha-Levanah) emphasizes renewal in nature, which is symbolic of Israel's renewal and redemption. In prayer books, the text of the ceremony was printed in large letters so that they could be read by moonlight, and large print became known as Qiddush Levanah letters. In some communities the text was affixed to the outer wall of the synagogue.

QINAH (קִּינָה; lament), elegy recited in biblical and Talmudic times upon the death of an individual (for example, David's qinah for Saul and Jonathan, 2 Sm. 1.17ff.), or upon a national catastrophe (Jeremiah's lament upon the destruction of the First Temple and the deportation of Jews to Babylonia). The Book of Lamentations is referred to as Qinot in the Talmud (B. B. 14b). In geonic times, special seliḥot* (i.e., prayers of a penitential character) were composed in Babylon for Tish'ah be-'Av, then a day devoted largely to penitence; these resembled the qinot of El'azar *Kallir, probably the first poet to use the term qinot, which was later applied specifically to the piyyutim for Tish'ah be-'Av. Many qinot about tragic historical events (for example, the massacres of whole Jewish communities during the Crusades, the persecutions in Spain in 1391, the Chmielnicki massacres of 1648, and the Baghdad pogrom of 1941) were composed by Ashkenazi and Sephardi poets, and some of them found a permanent place in the liturgy. All Yom Kippur rites incorporate the qinot on the *Ten Martyrs of the Hadrianic persecutions. The elegies on Zion by *Yehudah ha-Levi represent a special type of qinah, known as Tsiyyoniyyot after their first word Tsiyyon (Zion), which express yearning for Zion and the hope of redemption. Ashkenazi qinot were first published in Kraków in 1585; a scientific edition by Daniel Goldschmidt was published in 1968. The qinot of the Sephardi Jews and 'Adot ha-Mizraḥ appeared in Seder Arba' Ta'aniyyot (Venice, 1590), in the Yemenite prayer book (Tiklal), and elsewhere. In modern times, qinot have been written in memory of the Holocaust.

QINNIM (קִנִּים; Birds' Nests), last tractate, consisting of three chapters, in Mishnah order Qodashim; it has no parallel in the Tosefta and no gemara in either Talmud. Biblical law requires a sacrificial offering of a "nest," consisting of two pigeons or two turtledoves, as a purification offering after childbirth (Lv. 12.8) or as atonement by the poor for certain offenses (enumerated in Lv. 5) for which they cannot afford the more expensive sin offering (Lv. 5.11). Qinnim deals with intricate questions arising from cases, many of them highly theoretical, in which birds fly from nest to nest, creating confusion as to the identity and status of the birds residing in any given nest. Due to their complexity, the laws of Qinnim were considered a symbol of the highest level of Torah scholarship (Avot 3.23).

An English translation of the tractate by Herbert Danby is in The Mishnah (Oxford, 1933).

QINYAN. See ACQUISITION.

QIRQISANI, YAQUB (10th cent.), *Karaitic scholar and theologian. Very little is known of his life other than that he lived in Iraq. He was familiar with all branches of rabbinic literature and thoroughly acquainted with contemporary Arabic philosophical and scientific writings, and he established personal contacts with scholars of various faiths. His guiding principle was the absolute priority of reason, rational investigation being the key to understanding revelation. The influence of Kalam can be discerned in his writings, as well as that of other contemporary philosophical trends. His two major works are Kitab al-Anwar wa-al-Maraqib (edited by Leon Nemoy [1939–1943]), a systematic, erudite, and detailed code of Karaite law, which also contains a valuable survey of Jewish sects from the Samaritans and Sadducees to his time, a treatise on legal theory, discussions of Christianity and Islam, as well as excursions on various other nonlegal topics; and Kitab al-Riyad wa-al-Hada'iq, a commentary on the nonlegal sections of the Pentateuch (portions of the introduction on methods of biblical exegesis have been published, and much of the work is preserved in manuscript fragments). These works were completed by 937 or 938. His smaller works, most of which have not survived, include Tafsir Be-Re'shit, an extensive philosophical commentary on the story of creation; commentaries on Job and Ecclesiastes; a tract refuting Muḥammad's claim to prophecy; an essay on translation; and Kitab al-Tawḥid, on the principles of faith. His writing is characterized by moderation, and he frequently mentions varying opinions, quoting 'Anan ben David, Binyamin ben Mosheh Nahawendi, and Daniyye'l ben Mosheh al-Qumisi, as well as Rabbanite opponents such as Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on and Yaqub ben Efrayim.

QODASHIM (קֹדָשִׁים; Holy Things), fifth of the six orders of the Mishnah, dealing with sacrifice, ritual slaughter, and Temple procedure. In the Mishnah, Qodashim consists of eleven tractates: Zevahim*, Menahot*, Hullin*, Bekhorot*, Arakhin*, Temurah*, Keritot*, Me'ilah*, Tamid*, Middot*, and Qinnim*. Eight of these have related material in the Tosefta, and nine have gemara in the Talmud Bavli, but none has gemara in the Talmud Yerushalmi. In the late nineteenth century, an alleged Palestinian gemara to Qodashim was discovered but subsequently proved to be a forgery. Much of the material in the Mishnah of Qodashim is believed by scholars to belong to the most ancient strata of Mishnaic redaction, dating back to late Second Temple times.

QORBANOT (קִרְבָּנוֹת; sacrifices), the *sacrifices offered by the priests (kohanim) in the Temple of Jerusalem before its destruction in 70 CE. As a liturgical term, it refers to the second section of the *Shaharit (morning) service in the synagogue, in which, through appropriate biblical and rabbinic readings, the ancient rituals practiced in the Temple are reviewed. This is in accordance with a rabbinic teaching (Ber. 26b) that whoever studies the biblical and Talmudic passages governing the sacrificial cult is deemed to have actually brought the required offerings. Indeed, the hours fixed for the morning and afternoon services correspond to the time of the daily Temple sacrifices. Prayers enumerating the special sacrifices for Sabbaths and festivals are incorporated into the *Musaf (additional) service for these occasions, with the plea that God speedily restore the Temple so that the sacrifices ordained in the Torah can be reinstated. Reform Judaism has removed all references to the sacrificial cult from its prayer books. The Conservative prayer book has recast the prayers for the restoration of the sacrifices into a recapitulation of ancient practice and substitutes readings on Jewish ethics for the qorbanot section of the morning service.

QUERIDO, YA'AQOV (c.1650–1690), a radical Shabbatean leader in his native Salonika. The son of R. Yosef Filosof, a respected rabbi and follower of *Shabbetai Tsevi, he became known as Querido (the beloved). His sister was married to Shabbetai Tsevi, and after his death in Albania in 1676 she returned to Salonika, joining her brother. In 1683 Querido, supported by his father, R. Shelomoh Florentin, and others, led a mass apostasy in Salonika. Together with the believers who had apostatized earlier under Shabbetai Tsevi's influence, they formed the nucleus of the *Dönmeh sect. Querido was given the Turkish name Abdullah Yacoub. Because of his despotic leadership several dissensions occurred within the sect. In 1688 he made a pilgrimage to Mecca and died soon after in Egypt. His followers, who were called Jacobites, attributed to him a divine character.

QULLA'. See HUMRA'.

QUMISI, DANIYYE'L BEN MOSHEH AL- (c.840–900), *Karaites scholar. Born in the Persian province of Qumis, by 875 he was living in Jerusalem, where he became a leader of the *Avelei Tsiyyon. Qumisi was the first to formulate the classic Karaite ideology of biblicalism. Qumisi opposed the study of foreign (i.e., Greco-Arabic) philosophy, and Yaqub Qirqisani points out the contradiction between his opposition to the use of rational investigation and his own rationalistic tendencies. For example, Qumisi denied the existence of angels and interpreted them in the Bible as expressions of natural forces. His antagonism to theology also seems to be in tension with the Mu'tazili ideas found in his writings. He criticized the Rabbanite "shepherds of the Diaspora," blaming them for the prolongation of the exile, and decried the degeneration of the Jewish people resulting from the pursuit of worldly wealth and pleasures. In a circular letter sent to the Karaite communities in the Diaspora, he proposed, however, a program in which the Diaspora would send and support representatives in Jerusalem to live an ascetic life of mourning and prayer for redemption.

Qumisi wrote a number of biblical commentaries, including those on the Pentateuch, of which a number of fragments have been identified: the Minor Prophets (published as Pitron Sheneim 'Asar, edited by Isaac Markon [1958]), Psalms, Ecclesiastes, and Daniel (fragments of these have also been identified). A number of parallels between his commentaries and the Dead Sea Scrolls have been pointed out, raising questions about possible connections between the Qumran sect and the early Karaites. In addition, he evidently wrote a legal code and possibly a book on the laws of inheritance. While all of the above were written in Hebrew, fragments of an Arabic theological work of his, Kitab Tafsir al-Tawhid, have been found and published (Moshe Zucker, 'Al Targum Rasag la-Torah [1959], pp. 176–182, 481–485), although it is possible that this is a later translation from the Hebrew.

QUMRAN, site on the western shore of the Dead Sea approximately nine miles south of Jericho and thirteen miles east of Jerusalem. Ruins on the marl terrace adjacent to the Wadi Qumran were first excavated by Roland de Vaux. He found five main phases of occupation: an Iron II Israelite phase, identified with the biblical "City of Salt" (Jos. 15.61–62); three phases of occupation, Periods 1a, 1b, and 2, beginning in the mid-second century BCE and ending in the mid-first century CE, the remains of which included communal buildings of a self-contained Jewish group numbering between 150 and 200 (the adjacent cemeteries from the same periods contain about a thousand graves); and the final phase, a temporary Roman army camp from the time of the Jewish Revolt (66–70). The main phases of occupation show an extensive water system, an industrial complex including a pottery kiln and stables, communal rooms, a watchtower, and a wall surrounding the complex. There was a satellite farming community at the oasis of 'Ein Feshka, two miles to the south. Most scholars accept that the scrolls found in eleven caves in the vicinity of Qumran (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS) belonged to the inhabitants of the site, although doubts have been raised. The latest interpretations of the material evidence suggest several new possibilities: that Period 1a was a "rustic villa," succeeded by the communal settlement; that the site was a "rustic villa" with no connection to the scrolls; or that it was a commercial way station between the Dead Sea and Jerusalem, again with no connection to the scrolls.

QUMRAN COMMUNITY, a group living at the site of Khirbat *Qumran, on the western shore of the Dead Sea, between approximately 150 BCE and 68 CE, when the site was destroyed by the Romans during the Great Revolt. The site is connected with the caches of scrolls discovered in the Judean wilderness beginning in 1947 known as the *Dead Sea Scrolls. It has been generally accepted that the group living at Qumran owned the scrolls found in caves 1 through 11 and that they may have written or copied many of them.

Three texts from the Dead Sea Scrolls are pivotal for determining the identity of the community: the Rule of the Community*, the Damascus Document*, and 4Q Miqtsat Ma'asei ha-Torah*. The Rule of the Community, written between approximately 150 and 100 BCE, prescribes, for the leaders of the group, the regulations for a distinct community of Jews. These regulations involve a three-year period of probation for the new member, a zealous concern for purity, a strict hierarchy of membership led by *Zadokite priests, participation in communal meals, continual communal study and prayer, and property held in common. The aim of these statutes was the separation of the members of the community from "the men of iniquity" around them, so that the community would become the true people of Israel, prepared for the coming end of days. The Damascus Document, originally discovered in the Cairo Genizah in the nineteenth century and later found in multiple copies in Cave 4, contains an exhortation (probably by a leader of the community) that gives the history and purpose of the community, followed by a list of statutes. While the Damascus Document differs in some particulars from the Rule of the Community, it also envisages self-contained communities living in camps throughout Judea. There is a distinct concern with purity and the correct observation of biblical commandments (e.g., the Sabbath). The exact relationship between the two documents is still unclear, although it seems probable that they are describing two different types of settlement, but belonging to the same general movement, particularly since the Cave 4 fragments of the Damascus Document contain a form of the ritual for the Feast of the Renewal of the Covenant, which is closely connected with the initiation ritual of the Rule of the Community. The Qumran community, with its satellite settlement at 'Ein Feshka, was probably largely self-contained and isolated. This evidence has led to the major hypothesis that the Qumran community was a settlement of *Essenes, one of the three major groups of Jews in the Second Temple period, as described by Josephus, Philo, and the Roman historian Pliny the Elder. Josephus describes the Essenes as a sect that held their goods in common, kept strict rules of purity, required a period of probation for new members, and spent much time in study and prayer. Josephus also claims that the Essenes worshiped the sun; the Qumran scrolls make it clear that the community followed a solar calendar. Philo's description of the Essenes agrees in most points with Josephus. Pliny describes a community of Essenes that is located at a place that fits the physical description of Khirbat Qumran remarkably well. Although there are areas of disagreement between the ancient writers and the scrolls, a good example being the question of celibacy, the agreements are far-reaching enough to make the identity of the Qumran community as Essene very plausible.

Although the general consensus of scholarly opinion has accepted the Essene hypothesis, new evidence has come to light that suggests that the Qumran group were proto-*Sadducees. This is based on the fact that several of the legal interpretations espoused in 4Q Miqtsat Ma'asei ha-Torah, a text found in multiple copies in Cave 4, resemble positions described as Sadducean in the Mishnah, while the description of the opinions of the opposition group resembles that of the Pharisees. Further evidence for this position is adduced from the fact that the community's favorite name for itself is "sons of Zadok," the name from which the later term Sadducee is derived. However, 4Q Miqtsat Ma'asei ha-Torah, like other Qumran documents, also contains a solar calendar, which makes the link to the Jerusalem Sadducees, the opponents of the Pharisees in the Mishnah, questionable, since the Jerusalem hierarchy followed a lunar calendar. Earlier identification theories of the inhabitants of Qumran as Zealots or Christians have subsequently been rejected.

Others would question the identification of the inhabitants of Qumran as sectarian at all. Recent reassessments of the archeological evidence have led some to the conclusion that the site of Qumran was not an isolated communal settlement but a rustic villa or a commercial way station, with no particular connection to the scrolls found in the surrounding caves. However, this position ignores the peculiar aspects of the site of Qumran, such as the extremely large cemetery (over 1,000 graves) and the ritually buried animal bones scattered throughout the site, as well as the fact that the major scroll cave, Cave 4, lies within hundreds of feet of the site.

QUNTERES, term of uncertain etymology used in medieval sources for a register or notebook. Its most common application is by the tosafists, who invariably refer to *Rashi's commentary on the Talmud by that name. Consequently Leopold *Zunz inferred that Rashi's commentary was in the form of "lecture notebooks."

QUORUM. See MINYAN.

QUPPAH (קופה; poor box), box to which contributions were made on joyful as well as solemn occasions and at weekday prayer services. The distribution of the money—generally made on Fridays—was supervised by a group of overseers. The word quppah came to refer to general relief, whereas its companion word in the Talmud, tamhui (dish) referred to aid offered in the form of prepared food, a type of soup kitchen. The overseers fixed the amount to be raised by the community, and each member—man, woman, and child—was expected to contribute according to his or her means. Even the poor themselves were taxed, as they, too, were obligated to fulfill the commandment of charity. A dignified method of disbursing charity to those during the week of mourning was used in Frankfurt, where a quppah filled with money would be left at the mourner's home. Those visiting the mourner who needed money for that week were free to take whatever they needed, while those who did not need such aid would leave money in the quppah. Among Ashkenazi Jews the quppah is known by the Yiddish term pushka.

QUR'AN (Arab.; Reading), the holy scripture of *Islam. The Qur'an consists of the utterances of *Muhammad; a standard version of the text was edited on the authority of 'Uthman ibn 'Affan, third Muslim caliph, in the mid-seventh century, approximately nineteen years after the prophet Muhammad's death. According to Muslim belief, the Qur'an, as divinely revealed to Muhammad, is an exact replica of a heavenly prototype; other holy books, revealed by earlier prophets (e.g., Moses and Jesus), carried essentially the same message as the Qur'an, but their text and teaching had been corrupted. Nevertheless, people possessing such scriptures (peoples of the book) were to be treated differently from pagans. Muslims consider Muhammad to be the last in a series of prophets sent by God, and he supersedes them all. The Qur'an is divided into 114 suras or chapters, arranged according to their length (from 286 to 3 sentences), with the exception of the first sura, which stands alone. Muslim veneration of the Qur'an and the practice of reading it at Friday assemblies and other religious holidays is similar to Jewish practice. In Muslim theology, the Qur'an is one of two sources of authority; it represents the written law but is supplemented by tradition (hadith), that is, reliable testimonies of what Muhammad said or did on certain occasions. The Qur'an contains much biblical and aggadic material, frequently in garbled form because of misunderstandings and errors on the part of either Muhammad or his informants. Sarcastic criticism of his errors contributed much to Muhammad's increasing hostility toward Jews. Many biblical heroes figure prominently in the Qur'an, including Adam, Noah, Abraham, Ishmael, Lot, Joseph, Saul, David, Solomon, Elijah, Job, and Jonah. Moses' name appears in thirty-four suras. Modern scholars have made detailed studies tracing some of the Quranic references back to their Jewish sources. Some formulations in Maimonides' *Thirteen Principles of Faith (e.g., that Moses is the greatest of all prophets, and that the Torah as extant is the one given to Moses and that it will never be superseded) are said to have been directed against Muslim claims regarding the Qur'an.

RA'AYA' MEHEIMANA' (Aram.; ܪܝܝܐ ܡܚܝܡܢܐ; faithful shepherd), the appellation of Moses in kabbalistic literature, especially in the Zohar, based on a Midrashic legend according to which Moses' devotion to his flock of sheep (cf. Ex. 3.1) made him God's choice for the shepherd of Israel. The term is also used as the title of a mystical work by an anonymous Spanish kabbalist written toward the end of the thirteenth century and subsequently incorporated into the Zohar. The work is in the form of a conversation between Moses, the prophet Elijah, and Shim'on bar Yoḥ'ai.

RABBAH BAR NAḤMANI (died c.321), Babylonian *amora'; head of the *Pumbedita academy for twenty-two years. Under his direction the academy flourished, reaching a steady student population of four hundred (Ket. 106a); this number did not include the hundreds of additional students who came on special occasions (B. M. 86a). Although his legal interpretations tended to be severe, he was, nonetheless, a popular teacher and attracted many pupils (including *Abbaye and *Rava'). His halakhic views are often quoted in the Talmud, as are his legal disputes with his colleague R. *Yosef ben Ḥiyya'. Rabbah bar Naḥmani was a poor man who lived a life of great piety. Legend has it that at the time of his death, at about age forty, he was discussing a certain issue and ruled, "Pure, pure," at which time a heavenly voice announced, "Blessed are you Rabbah bar Naḥmani whose body is pure and . . . [whose] soul departs in purity" (B. M. 86a).

RABBAN (רַבָּן; our master), title of honor. No titles of this nature were used in ancient times (thus, great sages such as Hillel and Shamm'ai were never given any such appellation), but in the Mishnaic period, rabbān, which is a variant form of the more common rabbi, was applied honorifically to leading scholars and more particularly to presidents of the Sanhedrin. The first person to be given this title was Rabban *Gamli'el the Elder.

RABBANITES, followers of the rabbinical tradition. The term was first applied to adherents of the oral law and rabbinic Judaism in the tenth century by the *Karaites, who employed the term in a contemptuous sense to designate the partisans of rabbinic tradition as opposed to a purely scripture-based Judaism.

RABBI AND RABBINATE. Rabbi (my master) is an honorific term that was originally used in Erets Yisra'el to address sages, but it has gradually developed into a title for any person qualified to render decisions on Jewish law. The word rav*, from which rabbi is derived, means great or distinguished in Biblical Hebrew and was later used to mean master. The conferring of *ordination was restricted to Erets Yisra'el, where it was curtailed in the fourth century, but a limited authorization (hattarat hora'ah [permission to teach]) was subsequently introduced (San. 5a; Ket. 79a). At a later period, it was decreed that a candidate for the office of rabbi must sit for an examination in Talmud and codes. The formal conferment of a morenu* diploma was first introduced in Germany in the fourteenth century; it entitled the recipient to act as a rabbinical dayyan* (judge). Only men steeped in Talmud and rabbinic literature after many years of intensive study were admitted to full rabbinic honors. The examination of candidates for the rabbinate was administered by yeshivot (see YESHIVAH) or by individual rabbis of repute and could bear on any subject in the Talmud and codes. In the nineteenth century, *rabbinical seminaries and special theological institutions for the training of rabbis were founded in western Europe and America. Many of these added a body of secular studies to the traditional rabbinical requirements.

Until medieval times, rabbis received no salary from their congregations, in accordance with the Mishnaic law that prohibits deriving any income or benefits from the Torah. Thus, rabbis always had private occupations—artisan, doctor, farmer, or even laborer. As the demands on rabbis' time increased, they were permitted to obtain financial remuneration in lieu of the money they might have earned had they had the time to engage in a different occupation. This was referred to as sekhar battalah (wages for being idled [from another occupation]). This situation changed during the Middle Ages, especially after the persecutions in Spain (14th-15th cent.); the refugee rabbis who fled to countries of asylum found little opportunity for making an outside living, and at the same time, new communities of exiles needed full-time professional rabbis to minister to them. Some rabbis achieved international reputation and authority beyond the limits of their own communities. The responso* that they sent to correspondents often formed a link between the scattered communities of Jews in many parts of the world, and unity was also strengthened by rabbinic codifications of Jewish law and custom. Rabbinical synods established unified norms on many important problems, such as monogamy, inheritance, and marriage and divorce, and promulgated laws against informers. In matters such as the administration of communities (see COMMUNITY) and their relations with the civil authorities, the rabbinate acted in concert with (and was to some extent subject to) the lay leadership. Often the election of a rabbi was subject to confirmation by the civil authorities. In Poland, during the reign of King Sigismund I (r. 1506–1548), the rabbi was confirmed by the king and was, in a sense, an agent of the crown, collecting the poll tax and enjoying large powers of civil and criminal jurisdiction. Outside interference, however, was strongly resented (for example, Shim'on ben Tsemah Duran [see DURAN FAMILY] was elected rabbi in Algiers on the express condition that he forgo the custom of seeking ratification of his appointment from the government). In spite of external influence, the internal management of Jewish communities was largely left to the Jews themselves. Very often the rabbinic courts were permitted to try even criminal cases in which only Jews were involved. The main duties of a rabbi lay in deciding Jewish legal questions, acting as judge in civil and criminal cases, forming a beit din (rabbinical court), and supervising religious institutions such as ritual slaughter and ritual baths. Some rabbis also acted as the head of local Talmudic academies. Until the nineteenth century, preaching was of secondary importance; the rabbi usually preached only on Shabbat ha-Gadol (the Sabbath before Pesah), Shabbat Shuvah (the Sabbath before Yom Kippur), and during the months of Elul and Adar. In certain Middle Eastern countries, the rabbi was known as marbits Torah* or hakham*. The Hasidic master (tsaddiq) was often referred to as rebbe (Yi. of rabbi) even if he did not have formal rabbinic ordination. His rabbinate consisted of charismatic leadership of his community, exemplary personal piety, spiritual teaching, and a special concern for healing.

In modern times, rabbinical emphasis has changed. The rabbi is a communal official whose duties include not only religious activities (in which preaching and public speaking play an important part) but also embrace educational, pastoral, social, and interfaith activities; not all modern rabbis are trained as dayyanim, that is, able to render decisions in matters of rabbinical law. It has been argued that the modern rabbi, especially outside of Orthodoxy, owes more to the model of Hasidic rebbe than to that of the classical rav. Particularly in North America, it is spiritual leadership and traits of personality that define the rabbinate rather than the legal authority that derives from Talmudic learning. In imitation of Protestant practice, preaching (hitherto the task not of the rabbi but of the maggid*) became more central, as evidenced by the American use of the word pulpit for rabbinical office. In the British Commonwealth, the term minister is used for a person who is allowed to carry out the traditional functions of a rabbi. Since the Middle Ages, chief rabbis (see CHIEF RABBINATE) have been appointed with jurisdiction over countries or regions. In czarist Russia, the government appointed government rabbis (kazyonny ravvin*), individuals with little or no rabbinical knowledge, to regulate communal life. The training and manner of ordination of rabbis vary according to the character (rabbinical seminary, yeshivah) and affiliation (Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, Reconstructionist) of the institution of study. Judaism does not in any way regard the rabbi as being a Jew's intermediary or surrogate between him- or herself and God. Jewish law demands no less of the layperson than it demands of the rabbi. While the title of rabbi has throughout the ages been reserved for males, the Conservative, Reform, and Reconstructionist bodies now ordain women as rabbis*. In Israel, Orthodox rabbis are salaried by the state for their official duties, such as serving as marriage registrars and kashrut supervisors.

RABBINICAL ALLIANCE OF AMERICA (Igud Horabbonim), an organization of Orthodox rabbis. The Rabbinical Alliance abides by the "Das Torah" pronouncements and guidance of the Gedolei Torah, many of whom are official members. Igud Horabbonim was founded in 1942 in New York City and is dedicated to furthering the study of Torah and fostering the observance of strict Torah Judaism. Membership in the Rabbinical Alliance (now numbering approx. 600) is available to any rabbi of good standing who has been ordained with traditional semikhah from a recognized yeshivah or Orthodox synagogue, or one who is involved in a kindred field of Jewish education or other allied field of endeavor.

RABBINICAL ASSEMBLY, the rabbinical arm of the Conservative movement (see CONSERVATIVE JUDAISM). Organized in 1901, it has approximately twelve hundred members, about two-thirds of whom are graduates of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America*. Women have been admitted since 1985, and there are more than fifty women rabbis in the assembly today. The assembly is responsible for placing rabbis in suitable congregations. Various committees of the Rabbinical Assembly deal with such matters as social action, education, prayer and worship, and family ethics; its law committee serves in an advisory capacity to assembly members on issues of Jewish law and synagogue practice; and its Commission on Human Sexuality issued a pastoral letter on intimate relations dealing with heterosexual and homosexual relations. The assembly publishes the quarterly Conservative Judaism and other educational and scholarly materials, as well as prayer books (such as Siddur Sim Shalom [1989]).

RABBINICAL CONFERENCES. With the establishment of *Reform Judaism during the first half of the nineteenth century in Germany, its advocates felt the need to lay down the principles of the new movement and to establish a uniform policy with regard to departures from the accepted norms. The first of the Reform rabbinical conferences (which differed from medieval synods in that they were confined solely to rabbis) was the Brunswick Conference held in 1844; it concerned itself mainly with matters that might impair Jewish-Christian relations, for example, the *Kol Nidrei prayer, the Jewish oath (see VOWS AND OATHS), and the prohibition against *intermarriage. The rabbis agreed to permit intermarriage, providing any resulting children were raised as Jews. This conference was followed by one in Frankfurt am Main the following year (at which such radical innovations as the use of *organs, the introduction of the vernacular into the service, the abolition of any mention in prayers of the restoration of a Jewish state, and the triennial cycle of scriptural readings were adopted) and the Breslau conference in 1846 (which authorized congregations to abolish the second day of every festival except Ro'sh ha-Shanah and the traditional signs of *mourning, which were said to be "repulsive to religious feeling"). The first conferences of American Reform rabbis were held in Philadelphia in 1869 and Pittsburgh in 1885. It was at the Philadelphia conference that the traditional belief in the restoration of a Jewish state was formally renounced; the principle was affirmed that the Diaspora, far from being a punishment for sin, was in accordance with the divine will and essential to the "Jewish mission"; and all the laws applying to *priesthood were abolished. The *Pittsburgh platform, while reiterating many points of the Philadelphia conference, also permitted the holding of weekly services on Sunday rather than on Saturday, when "the necessity for such services appears or is felt." In 1937 at the Columbus conference (see COLUMBUS PLATFORM), the Reform rabbinate reversed itself on a number of points, such as the use of Hebrew in services, and came out in support of *Zionism. Since the beginning of the twentieth century, the different religious groups in the United States—Orthodox, Conservative, and Reform—have convened annual rabbinic conferences; Reconstructionist rabbis have followed suit. In recent years, at the initiative of the chief rabbi of Great Britain, several conferences of Orthodox European chief rabbis have been convened. See also COUNCILS AND SYNODS.

RABBINICAL COUNCIL OF AMERICA, a professional organization founded in 1936 in New York City and serving about one thousand Orthodox rabbis in the United States, Canada, Israel, and elsewhere. Membership is comprised of ordained rabbis who serve as congregational rabbis, Jewish educators, chaplains, and other allied positions within the Jewish community.

While many members received their ordination from New York's Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary (affiliated with *Yeshiva University) and Bet Midrash Letorah (affiliated with *Hebrew Theological College), a large number were ordained by other major yeshivot and by recognized rabbinic authorities.

The Rabbinical Council of America is a voice for Orthodoxy on the national and international level. It sponsors conferences and disseminates information on various issues, as well as working to protect the interests of the Orthodox community. One of its primary goals is to generate Jewish continuity, learning, and life by promoting widespread knowledge and study of Torah and by encouraging observance of Torah Judaism. The Rabbinical Council serves as the rabbinic authority of the Joint Kashrut Commission together with the *Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations. Its affiliate, the Beth Din of America, services the membership and the community by both administering and processing Jewish divorce and other documents of personal status, and by adjudicating and arbitrating civil litigation, as well as offering legal guidance. The Rabbinical Council maintains a Vaad Halakha which guides the organization and its members on halakhic issues. The Rabbinical Council also publishes Tradition, an academic journal of Orthodox Jewish thought in English, and Hadarom, a Hebrew halakhic periodical. The Rabbinical Council of America is committed to the ideals of *Religious Zionism and supports two institutions of study in Israel: Yeshivat Hadarom in Rehovot and Yeshivat Aḥuzat Ya'akov in Gan Yavneh. It also sponsors programs and study groups for Israeli soldiers.

RABBINICAL SEMINARIES, institutions for training rabbis that combine traditional education with modern scholarly methodology (see WISSENSCHAFT DES JUDENTUMS). Yeshivot (see YESHIVAH) granted rabbinical *ordination after an intensive course solely of Talmudic and halakhic study. However, by the 1820s, a combination of circumstances—notably Jewish *emancipation and the *Haskalah—had changed attitudes toward the rabbinate's function in modern society in central and western Europe. Worshipers, even many of the devoutly observant, now sought a more broadly educated type of rabbi, who could preach in the vernacular and tackle the growing drift away from Judaism. They felt that a yeshivah education was no longer sufficient and therefore began to develop the rabbinical seminary, in which graduates could acquire a university degree as well as a rabbinical diploma. This move aroused bitter opposition among traditionalists in central and eastern Europe.

Elsewhere, however, the charge that these seminaries promoted heresy and assimilation was at first harder to justify. Italy's *Collegio Rabbinico Italiano, founded in 1829, and the *Séminaire Israélite de France were traditionalist. *Jews' College, established in 1855 in London by Nathan Marcus Adler (see ADLER FAMILY), reflected *Neo-Orthodoxy. The *Breslau Rabbinical Seminary, opened in 1854 and headed by Zacharias *Frankel, steered a course between Orthodox and *Reform Judaism, imbuing its students with a positive-historical approach to Jewish tradition. The leaders of Germany's two opposing camps, Samson Raphael *Hirsch (Neo-Orthodox) and Abraham *Geiger (Reform), each criticized Frankel's moderation. Thus, when Geiger's campaign led to the establishment of the *Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums in Berlin in 1872, Ezriel *Hildesheimer promptly founded his *Berlin Rabbinical Seminary in 1873. There were also vehement objections to the *Budapest Rabbinical Seminary, founded by exponents of Hungarian *Neology in 1877, although it soon proved much more conservative than the Berlin Hochschule. Vienna's *Israelitisch-Theologische Lehranstalt, began in 1893, followed the traditionally moderate Austrian line.

Established in 1875 before Orthodox Jews from eastern Europe brought the first yeshivot to America, Hebrew Union College (HUC, see HEBREW UNION COLLEGE-JEWISH INSTITUTE OF RELIGION) in Cincinnati was planned by Isaac Mayer *Wise to train all rabbis in the United States, but it became a radical Reform institution. Opponents founded the *Jewish Theological Seminary of America (JTS) in New York in 1887, which Solomon *Schechter reorganized and turned into a bulwark of *Conservative Judaism on the Breslau pattern. Orthodox Jews later founded the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary in 1897, out of which New York's *Yeshiva University (YU) later emerged. The twentieth century brought two new foundations in Warsaw, the Orthodox Tahkemoni Rabbinical Seminary in 1920 and the Conservative Makhon le-Madda'ei ha-Yahadut in 1928. Apart from Jews' College, however, only the Paris, Rome, and Budapest seminaries in Europe outlived Hitlerism.

Other rabbinical seminaries include the Orthodox *Hebrew Theological College of Skokie, Illinois, founded in 1922; the Jewish Institute of Religion in New York, begun in 1922 and combined with HUC in 1950; the Progressive (Liberal-Reform) *Leo Baeck College in London established in 1956; the Conservative *Seminario Rabínico Latinoamericano of Buenos Aires opened in 1962; and the *Reconstructionist Rabbinical College in Philadelphia founded in 1968. There are branches of all three major American seminaries (HUC-JIR, JTS [see UNIVERSITY OF JUDAISM], YU) in Los Angeles and Jerusalem. Breaking with JTS a group also established the Institute for Traditional Judaism in Mount Vernon, New York, in 1990.

Many of the world's leading Jewish scholars and periodicals have been associated with rabbinical seminaries.

RAB DE LA CORTE (Span.; court rabbi), title given to an official appointed by the crown in the Spanish provinces of Navarre and Castile. This position existed from the mid-thirteenth century to the expulsion of Jews from Spain in 1492. The position itself was, to a great extent, administrative, involving supervision of tax collection and tax distribution, although the rab de la corte also served as a type of "court of appeal" for Jews who had been involved in litigation before the rabbinic courts. The appointees were generally individuals who, due to their talents in fields such as medicine or art, were close to the monarchs; many of those appointed were men of little Jewish learning. The position of arraby moor* in Portugal was largely analogous to that of rab de la corte.

RABINOWITZ, REFA'EL NATAN (1835-1888), rabbinic scholar and bibliographer. Born in Novo-Zhagory, Lithuania, Rabinowitz spent many years in Munich, where he published fifteen volumes of a valuable, though incomplete, study of the Talmud, Diqduqei Soferim. Using an uncensored manuscript of the Talmud from 1342—the Hebrew Munich Codex 95 (Codex Hebraicus)—he studied the accuracy of printed editions of the Talmud and other manuscripts, listing existing discrepancies. An extensive introduction to this work, Ma'amar 'al Hadpasat ha-Talmud (Munich, 1877), describes various editions of the Talmud Bavli since the fifteenth century. In addition, Rabinowitz published numerous critical editions of older rabbinic works.

RABINOWITZ-TEOMIM, ELIYAHU DAVID (c.1843-1905), Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Jerusalem, known by the acronym Aderet. He was appointed rabbi of Ponevezh in 1874, of Mir in 1893, and of the Ashkenazi community of Jerusalem in 1901 as successor to Shemu'el Salant. An erudite scholar and prolific author of over one hundred works and contributor to numerous periodicals, Rabinowitz-Teomim was an activist communal leader, who united the fragmented Ashkenazi community, systematized its communal regulations, and established a single organization for shehitah (ritual slaughter). He was the father-in-law and mentor of Avraham Yits'haq Kook (see KOOK FAMILY). His autobiography, Seder Eliyyahu, appeared in Jerusalem in 1983.

RACHEL (Heb. Raḥel), the younger daughter of Rebekah's brother, Laban, and the co-wife (with Leah) of *Jacob; Rachel is regarded as the fourth *matriarch of the Jewish people. She was "of beautiful form and fair to look upon" (Gn. 29.17), and Jacob agreed to labor seven years for Laban to obtain her as a wife. However, by substituting Rachel's less comely sister, Leah, on the long-awaited wedding night, Laban was able to extort seven additional years of service from Jacob for Rachel's bride-price (Gn. 29.15-30). Though initially able to provide children (Dan and Naphtali) for Jacob only by means of her servant girl, Bilhah (Gn. 30.3-8), she eventually bore a son of her own, *Joseph (Gn. 30.22–24). When fleeing with her husband from Laban, she stole her father's household gods (teraphim*) and avoided detection by sitting on them and claiming to be having her period (Gn. 31.34–35). Rachel died giving birth to her second son, whom she named Ben-oni (Son of My Trouble), but who was renamed *Benjamin by his father. She was buried on the way to Bethlehem and her tomb marked with a pillar (Gn. 35.16–20). Jeremiah refers to her poetically as the anguished mother weeping for her sons who refuses to be comforted (Jer. 31.15). In the blessing bestowed on brides, she is named first before her elder sister (Ru. 4.11). A tomb near Bethlehem was mentioned in early Christian sources as that of Rachel. The first Jewish references date from the Middle Ages. The domed structure built over the tomb in the late eighteenth century became a favorite theme in Jewish artistic depictions of Jerusalem. It became an object of pilgrimage, and infertile women came to pray there in the hope that, like Rachel, they would eventually bear children.

RAIN. In Erets Yisra'el rain is seasonal; the early rains (yoreh) fall in Heshvan (around October), and the late rains (malqosh) come to an end during Nisan (around April). Rain that falls out of season or with undue force is considered harmful (Ez. 13.13), while that which falls in good quantity and at the expected time is called a blessing (Ez. 34.26). An abundance or, conversely, a lack of rain is considered to be a divine means of reward or punishment for the people of Israel, because the "keys of rain" have been retained by the Almighty to chasten man and cause him to repent (Dt. 28.12). Both unseasonal rain (1 Sm. 12.18ff.) and drought (1 Kgs. 17) are invoked by the prophets as signs of God's displeasure. The formula *Mashiv ha-Ruah u-Morid ha-Geshem, a supplication for the blessing of rain and recognition of God's instrumentality in the bestowal of this blessing, is included in the daily service during the winter months. The festival of Sukkot and its practices are particularly associated with rain and *water (see SIMḤAT BEIT HA-SHO'EVAH), and the additional service for Shemini 'Atseret, called Geshem (rain), opens with a petition for rain that is timed in accordance with the seasons of Erets Yisra'el (see TEFILLAT GESHEM). A series of special services and fasts, varying in intensity with the progression of a drought, are inaugurated if the rains fail to arrive in due season. The Talmudic tractate Ta'anit is devoted to the description of these services and the regulations governing the fasts.

RAINBOW. According to Genesis 9.12–17, the arc containing the colors of the spectrum that appeared after the *Flood was placed there by God as a sign of his covenant, that is, his promise, never again to destroy mankind. Every rainbow thereafter would serve to remind God of this pledge. The Bible calls the arc God's "bow." The arc resembles a warrior's bow; by "hanging up" his bow, God undertakes never again to "make war" against mankind. Later interpreters, uncomfortable with the idea that God needed reminders, preferred to view the rainbow as a sign for humanity of God's resolve to ensure the survival of his creations. Upon seeing a rainbow, a Jew recites a blessing praising God "... who remembers his covenant, is faithful to his covenant, and keeps his promise."

RANSOM (Heb. kofer, pidyon). The Bible explicitly prohibits the taking of ransom (blood money) in the case of murder (Nm. 35.31–32), and the only trace of the ancient legal institution of ransom in Jewish law is the indemnification paid by the owner of an ox that has killed a man by goring (Ex. 21.30). At the taking of the *census, each individual was to give "a ransom for his soul unto the Lord ... a half shekel" (Ex. 30.12). The ransoming of *captives (pidyon shevuyyim) played an important part in Jewish history both in Talmudic times and during the Middle Ages and was considered a supreme duty of charity. Almost every Jewish community had a fund for ransoming captives. The term pidyon is also used for the "redeeming" of the firstborn (see FIRSTBORN, REDEMPTION OF THE).

RAPE, nonconsensual sexual intercourse with a woman. When it occurs in a secluded place where screams for help would not normally be answered, no additional evidence is needed to prove the woman's innocence. If the sexual activity occurred in a public place where the woman's cries for help would normally be answered, and she did not cry out, it is assumed that she too is culpable for the sexual activity (Dt. 22.25) and that no rape occurred. According to Talmudic law, a woman who is asleep when the act takes place is presumed to have been violated. Furthermore, if intercourse began forcibly but became consensual, it is still regarded as a violation. According to biblical law, a man who rapes a woman who is not betrothed is obligated to pay a fine of fifty shekels as well as marry her without the possibility of divorce (had the woman been betrothed, the perpetrator would be subject to death; Dt. 22.25–29). The rabbis explain that the woman need not marry the man if she, or her father, does not desire the marriage. However, even in such a case the perpetrator is obligated to pay the fine. According to the majority rabbinic opinion, the Deuteronomic law only refers to a girl under the age of twelve and a half. Older women who have been raped are compensated for humiliation and physical and mental anguish. A married woman who is raped is not prohibited to her husband unless he is a kohen, in which case he must divorce her.

RAPHAEL, archangel. Unlike *Michael, and Gabriel, Raphael is not mentioned in the Bible, but he figures prominently in both the Apocrypha (e.g., Tb. 12.11) and in kabbalistic literature. Together, Michael, Gabriel, *Uriel, and Raphael fulfill such functions as taking command of the four points of the camp of Israel and the four points of the compass, or standing to the right and left, above and below the heavenly choir, which sings the praises of God. More particularly, Raphael is the angel of healing (rafa' [healed] and El [God]) and was therefore identified by legend as one of the three angels who visited Abraham after he had circumcised himself (Yoma' 37a). RAPOPORT, HAYYIM HA-KOHEN (c.1700–1771), Polish rabbi and disputant. He was rabbi of Sluck and from 1740 of Lemberg (Lwów), where he served until his death. He engaged for many years in a dispute over his right to the income from the regional chief rabbinate of Lwów, in which, despite the support of the local authorities, he was unsuccessful. In 1759 he was the head of the Jewish delegation in the disputation with the Frankists (see FRANK, YA'AOOV) in Lwów cathedral. Though able to understand and read Polish, he engaged the services of Dov Ber from Bolechów, the Jewish memoir writer, as his scribe. His speech in refutation of the Frankists' seventh point, that Jews use human blood in the baking of matsot, has been preserved. In addition to exposing the Frankists' misrepresentation of Talmudic and other Jewish sources, he also quoted Christian authorities who denied the truth of such charges. Zekher Hayyim, a collection of his responsa, was published in Lemberg in 1865.

RAPOPORT, SHELOMOH YEHUDAH LEIB (1790–1867), known by the acronym Shir; one of the founders of modern Jewish studies (Wissenschaft des Judentums); rabbi in Tarnopol in 1837 but, owing to the opposition of the Hasidim, left after a year for Prague, where he became chief rabbi in 1840. Rapoport was a pioneer in applying the methods of modern scholarship to Jewish cultural history; his works include monographs on Jewish personalities (e.g., *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on, *Ha'i Ga'on, El'azar *Kallir) and the first (and only) volume of a projected Talmudic encyclopedia, Erekh Millin. Rapoport insisted on freedom of inquiry (thus arousing the bitter enmity of the ultra-Orthodox and the Hasidim) but opposed Reform Judaism and severely attacked the views of Abraham *Geiger.

RASHI (1040–1105), acronym for R. Shelomoh Yitsḥaqi (son of Isaac); the outstanding commentator on the Bible and Talmud. Rashi was born in Troyes in northern France. Factually, little is known of his early years, but legends abound.

Rashi grew up in an environment where Bible commentary and study of the Talmud were the chief subjects on the curriculum of Jewish scholars. After his early years of study in Troyes, Rashi became a traveling scholar, moving from one place to another to find the most distinguished teachers available. For some years he lived in Worms, where he studied and taught, and his reputation as a brilliant young teacher soon attracted disciples from all over Lorraine. Finally he moved back to Troyes, where he established his own academy. He served the community as a rabbinic judge, while devoting as much time as possible to teaching and writing. He supported himself by growing grapes and making wine.

Rashi wrote his commentary on the entire Bible, with the exception of the Book of Chronicles. Some have doubted his authorship of the commentaries on parts of the Book of Job, Ezra, and Nehemiah. His commentary is distinctive in a number of significant features. Generally, rabbinic commentaries on the Bible fall into two main classes: peshat (the plain meaning of the text) and derash (expounding the inner meanings, including mystical, ethical, and homiletical ones). Rashi stressed the peshat and provided meanings for all difficult words and phrases in the text. Rather than suggest forced interpretation, he occasionally admitted that he had no explanation. However, he also used derash, quoting rabbinic teachings from the Talmud and Midrash to enliven the biblical text. He explained that he used derash only when the peshat on its own failed to give a satisfactory meaning to the Bible (see his comment on Gn. 3.8), but in fact he often introduced derash even when the peshat alone was sufficient to make the biblical word or phrase perfectly intelligible. His work was criticized because of this use of derash. Even his grandson, *Shemu'el ben Me'ir (Rashbam) raised the point with his grandfather and says that Rashi acknowledged the justice of such criticism, observing that if he only had the time he would have written a different kind of commentary, concentrating only on the peshat (Rashbam's commentary on Gn. 37.2). However, much of Rashi's popularity over the ages can be attributed to the derash.

Rashi's Bible commentary has a unique blend of brevity and clarity. He only adds a comment when there is a question as to the meaning of the text and used the equivalent French translation for a difficult Hebrew word. These French words (1,000 in the Bible and 2,000 in the Talmud) are known as lo'azim (see LA'AZ) and have proved important for the study of Medieval French and its pronunciation.

Rashi was frequently referred to as the parshandata', that is, "the commentator" par excellence. His influence on the Jewish masses was, and still is, significant. The first Hebrew book to be printed was Rashi's commentary on the Pentateuch (without the Bible text) in Reggio de Calabria, Italy, in 1475. Afterward, the Pentateuch with his commentary became the first classical text in Jewish education. Over a hundred supercommentaries on Rashi's work have appeared in print. Rashi's influence even extended to Christian scholars, who frequently relied heavily on his explanations of biblical texts. Foremost among these was the Franciscan monk Nicholas de Lyra, who acknowledged his debt to Rashi and whose works influenced Martin Luther's scriptural translations as well as the leaders of the Reformation. An English translation of Rashi's commentary on the Pentateuch was published by M. Rosenbaum and A. N. Silbermann (5 vols. [1938]).

Rashi's commentary on the Talmud Bavli covered the entire work, with the exception of parts of two tractates (Makkot and Bava' Batra). As the Talmud is written in Aramaic, it was difficult for average students to read it, and the meaning of words and rabbinic phrases was often beyond their understanding; Rashi's commentary opened up this vast literature to them. Indeed, the fact that no similar commentary was written on the Talmud Yerushalmi meant that this work remained virtually unstudied for centuries. Unlike in his commentary on the Bible, Rashi saw no need to introduce derash into his Talmud commentary, and he concentrated entirely on exposing the plain meaning of the Talmudic text.

As in the case of his Bible commentary, Rashi's Talmud commentary also drew later scholars to interpret his explanations and conclusions. The first such scholars are known as tosafists (supplementary commentators), and their writings are therefore known as tosafot*. The first tosafist was Rashi's grandson *Ya'aqov ben Me'ir Tam. All of Rashi's grandsons were scholars, and their children were among the leading tosafists.

Rashi also wrote a number of responsa* on questions of religious law submitted to him by individuals and communities. It was due to the influence of Rashi and his school that Franco-Germany became a focus of Bible and Talmud study.

RASHI SCRIPT, the cursive script of Spanish Jews, a modification of the usual square Assyrian script designed to expedite writing. The het, gimel, and shin, for instance, are reduced by this script from two or three strokes to one each. When the first Hebrew book was printed—a Bible with *Rashi's commentary (Reggio de Calabria, 1475)—this script was selected as the model for the typeface used for the commentary, hence the name "Rashi script" (i.e., the script in which Rashi was first printed, not, as is commonly supposed, the script in which he wrote). It was frequently used in printing rabbinical works.

RATIONALISM, the view that reason, however defined, is the ultimate foundation of knowledge. Faith and reason were viewed as antithetical, and rationalism became synonymous with criticism of certain religious beliefs (e.g., revelation, miracles, the sacred character of scripture). Apologetics usually attempted to demonstrate by rational argument the reasonableness of religious doctrines if properly understood, or at least to deny that they contained anything inherently unreasonable. Medieval philosophy, in both its Neoplatonic and Aristotelian forms, held that the intellect (sekhel) was a human being's noblest faculty, the divine soul that made people the image of God and the means by which they could commune with God. This tradition maintained itself, at least terminologically, in mystical literature. In Medieval Hebrew, the biblical noun maskil (wise) could mean "philosopher" or "kabbalist," depending upon who used the term. In the great *Maimonidean Controversy (13th cent.), philosophical rationalism was said to lead to unbelief and even heresy. Rationalism was the watchword of eighteenth-century Enlightenment (rendered since c.1800 into the Hebrew word *Haskalah) as opposed to "obscurantism." According to twentieth-century German philosopher Hermann *Cohen, Judaism was the prototype of the "Religion of Reason," the assumed superiority of which was only challenged by the growing influence of existentialist trends.

RAV (רַב; great), a term used in Babylonia for those qualified for the office of rabbi. The term rabbi (my rav) was conferred only in Erets Yisra'el upon those who received *ordination and were authorized to judge penal cases. The title rav is still used in communities where Hebrew or Yiddish is spoken. —SHMUEL HIMELSTEIN

RAV (died c.248), the first Babylonian amora'; his full name was Abba' bar Aivu, and he was also called Abba' Arikha' (Abba' the Tall). He studied for many years with R. *Yehudah ha-Nasi' in Palestine, after which, in the year 219, he returned to Babylonia. His period of scholarly activity spanned the last generation of the tanna'im and the first generation of amora'im, and his status is sometimes considered to be equal to that of a tanna'. Some time after his return to Babylonia, he left *Nehardea, seat of his colleague *Shemu'el, to found the *academy at *Sura; it was the authority of the two men that ensured the independent status and prestige of the Babylonian academies. The Talmud reports many of the discussions of Rav and Shemu'el and ruled that in matters of ritual law Rav's opinion was to be followed. He also empowered the beit din to excommunicate any person refusing to answer its summons. Rav was a noted agadist, many of whose homilies dealt with ethical questions. Several prayers composed by him (e.g., *'Aleinu; Teqi'ata' de-Vei Rav, in the Ro'sh ha-Shanah Musaf service; and, together with Shemu'el, Va-Todi'enu) were included in the liturgy. He also expressed views on esoteric subjects, such as the names of God and *Ma'aseh Be-Re'shit. Rav has been called the father of Jewish learning in Babylonia. He was a person of great piety, but he did not advocate asceticism (Eruv. 54a). One of his memorable sayings is, "A person will be answerable to heaven for everything his eye saw that he did not eat [i.e., benefit from]" (Qid. end). Another of his famous aphorisms is, "The mitsvot were given to man to refine his soul" (Gn. Rab. 44a).

RAVA' (4th cent.), Babylonian amora' whose full name was Rava' (Rabbi Abba') ben Rabbi Yosef bar Hama'. He studied with Nahman bar Ya'aqov, R. Hisha' (whose daughter he married), and R. Yosef ben Hiyya'. Almost every page of the Talmud reports discussions between Rava' and his colleague *Abbayei, based on their profound knowledge of the oral law and great analytical powers. With six exceptions, the decision in each case is in accordance with the views of Rava'. He stressed the importance of study and also emphasized ethical conduct. He headed the academy at Maḥoza; after the death of Abbaye (in 340) the academy of Pumbedita merged with the academy at Maḥoza, and Rava' became the undisputed Talmudic authority in Babylonia until his death in 354. He placed great emphasis on learning the Torah, asserting that he who is engaged in Torah needs no burnt offering, no sin offering, and no guilt offering (Men. 110b) for the Torah will protect him from sin (B. B. 16a) and is like the elixir of life (Shab. 88b). He stressed the great need for intellectual honesty (Yoma' 72b) and was one of the leading Babylonian aggadists.

RAZA' RABBA', a secret book from the geonic period, known by both its Aramaic title, Raza' Rabba' (Great Secret), and its equivalent Hebrew title Sod ha-Gadol. It is mentioned in lists of mystical and magical works by the ge'onim, and it is probably the work mentioned by Petrus Alfonsi in the eleventh century as a Hebrew work on the Tetragrammaton, the Secreta secretorum (see GOD, NAMES OF). Many quotations from Raza' Rabba' are included in the commentary on the Shi'ur Qomah* by R. Mosheh ben Eli'ezer ha-Darshan, an Ashkenazi Hasidic writer, who was familiar with the Kabbalah and wrote at the end of the thirteenth century. Gershon Scholem, who discovered and analyzed these quotations, demonstrated that the Raza' Rabba' was one of the main sources of the Sefer ha-Bahir*, the earliest work of the Kabbalah. The work appears to have contained speculations concerning the structure of the Tetragrammaton, the names of archangels, and some magical material. The work may have been used by the thirteenth-century esoteric writer R. Elhanan ben Yaqar of London, in his treatise Sod ha-Sodot.

RAZIEL, the *angel entrusted with guarding or transmitting divine secrets. The name occurs in the Slavonic Apocalypse of Enoch, the Targum of Ecclesiastes 10.20, and the later pseudepigrapha, but is far less prominent than that of the archangels. Nevertheless, the book ascribed to Raziel (see SEFER RAZI'EL) played an important role in folklore and magic.

REAL ESTATE. Fixed property may be acquired by three means: purchase, presumptive right, or deed (see ACQUISITION). If intention is present, all movable property within the area of the real estate being transferred is automatically transferred at the same time without a separate qinyan; this is called agav. Real estate serves as security for a loan contracted by deed but not for one contracted verbally. No oath is taken on claims involving real estate, nor do the laws of the bailee apply to it. Unless the purchase price exceeds the value of the land by more than half, no claim of overcharging may be brought against the seller. Real estate cannot be stolen; hence, no matter how many times it may have been resold without permission of the owner and regardless of any improvements that have been made on it, it always reverts to the original owner. The "thief" is not reimbursed for such improvements, and he must indemnify the owner for any usufruct enjoyed. Land, or anything joined to it, cannot contract ritual impurity.

REBBI (Yi.; רַבִּי; rabbi), a title used for Hasidic leaders and spiritual guides. The rebbe or tsaddiq* is not necessarily a halakhic scholar or teacher—the position, in most cases, being hereditary—but guides his followers by the spiritual power and holiness thought to be inherent in him. The term is also used in yeshivot to denote those who teach the Talmud.

REBEKAH (Heb. Rivqah), wife of *Isaac, daughter of Bethuel (Gn. 22.23). Abraham's servant journeyed to Haran, where Abraham's family lived, and selected her as Isaac's bride (Gn. 24). After a difficult pregnancy and her husband's prayer, she gave birth to twins: Jacob and Esau (Gn. 25). Each of the parents had a favorite: Rebekah's was Jacob, Isaac's was Esau. Sibling rivalry was inevitable, as already predicted to Rebekah in a prenatal prophecy (Gn. 25.23). Rebekah helped Jacob extract the paternal blessing for the firstborn through a deception of the blind Isaac (Gn. 27), then helped Jacob escape to Haran (Gn. 28). Rebekah was also involved in one version of the wife-sister ploy (see SARAH), when she was introduced to a foreign king as her husband's sister, but she eventually escaped unharmed (Gn. 26). Upon her death, she was buried in the cave of *Machpelah in Hebron (Gn. 49.31). In all the stories about her, Rebekah is presented as independent, strong-willed, and a worthy *matriarch.

RECONSTRUCTIONISM, religious movement initiated in the United States by Mordecai Menahem *Kaplan with the founding of the Society for the Advancement of Judaism in 1922. It attempts to integrate Western democratic values and social scientific scholarship into a reconstruction of Judaism. The Jewish Reconstructionist Federation, founded in 1955, has grown since 1980, as a result of the leadership provided by the rabbis ordained by the *Reconstructionist Rabbinical College. Reconstructionism views Judaism as the evolving religious civilization of the Jewish people and seeks to adapt inherited Jewish beliefs and practices to the needs of the contemporary world. Embracing the perspective of the historian, this view rejects the traditional claim that the Torah was revealed at Mount Sinai. Rather, it sees Judaism as having undergone a process of continuous adaptation by successive generations to ever changing social and cultural circumstances. Jewish traditions are to be treasured because they represent the most lasting and compelling insights reached by preceding generations about the ultimate meaning and sanctity of life. It is, however, the responsibility of each generation to continue the process of evolution. The constant factor throughout the process has been the Jewish people. The emphasis on peoplehood has led Reconstructionists to stress the importance of Jewish community as the primary vehicle for the transmission of Jewish life. In contrast to the value Western culture places on personal autonomy and choice, Reconstructionists have sought to create communities in which individuals are closely interconnected and decisions are made collectively, with individuals following the communal will. Communal decisions are made through serious study and discussion by everyone, rather than by the rabbi alone. The emphasis on Judaism as a civilization has entailed a close connection to the Hebrew language, in prayer and elsewhere, and to traditional ritual practices. The movement has from its beginnings been a strong advocate of Zionism, believing that it is in Israel that Jews can live most fully in a Jewish civilization. Theologically, Reconstructionists reject belief in a supernatural God who intervenes miraculously in human affairs but affirm a serious belief in spiritual practice. God is generally understood as a process rather than as a person, and divine communication through the ages is valued as the record of the human experience of God rather than as literal divine word. The Jewish people is not belied to be exclusively chosen by God; rather, all peoples have the ability to express the divine will. Rituals are practiced and classical texts studied by Reconstructionists because they convey the sacred insights, values, and worldview of previous generations. The new Reconstructionist series of prayer books, Kol Haneshamah (edited by A. Teutsch [1989, 1991, 1994, 1996]), represents an ongoing commitment to the traditional words of the liturgy, while reflecting feminist and other ethical considerations. The movement considers itself post-halakhic because it views the mitsvot not as commandments from God but as treasured expressions of the past that reflect the specific historical contexts of the generations in which they originated. They are therefore subject to cautious change on ethical grounds. The movement has pioneered in the area of gender equality, initiating the bat mitsvah ceremony for girls in 1922, according women full ritual equality in the 1940s, ordaining women as rabbis beginning in 1968, developing women-initiated gittin divorces in 1978, and experimenting with nonmasculine God-language in prayer.

RECONSTRUCTIONIST RABBINICAL COLLEGE, educational institution in Wyncote, Pennsylvania, founded in 1968 by R. Ira Eisenstein to train the leaders of Reconstructionism. Its curriculum is based on the definition of Judaism as the "evolving religious civilization of the Jewish people" and emphasizes the study of the Jewish past in its historical context. With a strong accent on professional training, its graduates are prepared to pursue careers as educators, chaplains, communal executives, and campus directors, as well as congregational rabbis. Its Center for Jewish Ethics and its Center for Outreach develop programs and study materials for broader use. Nearly two hundred rabbis had been ordained by 1995 and belong to the Reconstructionist Rabbinical Association.

REDEMPTION (Heb. ge'ullah). The religious and theological meanings of redemption are derived from ancient Israelite law and social custom. To "redeem" meant to fulfill the duty of next of kin ("redeemer") in certain specific situations (cf. Ru. 3.9-4.9) by ransoming a kinsman who had sold himself into slavery or by exercising the option to buy back family property that had been alienated. The next of kin who acts as a *blood avenger is called a go'el. God is also described as a go'el

(cf. Jb. 19.25, "I know that my redeemer lives"). In saving his people (cf. Is. 11.11; Jer. 31.10), he acts the part of the kinsman in ancient law. Liturgical reference to God as Israel's redeemer (cf. Is. 59.20) is made daily in the benediction following the *Shema and in the seventh benediction of the weekday 'Amidah. The idea of redemption operates on a variety of levels: as social and political liberation (the prototype being the Exodus from Egypt), as freedom from sin, and as a general cosmic transformation. Only in later usage was the term applied to the expected Davidic Messiah. The Kabbalah, in particular, developed the notion of a redemption (tiqqun) in which God himself shares, since he, too (in the aspect of the Godhead called the *Shekhinah), was involved in the suffering of a disarranged and "fallen" world. It has been suggested that modern Zionism is merely the national and secularized reinterpretation of the ancient Jewish striving for redemption; in Zionist terminology "redemption of the land" means buying land in Erets Yisra'el for Jewish ownership. The term redemption is generally used in a concrete collective or individual (e.g., salvation from illness, oppression, suffering) sense but not in the sense of a change in spiritual state, where a different terminology (atonement, sanctification) applies.

RED HEIFER (Heb. parah adummah), animal whose ashes are used in preparing the "waters of purification," by which a person who had come into contact with a human corpse was decontaminated. The ritual (Nm. 19) is modeled after the *purification offering and is even called a hatta't (Nm. 8.7, 19.9, 17). The flesh of a cow is completely incinerated, so that whenever necessary a small amount of its ashes may be mixed with water and sprinkled on an impure person. This is to be done on the third and seventh days of his defilement, after which he is pure once again. The requirement that the sacrificial animal be red (adummah—actually earth-colored or brown) and that its blood be incinerated along with its flesh, together with cedar wood and crimson yarn (and hyssop, a symbol of purification), is not merely in order to obtain the greatest possible quantity of ash. The mixture of the ash with water symbolizes actual blood, as employed in the purification offering; the ash is a sort of instant blood, kept for use as needed. In biblical thought, death in all of its manifestations is defiling; the ritual purification of humans from corpse contamination is essential, lest the spread of defilement cause the pollution of the Temple, God's abode, and drive him from there (Nm. 19.13, 20). In post-biblical thought, the original significance of the procedure was no longer acknowledged, and it was reinterpreted by the rabbis as a rite designed to atone for the sin of the golden calf. Following the teaching of R. Yoḥanan ben Zakk'ai (Pesiḳta de- Rav Kahana 4.7), the seemingly illogical ritual of the red heifer has become the archetype of the hugqim: commands that require compliance though they are incomprehensible and that are considered sublime expressions of the inscrutable divine will. Since those involved in the preparation and sprinkling of the ash are defiled, the red heifer presents the classic halakhic paradox: though it purifies the impure, it contaminates the pure.

Corpse contamination, one of the most frequent types of defilement, prevented one from participating in sacrifice. Thus, it was necessary for all to be reminded of the need to undergo purification before the annual Pesah offering, in which everyone was required to participate. For this reason the rabbis enjoined the public reading of the law of the red heifer from the Torah on one of the Sabbaths preceding Pesah, called Shabbat Parah (Meg. 3.4).

REFORM JUDAISM, a religious movement advocating the modification of Orthodox tradition in conforming with the exigencies of contemporary life and thought. In some places it is called Liberal or Progressive Judaism. The essential difference between Orthodox and Reform revolves around the authority of the halakhah; whereas Orthodoxy maintains the divine authority of the halakhah in both its biblical and rabbinic expressions, Reform Judaism subjects religious law and customs to human judgment. While granting the elements of divine inspiration in the Bible and Jewish tradition, it attempts to differentiate between those elements of the Torah that are eternal and the legal forms and customs that it believes are the products of a particular age. It thus maintains its right to adapt and change Jewish traditions to make them more relevant to each generation. Its historic origins were motivated less by theological or ideological attitudes than by a desire for a more attractive form of service that would appeal to Jews who were in danger of dropping out of Judaism completely.

The seeds of the movement were sown when a prominent German Jew, Israel *Jacobson, organized a progressive Jewish school and then a synagogue in Seesen in the early years of the nineteenth century. He later moved to Berlin, where religious services along the lines he had initiated were organized in private homes (under Orthodox pressure, the government prohibited the establishment of Reform places of worship). Jews in Hamburg built a synagogue in 1818 that they called a temple. The organizers of these early Reform services conducted some of the prayers in the vernacular, shortened the service, eliminated some ideas that they felt were outdated, used musical accompaniment (see ORGANS), and delivered sermons in German. Jacobson also introduced the *confirmation ceremony into the religious calendar of the new community. Reform leaders relinquished the belief in a personal Messiah who would lead the Jews back to the Land of Israel. They insisted that Jews look upon the lands of their residence as their permanent homes and not places of temporary exile. Covering the head during prayer, dietary restrictions, the donning of tefillin, and other traditional customs and laws were regarded by some early reformers as outmoded. They looked to the prophetic and ethical elements of biblical Judaism rather than to the ritual elements for inspiration. The negation of ritual also divided the emergent Reform movement. At a series of conferences (synods) in Germany at Brunswick in 1844, Frankfurt in 1845, and Breslau in 1846, the new movement split into a radical faction (Samuel *Holdheim) and a moderate faction (Zacharias *Frankel). Abraham *Geiger and others tried to occupy a middle position and worked for a platform of religious principles and order of prayers acceptable to all groups. Reform Judaism in Germany achieved only modest growth; it organized a seminary and a number of congregations. In France and England, too, it made slow organizational headway. In 1903 the Union Israélite Libérale was formed in France and built its own temple in Paris. In England, where the movement became known as Liberal Judaism, a moderate Reform synagogue was established in 1842 and the Jewish Religious Union in 1902.

A small movement in North America developed concurrently, first evidenced in the Reformed Society of the Israelites in Charleston, South Carolina (1825–1833), led by Isaac Harby. With the arrival of central European immigrants, new Reform groups formed in Baltimore (Har Sinai Verein, 1842) and in New York (Temple Emanuel, 1846). However, the North American Reform movement took on a momentum of its own and became the first branch of American Judaism to organize itself on a denominational basis when Isaac Mayer *Wise founded an organization of synagogues, the *Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC), in 1873, Hebrew Union College (see HEBREW UNION COLLEGE–JEWISH INSTITUTE OF RELIGION [HUC–JIR]) in 1875, and a professional association of rabbis, the *Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR), in 1889. Wise also worked toward the acceptance of a uniform prayer book. Released as the Union Prayer Book, it was modeled after David *Einhorn's Olat Tamid rather than Wise's own Minhag America. While Wise became the undisputed organizational leader of the movement, Einhorn significantly influenced Reform Judaism with his more radical approach to theology and liturgy, particularly during the incipient stages of its growth in North America. His theology reflected a Hegelian understanding of "progressive or evolving revelation," which continues through our day (rather than one bound by Sinai in time and space and later fixed by the rabbis as oral law); ethical monotheism; and the "mission of Israel" (a universalistic interpretation of the "election of Israel" as a chosen people), which implies the moral responsibility of Jews to be a "light to the nations." Reform rabbis attempted to articulate this theological outlook in two official platforms: the *Pittsburgh platform of 1885, prepared by *Kaufmann Kohler; and the *Columbus platform of 1937, prepared by Samuel Cohon. In 1976 theologian Eugene B.

Borowitz wrote, on behalf of the movement, a centenary perspective in order to describe the pluralistic approach to Judaism that marked the Reform movement in the last quarter of the twentieth century. This document summarized, among other things, these pioneering contributions of Reform Judaism: "that our tradition should interact with modern culture; that its form ought to reflect a contemporary esthetics; that its scholarship needs to be conducted by modern, critical methods; and that change has been and must continue to be a fundamental reality in Jewish life." When the CCAR originally rejected a proposal to establish under its auspices a synod for all American Jews, it opted instead to establish a standing responsa committee in 1907. While eventually more accepting of traditional liturgical practices, North American Reform Judaism generally takes a more radical approach to Judaism than did its European counterpart, arguing for personal autonomy and spirituality.

The influx of eastern European Jews to the United States both threatened and influenced the elitist German Jewish approach to Reform in the late nineteenth century. Classical Reform reached the extent of its strength with a denunciation of Zionism following the First Zionist Congress in Basel in 1897. It later abandoned this posture (except among the small minority who formed the anti-Zionist American Council for Judaism in 1942). The significant reorientation toward Zionism (evidenced in the Columbus platform) was fostered by leaders like R. *Stephen Samuel Wise, who founded the Jewish Institute of Religion in New York in 1922, and R. Abba Hillel Silver. The Reform movement later more fully embraced Zionism with the move of the international headquarters of the *World Union for Progressive Judaism to Jerusalem and the establishment of Reform synagogues, schools, and kibbutzim in Israel, as well as the building of an HUC-JIR campus in Jerusalem. The Association of Reform Zionists of America (ARZA), founded in 1977, has become a major force in Zionist politics. Reform communities now exist in twenty-five countries and since 1989 have been founded in many republics of the former Soviet Union.

The Reform movement's stress on social justice led to the establishment of the Religious Action Center in Washington, D.C., in 1961. While the CCAR rejected two early resolutions in support of women's suffrage, it finally passed a resolution of support in 1917. As a manifestation of its principle of equality (removing all class distinctions and the vestige of priestly lineage in the synagogue from the outset), Reform Judaism eventually gave women full equality in synagogue ritual and government. In 1972 HUC-JIR became the first seminary in North America to ordain a woman as rabbi (Sally J. Priesand).

In the latter part of the twentieth century, the Reform movement in the United States has taken steps that have stirred controversy in the Jewish world; these include seeking to influence non-Jews married to Jews through its outreach program, adopting patrilineal descent (in contradistinction to the traditional notion of matrilineal descent) in matters of personal status, and affirming the sexual orientation of gays and lesbians, including their ordination as rabbis.

By the 1990s, the Reform movement claimed to be the largest of the Jewish religious movements in North America.

REINES, YITSHAQ YA'AQOV (1839–1915), Lithuanian rabbi, Zionist, and Talmudist, founder and first president of Mizrahi, the Religious Zionist movement. In the face of the vehement opposition of his rabbinic colleagues, he pioneered the introduction of secular studies into the yeshivah curriculum as a response to the tide of assimilation and secularism that was sweeping eastern European Jewry. After a short-lived experiment in 1884 in Svetsyany (Svencionys, Lithuania), he eventually established a similar yeshivah incorporating a secular study program in Lida (1905), the seat of his rabbinate, which functioned until his death. He also formulated an innovative theoretical framework of Talmudic logic (hotam tokhnit). He joined the Hibbat Zion (Lovers of Zion), a precursor to the Zionist movement, and later joined forces with the Zionist leader Theodor Herzl, becoming a leading figure at the Zionist congresses from 1902. As a counterbalance to the secular national educational program adopted by the Zionist movement, he founded the Mizrahi movement in Vilna (1902), focusing on establishing a school system in Erets Yisra'el that would combine Orthodoxy and Religious Zionism with secular studies. His major published works include 'Edut be-Ya'aqov (Vilna, 1871; Jerusalem, 1951), responsa on the laws of evidence; Hotam Tokhnit—Derekh ba-Yam (Mainz, 1880; Pressburg, 1881; Jerusalem, 1934), Talmudic logic; No'd shel Dema'ot (Vilna, 1891; Jerusalem, 1951), homiletic interpretation; Or Hadash 'al Tsiyyon (Vilna, 1902; New York, 1946), a Religious Zionist ideological statement; and Mishkenot Ya'aqov, program of the Lida Yeshivah.

REISH KALLAH (רִישׁ קָלָה; head of a row), a term that refers to a sage who delivered discourses during kallot (see KALLAH MONTHS); the title appears a few times in the Talmud Bavli (e.g., B. B. 22a), however, it is much more widely attested in the geonic period. In geonic literature, it primarily signifies a leading member of one of the Babylonian *academies, who is responsible (in some undetermined fashion) for ten scholars, comprising one of the seven rows into which the permanent core of the academy was divided. Reish kallah was also an honorary title given to distinguished correspondents or supporters of the academy. A related and probably synonymous title, in the geonic period, was aluf.

RELIGIOUS PARTIES IN ISRAEL. The World Zionist Organization (WZO), established in 1897, was not welcomed by Orthodox Jews in central and eastern Europe, who believed that the redemption of the Jewish people would come about solely as a result of divine intervention and a messianic process rather than through political activism. However, a number of Orthodox Jews, headed by R. Yitsḥaq Ya'aqov *Reines of Lithuania, joined the Zionist movement and founded in 1902 a Religious Zionist party, Mizrachi, whose slogan was: "The Land of Israel to the People of Israel according to the Torah of Israel" (see RELIGIOUS ZIONISM). Before long, the party's popularity spread throughout the world, and it became a significant factor in the WZO. It represented a synthesis of the religious and national components in Judaism. From its early beginnings, it was in constant confrontation with the ultra-Orthodox *Agudat Israel, which rejected the nationalist component and fought cooperation with the secularists.

Between 1920 and 1948, Mizrachi was active building up the Jewish national home in Palestine. Following the establishment of the State of Israel, membership in Mizrachi and its labor wing, Ha-Po'el ha-Mizrachi, broadened as a result of mass immigration. In 1956 the two organizations united to form Mafdal, the National Religious Party (NRP), as the Israeli branch of the World Mizrachi Organization. While the NRP viewed the rise of a Jewish state as "the beginning of Redemption," Agudat Israel denied religious legitimacy to the state. Until 1992 the NRP participated in all coalition governments, while Agudat Israel usually stayed out because of its opposition to women serving in the army.

In the 1984 elections, a third religious party appeared, Shas, founded by ultra-Orthodox elements in the *Adot ha-Mizrah.

The NRP is organized on a democratic basis, unlike the two ultra-Orthodox parties. The supreme authority of Agudat Israel is the Council of Torah Sages, while Shas is headed by the Council of Rabbis. All decisions of these parties are referred to their respective council of rabbinical authorities for consideration and approval.

In Knesset elections, religious parties have received, on average, between 11 and 13 percent of the total vote, but they have wielded political power far beyond their numerical strength. In exchange for their support of the major political parties in Israel, the religious parties have secured legislation in matters of Sabbath observance, kashrut, support for the several religious schools systems, as well as support for yeshivot and their students.

As regards foreign policy, Agudat Israel holds moderate views, while Shas's attitude has been conditioned by coalition considerations. After the 1967 Six-Day War, NRP underwent a reorientation, advocating the principle of shelemut ha-'arets, that is, Israel in its historical boundaries. It has actively supported the establishment of settlements in Judea and Samaria, and Gush Emunim, the movement for settling the West Bank, became the dominant force in the NRP. Subsequently the NRP's power declined, thousands defected from its ranks, and it lost its hold over the rabbinic establishment. Following the 1977 elections, the NRP held twelve seats in the Knesset; following the elections of 1992, the NRP held six seats, and Shas became the largest religious party. The 1996 elections saw a substantial increase in support for the religious parties, which received a record twenty-two seats in the hundred-twenty-seat Knesset and considerable power in the coalition government.

RELIGIOUS PLURALISM. See PLURALISM, RELIGIOUS.

RELIGIOUS ZIONISM, conceived in the mid-nineteenth century as a modernizing response of Orthodox Judaism to *emancipation. Religious Zionism aimed to preserve the continuity of Torah as a national religious culture within a modern independent Jewish society.

A major source of Religious Zionist ideology is the traditional messianic motif of the return to and settlement of Erets Yisra'el. The movement's fathers, Tsevi Hirsch *Kalischer and Yehudah Shelomoh Ḥai *Alkalai, departed from the accepted religious view that the Jewish people must passively await the coming of the Messiah by distinguishing between a natural or rational first stage in the messianic process, and a second, supernatural stage, of which the former is a necessary precondition. This provided religious justification for the idea that Jews could shape their own future.

Religious Zionists were further motivated by concerns first articulated in the 1870s about rising assimilation and rising antisemitism. Affirming the religious value of national existence, Religious Zionism championed a modern sovereign Jewish polity. Religious Zionists cooperated with secular Zionists to attain common goals.

Religious Zionism developed in three phases. The Mizrahi party was founded in 1902 in Vilna. In 1909 it created a network of schools in Palestine, for boys and girls, the curriculum of which combined secular and sacred studies. (In 1947 Mizrahi schools educated about 25 percent of all the children in the Zionist educational system.) Mizrahi also supported women's suffrage.

The second phase of the development of Religious Zionism was initiated by Ha-Po'el ha-Mizrachi (the Mizrahi Worker). This labor organization, founded in Palestine in 1922, also constituted a political party and under the slogan of "Torah and Labor" promoted the integration of Orthodox youth into the larger society. Of particular import was the cooperative settlement movement sponsored by Ha-Po'el ha-Mizrachi; in 1990 it comprised eighty moshavim (smallholder agricultural communities) and seventeen kibbutzim, organized as Ha-Kibbutz ha-Dati. In 1929 Ha-Po'el ha-Mizrachi founded its own youth movement, Benei Akiva, active both in Palestine (later Israel) and the Diaspora. In 1956 Ha-Po'el ha-Mizrachi and Mizrahi merged into Mafdal (the National Religious Party [NRP]), but Ha-Po'el ha-Mizrachi continues to exist independently as a labor organization.

The third phase in the development of Religious Zionism centered around Gush Emunim. Created by graduates of Benei Akiva after the Six-Day War (1967), Gush Emunim initiated the establishment of scores of Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, viewing Jewish political possession of all of Erets Yisra'el as a great milestone in the messianic process. Gush Emunim, however, did not enjoy the support of the entire Religious Zionist movement. See also ISRAEL, STATE OF, JEWISH RELIGIOUS LIFE IN; RELIGIOUS PARTIES IN ISRAEL; ZIONISM.

REMNANT OF ISRAEL (Heb. she'erit Yisra'el), a doctrine expressing the belief that despite the catastrophes and dire punishments visited upon the sinful people of Israel, either directly by God or at the hands of other nations before the Day of Judgment, the people will not be utterly destroyed; a repentant and righteous remnant will survive, return to its land, and ultimately constitute the kingdom of God. The idea of the remnant of Israel is expressed by nearly all the prophets. This teaching, hinted at in Leviticus 26.44-45, is clearly enunciated by Isaiah, who thought of the remnant as a small minority ("a tenth part") of the people (Is. 6.13) and who gave one of his children the symbolic name Shear-jashub (the Remnant Will Return) in token of this belief (Is. 7.3). Jeremiah elaborated upon the theme: "I will gather the remnant of my flock out of all the countries to which I have driven them and bring them again to their folds" (Jer. 23.3). Ezekiel also accepted the doctrine to the extent that he designated the Babylonian exiles as "the remnant of Israel" (cf. Ez. 9.8, 11.13). Persecutions and massacres kept the idea of the remnant of Israel alive in liturgy and historical consciousness, and those who were not killed in the Holocaust were known as "the surviving remnant."

RENDING OF CLOTHES (Heb. qeri'ah). The practice of rending one's garments is found in the Bible as a sign of mourning (Gn. 37.34) and of national (Jos. 7.6) and personal (Gn. 37.29) distress. Jewish mourners, male and female, rend their garments upon the demise of any one of the following seven close relatives: father, mother, brother, sister, son, daughter, spouse (Shab. 105b). The Talmud (Mo'ed Q. 25a) says it should be done immediately after death, but the custom is to perform it before or after the burial service. The mourner stands during the rending. While doing so he or she recites the blessing *Barukh Dayyan Emet (Blessed Is the True Judge). The rent is made on the left side over the heart in the case of parents; on the right side for other relatives. For parents all garments are rent and the tear is left permanently; in the case of other relatives, only the upper garment is rent and crudely sewn together again after the week of mourning (women may sew it up immediately). Other occasions upon which Orthodox Jews rend their garments are: when beholding the Temple site for the first time; for a Sefer Torah that has been burned; and upon receiving news of a communal or national Jewish calamity. Today some mourners wear a torn black ribbon to symbolize the rending of clothes.

REPARATION OFFERING (Heb. asham), one of the types of *sacrifices of expiation. Though its procedure resembled that of the *purification offering (hatta't), it was mandated for the individual in specific circumstances: desecration of sacred objects, suspected sacrilege, false oath in property offenses (Lv. 5.14–26; Nm. 5.5–10), purification from *leprosy (Lv. 14.10–14), as a penalty for ravishing a betrothed slave (Lv. 19.21–22), and for a *Nazarite following contamination by a corpse (Nm. 6.12). The basic purpose of the reparation offering was to fine the individual offender for mistreatment of things sacred (beyond the material restitution he was required to make in the case of actual misappropriation of property). For this reason, and since Hebrew asham primarily means payment of a fine, the English translation "reparation offering" is preferable to the traditional translations "guilt offering" or "trespass offering." No reparation offerings figure in the public cult at all. The three most significant features of the reparation offering were that it was usually commutable into silver since it was essentially a fine; that it was required even when nonspecific pangs of conscience moved the individual merely to suspect that he may have been guilty of sacrilege; and that it explicitly required confession of wrongdoing along with the sacrificial procedure itself.

REPENTANCE. The Hebrew word for repentance is teshuvah (return), which clearly indicates that the Jewish concept of repentance means a return to God and to the right path (cf. Hos. 14.2; 2 Kgs. 17.13; Jer. 13.14, 18.11; Jl. 2.12–13, etc.). Repentance in the narrow sense of regret for past transgressions is called haratah and is held to be a precondition of genuine teshuvah. According to rabbinic teaching, human beings were created with an evil inclination—a tendency to sin—and sin can only be exculpated by repentance. It is within each person's power to redeem himself or herself from sin by sincerely changing behavior and returning to God. The rabbis frequently extol the merits and significance of repentance, for example, "Great is repentance, for it brings healing to the world. Great is repentance, for it reaches to the throne of God. Great is repentance, for it brings redemption near. Great is repentance, for it lengthens a man's life" (Yoma 86a); and "Where penitents stand, the perfectly righteous cannot stand" (Ber. 34b). The fundamental text quoted and emphasized in the liturgy of Yom Kippur (Ez. 33.11) states that God delights not in the death of the wicked but that the individual turn away from evil and live. Repentance is the central theme of the biblical Book of Jonah, which is read as a prophetic lesson (haftarah) on Yom Kippur. The importance of repentance as a moral act became stressed all the more after the destruction of the Temple and the cessation of atonement offerings. Particular importance was attached to the penitential season—the *Aseret Yemei Teshuvah (as well as the preparatory month of *Elul). Penitence is also prominent in the liturgy, being the subject of the fifth blessing of the *Amidah and the *Tahanun and *Selihot prayers. Strictly Orthodox Jews devote the day before the new moon to repentance (see YOM KIPPUR QATAN). The exhortation of the rabbis "repent one day before you die" implies daily repentance as one never knows when one will die (Avot 2.10). A distinction is made between repentance for sins committed against God and those committed against one's fellow human beings. Whereas the former demands only regret, confession, and abnegation of the offense, the latter involves complete restitution for the wrong committed or, in the case of a nonmaterial offense, reconciliation and forgiveness. Repentance is regarded as so fundamental that it is enumerated in the Talmud as one of the seven things created by God before he created the world (Pes. 54a; see PREEXISTENCE). A penitent should not be reminded of past sins. Providing it is sincere, repentance has the power of completely erasing all of one's previous transgressions. Repentance is a major theme in the ethical, devotional, spiritual, and ascetic writings of the medieval philosophers (e.g., Maimonides, Bahya ben Yosef ibn Paquda), kabbalists (e.g., Yitshaq Luria), and moralists and later of the *Musar movement. REPENTANCE, TEN DAYS OF. See 'ASERET YEMEI TESHUVAH.

RESHUT (רְשׁוּת; permission), a piyyut in which the prayer leader (sheliaḥ tsibbur*) asks permission of the congregation to serve as their representative to God, especially on the High Holy Days, when many of the congregants, unfamiliar with the difficult Hebrew, cannot pray properly on their own behalf. Various forms of the reshut occur in the traditional liturgy. Among the best known are Mi-Sod Hakhhamim, before the piyyutim that are inserted into the *Amidah; Ya'eiti bi-Fetsoti (by R. Yekuti'el ben Moshe of Speyer, 11th cent.); and Oḥilah la-'El, introducing the blowing of the shofar in the *Musaf service for *Ro'sh ha-Shanah. On Simḥat Torah a reshut by R. Menaḥem ben Makhir (11th cent., Germany) precedes the reading of the final verses of Deuteronomy and the beginning of the Book of Genesis.

RESHUT HA-YAHID. See DOMAIN.

RESPONSA (Heb. she'elot u-teshuvot [questions and answers]), answers to questions of Jewish law and observance written by halakhic scholars in reply to inquiries addressed to them; the role of responsa is similar to that of case law. Mentioned in the Talmud, responsa emerged as a distinct branch of Jewish legal literature during the geonic period and became especially important after the Muslim conquest. The unquestioned spiritual authority of the ge'onim—the heads of the Babylonian academies—led far-flung communities throughout the Islamic world to send their questions about disputed or unknown points of Jewish law or procedure to the ge'onim for solution. Generally, questions were composed by representatives of the Babylonian academies in distant lands and delivered to the ge'onim, together with donations for the academies, by travelers along the caravan routes. Before answering an inquiry, the ga'on allowed the students in the academy to discuss the pertinent legal issues, and only after considering the issues that they had raised did he come to a conclusion. Responsa, thousands of which are still extant in Hebrew, Aramaic, and Arabic (those of *Ha'i Ga'on alone number over a thousand), were typically couched in the briefest of terms and consisted of a single sentence or even a word ("forbidden" or "permitted"), although monographs that dealt extensively with the subject at hand were not unknown, particularly as the geonic period progressed. The decisions of the ge'onim were viewed by contemporaries as binding. Correspondents also wrote to the ge'onim for clarification of matters of Jewish belief and textual problems in the Bible, Talmud, and liturgy. Many of the extant copies of the responses of the ge'onim have been found in the Cairo *Genizah.

The first prayer book was contained in a responsum sent to the Jewish community of Lucena by *Amram bar Sheshna' in answer to a query about the correct liturgy. The only connected history of the geonic period, by Sherira' Ga'on, was a responsum to a letter written to him from the community of Kairouan, while most of what is known about the mysterious *Eldad ha-Dani, who appeared in Kairouan in the ninth century, is contained in a query sent by that community to the ga'on Cohen Tsedeq.

Toward the end of the tenth century, new centers of Jewish scholarship emerged in Europe and North Africa, and communities in these regions began to turn to local halakhic scholars such as R. *Mosheh ben Hanokh of Cordova, R. Hanan'el ben Hushi'el of Kairouan, and R. Kalonimos of Lucca. These authorities and their successors were asked to clarify issues regarding religious custom as well as to define the parameters of communal authority. Questions arising from situations that were without clear precedent in Jewish law, whether ritual or economic, or even problems stemming from climatic conditions (for example, could Jews ask non-Jews to light a fire so that they could remain warm during the cold winter Sabbaths of northern Europe), continued to characterize this legal genre. Issues of personal status (e.g., divorce, agunah) were particularly complex and were also often the subject of queries. While responsa from the Muslim world considered geonic precedents, legists in Christian countries, who had been all but cut off from geonic authority for centuries, were generally free from this restraint. Responsa from the period of the ri'shonim*, which were almost entirely written in Hebrew and generally dealt only with legal problems, typically sought paradigmatic cases in the Talmud that could serve as precedents for contemporary problems. Talmudic methods, such as casuistry, were brought to bear on practical halakhic discussions as respondents attempted to explain and justify their conclusions. As in Talmudic times, public practice was not ignored as a source of legal authority. Major collections of responsa by ri'shonim include the works of R. *Me'ir ben Barukh of Rothenburg, R. *Asher ben Yehi'el, R. Shelomoh ben Avraham *Adret, R. *Yitshaq ben Sheshet Perfet, and R. Shim'on ben Tsemaḥ Duran (see DURAN FAMILY).

Authorities from the fifteenth century onward tended to show less judicial independence and gave great weight to the precedents of earlier authorities in their decisions (see AḤARONIM). Beginning in the sixteenth century, responsa became more complex, accessible only to the well-educated. The best-known responsa collections of recent centuries include the works of R. Yehezqel *Landau of Prague, R. Mosheh Sofer of Pressburg (see SOFER FAMILY), R. Yitshaq Elhanan *Spektor of Kovno, and R. Mosheh *Feinstein of New York. In addition to traditional concerns, contemporary responsa have tried to deal with the halakhic problems raised by the disintegration of the traditional Jewish community (for example, does halakhah recognize Reform marriages) and the advent of new technology (for example, the abortion of fetuses with Tay Sachs disease).

The authority of a poseq*, an arbiter of Jewish law, was dependent on how his decisions were received. Someone whose legal positions were not in keeping with publicly accepted values was unlikely to continue to receive questions. Collections of responsa, which were often edited not by the author but by his disciples or descendants, were generally not systematically organized. However, with the widespread acceptance of R. Yosef *Karo's Shulhan 'Arukh and the accompanying glosses of R. Mosheh *Isserles in the seventeenth century, responsa began to be loosely organized along the lines of Karo's work.

Responsa have almost always dealt with concrete problems. R. Yisra'el ben Petaḥyah *Isserlein (15th-cent. Germany) did, however, use the question and answer format of responsa to discuss hypothetical halakhic issues as well as practical problems. A limited number of rabbis have followed in his path. Responsa continue to be used as a means of clarifying contemporary halakhic issues, not only by Orthodox Jews but by Reform and Conservative rabbis as well, who often write their responsa in English. Since rabbinic responsa reflect on daily life, they have become a useful tool for uncovering the social, economic, and religious histories of both Jewish and non-Jewish communities.

Large-scale programs to compile and classify responsa literature have been undertaken in Israel at Hebrew University of Jerusalem and Bar-Ilan University.

RESPONSES, LITURGICAL, a phrase or word spoken or chanted antiphonally after the prayer leader by the congregation at set parts of the liturgy. The most frequently used responses are amen*, Barukh hu' u-varukh shemo* ("Blessed be he and blessed be his name"), Barukh Adonai ha-mevorakh le-'olam va-'ed* ("Blessed is the Lord who is to be blessed forever and ever"), Yehe' shemeh rabba' mevorakh le-'olam u-le-'olmei 'olmayya'* ("Let his great name be blessed forever and to all eternity" [Shab. 119a; cf. Ps. 113.2]), and Berikh hu'* ("Blessed be he").

The antiphonal form of liturgical response probably originated in the Temple service when congregational responses accompanied the Levitical choirs.

RESURRECTION (Heb. tehiyyat ha-metim). The doctrine of resurrection teaches that the bodies of the dead will arise from their graves before the Day of Judgment (see YOM HA-DIN). Belief in resurrection began to develop toward the end of the biblical period, possibly under Persian influence, and is referred to in the Book of Daniel (12.2). By the end of the Second Temple period, resurrection had developed into a fundamental dogma of the Pharisees, who declared it heresy to deny, as did the Sadducees (Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews 18.1.4; San. 90b), that the doctrine possessed Mosaic authority (San. 10.1). Resurrection is referred to in the liturgy, where it is the subject of the second paragraph of the Amidah*, and is commonly associated with the "world to come" ('olam ha-ba') rather than the messianic era (see ESCHATOLOGY). Maimonides states it as the last of his Thirteen Principles of Faith*. However, the doctrine proved a stumbling block to those thinkers to whom the heavenly bliss of the soul seemed a more worthy possibility than continued life in a material body. Maimonides himself seems to have identified resurrection with immortality of the soul and later composed a special "Treatise on Resurrection," in which he argued that a spiritual view of immortality was not in conflict with the doctrine of the return of the soul to the body. Some thinkers believed that all mankind would be resurrected (Manasseh ben Israel), others that the doctrine applied only to the Jewish people (Yitshaq Abravanel), and still others that it applied only to the righteous (Moses Maimonides and Hasda'i ben Avraham Crescas). Reform Judaism denies the concept of bodily resurrection (and has revised the liturgy accordingly) and has asserted that the belief is a foreign import into Jewish thought that should be rejected. It is not accepted by Reconstructionists either. Moderate Reform and Conservative Jews tend to identify resurrection with the doctrine of the immortality of the soul. (See also AFTERLIFE).

RETSEH (רִצֵּה; Be Pleased), the seventeenth of the nineteen benedictions of the Amidah* for the three daily services on weekdays, and the fifth benediction of the seven in the Amidah* for Sabbaths and festivals. Dating to Temple times, this was originally a supplication for the acceptance of the sacrifices. After the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE, it was modified into a supplication for the reestablishment of the sacrificial cult. God is implored to restore his presence to Zion, and to receive the Jew's worship favorably. The Reconstructionist prayer book, Kol ha-Neshamah, invokes God to accept Israel's "passionate prayers." In a paraphrase of the traditional text, the Reform Gates of Prayer declares that God is responsive to all who seek him in sincerity, whether in Israel or in other lands.

RETURN TO ZION. See ZION; ZIONISM.

REUBEN (Heb. Re'uven), Jacob's eldest child. The name, which means "Look! A son!", was chosen by his mother, Leah, who hoped that Jacob would now love her for bearing him his first son (Gn. 29.32). Reuben regularly played a role in Leah's struggle to wrest Jacob's love from Rachel. He brought Leah mandrakes, which indirectly led to her bearing three more sons and a daughter (Gn. 30.14–21). After Rachel's death, he slept with Bilhah, Rachel's maidservant and one of Jacob's concubines (Gn. 35.22), which ultimately earned him Jacob's severe rebuke (Gn. 49.4). Nevertheless, Reuben attempted to save Rachel's son Joseph from the other jealous brothers, and, thinking he had failed, mourned for him (Gn. 37.1–30). He blamed the brothers for Joseph's death (Gn. 42.22), and when he attempted to persuade Jacob to allow them to take Benjamin, Rachel's other son, to Egypt, he offered the lives of his own two sons as surety (Gn. 42.37). In their final blessings, Jacob revoked Reuben's leadership position among the brothers (Gn. 49.3) while Moses prayed for the survival of Reuben's tribe (Dt. 33.6). The tribe of Reuben received its inheritance in Transjordan, where in time it was largely absorbed by its stronger neighbor, the tribe of Gad.

RE'UVENI, DAVID (died c.1538), a mysterious messianic activist who appeared in the Middle East and Europe in 1517, presenting himself as a representative of the ten lost tribes, and as the brother of Joseph, the king of the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh. He tried to mobilize both Jewish communities and non-Jewish powers to a concerted effort to bring about the redemption. Most of the information concerning his enterprise is derived from a detailed diary which he kept, describing his travels, his meetings and his ambitions, and from evidence found in letters of contemporary writers concerning their meetings with him. His origin is unknown; it has been suggested that he was a Jew from Ethiopia, but no proof of that has been found. His messianism was intensely political and military in character: he envisaged a coalition between the Christian European powers and the Catholic church with the vast army of the lost tribes, whose commander he claimed to be; they were to fight against the Ottoman empire and redeem Erets Yisra'el. It is not clear whether the existing text of his diary was written by his hand or was edited by someone else. Much of the material in his diary concerning his early travels is fictional, modeled, to some extent, on the legends of *Eldad ha-Dani, the early medieval traveler who also claimed to have come from the lost tribes. Re'uveni also included descriptions of some miracles that had happened to him, but mostly his account is mundane, including discussion of his financial difficulties. He visited Jerusalem, Damascus, and Alexandria, and reached Italy—mainly Venice and Rome—in 1523. He received from the pope, Clement VII, letters of introduction to the king of Portugal and to the legendary Christian ruler Prester John. Among the people he met was the Hebraist and Christian kabbalist Egidio da Viterbo. He went to Portugal in 1525, where he was received warmly by the converso community; he made a great impression on the young Diego Pieres, who returned to Judaism in Portugal, assumed the name Shelomoh *Molkho, and was subsequently burned at the stake by the inquisition. Re'uveni was imprisoned because of his effect on the New Christians in Portugal, but the details of his long imprisonment, and his death (probably in 1538) are unknown.

REVEL, BERNARD (1885–1940), Orthodox rabbi who molded twentieth-century Orthodox educational institutions in the United States. He was born in Pren, Lithuania, and studied in yeshivot in Tels and Kovno. Upon arrival in the United States in 1905, Revel, who believed in the compatibility of Torah learning with secular knowledge, studied at New York and Temple universities and earned a doctorate at Dropsie College in 1911.

Revel's commitment to synthesizing traditional learning and modern culture found expression in the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary, which under his presidency beginning in 1915 became America's first modern Orthodox yeshivah. The Talmudical Academy, also founded in 1915, and Yeshiva College, established in 1929, likewise embodied Revel's core beliefs (see YESHIVA UNIVERSITY).

REVELATION, the act by which God manifests himself (his saving presence, his will, his commandments) to humans. Biblical and rabbinic Hebrew have no specific term corresponding to revelation. The great theophany on Mount Sinai is traditionally referred to as the "giving of the Torah" (mattan Torah). God is said to "appear" to the patriarchs and prophets, and the appearances are described in varying degrees of *anthropomorphism and concrete imagery (cf. Gn. 3.8, 18.1, 38; Ex. 19.20). Sometimes the divine manifestation takes place "in a *vision" or "in a *dream" (Gn. 31.13ff.; Nm. 12.6) or by means of an *angel. At the same time, the Bible emphasizes that no direct, sensory perception of God is possible, and hence various circumscriptions were used when describing divine manifestations, for example, kavod (glory; see Ex. 33.18–23) and, in later rabbinic usage, shekhinah* (e.g., gilluy shekhinah [divine manifestation]). Sometimes the agent of revelation is described as the "word" (davar; see LOGOS) or as the "spirit" (see RUAH HA-QODESH). Although any event in which the divine majesty or presence becomes immediately manifest (e.g., theophany; see MIRACLE) is called revelation, the term has come to be applied more particularly to the communications of the divine will as revealed to God's messengers. According to the traditional view, the highest type of revelation was that granted to Moses, and the Pentateuch (the Five Books of Moses) is the highest expression of revelation (see ORAL LAW; TORAH; WRITTEN LAW). The prophets experienced lesser degrees of revelation, whereas for other parts of scripture, the term inspiration rather than revelation would be appropriate. Rabbinic theology correlates the different divine names (see GOD, NAMES OF) with different manifestations of the Divine (see also GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF). In the Talmudic period a celestial voice (bat qof) is reported to have sometimes communicated divine approval or disapproval. For medieval thinkers, revelation was identical with prophecy, and they considered such problems as the degrees of prophetic revelation, the relationship between suprarational revelation and reason, and the role of human faculties in revelation. *Yehudah ha-Levi held revelation to be essentially different from and superior to rational knowledge, but others (e.g., *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on, Moses *Maimonides) held prophecy to be the perfection of the intellect itself and supernaturally revealed laws to be anticipations of subsequent rational insight. The view that revelation was essentially the manifestation of divine law, since reason itself was sufficient for insight into the principles of religious truth and ethics, was still held by Moses *Mendelssohn in the eighteenth century. In the nineteenth century, Solomon Ludwig *Steinheim was exceptional in formulating a radical philosophy of revelation, maintaining that reason had to abdicate in the face of revelation. The antisupernaturalist and rationalist character of modernism in general and biblical criticism in particular challenged the traditional conceptions of revelation, revealed laws, and revealed scriptures. Liberal and Reform theologians spoke of revelation as a subjective mode of experience or as a growing (and increasingly refined) perception of the divine creative power and of moral values in human history. Hence the notion of a "progressive revelation" rather than that of revelation as a distinct, objective, and supernatural event. In the philosophy of Franz *Rosenzweig, revelation is the term for the specific mode of relationship between God and humans (i.e., the individual man not humanity as a collective). Charismatic revelatory experiences, often defined as lower forms of revelation (e.g., illuminations, visions, infusions of holy spirit, etc.), played a considerable role in the history of Jewish *mysticism.

REVENGE. See BLOOD AVENGER; VENGEANCE.

REWARD AND PUNISHMENT, the belief that God rewards those who keep his commandments and punishes transgressors. In any monotheistic theology, the belief that God is good and just, as well as omnipotent, is in seeming contradiction to a world in which the righteous suffer and evil doers flourish. This finds its classical biblical expression in the anguished outcry of the prophet Habakkuk (Hb. 1.3–4). The Pentateuch, especially the Book of Deuteronomy, assumes that well-being and blessing result from faithful adherence to the covenant, whereas dire punishment and disaster are the wages of sin (e.g., Lv. 26; Dt. 11.13–15, 28). The same view, transposed from the national collective to the individual, is presupposed in many psalms. The Book of Job apparently protests against this simplistic view but leaves the problem unsolved. Ezekiel (Ez. 18) repudiated the concept that descendants can be punished for their ancestors' sins. The rabbinical exhortation to serve God without thought of a reward (Avot 1.3) is an exalted maxim but could not suffice as the basis for religious *ethics. Justice implies a measure-for-measure dispensation, though its demands may be mitigated by genuine *repentance. During the Second Temple period, two major solutions emerged, which were further developed in rabbinic, Midrashic, and later medieval literature. These were the doctrines of immortality and *resurrection, both of which assumed some form of *afterlife in which justice would prevail through a system of reward and punishment. Nevertheless R. Yann'ai stated "It is not in our power to explain either the prosperity of the wicked or the sufferings of the righteous" (Avot 4.19). Maimonides enumerates the doctrine of reward and punishment (retribution) as the eleventh of his *Thirteen Principles of Faith, and Yosef *Albo, whose Iqqarim is a critique of these principles, nevertheless accepts the doctrine of reward and punishment as one of the three basic tenets of Judaism. In the late Middle Ages, the kabbalists also adopted the belief in *transmigration of souls as a solution. The problem of theodicy remains one of the major challenges to theological thinking on the level of both individual consciousness and historical experience. It became particularly acute in the aftermath of the Holocaust (see HOLOCAUST THEOLOGY). Many liberal thinkers have denied the possibility of divine reward and punishment or endeavored to rationalize it in terms of historical processes.

RICCHI, REFA'EL 'IMMANU'EL (1688–1743), rabbi and kabbalist born in Ferrara, Italy, who wandered throughout the Mediterranean area, including the Holy Land. For twelve years he served as rabbi in Florence and lived for three years in Leghorn, where he published various legal and mystical writings. He was murdered by robbers near Cento, not far from Leghorn.

His two important kabbalistic writings are Mishnat Hasidim, a systematic review of Lurianic Kabbalah divided into six parts (like the Mishnah), and Yotser Levav, written in Jerusalem, which treats Lurianic aspects of theosophy. Unlike kabbalists such as Avraham *Cohen de Herrera, Menaḥem 'Azaryah da *Fano, and Yosef Shelomoh *Del-Medigo, who advocated a metaphorical interpretation of the doctrine of *tsimtsum, Ricchi considered this contraction as a real occurrence in the *Ein Sof, the highest aspect of the Godhead. Ricchi argued that the logical consequence of the opposite position would be the inconceivable doctrine of the total immanence of God in the created material world and attacked kabbalists, such as his contemporary, Yosef Ergas, who defended it.

RICE, ABRAHAM (1802–1862), Orthodox rabbi in the United States. Rice was born in Gochsheim, Bavaria, and was a student of R. Wolf Hamburger and R. Abraham Bing. After heading a yeshivah in Zelle, Rice was sent by the rabbis of Bavaria to the United States. Soon after his arrival, Rice became rabbi of Baltimore's Nidche Israel—also known as the Baltimore Hebrew Congregation—where he served initially from 1840 to 1849. He was the first ordained rabbi to serve in the United States. He attempted, largely unsuccessfully, to strengthen his congregants' commitment to Orthodox teachings through severe measures, such as denying 'aliyyot to public Sabbath transgressors. Rice left the congregation for a smaller pulpit, Sherith Israel, where he officiated from 1850 to 1861, only to return to the Baltimore Hebrew Congregation in 1862, shortly before his death. Rice was an outspoken opponent of Reform Judaism in America, expressing his views in the Occident, published in Philadelphia and edited by Isaac *Leeser.

RIGHTEOUS GENTILES. See ḤASIDEI UMMOT HA-'OLAM.

RIGHTEOUSNESS (Heb. tsedeq, tsedaqah). The key-note of biblical legislation and prophetic preaching, and a divine attribute, righteousness—meaning uprightness, honesty, and *justice, freedom from wickedness, sin, and deceit—is seen as the totality of morality. Noah was saved because he was righteous (Gn. 6.9), and had there been ten righteous men in Sodom, the city would have been saved (Gn. 18.32). Abraham was admitted to God's covenant in order that he and his seed might "keep the way of the Lord, to do righteousness and justice" (Gn. 18.19), and in Deuteronomy 16.20 Israel is exhorted "that which is wholly righteous you shall follow, that you may live and inherit the land." Books such as Proverbs and Ecclesiastes contrast the righteous with the wicked, implying that the righteous will ultimately be rewarded and the wicked punished (see REWARD AND PUNISHMENT). Habakkuk 2.4 states that "The righteous man is rewarded with life for his fidelity," which, mistranslated as "the righteous shall live by his faith," played an important role in Christian theology. Paul's distinction between a righteousness of faith and of works (Rom. 4) did not find a place in Judaism. It is assumed that no perfectly righteous man exists (cf. "There is not a righteous man on earth who does good and does not sin," Ecc. 7.16), but that a man's status depends on the balance of his deeds. Legend, however, holds that there are thirty-six (*lamed vav) perfectly righteous men through whose righteousness the world exists. References to a *Teacher of Righteousness figure prominently in the writings of the *Qumran community, of which he was possibly the founder. According to Tanḥuma' (Pequdei, Ex. 38.21–40.38) poverty and wealth, health and sickness are predetermined; whether a person will be righteous or wicked is left undetermined and depends on the human exercise of *free will. The minimum ideal of righteousness is conformity to the requirements of the law. The higher ideal of boundless devotion to God is exemplified by the *ḥasid (pious man). Righteousness is not limited to Jews, and the righteous among the gentiles (*ḥasidei ummot ha-'olam) will also have a place in the world to come. In Rabbinic and Medieval Hebrew, the word tse-daqaḥ came to denote only one aspect of righteousness, that of almsgiving and charity. A tsaddiq (righteous man) is one who lives righteously by adhering to the divine law, a person in whom no fault or transgression is to be found. Ḥasidim identified righteousness and holiness with their leaders, the tsadiqqim, who mediated between man and God.

RIMMONIM. See TORAH ORNAMENTS.

RI'SHONIM (רִישוֹנִים); first ones), in Talmudic literature a term referring to rabbinic scholars of earlier generations who, because they were chronologically closer to the revelation at Mount Sinai, were deemed by subsequent generations to be more pious and greater authorities in the tradition. Now the term refers to rabbinic scholars during the period between the emergence of independent rabbinic scholarship in Europe and North Africa (late 10th cent.) and approximately the fifteenth or sixteenth century. Subsequent halakhists and Talmudists, known as aḥaronim*, generally held the opinions of authorities from this period in high esteem and were often reluctant to disagree with them. Sometimes a regional distinction is made between the ri'shonim of Ashkenaz, Spain, France, North Africa, and so on. The literature of the ri'shonim comprises two genres: commentaries on the Talmud and on the code of Yitshaq Alfasi, and ḥiddushim (novellae), often reached through critical study of the texts. Many of these works remain in manuscript, but a considerable number have been published in recent decades.

RITUAL SLAUGHTER (Heb. shehitah), the act of butchering an animal or bird that is fit for consumption (kasher; see DIETARY LAWS) according to Jewish law (derived from Dt. 12.20–21), which consists of cutting through both the windpipe and the gullet by means of a sharp implement. Fish and those species of locust permitted as food (Lv. 11) do not require shehitah. The ritual slaughterer (shohet*) must examine both windpipe and gullet after shehitah in order to ascertain that at least the major portion of both (or, in the case of fowl, of one) has been cut through. A knife or any sharp instrument may be used for shehitah, but the implement (hallaf) must be so sharp that the slit is effected by the keenness of the knife, without requiring downward pressure from the shohet. The cutting edge must be free from even the slightest imperfection (pegimah) and the sides of the cutting edge must be perfectly smooth. The implement is examined both before and after the shehitah. This examination is made by drawing the cutting edge and sides forward and backward slowly and carefully over the tip of the finger and nail in order to feel for any imperfection, by holding the edge against the light so that an imperfection would cast a shadow, or by drawing the knife across the surface of still water, in which case an imperfection in the cutting edge would leave a ripple. Five factors render shehitah invalid: shehiyyah, that is, if after commencing to slaughter the shohet interrupts or stays the progress of the knife; derasah, that is, if the knife is pressed downward instead of being drawn across the throat; hahladah, that is, if the gullet and/or the windpipe are cut from the inside; hagramah, that is, if the cut is made too close to the head or body of the animal, thus going beyond the bounds of what is legally considered the neck; or 'iqqur, that is, if the implement used is notched or otherwise unfit and the tissues are torn, not cut. Shehitah is supposed to be preceded by a special blessing, but the shehitah is not invalidated if the blessing is not recited. Shehitah has been both attacked and defended on humanitarian grounds; it is clear, however, that an animal loses consciousness almost immediately after the jugular vein has been severed. Most of the laws of shehitah can be found in Talmud tractate Hullin and in the Yoreh De'ah section of the Shulhan 'Arukh.

ROBBERY, the open and forcible appropriation of another's goods (as opposed to *theft, which is carried out secretly). Withholding another's property, even though it has come legitimately into one's possession, is considered "oppression" (Lv. 19.13) and is included in the prohibition against robbery, as is the misappropriation of funds entrusted to one's care. The forcible taking of a pledge and borrowing without permission also fall under this prohibition. A robber (Lv. 19.13) is not subject to corporal punishment since his felony can be rectified by restoring the stolen property. If the stolen goods have undergone a change, for example, a beam that has been used in constructing a building, monetary restitution may be made (Git. 55a). The penalty for falsely denying a robbery while under oath is an additional quarter of the value of the stolen property. The prohibition against robbery is one of the seven *Noahic laws. ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. Classic Christian attitudes and ecclesiastical policies toward the Jews crystallized mainly within the framework of Roman Catholicism, which, until the Reformation, was the standard form of Western *Christianity and which preserved the Adversus Iudaeos traditions of the *church fathers and sought to govern Jewish life in Christendom in accordance with them, while never entirely forsaking the tradition of the Roman empire, where Jews were a legally recognized religious minority.

From Late Antiquity to the Early Middle Ages. Though Christianity borrowed many essentials from Judaism, it viewed the continued existence of the latter as threatening or at least offensive. This ambivalence characterized the historic stance of Catholicism vis-à-vis the Jews, both theologically and in the efforts of Catholic leaders to translate doctrinal principles into legislation and public policy. Throughout the late ancient and medieval periods, councils of Catholic bishops struggled to assert the superiority of Christianity and to minimize the influence of Jews over Christians. The conversion of the Roman emperor Constantine, who proclaimed religious freedom for Christians in 313 and presided over the Nicene Council in 325, signaled an opportunity to implement such ecclesiastical demands, particularly enforced after Theodosius I (r. 379–395) proclaimed Catholicism the official religion of the empire. Yet the Christian emperors of Rome, as reflected in the Theodosian Code (438), wavered in their willingness to abandon their traditional toleration of the Jews, and their legislation, in its rhetoric and its substance, ranged from discriminatory to permissive. After the fall of the empire in the west, the treatment of the Jews by Catholic rulers continued to vary widely. Influenced by patristic teachings and Roman legal tradition alike, Pope Gregory the Great (r. 590–604) preached a policy that balanced restriction, especially against Jewish ownership of Christian slaves, and protection; in the precedent-setting bull of Sicut Iudaeis (598), he decreed that just as one ought not to grant anything to the Jews beyond that allowed by law, so, too, they ought not to be deprived of what is rightfully theirs. The Catholic kings of the Visigoths, however, banned the Jews from Spain, outlawed the practice of Judaism, and even persecuted baptized Jews. In the ninth-century, on the other hand, Louis the Pious granted broad privileges to the Jews, provoking the protests and bitter anti-Jewish polemic of Archbishop Agobard of Lyons.

From the Crusades to the Catholic Reformation. The First Crusade in 1096 ushered the Catholic church into a period of unprecedented power, and the massacres of Jews by the Crusaders in the Rhineland underscored the need to define the place of the Jew in a properly ordered Christian society. The burgeoning of Christian scholarship in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries prompted the study of hitherto neglected Jewish texts, and the plenitude of papal power claimed by contemporary popes included jurisdiction over Jewish and Muslim infidels. Collections of canon law, notably the Decretum Gratiani (1140) and the decretals of Pope Gregory IX in 1234, codified old and new decrees concerning the proper status and behavior of Jews. Ecumenical councils convened by the papacy included the Jewish question in their agenda. Pope Innocent III (r. 1198–1216) complained bitterly of Jewish insubordination and endeavored to restrict the Jews to their divinely ordained servitude; under Innocent's direction, the Fourth Lateran Council of 1215 legislated against Jewish moneylending and ordered Jews under Christian rule to wear distinguishing marks on their clothing. Papal initiative subsequently led to condemnations and burnings of the Talmud (see BOOKS, BURNING OF) increased missionary activity among the Jews, and inquisitorial harassment of entire Jewish communities. Critical to these efforts were the mendicant friars of the Dominican and Franciscan orders. Spearheading the church's confrontation with the Jews, many friars believed that the Jews had abandoned their biblical religion for a satanic, Talmudic heresy and had accordingly forfeited their rights to toleration in Christendom. As the Middle Ages wore on, this outlook nourished popular conceptions of the Jew as an agent of Satan and the Antichrist. Jews were depicted as anatomically disfigured sexual perverts with offensive bodily odor and as the perpetrators of heinous crimes, including the desecration of the host, the ritual murder of innocent Christians (see BLOOD LIBEL), and the poisoning of wells. For the Jews of central Italy and Avignon, the Counter-Reformation heralded a new series of oppressive measures: the establishment (at Jewish expense) of a house of converts in Rome, renewed burning of the Talmud, Pope Paul IV's restriction of the Jews to ghettos and the most menial occupations in 1555, and Pope Pius V's expulsion of the Jews from all papal territory except Rome and Ancona in 1569.

From the Reformation to the Twentieth Century. Catholic attitudes toward the Jews underwent little substantive change prior to the twentieth century. While the church lost much of its influence in western Europe during the centuries following the Reformation, Catholic clergy continued to promote the persecution of Jews in many lands. Only in the twentieth century has the Catholic church begun to disavow the blatant antisemitism of its past. The record of the church during the Holocaust continues to evoke debate; Pope Pius XII refused to condemn Hitler's Final Solution publicly, but members of the church did exert themselves on behalf of Jews in some communities. Guided by Pope John XXIII, the Second Vatican Council issued its decree on non-Christian religions, Nostra aetate (1965), which absolved the Jewish people of blanket, collective responsibility for the crucifixion of Jesus and instigated Catholic-Jewish dialogue. Subsequent Catholic leaders have made additional gestures of rapprochement, and John Paul II displayed concern with the Holocaust, its implications for Christians, and its significance for contemporary Jews. He also spoke of the continuing validity of God's covenant with the Jews, traditionally denied in Catholic teaching. Opening a new era in Catholic-Jewish relations, and departing from established patristic teachings that the Jews lost their homeland as punishment for rejecting Christianity, the Holy See established formal diplomatic relations with the State of Israel in 1994.

Jewish Attitudes toward the Catholic Church. While Jews and Judaism have always figured prominently in Christian doctrine, Christianity, after having severed its links with the Jewish community to become a distinct gentile religion, mattered relatively little to Jewish theologians. Yet the exigencies of history, particularly in the wake of the Christianization of the Roman empire, assured the church a prominent place in Jewish life and thought, characterized by negative attitudes or, at best, by ambivalence. On the one hand, Jews perceived the Catholic church as the great oppressor, responsible for much of their misery and persecution throughout history. They strove to respond in kind to the polemical attacks of Catholics, and in theological typology Latin Christendom was identified with Edom, destined to bring Jewish suffering to its eschatological climax. On the other hand, Jews of western Europe realized the value of papal protection, and they habitually petitioned the Holy See for guarantees and privileges; medieval liturgies for papal coronation ceremonies indicate that Roman Jews presented a gift of a Torah scroll to newly elected popes, who then affirmed the linkage between Judaism and Christianity that rationalized continued Jewish existence in a Christian world. More recently, many Jews, particularly in non-Orthodox circles, have responded positively to the new Catholic openness to religious dialogue. See also INTERFAITH RELATIONS.

ROMANIOT RITE, liturgical rite originally followed by the Jews of the Byzantine empire, the Balkans, and Asia Minor. It was based chiefly upon the liturgy established by the authorities of the late gaonic period (latter half of the 10th and early 11th cents.), although it was also influenced by the Palestinian and Italian rituals. By the beginning of the twentieth century, it still survived among a few congregations on the island of Corfu though it had been almost completely abandoned elsewhere. The Romanis spoke a Judeo-Greek dialect, and their prayer book included a prayer for the new moon in that language. On Yom Kippur, they read the Book of Jonah in both Hebrew and Greek, and they chanted *Kol Nidrei in Hebrew rather than Aramaic, as is the common practice.

ROSENBLATT, JOSEF (1882–1933), Russian-born cantor and composer. After conducting services throughout eastern Europe as a child prodigy, Rosenblatt served as hazzan in Mukachevo, Bratislava, and Hamburg before immigrating to the United States in 1912. Concert tours of Europe and the United States brought him great fame. Nevertheless, Rosenblatt maintained a scrupulous adherence to Jewish law and refused lucrative offers to appear in operatic roles and secular films. He did, however, allow his voice to be heard in The Jazz Singer (1927), and at the time of his sudden death, he was working in Jerusalem on a Yiddish film that would feature landscapes of Israel as a background to his own compositions.

Rosenblatt possessed a brilliant tenor voice with an impressive coloratura and an extensive range of two and a half octaves. Some of his best-known works were included in the 1907 collection Tefillot Yosef. He was among the leading performers and recording artists during the golden age of eastern European hazzanut (see CANTORIAL MUSIC), and several of his melodies retain a place in the synagogue repertoire.

ROSENZWEIG, FRANZ (1886–1929), German religious philosopher. His path to Judaism was marked by a dramatic turn from assimilation and philosophical relativism to a religious faith that took him at first, to the threshold of conversion to Christianity. His affirmation of religious faith, and eventually traditional Judaism (although his stance was hardly Orthodox) as a framework to realize this faith, was prompted by his adoption of a belief in revelation as a historical and existential reality. Such a belief must be the matrix of any genuine theology, he contended, otherwise one embraces an atheistic theology. Theology must proceed from the theocentric fact of divine revelation, of God's address to human beings. Rosenzweig developed his understanding of this address on the basis of a radical critique of philosophical idealism, with its quest for universal and thus timeless abstract truths. In contrast, revelation is in time; it is an occurrence whereby God establishes a relation with specific time-bound individuals. God addresses individuals in their finite existence calling them, as it were, by their "first and last names" which distinguish them existentially from all others. This relation is one of love, the divine utterance of Thou to the temporally contingent I of the individual. In revelation, the individual, in finite existence, is thus confirmed by divine love and blessed with an encounter with eternity.

This affirmation of revelation allowed Rosenzweig to discern in Judaism what many of his generation of assimilated German Jews had denied, namely, that Judaism was a faith of enduring existential significance. He elaborated his conception of faith and of Judaism in Der Stern der Erlösung (1921; English trans., The Star of Redemption by W. Hallo [New York, 1970; Notre Dame, 1985]). In this work, Rosenzweig focuses on the spiritual life of the Jews as structured by their ancient liturgical calendar. As a community of prayer, he argues, the Jews experience time not only as sacred but as cyclical: the pattern of prayer that guides the Jews' passion and spiritual imagination is set in a recurring yearly cycle. Hence, in prayer Jews do not experience the "growth" of time moving from year to year, but rather as spinning upon itself, in a recurring pattern of liturgical celebration. The linear, ever unfolding time of the mundane world, thus, hardly affects the spiritual reality of the Jews. The Jewish people, Rosenzweig concludes, is a community apart from history. But although insulated from history, or, rather, from the conceits and follies of a nation that lives in history, the Jews are not, as is often charged by Christian critics, a-historical; rather, they are meta-historical. Standing apart from history, they anticipate the spiritual reality of redemption, and thus, as the existential embodiment of the eschatological promise, they serve to inspire and prod the church (which, because of its divinely appointed mission to the gentiles, must perforce act through history) to lead humanity to the goal of a world beyond history; that is, a world that has overcome division, strife and war. For Rosenzweig, the Synagogue, as he preferred to call Jewry as a liturgical community, and the church are complementary covenants; the former being the sustaining "fire," the latter the luminous "flame" of God's saving light.

Subsequent to writing the Star, Rosenzweig devoted himself to adult Jewish education (see his On Jewish Learning, edited by N. N. Glatzer [New York, 1955]), founding the Freies Jüdisches Lehrhaus in Frankfurt. Guided by a unique dialogical approach to study of the classical sources of Judaism, the Lehrhaus became the fulcrum for a veritable spiritual renaissance of German Jewry. Although bedridden for the last seven years of his life by an almost total paralysis, he continued his religious quest. In particular, he explored the extra-liturgical expressions of Jewish piety, such as the commandments (mitsvot), which, when observed not as law but as a sacramental calling, he regarded as facilitating one's relation to the living God. Rosenzweig collaborated with Martin Buber in translating the Bible into German.

RO'SH. See ASHER BEN YEḤTEL.

RO'SH HA-SHANAH (רֹאשׁ הַשָּׁנָה; New Year), name of a festival and of a Mishnaic tractate.

Festival. Four days of the year are regarded as the New Year for different and specific purposes. They are enumerated in the first mishnah of tractate Ro'sh ha-Shanah. The first day of Nisan marked the New Year for dating the reigns of Jewish kings and the order of months for religious purposes, including the festivals. In Temple times, 1 Elul marked the New Year for cattle tithes, when tithes had to be given for cattle born during the previous year. The first day of Tishrei is the New Year for civil calendrical purposes and for shemittah* and yovel*. The fifteenth day of Shevat (or 1 Shevat, according to Beit Shamm'ai) is the New Year for trees (see TU BI-SHEVAT).

Of the four New Years, only 1 Tishrei is celebrated as a religious New Year festival (Ro'sh ha-Shanah), since on that day "all who have entered into the world pass before him [in judgment] like a flock of sheep" (R. ha-Sh. 1.2) and also because the first day of Tishrei is the only one of the four New Years to be specified in the Bible as a festival—"A Sabbath, a memorial of the sounding of the shofar*" (Lev. 23.23-24)—and "A day of sounding of the shofar (Nm. 29.1-6)—although no mention is made of it there as the New Year. The sounding of the shofar is one of the distinctive features of the religious celebration of the festival and has largely determined the character of the liturgy of the day, particularly the Musaf* service (see FESTIVAL PRAYERS). In the Ashkenazi rite, worshipers wear white as a symbol of purity, which traditionally is the color of the synagogue ark cover and Torah scroll cover on this day. Three groups of prayers, each consisting of ten scriptural verses selected from all three sections of the Bible, are inserted into the Musaf service, each with an introduction and closing paragraph compiled by Rav in the third century. The first section consists of verses describing the sovereignty of God (hence, called Malkhuyot*), the second speaks of God's remembrance of his creatures (Zikhronot*), and the third is related to the sounding of the shofar (Shofarot*). After each section the shofar is sounded according to a fixed pattern (with minor differences between the Sephardi and Ashkenazi rites). The solemn liturgy for the day includes special piyyutim, Avinu Malkenu*, and in the Ashkenazi rite U-Netanneh Toqef* (culminating in the declaration that penitence, prayer, and charity can annul a negative divine judgment), while during the recitation of Aleinu* in the repetition of Musaf, it is customary among Ashkenazim in Orthodox and some Conservative and Reform synagogues for the reader (and congregants) to prostrate themselves and kneel. Ro'sh ha-Shanah takes on additional significance since it marks the beginning of ten days of penitence (see ASERET YEMEI TESHUVAH*), which culminate in Yom Kippur*. Ro'sh ha-Shanah does not commemorate any historical event in Jewish history but rather the creation of the world. It has been since rabbinic times a period of self-examination and divine judgment, a judgment in this case universal. On this day God judges mankind for the forthcoming year, a judgment finally sealed on Yom Kippur. The liturgy stresses people's yearning for the establishment of God's sovereignty over the entire world and the ushering in of the millennium. Ro'sh ha-Shanah, observed for one day in biblical times, is now observed for two days, even in Erets Yisra'el (1-2 Tishrei; see YOM TOV SHENI SHEL GALUYTOT). However, many Reform congregations follow the biblical custom of one day. Various customs are connected with its celebration. On the first night, dishes are prepared that are meant to augur well for the new year; for example, apples dipped in honey are eaten while a prayer is recited for a "good and sweet year." On the second night, new fruit is eaten in order to be able to say the She-Heḥeyanu* blessing. It is also customary to go to a river or pond to recite Tashlikh*. The sages also called the festival Yom ha-Din (Day of Judgment) and Yom ha-Zikkaron (Day of Remembrance, i.e., a day on which God remembers humankind). The traditional greeting on the holiday is "may you be inscribed [in the Book of Life] for a good year."

Tractate. The tractate Ro'sh ha-Shanah is in Mishnah order Mo'ed, in four chapters, with related material in the Tosefta' and in both Talmuds. Its four chapters are evenly divided between two topics: the laws governing the sanctification of the new moon and the laws of Ro'sh ha-Shanah, especially the sounding of the shofar and the liturgy.

The sanctification of the new moon (see RO'SH HODESH) was charged with great significance for several reasons, including the establishment of the date of the festivals and the existence, during Second Temple times, of competing sectarian calendars (Boethusians, Samaritans, Qumran community). The sanctification was a dramatic public event that reinforced the connection between the high court in Jerusalem (later in Yavneh, see R. ha-Sh. 2.9) and the people (R. ha-Sh. 2.3-4). Although the festivals were sanctified by God (R. ha-Sh. 2.2), the authorization granted the court to determine the time when the festivals would occur symbolized the autonomy conferred by God upon human authority.

The central rule of the Ro'sh ha-Shanah festival is the sounding of the shofar. Although the scriptural sources for this ritual (Lv. 23.24; Nm. 29.1) do not define the instrument to be used, Ro'sh ha-Shanah specifies the use of animal horns, examining the symbolic meaning of the horns of various animals.

The tractate in Talmud Bavli was translated into English by Maurice Simon in the Soncino Talmud (London, 1938).

RO'SH HODESH (רֹאשׁ חֹדֶשׁ; New Moon), the beginning of the Hebrew month. During the period of the First Temple, Ro'sh Hodesh was regarded as a semi-festival (possibly the continuation of an ancient moon-festival tradition) when the people abstained from business (Am. 8.5), thronged the Temple (Is. 1.13-14, 66.23), held family feasts (I Sm. 20.5), and visited the prophet (2 Kgs. 4.23). The festive character of the day was equally signified by its special sacrifice (Nm. 28.11-15) and by the blowing of the trumpet (Nm. 10.10). The festivities surrounding the new moon disappeared during the Second Temple period, except for the custom granting freedom from work on that day. According to rabbinic legend, when the Israelites were at Mount Sinai, women refused to join their husbands in building the golden calf. As a reward, God made Ro'sh Hodesh a special day for women (Pirkei de-Rabbi Eli'ezer). Considerable attention was paid to the determination of the new moon by the Sanhedrin through the testimony of two eye witnesses (see CALENDAR), and the liturgy of the day reflects its ancient importance. The dates of Ro'sh Hodesh were finally fixed in 358 CE under *Hillel II, whose calendar was based on astronomic calculation. When in the third century Rav, on a visit to Babylon from Palestine, heard a community reciting the half *Hallel on that day, for which there was no apparent authority, he decided to retain the custom—it was obviously based on an old tradition; recitation of the half Hallel has since become universal. The festive nature of Ro'sh Hodesh is further stressed by the scriptural reading, the recitation of *Ya'aleh ve-Yavo', and the removal of the tefillin before the recitation of *Musaf. Fasting and mourning are forbidden on Ro'sh Hodesh, which is observed for two days, the last day of the old month and the first of the new, when the preceding month has thirty days. If the preceding month has twenty-nine days, Ro'sh Hodesh is observed for only one day. The blessing recited on the Sabbath preceding the new moon (Shabbat Mevarekhim) is a relic of a custom in the synagogue, antedating the fixing of the calendar, to establish the new moon on the evidence of eyewitnesses. Since the early 1970s, growing numbers of Jewish women, particularly in the United States, have rediscovered the new moon's special significance. Orthodox women's prayer groups often meet on Ro'sh Hodesh, naming ceremonies for baby daughters are frequently held then, and communities of women, in synagogue and private settings, participate in rituals celebrating the rebirth and renewal of women and the moon. RO'SH YESHIVAH (רֹאשׁ יִשְׁבָּה; head of the yeshivah), the head of an institution for the study of the Talmud. In the *Yequm Purqan prayer, the phrase occurs in the Aramaic plural as reishei metivata'; in that passage, the heads of yeshivot rank after the ge'onim and exilarchs but take precedence over "judges in the gates." Now, the title is also applied in some yeshivot not only to the head of the yeshivah but also to the permanent members of the teaching staff. In the national religious yeshivot in Israel, the term is reserved for the head of the institution, while the other lecturers are known as ramim (the plural of ram, an abbreviation of the phrase ro'sh metivta'). In eastern Europe the ro'sh yeshivah traditionally deferred to the town rabbi in questions of Jewish law. Currently, however, particularly among the Haredim, it is the ro'sh yeshivah who is the final arbiter in matters of Jewish law.

ROSSI, 'AZARYAH BEN MOSHEH DEI (c.1511-1577), Italian scholar. Born in Mantua into a prominent Italian-Jewish family, Rossi studied medicine as well as archaeology and history, and he was familiar with Hebrew, Latin, and Italian literature. He lived in various towns in Italy, notably Ferrara and Mantua. The first section of Rossi's major work, Me'or 'Einayim (Mantua, 1573–1575), compared Jewish and non-Jewish classical and medieval theories of earthquakes. The second section consisted of the first Hebrew translation of the Letter of Aristeas*. In the final section, Rossi critically examined the veracity of Jewish sources (but not the Bible) in light of contradictory non-Jewish sources, including the writings of the church fathers. The effect was to reconfigure Jewish history and chronology. Rossi challenged the accuracy and origin of the traditional Jewish calendar and concluded that the Persian period of Jewish history was longer and more important than acknowledged. He further proved that Sefer Yosippon, considered an authoritative source of ancient Jewish history, was a medieval forgery. As the first Jewish scholar to use Greek-Jewish literature in his reconstruction of Jewish history, literature, religion, and culture, Rossi was largely responsible for reviving interest in the works of *Philo. Though contemporary religious scholars never doubted Rossi's personal piety, his work was found objectionable and banned. Some historians view Rossi's book as the first modern work of Jewish history.

ROSSI, SALAMONE (c.1570–1628), first composer of music for the synagogue. Born in Mantua, Italy, Rossi entered the service of the Gonzagan court of Mantua as a singer and violist in 1587. He also conducted an instrumental ensemble comprised largely of Jewish musicians and is credited as the originator of the "trio sonata." Relying upon a 1605 responsum by R. Leone *Modena permitting choral music in the synagogue, Rossi published a group of thirty-three settings of Hebrew psalms and other liturgical texts for varying combinations of three to eight voices, Ha-Shirim Asher li-Shelomoh (1622–1623). The limited musical vocabulary of Rossi's time required him to employ the Western harmonic techniques of the seventeenth century and to largely abandon the Eastern flavored traditional melodies of the Italian synagogue. Rossi took great care in selecting his texts, however, often displaying uniquely Jewish sensitivities in settings including Berekhu and Psalm 137.

Although his ducal patrons absolved him of the requirement to wear a yellow patch identifying him as a Jew and restricting his movement throughout the duchy, Rossi remained a proud Jew, adding the name Ebreo (the Hebrew) to his signature. Nothing is known about him after the Austrian invasion of Mantua (1628–1630), but the nineteenth-century recovery of his scores (in the attic of a Paris synagogue) brought to light his contribution to synagogue music history.

ROZIN, YOSEF (1858–1936), one of the outstanding Talmudists of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries; known as the Rogachover, after his birthplace, Rogachov, Poland. From 1889 he served as rabbi to the Hasidic community of Dvinsk (Daugavpils, Latvia). Rozin knew a great deal of rabbinic literature, including both Talmuds, by heart and was a prolific author. Unlike his clear verbal expositions, his writings are obscure and contain many arguments that are made by referring to unspecified sources. His entire literary body of work is known as Tsofnat Pa'neah. Many of his responsa as well as his commentary on Maimonides' Mishneh Torah (1903–1908) have been published.

RUAH HA-QODESH (רוח הקודש; holy spirit), divine spirit; spirit emanating from *God. The expression occurs only three times in the Bible, where it is synonymous with God (Is. 63.10) or else signifies his sustaining and inspiring presence (Is. 63.11; Ps. 51.13). Elsewhere biblical usage prefers "spirit of God" (Ruah Elohim, Ruah YHVH, or Ruah El) to denote the creative action of God (Gn. 1.2; Ps. 129.7; Job 33.4), as well as the powers of superior wisdom, statesmanship, and valor that he imparts to human beings (e.g., Jgs. 13.25; Is. 11.2), more particularly the gift of inspired speech (2 Sm. 23.2). It is the latter sense that became especially associated with the later usage of the expression. According to the Talmud (Sot. 48b) the holy spirit departed from Israel with the death of the last prophets, although a minor form of celestial communication still existed in the bat qol*. Hence, in some apocryphal writings "holy spirit" refers either to the age of biblical *prophecy or to the prophetic revival in the messianic age (cf. Jl. 2.28–29); in others, the term is made to approximate the concept of an ever-present divine *wisdom. The Targum often renders the "spirit of God" as the "spirit of prophecy" and in this sense the term "holy spirit" is often akin to the concept of shekhinah. Rabbinic and medieval philosophical writers distinguished higher and lower forms of *inspiration and degrees of action attributed to the holy spirit, for example, the direct inspiration of the Pentateuch, the "prophetic spirit" in the prophetic books proper, and the holy spirit informing the *Hagiographa. Following R. Pinhas ben Ya'ir's dictum (Sot. 9.15), "piety leads to the holy spirit," it has been generally held—with many variations of form and emphasis—that the holy spirit as a degree of spiritual perfection (viz., communion with God, devequt*, and even illumination) can be attained by earnest striving, religious observance, ascetic discipline, and moral and intellectual perfection.

RULE OF THE COMMUNITY, a work among several others found in the *Dead Sea Scrolls containing regulations for the sectarian *Qumran community. The Rule of the Community (Serekh ha-Yahad) deals with admission of new members, the annual covenant ceremony, communal organization and meetings, and the penal code. It incorporates a manifesto of the community's aims, a treatise on the "Two Spirits," and a concluding hymn. Appended to one manuscript (1QS) are rules for the eschatological community (the Rule of the Congregation and the Rule of Benedictions). The numerous copies of Rule of the Community reflect the importance of these rules for the Qumran sect.

RUTH, book in the Hagiographa section of the Bible, one of the Five Scrolls (see HAMESH MEGILLOT). The story, which is set in the time of the judges, tells of Naomi, wife of Elimelech of the tribe of Judah, who moved to Moab to escape a famine. After a ten-year sojourn in Moab, during which her husband and two sons die, Naomi returns impoverished to Bethlehem. Her Moabite daughter-in-law Ruth insists on following her, and Naomi fails in her attempt to dissuade her. While gleaning in the fields, in her concern for Naomi's survival, Ruth meets a wealthy landowner, Boaz, whom she discovers to be a kinsman of Naomi. Boaz has heard of Ruth's selfless devotion to Naomi and treats her deferentially. At the end of the harvest, Ruth, acting on Naomi's advice, seeks out Boaz by night on the threshing floor and entreats him to assume the responsibilities of the next of kin and redeem the fortunes of the family. Boaz agrees but does not compromise Ruth's honor. Only after dutifully ascertaining that another, closer kinsman has forfeited his rights does Boaz make Ruth his lawfully wedded wife. She bears him a son, who is declared to be Naomi's child and is reared by Naomi. The son, Obed, is the grandfather of King David. Rabbinic tradition ascribes the book to Samuel (B. B. 14b), but linguistic and other evidence indicate that it was probably written in postexilic times. The basic aim of the book, which is divided into four chapters, is to provide a genealogy for David, missing in the Book of Samuel. Many commentators assume that the book, by arguing that a non-Israelite can be worthy of producing royal progeny, opposes the measures taken by Ezra to combat intermarriage. Others claim the opposite: that Ruth is an atypical non-Israelite, and that by stressing that Obed is legally Naomi's child and not Ruth's, the book merely acknowledges a Moabite strain in David's lineage but minimizes its importance. The Book of Ruth is read in the synagogue on the festival of Shavu'ot because of its connection with the harvest and with King David, traditionally believed to have been born on Shavu'ot.

RUZHIN, YISRA'EL OF (1796–1850), great-grandson of R. *Dov Ber of Mezhibezh; one of the most controversial figures in the history of Hasidism. Rabbi Yisra'el Friedmann is known for the great luxury and splendor with which he surrounded himself. He was revered as a powerful holy man by thousands of followers, and his blessing was thought to have great impact. In 1838 he was accused (probably accurately) of collusion in the murder of two Jews who were informers for the Russian government. His imprisonment, which lasted nearly two years, caused great consternation among his faithful. Even after he was released for lack of evidence, the government continued to watch him, suspecting that he wanted to establish political hegemony for himself in the Jewish community. He fled Russia, first to Kishinev in Bessarabia, then to Jassy, in Moldavia, and in 1845 he settled in Sadagora, just outside Chernovtsy, Bukovina, then under Austrian rule. There he reestablished his court in undiminished glory. His sons succeeded him in Sadagora, Chortkov, and also in various towns of Romania. In 1869 his son Dov of Leova caused great scandal by leaving his Hasidim, moving to the home of a supporter of the Haskalah in Chernovtsy, and denouncing Hasidism as a sham. While he soon recanted, perhaps forced by his brothers, the incident was not forgotten. Rabbi Hayyim *Halberstam claimed that his apostasy had been punishment for the opulent life-style of the Friedmanns, and a long controversy ensued. Later generations of the Ruzhin dynasty were scattered throughout the Galician-Romanian border areas. Many perished during the Holocaust.

RYMANOWER, MENAHEM MENDEL. See MENAHEM MENDEL BEN YOSEF OF RYMANÓW.

SA'ADYAH BEN YOSEF GA'ON (882–942), scholar and ga'on in Babylonia. Sa'adyah was born in the Fayum district of Egypt and wandered through Palestine and other lands before settling in Babylonia. After playing a leading role in the controversy between Palestine and Babylonia concerning the fixing of the calendar (921–922), he was appointed ga'on of Sura in 928, in spite of his unconventional background (ge'onim usually belonged to one of a small number of Babylonian families intimately associated with a given academy and spent their entire careers within that setting) and reservations concerning his uncompromising personality. These misgivings were not entirely unfounded. Shortly after his appointment, Sa'adyah became embroiled in a bitter conflict with the exilarch David ben Zakk'ai, who had secured his appointment; each declared the other to be deposed and appointed a successor. Years passed before the two men were reconciled, by dint of the efforts of leading members of the Jewish community of Baghdad.

Sa'adyah's background and personality led to a profound revolution in the nature of geonic intellectual and literary activity. Prior to his period of office, the intellectual elite of Babylonian Jewry concerned itself almost exclusively with the transmission, explication, and practical application of the Talmud Bavli, the literary vehicle for these endeavors being responsa*. Sa'adyah expanded the canonical library to include the Talmud Yerushalmi, and probably other works of post-tannaitic Palestinian rabbinic literature, such as various midrashim. Another innovation was the composition of systematic treatises on selected halakhic topics. These were modeled on similar works in the field of Islamic law (fiqh); a striking indication of this dependence is that they were invariably written in Judeo-Arabic. These works represented a radical departure in rabbinic literature, which had previously been dominated by collective and largely anonymous works (e.g., the two Talmuds), and served as a precedent for later rabbinic authors.

Particularly noteworthy is Sa'adyah's siddur (prayer book; Siddur Rav Sa'adyah Ga'on, edited by S. Assaf, I. Davidson, and B. I. Joel [1941]), which combines liturgical texts with halakhic instructions, not all of them concerned with liturgical matters. In contrast to his other halakhic monographs, Sa'adyah dispensed with Talmudic proof texts in his siddur, on the ground that it was intended to be a practical manual rather than an academic text. A large part of the prayer book is devoted to describing and analyzing various local customs that Sa'adyah had encountered in the course of his travels. Numerous liturgical poems (piyyutim) are also included, as are two prose petitions (baqqashot) that he composed.

Although apparently not the first, Sa'adyah's Judeo-Arabic translation of the Torah and several other biblical books achieved great popularity and influence among Arabic-speaking Jews. He also wrote innovative commentaries on a number of biblical books, including at least half of the Torah. These had a profound impact on later Jewish biblical commentators (especially, though not exclusively, on those writing in Arabic) and emphasized philological, philosophical, and polemical themes.

In the field of piyyut, Sa'adyah was one of the earliest leading poets to reside in Babylonia. Much of his poetry is characterized by linguistic innovations, in keeping with his belief that any morphological form attested in Biblical Hebrew might legitimately be applied to any Biblical Hebrew root. Closely related to his work in the biblical and poetic fields are a number of grammatical and lexicographical writings, including the Egron, a dictionary of which one half was arranged in alphabetical order and the other half as a rhyming dictionary to assist poets (edited by N. Allony [1969]).

Sa'adyah's Book of Beliefs and Opinions, known in Hebrew under the title Emunot ve-De'ot, is the first great medieval Jewish philosophical classic. This work is indebted to Aristotelianism and Platonism and clearly states the view held by most medieval philosophers that there was a distinction but no contradiction between reason and revealed religion. Intellectual speculation only confirms the truths of Judaism. The Torah provides a philosophical system. Creation is ex nihilo and within time, and proof of God's existence can be inferred from creation. The object of creation was to bring happiness within the reach of all creatures; for the individual, this is attained through the commandments, which fall into two categories: ethical commandments, which conform to reason and would be observed even without revelation; and ceremonial commandments, which have the authority of revelation alone. The Torah is revealed reason. Sa'adyah's definitions of God and his attributes influenced philosophers and mystics (e.g., the Ḥasidei Ashkenaz). His philosophical approach owes much to Islamic writers of the Kalam school, who had grappled with similar issues after becoming acquainted with the works of classical philosophers. Emunot ve-De'ot, written in Judeo-Arabic, was translated into and paraphrased in Hebrew several times during the Middle Ages and represents an important milestone in the history of Jewish philosophy, although it was harshly criticized by later authors, including Maimonides.

An important number of Sa'adyah's writings are explicitly polemical and directed mainly at the Karaites and other sectarians or heretics (notably against Ḥivi al-Balkhi, published by Israel Davidson [1915]) but also at opponents within the world of rabbinic Judaism, such as David ben Zakk'ai. Implicit polemics also occur in many of Sa'adyah's works in other fields.

Most of Sa'adyah's halakhic works remain in manuscript. A number were published by J. Müller (Paris, 1897). The first Hebrew edition of The Book of Beliefs and Opinions appeared in Constantinople in 1562; the Arabic original, edited by S. Landauer, in 1880; and an English translation by S. Rosenblatt in 1948. Yosef Kafah published a Hebrew translation with the Arabic original in 1970. Sa'adyah's Bible commentary on Genesis appeared in 1980, edited by M. Zucker, and an English translation of the commentary on Job, by L. E. Goodman (The Book of Theodicy), in 1988. A five-volume edition, Saadia ben Joseph al-Fayyumi: Oeuvres completes, edited by J. Derenbourg, H. Derenbourg, and M. Lambert, was issued between 1893 and 1899.

SABA, AVRAHAM BEN YA'AQOV (15th–16th cent.), Bible commentator and kabbalist. When the Jews were expelled from his native Spain, he moved to Oporto in Portugal. There his wife and children were subjected to forced baptism; he was imprisoned but managed to escape to Morocco and settled in Fez. He had had to leave his writings behind but rewrote them from memory. Later he moved to Tlemcen in Algeria and possibly from there to Italy and Adrianople.

His major work, Tseror ha-Mor (Venice, 1522; repr. under the title Hibbur Qadosh ve-Nora' [Warsaw, 1880]; edited by B. Wichleder [Bene Beraq, 1990]), is a commentary on the Torah containing many topical messages for his contemporaries, among them the importance of observing the Sabbath and not taking non-Jewish wives. He identifies with the biblical stories, seeing Mordecai and Esther as precursors of the Marranos, and criticizes Esther for entering the palace of Ahasuerus, compared to Ruth, who clung to the God of Israel. Saba sharply criticized Spain and Portugal and did not spare the Muslim lands on account of the sufferings of Jews in North Africa (in his Eshkol ha-Kofer, commentaries on the Five Scrolls, of which his commentaries on Ruth and Esther were published by A. Segal [Breslau-Drogobych, 1904–1908]).

SABBATAI TSEVI. See SHABBETAI TSEVI.

SABBATH, the weekly day of rest observed from sunset on Friday until nightfall on Saturday (a period of approximately twenty-five hours). It has been suggested that the biblical Sabbath displays certain similarities to the Babylonian shappatu, but the connection is dubious. The Sabbath is central to the Bible. God created the world in six days and rested on the seventh. Moreover, it is written, "and God blessed the seventh day and declared it holy" (Gn. 2.3). The Sabbath is the only festival mentioned in the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20.8–11), and it is especially emphasized in God's words to Moses in Exodus 31.12–17. Both of these passages refer to God's rest from the work of creation; from this principle is derived the ban on all work by humans (with special mention of all slaves) and animals on the Sabbath day. In the repetition of the Decalogue (Dt. 5.15), the Sabbath is also linked to the Exodus and the miraculous deliverance from slavery to freedom that that narrative expresses. The Sabbath is referred to as a symbol of the *covenant between God and Israel (Ex. 31.16–17). Therefore, in rabbinic law, tefillin*, which are also a symbol of the divine covenant, do not have to be worn on the Sabbath. Even before the revelation at Sinai, the Israelites were forbidden to gather manna on the Sabbath because it was "a day of rest, a holy Sabbath to the Lord" (Ex. 16.23). Public desecration of the Sabbath was punishable by death according to biblical law (see Nm. 15.32–36); the rabbis, in fact, considered the public desecration of the Sabbath a sin equal to idolatry. During the First Temple period, observance of the Sabbath was taken for granted, and there are few biblical references to it, but in the early Second Temple period, Nehemiah enforced the suspension of all trade and business activities on the Sabbath (Neh. 13.14–22). At the time of the Maccabean Revolt, Sabbath observance was so strict that Jewish warriors preferred to be killed rather than offer resistance on that day. In response, a ruling was promulgated saying that the preservation of life overrides the observance of the Sabbath, and the warriors were allowed to fight in their own defense (1 Mc. 2.40–41). Exodus 31.14 is considered the scriptural reference for this halakhah: "for it [the Sabbath] is holy unto you," implying that "the Sabbath is given unto you; you are not to be delivered to the Sabbath" (Yoma' 85b).

The Mishnaic sages enumerated thirty-nine principal categories of work (mal'akhah) forbidden on the Sabbath, each of which is further subdivided. These included sowing, plowing, reaping, binding sheaves, threshing, winnowing, cleansing crops, grinding, sifting, kneading, baking, shearing wool, washing wool, spinning, weaving, making two loops, weaving two threads, separating two threads, tying a knot, loosening a knot, sewing two stitches, tearing, hunting, slaughtering or salting or curing the skin of an animal, cutting up an animal, writing two letters of the alphabet, erasing, building, demolishing, putting out a fire, lighting a fire, striking with a hammer, or carrying from one domain to another. In addition, the rabbis added further restrictions (see SEYAG LA-TORAH) so that there would be no danger of infringing the categories. For example, the rabbis forbade even the handling of certain objects associated with work (see MUQSEH). At the same time, a number of laws and legal fictions were introduced to offer ways around certain restrictions (see, for example, ERUV). In certain emergencies, the laws of the Sabbath could be overruled, especially if their observance posed a *danger to life. Jews often employed non-Jews to perform some of these labors for them; in eastern Europe such an employee was known as a shabbes goy.

Essentially, the Sabbath is a day of physical rest and spiritual joy, centered around the twin poles of home and synagogue (for the distinctive liturgy, see SABBATH PRAYERS). As the men leave for synagogue for the evening service (*Qabbalat Shabbat), the women recite a special blessing over the Sabbath candles (see KINDLING OF LIGHTS). Upon his return, the husband blesses his wife (see ESHET HAYIL) and the children (see BLESSING OF CHILDREN). Then the *Qiddush prayer, sanctifying the Sabbath day, is recited over wine and the *Birkat ha-Motsi' is recited over two loaves of bread (hallah), which recall the two portions of manna gathered by the Israelites on the Sabbath eve. The festive meal is punctuated with the singing of Sabbath zemirot*. At the conclusion of the meal, the *Birkat ha-Mazon is said. In non-Orthodox homes, the Sabbath meal may be eaten before the family goes to a late synagogue service. It is a widespread custom to invite guests to the Sabbath meals. Marital intercourse is regarded as especially meritorious on the Sabbath eve. In general, the Sabbath should be a "day of delight" (see ONEG SHABBAT).

After Sabbath morning services, another festive meal is eaten, also preceded by Qiddush, and the afternoon is spent in study or rest. In ancient times it was customary to eat two meals a day, but the rabbis decreed that on the Sabbath there should be a third meal (*Se'udah Shelishit). This is enjoyed in the late afternoon, and participants sing zemirot and expound Torah. Under the influence of the kabbalists and Hasidism, this meal may be prolonged as long as possible, to retain the Sabbath spirit, and is called *Melavveh Malkah (Escorting the Queen, from the concept of the Sabbath as a queen). Sabbath ends with the evening service, which is held after three stars appear in the sky. *Havdalah, which marks the separation between the holy and the secular, is recited in the synagogue (in certain communities) and the home.

In the nineteenth century, some Reform congregations celebrated a "second Sabbath," by holding Sabbath services on Sunday mornings for those who had to work on Saturdays, but this practice was rejected by the moderate Reform as a step too far in the direction of Christianity. In the course of time, the entire Reform movement accepted the traditional Sabbath day. In the Mishnah and Talmud, tractate Shabbat* is devoted to the laws of the Sabbath.

The idea of the weekly Sabbath passed into the other monotheistic religions, although the Christian Sunday originally had a different emphasis and only later became a "day of rest"; the Muslim Friday is not a day of rest at all but a day of communal prayer. A number of Christian sects, however, observe Saturday as their Sabbath.

SABBATH, GREAT. See SABBATHS, SPECIAL.

SABBATH EVE. See QABBALAT SHABBAT.

SABBATH LIGHTS. See KINDLING OF LIGHTS.

SABBATH PRAYERS. As far as their basic structure is concerned, the prayers recited on Sabbath do not differ from those of other days, except that the 'Amidah consists of only seven benedictions (Ber. 3.12), and that in addition to the three regular daily prayers a fourth—*Musaf—is added, as on festivals. Reform Judaism eliminated the Musaf service and the most recent Conservative and Reconstructionist siddurim have modified it extensively. The Sabbath 'Amidah does not contain the series of petitions prescribed for weekdays. The intermediate benediction of the 'Amidah, which is devoted to the sanctification of the day (Qedushat ha-Yom), opens differently in each Sabbath service, though the conclusion is always the same ("Blessed . . . who sanctifies the Sabbath"). During *Ma'ariv, the opening Attah qiddashta, "You have sanctified," followed by Genesis 2.1–3, emphasizes the Sabbath of Creation. In Shaharit, the opening Yismah Mosheh, "Moses rejoiced," followed by Exodus 31.16–17, refers to the revelation at Sinai; in *Minhah, the opening Attah ehad, "You are One," evokes the "perfect rest and peace" of messianic redemption. Taken together, these three openings express three different aspects of the Sabbath—as a commemoration of Creation and of revelation, and as a symbol of future redemption. In the Musaf prayer the intermediate benediction of the Ashkenazi rite opens with Tiqqanta Shabbat, "You have instituted the Sabbath," a paragraph whose words are arranged in reverse alphabetical order.

On Friday evenings, Ma'ariv is preceded by Qabbalat Shabbat, a ceremony that consists in most rites of a number of psalms (among them Psalm 92, the "Sabbath psalm") and the hymn Lekhah Dodi, which was introduced by the kabbalists in Safed at the end of the sixteenth century. The benedictions before and after the Shema' are in most rites today the same as on weekdays, except for a different conclusion to *Hashkivenu and the addition of Exodus 31.16–17, *Ve-Shameru. This is followed by the 'Amidah and the recital of Genesis 2.1–3. The reader then repeats aloud a summary of the 'Amidah (*Magen Avot) in a single benediction. It is customary to read the second chapter of Mishnah Shabbat (*Ba-Meh Madliqin), and in many congregations Qiddush is also recited by the reader. At home, prior to sunset (or, among many non-Orthodox Jews, when the family gathers for dinner), candles are lit to welcome the Sabbath, then Qiddush is recited, followed by the meal, which is accompanied by the singing of zemirot. At the end of the meal, *Birkat ha-Mazon is recited, with special additions for the Sabbath. During Shaharit, the *Pesuqe de-Zimra' are said in extended form and are followed by Nishmat Kol Hai. *Yotser is enlarged by piyyutim, which combine the Sabbath motif with the prayer text. The 'Amidah is followed by the reading of the law (see QER'AT HA-TORAH) and haftarah*. The Torah scroll is taken out and returned to the ark with great ceremony, including various prayers not used on weekdays. Before the morning meal, Qiddush (differing significantly from the evening version) is again recited. For Minḥah there is again a short reading of the law from the sidrah* of the following week. It is customary after Minḥah to read, in the summer, one of the chapters of Mishnah Avot*, and in the winter, a collection of psalms (Psalm 104 and the Song of Degrees, Psalm 120, through Psalm 134). Upon the termination of the Sabbath, Ma'ariv is recited, as on weekdays, and is followed by Havdalah*. The Sabbath has a distinct beginning and a distinct end. It is sanctified at the beginning with light and wine and is concluded with light and wine.

SABBATHS, SPECIAL, so designated because of their place in the calendrical year or because of the particular scriptural readings on them.

Shabbat Shuvah (שַׁבָּת שׁוּבָה; Sabbath of Return), the name given to the Sabbath that falls during the ten days of penitence (see 'ASERET YEMEI TESHUVAH) between Ro'sh ha-Shanah* and Yom Kippur*, which is derived from the first word of the haftarah* designated for that day, Shuvah Yisra'el 'ad Adonai Elohekha, "Return, O Israel, unto the Lord your God" (Hos. 14.2). It is customary on this Sabbath for the rabbi to deliver a sermon on the theme of repentance. The day is also referred to as Shabbat Teshuvah (Sabbath of Repentance).

Shabbat be-Re'shit (שַׁבָּת בְּרֵאשִׁית; Sabbath of the Beginning [also, of Genesis]), the first Sabbath after Simḥat Torah*, when the annual cycle of weekly Torah readings begins anew with the portion Genesis 1–6.8 (parashah or sidrah). Shabbat be-Re'shit retains a little of the festive atmosphere of Simḥat Torah, and in many communities, it is customary for the hatan Be-Re'shit (see HATAN TORAH AND HATAN BE-RE'SHIT) to host a Qidush reception for the congregation after services.

Shabbat Shirah (שַׁבָּת שִׁירָה; Sabbath of Song), the Sabbath when the parashah Be-Shalah (Ex. 13.17–17.6) is read, which contains Shirat ha-Yam (Song of the Sea; a hymn of praise), which Moses and the children of Israel sang after their deliverance at the Red Sea. All communities—Ashkenazi, Sephardi, and Oriental—have their own special melodies to which the song is chanted. In Ashkenazi communities, the congregation stands during the song's recitation. Special piyyutim (see PIYYUT) are recited in some rites.

Shabbat Sheqalim (שַׁבָּת שֶׁקָלִים; Sabbath of the Shekels), the Sabbath before the first of Adar (or on the first of Adar if it falls on the Sabbath; in a leap year, the second month of Adar); the first of four (Arba' Parashiyot) leading up to Pesaḥ. A second Torah scroll is removed from the synagogue ark for the reading of a special maftir* (Ex. 30.11–16). The haftarah is 2 Kings 12.1–17 for Ashkenazim, 2 Kings 11.17–12.17 for Sephardim. The maftir contains the law of the half-shekel tax that was paid by every adult male over the age of twenty and is described as "a ransom for the soul." The money collected went to finance the sacred service. The tax was announced on the first day of Adar and was payable during that month. Shabbat Sheqalim was instituted after the Temple period as a reminder of the tax. Special piyyutim were composed for recitation on this Sabbath.

Shabbat Zakhor (שַׁבָּת זָכוֹר; Sabbath of Remembering), the name given to the Sabbath before the festival of Purim*, on which a special maftir (Dt. 25.17–19), which begins with the word zakhor (remember), is read in the synagogue from a second Torah scroll. These biblical verses contain an exhortation to remember the vicious cruelty of the Amalekites*, who attacked the Israelites soon after the Exodus* from Egypt. According to tradition, Haman*, the archvillain of the Purim story, was a descendant of the Amalekite tribe. The special haftarah, which deals with the execution of the king of the Amalekites, is from 1 Samuel 15.1–34. Special piyyutim were written to be recited on this Sabbath.

Shabbat Parah (שַׁבָּת פָּרָה; Sabbath of the [Red] Heifer), the Sabbath preceding Shabbat ha-Hodesh (see below) when a special maftir about the red heifer* and a special haftarah about ritual purity (from Ez. 36) are read. During the Temple period, anyone in a state of ritual impurity was prohibited from participating in the ritual of the paschal sacrifice (see PESAḤ). One could be cleansed only with the ashes of the red heifer mixed with water. In some rites, special piyyutim are recited.

Shabbat ha-Hodesh (שַׁבָּת הַחֹדֶשׁ; Sabbath of the Month), the title given to the Sabbath before the first of the month of Nisan (or the first of Nisan if that day falls on a Sabbath), which signifies the arrival of the month of Nisan, in which the Israelites were delivered from Egyptian bondage. A second Torah scroll is removed from the synagogue ark, and a special maftir, Exodus 12.1–20, on the laws of the paschal lamb, is recited. The haftarah is Ezekiel 45.16–46.18. If Shabbat ha-Hodesh coincides with Ro'sh Hodesh* (the New Moon) Nisan, the regular weekly portion is read from the first scroll, the designated reading for Ro'sh Hodesh is read from a second scroll, and a third scroll is used for the reading of the maftir for Shabbat ha-Hodesh.

Shabbat ha-Gadol (שַׁבָּת הַגָּדוֹל; Great Sabbath), the Sabbath before Pesaḥ. Various reasons have been suggested for this Sabbath's designation. First, the Exodus from Egypt took place on 15 Nisan, which was a Thursday. On the tenth of the month (a Sabbath) the children of Israel were commanded to slaughter a lamb. In view of the sacredness of the lamb to the Egyptians, the Israelites showed great courage and faith in obeying the command; hence, the name Great Sabbath. Second, the Sabbath before Pesaḥ may also take its special title from the haftarah for that day, which concludes, "Behold I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and terrible day of the Lord" (Mal. 3.24). The reference to Elijah*, who features in the Pesaḥ Seder*, and to the "the great . . . day" give this Sabbath its distinctive name. Finally, on this Sabbath, it is customary for the rabbi to review all the laws of Pesaḥ with the congregation. In earlier times, his lesson was so lengthy that the congregation, feeling they had spent most of the day in the synagogue, began calling that Sabbath "the great [i.e., long] Sabbath." There is no special maftir for this Sabbath, but there is a special haftarah, Malachi 3.4–24. It is customary to read the first narrative section of the *Haggadah of Pesah after the *Minhah service. In certain Sephardi communities (e.g., Salonika), Jewish schoolchildren received new garments on this day, which was known as Hag ha-Halbashah (the Feast of Putting on [New] Garments).

Shabbat Hazon (שַׁבָּת הַצֹּהֵן; Sabbath of Vision), the Sabbath immediately preceding the fast of *Tish'ah be-'Av, so called because the haftarah for that Sabbath, Isaiah 1.1–27, begins with the words Hazon Yesha'yahu ben Amos, "The vision of Isaiah the son of Amos." This is the last of the three prophetic readings of "rebuken" (Sheloshah de-Puranata) read on the three Sabbaths during the three-week mourning period that culminates with Tish'ah be-'Av. In this haftarah, the prophet castigates the people of Judah for their serious religious sins and social crimes and warns them of the impending destruction of the land and the downfall of the people. In Ashkenazi synagogues, the chapter is traditionally chanted to the tune used for reading the *Book of Lamentations. The *Lekha Dodi hymn recited at the preceding Friday-evening service is also chanted to the mournful melody of *Eli Tsiyyon. In geonic times, Shabbat Hazon was called Shabbat Shehorah (Black Sabbath), and the ark was covered with a black curtain. In some communities, it was not unusual for people to wear regular weekday clothes instead of their festive Sabbath attire. Yemenite Jews read Isaiah 1.21–27 for the haftarah and call the day Shabbat Eikhah (Eikhah being the Hebrew name for the Book of Lamentations).

Shabbat Nahamu (שַׁבָּת נַחֲמֵנוּ; Sabbath of Comfort), the Sabbath immediately following the fast of Tish'ah be-'Av. The haftarah, from Isaiah 40, begins with the words Nahamu nahamu 'ami, "Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people." In it, the prophet offers a message of encouragement and hope for the return of the Jewish exiles and for the physical and spiritual rebuilding of the destroyed Jerusalem and the Holy Land. Shabbat Nahamu is the first of the seven haftarot of "consolation" (Sheva' de-Neḥemta) that are read on the seven Sabbaths between Tish'ah be-'Av and Ro'sh ha-Shanah.

Shabbat Mevarekhim (שַׁבָּת מְבָרְכִים; Sabbath of Blessing), the Sabbath before Ro'sh Hodesh (the new moon), on which a special prayer is recited before the *Musaf service invoking God to make the coming month one of spiritual fulfillment and material prosperity. As part of the ceremony, the name of the new month is formally announced, as well as the day or days upon which Ro'sh Hodesh falls. The ritual was introduced in the fourth century, when *Hillel II determined the calendar, and became particularly important in the eighth century, when the rabbinic method of calculation was challenged by the *Karaites. A private prayer composed by third-century scholar *Rav for recitation after the *Amidah was added at a late date (c. 18th cent.). The Sephardi version of this prayer (beginning Yehi ratson, "May it be your will") is longer than the Ashkenazi version. The ritual is omitted on the Sabbath before the month of Tishrei, since 1 Tishrei is also Ro'sh ha-Shanah, and it is assumed that everyone is aware of that date.

Shabbat Ro'sh Hodesh (שַׁבָּת רֹאשׁ חֹדֶשׁ; Sabbath of the New Moon), a Sabbath that coincides with Ro'sh Hodesh. Two scrolls of the Torah are removed from the ark; the regular weekly portion is read from the first, and a special Ro'sh Hodesh maftir, Nm. 25.9–15, is read from the second. There is also a special haftarah, Isaiah 66. There are a number of additions and changes in the liturgy on Shabbat Ro'sh Hodesh, including the introduction of *Hallel before the Torah reading and changes in the Musaf service to make it more appropriate for Ro'sh Hodesh.

Shabbat Mahar Hodesh (שַׁבָּת מָחָר חֹדֶשׁ; Sabbath of the Month [That Comes] Tomorrow), designation of a Sabbath when Ro'sh Hodesh falls on the next day, Sunday. The title derives from the opening words of the special haftarah read on this occasion (1 Sm. 20.18–42), "and Jonathan said unto [David]: 'Tomorrow is the new moon [mahar hodesh].'" Other than the specially selected haftarah there are no liturgical additions to mark this day.

SACRIFICES, the primary form of worship in Judaism from biblical times until the destruction of the Second Temple. Sacrifice was the dominant way of serving the gods throughout the ancient Near East and was embraced by the Israelites as the means by which the people of YHVH could pay homage to the one God. The word sacrifice corresponds to the Hebrew godashim (consecrated things; Lv. 22.2–3); other Hebrew terms are qorban (that which is brought near, an offering; Lv. 1.2), minhah (tribute; Gn. 4.3), and isheh (formerly thought to mean "fire offering" [from esh (fire)] but now known to mean "gift"; Lv. 1.9). These terms demonstrate the idea that the individual and the community were expected to express physically and tangibly their love of God, their dependence upon him, their gratitude and subservience to him, and their desire to continue to enjoy his blessings by offering to him a portion of the bounty he had given them.

Though Israelite sacrifice was somewhat similar in form to its Near Eastern parallels, it was thoroughly adapted to Israel's monotheistic faith. Obviously, sacrifices in Israel could be made to YHVH alone; the frequent prohibition against worshipping other gods refers precisely to this (e.g., Ex. 20.5). Sacrifice to spirits, such as those of dead ancestors, was also strictly forbidden (Dt. 26.14). Because of Israel's belief that man is created in God's image, human sacrifice was strictly outlawed; in fact, it was the outstanding example of foreign practices that were not to be copied (Dt. 12.31; see MOLECH).

Israelite sacrifice was cleansed of all theurgic elements: it was not believed to activate supernatural forces or to have a magical influence on the deity or on nature; nor was sacrifice used, as in Mesopotamia, for divination. By insisting that all the details of sacrificial procedure were ordained by God, Israel rejected the pagan idea that sacrifice was the product of human cleverness, a method of manipulating the forces of the universe to secure or predict a desired outcome. Israelite sacrifice attached no intrinsic role to the taking of life; the actual slaughter of the animal was not an act of worship. God was not pictured as desirous of the animal's death but rather of the offering made of its flesh and the use of its blood for purification; slaughter was simply a necessary step in the process.

Sacrifice in Israel was organized around the idea of the divine abode (see TABERNACLE; TEMPLE) and the metaphor of God as King (see GOD). As Israel's only true sovereign God was conceived of as actually residing in his earthly palace. There, much as an earthly ruler, he received his royal tribute, primarily in the form of food gifts presented on behalf of the Israelite people by the palace servants—the priests—in an uninterrupted pageant proclaiming his sovereignty and nearness. The Bible unabashedly speaks of the sacrifice as God's "food" (Lv. 21.6, 8; Nm. 28.2) and of the *altar as God's "table" (Ez. 41.22, 44.16; Mal. 1.7, 12). Still, it is clear that in biblical thought God is not believed to need sacrifices for his sustenance (as in Mesopotamian belief) but rather to desire them and be pleased by them. The idea that God eats is rejected outright (Ps. 50.8–13); the *showbread was simply displayed in his presence, and the sacrificial flesh of animals was turned into smoke upon an altar in order that its aroma be pleasing (e.g., Lv. 1.9). Israelite sacrifice, for all its anthropomorphic detail, was a huge, elaborate symbol, a sacred drama rather than a method of satisfying any physical needs of the deity.

Animal sacrifices were "from the herd and from the flock" (Lv. 1.2): oxen, cattle, calves, sheep, and goats. In some cases fowl—turtledoves and pigeons—were acceptable or even prescribed (Lv. 1.14–17, 5.7, 12.6). The meal offering was made of semolina and oil. Wines, oils, and incense also had their roles in the sacrificial system, as did silver and gold (used primarily for beautifying the Temple and for purchasing the sacrificial animals).

There were two classes of sacrifice: offerings on behalf of the community and those presented by an individual. Sacrifices might be required or voluntary. Most public sacrifices were of the former type, meaning they had to be offered on particular, recurring occasions (see TAMID); these include the daily, Sabbath, new moon, and festival offerings (see BURNT OFFERING). Private offerings might be required—such as those made in fulfillment of a vow, the Pesah offering, or sacrifices upon making a festival pilgrimage—or they might be spontaneous expressions of an individual's gratitude or piety. Private sacrifices of *atonement (*purification and *reparation offerings) were necessitated by circumstances. Their purpose was to make reparation for sacrilege and to purge the divine abode of impurities and sins. Failing to offer them was held to be criminal. Public atonement sacrifices belonged to the yearly cycle of required offerings.

An essential part of the procedure was the sprinkling, daubing, or pouring—as specifically prescribed in each case—of the animal's blood on or around the altar. The burning of the suet and other portions of the animal on the altar was the way in which the deity was given his "share." The burnt offering was entirely consumed on the altar; the meal offering was eaten by the priests, but a token portion was burned on the altar; the peace offering was essentially a sacred meal. Most of the flesh was enjoyed by the worshiper and his family, with only certain choice portions being placed on the altar and others given to the priests.

Biblical tradition differs on when sacrifice began. The priestly view is that it was instituted after the Exodus from Egypt with the building of the Tabernacle (Lv. 1.1ff.); non-Priestly texts hold that Cain and Abel, Noah, and the patriarchs all offered sacrifices, though at private altars, without a Temple (e.g., Gn. 4.3–4, 8.20–21, 12.8). The Pentateuch demands the centralization of all sacrifice at one single shrine (Lv. 17.8–9; Dt. 12), but the historical books attest to the existence of local shrines, both legitimate and illegitimate, and a gradual process of centralization that was only completed toward the end of the First Temple period, under the reign of Josiah (see HIGH PLACE).

The laws of sacrifice are found in the second half of Exodus, in much of Leviticus, and in a few chapters of Numbers. Outside the Pentateuch, too, it is clear that sacrificial ritual was the central feature of worship in biblical times. Occasionally, prophets harshly denounced the offering of sacrifices (Is. 1.11–14; Am. 5.21–23; Jer. 7.21–22; Mi. 6.6–9). In all these cases, the intent is not to negate sacrifice itself but to decry piety divorced from morality; God rejects the tokens of Israel's affection when his people are incorrigible wrongdoers. When, however, Israel was neglectful of its sacrificial duties, prophets also rebuked them (Mal. 1.6ff).

By the time sacrifice ceased (with the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE), statutory *prayer, which had formed a part of the Temple service, had already begun to become institutionalized. Its meticulous, daily observance by all Jews eventually became the substitute for sacrifice as the required, regular service of God. Still, as the rabbis stated, sacrificial worship was deemed to be one of the pillars upon which the earth's very existence rests (Avot 1.2). Thus, traditional Jewish thought does not admit that sacrifice has actually been abolished. Rather, it holds that the destruction of the Temple has made sacrifice temporarily impossible, and the traditional Jew continues to pray for the rebuilding of the Temple and the resumption of the sacrificial system.

Non-Orthodox prayer books have eliminated most prayers for the restoration of sacrifice; many of those who retain them interpret them symbolically rather than literally.

Talmud order Qodashim deals extensively with all the laws of sacrifice, particularly tractates Zevahim* and Menaḥot*. The rabbis' attitude toward sacrifice indicates a gradual de-emphasis on the anthropomorphic element, placing stress upon the humanistic value of sacrifice. Discomfort with this seemingly primitive element in Judaism reaches its peak in the opinion of Maimonides, who believed that sacrifice was instituted as a necessary evil, to wean the Israelites gradually away from paganism, as they could not have grasped the idea of a religion without sacrifice (Guide of the Perplexed 3.32, 46). He was severely criticized by Nahmanides, who insisted that such a view was totally inconsistent with the biblical text, according to which sacrificial ritual is divinely ordained and the noblest form of serving God (commentary on Lv. 1.9). SACRILEGE (Heb. ma'al; me'ilah), strictly speaking, the misappropriation of sacred property, such as sacrificial animals. When the offender realized the misdeed, a reparation* offering was required (see Lv. 5.14–16). In its wider usage, the concept is virtually identical to the illicit type of profanation*. King Uzziah's crime of entering the Temple and offering incense (both forbidden to a non-priest), King Ahaz's disregard for Temple sanctums, and the general sin of contaminating the Temple are all called ma'al (2 Chr. 26.16, 28.19, 36.14), as is Achan's misappropriation of the spoils of Jericho (Jos. 7.1ff.), which were dedicated to the Lord. Sacrilege can refer to any misuse of sacred objects, treated in the Talmudic tractate Me'ilah, and in later times to the prohibited disrespect for Torah scrolls, holy books, tsitsit, tefillin, and so forth.

SADDUCEES (Heb. Tseduqim), one of the three main Jewish sects that flourished during the last two centuries of the Second Temple period. The origin of the name is uncertain, but it is probably derived from Zadok*, whose descendants had held the Jerusalem high priesthood since Solomon's time. Josephus* Flavius (and other sources) described the Sadducees as wealthy, especially the priestly aristocracy. Their origins as well as those of the other Jewish sects, are obscure, and the Sadducees first appear in Josephus's accounts of the internal Jewish feuds of the Hasmonean* period. From these accounts, the Sadducees emerge as the more conservative element of the Jewish population, refusing to acknowledge such Pharisaic innovations as the belief in angels, in resurrection, and in the immortality of the soul. Moreover, they refused to accept the Pharisaic concept of a binding oral law and adhered only to those laws that were written in the Torah. Knowledge of Sadducean beliefs and halakhic rulings is incomplete and is mostly derived from sources that do not view them favorably—Josephus (who describes himself as a Pharisee), the New Testament* (in which Jesus* is depicted as arguing not only with Pharisees but with Sadducees as well), and rabbinic literature (the rabbis claim to be the spiritual heirs of the Pharisees)—and therefore it is hard to reconstruct the Sadducees' worldview, beyond enumerating those areas in which they differed from the Pharisees.

The Sadducees maintained that Shavu'ot* always had to fall on a Sunday, insisted that the high priest enter the Holy of Holies in the Temple on Yom Kippur with the incense burning in a censer (rather than placing it in the censer after entering the Holy of Holies), allowed individuals to finance the daily public sacrifices (rather than financing such sacrifices only from the public coffers), and held slaveholders responsible for crimes committed by their slaves. In a recently published halakhic letter (known as 4QMMT) found among the Dead Sea Scrolls*, the Qumran sectarians espouse some halakhic views known from rabbinic sources as typically Sadducean: that an unbroken column of liquid (nizzog) can transmit ritual impurity and that the priests who burned the red heifer had to immerse themselves and wait until after sunset before performing the purification ceremony. These similarities, as well as the affinities between the halakhic injunctions of the previously published Temple Scroll and the halakhot attributed to the Sadducees, point to some affinity between the Sadducees and the Essenes*. It has been suggested that the two groups shared a common origin. With the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE, the Sadducees lost their social and ideological center and no more is heard of them.

SAFED, a town in Galilee which became the center of concentrated literary and spiritual activity in the sixteenth century; regarded later as one of the four holy* cities. Early evidence of Jewish presence is sketchy; Safed is not mentioned in the Bible. The name Safed is related to the Hebrew root meaning "looking over," and in the Talmud Yerushalmi (R. ha-Sh. 2.1) it is noted as one of the mountain tops on which a signal fire was lit to announce the arrival of Ro'sh Hodesh*. A stable community is known from the thirteenth century on. It became the center of remarkable literary and spiritual activity in the sixteenth century when it attracted scholars who were refugees from Spain. Many outstanding Talmudists and kabbalists, such as Mosheh *Cordovero, Yosef *Karo, and especially Yitshaq *Luria and his school lived in Safed. Luria claimed that he had identified many ancient graves in the vicinity of Safed as tombs of ancient rabbinical authorities, and the area became widely visited by pilgrims coming to worship at these tombs. Safed was also the site of the attempt by Ya'aqov *Berab to renew rabbinic *ordination.

SAHL BEN MATSLIAH (10th cent.), *Karaitic scholar, exegete, and propagandist; known in Arabic as Abu al-Sarri. He was highly regarded as a scholar by Karaites of his generation and accepted as a major authority on religious law by later Karaites. He was a resident of Jerusalem but traveled abroad seeking to convert Rabbanites to Karaism. On one such journey, he came into conflict with Ya'aqov ben Shemu'el, an ardent follower of Sa'adyah Ga'on. As a result of this, Sahl wrote a long missionizing epistle in Hebrew (published by Simḥah Pinsker, Liqqutei Qadmoniyyot [1860], appendix) responding to Ya'aqov ben Shemu'el's attack and addressing the Rabbanite community, appealing to them to cast off the yoke of their greedy and insincere leaders and return to the original and pure biblical faith. He accuses the Rabbanite leaders of persecuting the Karaites, laxity in observance, and superstition. In addition, Sahl wrote Sefer Mitsvot, an Arabic code of ceremonial law (the Hebrew introduction has been published by A. Harkavy, Me'assef Niddaḥim I, no. 13); Sefer Dinim, an Arabic work on civil and criminal law; a commentary on the Pentateuch; a commentary on Isaiah; a work on grammar; and a polemic against Sa'adyah Ga'on. (Manuscript fragments of the first four of the above works have been preserved; manuscripts of the rest have not been identified.)

SALANTER, YISRA'EL (1810–1883), founder of the *Musal movement. Born Yisra'el Lipkin in Zhagare, Lithuania, at age twelve he entered the yeshivah of Tsevi Hirsch Broda in Salant, where he became renowned for his brilliance. Inspired by the example of R. Zundel of Salant, an unusually saintly and humble scholar in the Mitnagedic tradition, Salanter decided to devote his life to disseminating R. Zundel's personal ethical principles by establishing a general movement to promote the deliberate pursuit of pietism, adopting innovative educational and psychological techniques. Beginning in Vilna as a mashgiach and ro'sh yeshivah, Salanter established a reputation as a powerful orator, delivering sermons that drew huge audiences. These sermons, specially calculated to appeal to both scholars and laymen, introduced musar insights in the form of learned homilies. Salanter also founded groups for the study of musar (ethics) and established a special institution called a musar-shtibl, in which he delivered his discourses.

Much to his chagrin, R. Yisra'el's activities also gained approval in Haskalah circles. Proponents of the Haskalah discerned in them a new sense of social responsibility for the needs of the unlearned and downtrodden and a welcome extension of the parameters of Jewish spirituality. The boldness of leadership that Salanter projected, reinforced by his dramatic behavior during the cholera epidemic that swept Vilna in 1848, when he ordered the congregation to break their Yom Kippur fast, led to government pressure upon him to head the rabbinical seminary of Vilna. Salanter moved to Kovno, where he founded his own Musar yeshivah, producing an important second generation of Musar leaders and disciples.

In 1857 Salanter moved to Germany, where he lectured to university students on Judaism, published a Torah journal (Tevunah), and corresponded with his Kovno disciples. After two years of similar activity in Paris, he returned to Königsberg, where he died. A few articles that he published were collected in a volume entitled Imrei Binah (1878), some of his letters were published by his pupil Yitshaq Blaser in Or Yisra'el (1900), and a collection of his discourses recorded by his pupils was published under the title Even Yisra'el (1883). Many of his works, edited by Mordechai Pachter, appeared in Kitvei Rav Yisra'el Salanter (Jerusalem, 1972).

SALE. To become legally binding, any sale or purchase requires an act called qinyan (see ACQUISITION; PROPERTY), with which ownership is immediately transferred. An oral agreement to buy or sell an article is not binding, and either party may withdraw. If the vendee pays money to the vendor after an agreement for the sale of movable property has been reached, the vendor still has the legal right to void the sale if the formal qinyan has not yet taken place; however, it is considered morally dishonest to retract an agreement under such circumstances. A sale is effected in cases of immovable property by payment of the full price or by writing and signing the deed of sale; for movable property, an action of ownership (e.g., pulling or raising the object) is required.

SALIḤ, YAḤYA BEN YOSEF (1665–1749), Yemenite rabbi, also known as Maharits. He was the head of the beit din in Sanaa and the undisputed leader of the community during the first half of the eighteenth century.

He mediated a bitter dispute between those who viewed the Shulḥan 'Arukh as the supreme authority in all halakhic matters and the more conservative, who championed Maimonides. Salih's writings were aimed at summarizing Yemenite Jewish traditions from their earliest appearance to his own day. This was of special importance since printed prayer books were arriving from Erets Yisra'el and being used by the community, as a result of which the unique Yemenite traditions were being overlooked. He gathered the responsa of Yemenite rabbis in Pe'ullat Tsaddiq (3 vols. [1946–1965]) and wrote a commentary, Ets Hayyim (1894), on the Yemenite prayer book. Both of these works were the subject of commentaries by later scholars. He also wrote commentaries on the Torah and the Five Scrolls, in addition to writing Megillat Teiman (Jerusalem, 1986), a short history of Yemenite tradition.

SALMON BEN YERUḤIM (10th cent.), *Karaite polemicist and exegete. He was born either in Iraq or Erets Yisra'el and was active as a member of the Karaite community of *Avelei Tsiyyon in Jerusalem during the 940s and 950s. According to Karaite tradition, he taught Sa'adyah Ga'on, and Sa'adyah mourned him in Aleppo, where he was buried. This, however, is impossible since Salmon was much younger than Sa'adyah; but it may reflect an actual confrontation between the two. In what is evidently a work of his youth, Salmon wrote a violent polemic against the Rabbanites and Sa'adyah in particular (published as Milḥamot Adonai by I. Davidson [New York, 1934]). It was written in rhymed Hebrew, using exceptionally abusive language. An anonymous student of Sa'adyah, writing in Arabic, responded to this polemic, and fragments of Salmon's Arabic rejoinder have been preserved. Salmon wrote Arabic commentaries on a number of biblical books, including the Torah, Isaiah, Psalms (chaps. 42–72; edited by L. Marwick [Philadelphia, 1956]), Proverbs, Job, Song of Songs, Lamentations (partially edited by Feuerstein [Kraków, 1898]), Ecclesiastes (edited by M. Riese, Ph.D. dissertation, Yeshiva University, 1973), Esther, and Daniel. His commentary on Lamentations was actually a text used for ritual recitations by the Avelei Tsiyyon. In addition, he wrote Kitab Ahruf al-Ibdal, a work on grammar; Kitab Intisar lil-Ḥaq, evidently a polemical work; and a work on the virtues of the priests. In his writings Salmon condemned the study of foreign philosophy and the Arabic language.

SALT is first mentioned in the Bible in reference to Lot's wife, who was turned into a pillar of salt (Gn. 19.26) in the vicinity of the Dead Sea (which in Hebrew is called the Salt Sea). As a preservative, salt was a symbol of the eternal covenant between God and his people (Nm. 18.19; 2 Chr. 13.5). All sacrifices and meal offerings had to be salted prior to being placed on the altar (Lv. 2.13; Men. 20a); the salt used for this purpose was stored in a special place known as the salt chamber on the north side of the Temple court (Mid. 5.3). After the Temple period, a table at which meals were taken came to symbolize the altar, and it therefore became customary to place salt on the table at each meal and to dip the bread into salt after reciting the Birkat ha-Motsi*'. According to Jewish *dietary laws, all *meat must be thoroughly salted and sit for an hour after having been soaked for a half hour in water to drain the blood and make it permissible for consumption.

SALVATION (Heb. yeshu'ah, also teshu'ah), acts whereby God delivers his people from distress. The term occurs frequently in biblical and liturgical texts (cf. Gn. 49.18; Ex. 14.13, 14.30) and in the prophetic books, particularly in Isaiah (cf. Is. 45.17, "Israel is saved by the Lord with an everlasting salvation"), and in Psalms, but almost always refers to deliverance from concrete and specific sufferings, such as oppression and exile. It is not used in connection with the remission of sin, atonement, and the like. The noun moshi'a (savior) is occasionally used for the leaders sent by God to succor the people in times of distress (cf. Jgs.) but is generally applied only to God (Prophets; Ps.). A favorite image is that of the sprouting or flourishing of salvation (cf. the second and fifteenth benedictions of the Amidah*, "who causes the horn of salvation to flourish"), which is connected with the idea of the messianic sprouting of the "shoot of David." Salvation played an important role in the thought of Mordecai Menahem *Kaplan, who conceived it as a striving for the fulfillment of human destiny, while God was the source of the human will to salvation. SAMAEL, the prince of demons in Jewish folklore; identical with *Satan. The name occurs in the Slavonic Apocalypse of Enoch, and, together with his wife *Lilith, he plays an important role in popular legend and kabbalistic literature, acting as seducer, accuser, and destroyer of the Jews as well as guardian angel of the gentiles. His antagonist is the archangel *Michael, the guardian angel of Israel. Pirkei de-Rabbi Eli'ezer describes Samael's initiative in planning Adam's fall, his descent from heaven, and his use of the serpent to seduce Eve. He acted as the accuser against the children of Israel to persuade God not to redeem them from the bondage of Egypt (Ex. Rab. 21.7), and it was he who was sent by God to take the soul of Moses (Dt. Rab. end).

According to Jewish folklore, he continues throughout history to act as the accuser of Israel, except on Yom Kippur, when he is powerless. See also DEMONS.

SAMARIA (Heb. Shomron), capital of the northern kingdom of Israel, identified with modern Sebastia (about 10 km [7 miles] northwest of Nablus [Shechem]). It was founded by King Omri (c.876 BCE), who bought the site from Shemer (1 Kgs. 16.24) and moved his capital there from Tirzah. His son Ahab expanded the city and imported Phoenician luxury items. Ivories found in the palace remains are evidence of Ahab's "house of ivory" (1 Kgs. 22.39). During his reign, under the influence of his Phoenician wife Jezebel, shrines were erected to Baal and Asherah. An inscription from the eighth century BCE found in northern Sinai, dedicated to Yahveh of Samaria and his Asherah, emphasizes the religious significance of the site. Corruption and excessive luxuries were the subjects of rebuke of such prophets as Amos when Samaria reached the zenith of its prosperity and expansion during the reign of Jeroboam II (784–748). A collection of sixty-three ostraca (which are inscriptions on potsherds) dated to this period records shipments of wine and oil to officials at Samaria.

After the Assyrian conquest of the West under Tiglath-pileser III (734–732), most of the territory of the northern kingdom of Israel was annexed by Assyria, and the people were exiled. Only Samaria and its surroundings remained; its king, Hoshea, became an Assyrian vassal. He soon conspired against Assyria (2 Kgs. 17), and Samaria was finally conquered by Shalmaneser V in 722 BCE. Shalmaneser's successor, Sargon II, exiled the Israelites, resettled foreigners in Samaria (*Samaritans) and made it an Assyrian provincial administrative center. Samaria was subsequently captured by the Babylonians and Persians. Under Alexander the Great, who first destroyed it after a rebellion in 331 BCE, it became a Hellenistic city, but it, too, was destroyed in the late Hellenistic period by John Hyrcanus in 107 BCE. Roman Samaria was rebuilt by Herod the Great, who renamed it Sebaste and erected a temple there to Augustus in 30 CE.

SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH, a recension of the Hebrew text of the Pentateuch used by the *Samaritans. It is written in an archaic script evolved from Old Hebrew (Phoenician) writing. Its antiquity is attested, among other things, by the shape of the letters, as well as by the fact that a dot is placed after each word. Possibly the Samaritan Pentateuch dates back in its primary form to the time of Josiah, but it has been much altered in the course of the generations, and the best known surviving manuscripts belong to the twelfth century. It nevertheless constitutes the earliest external witness to the Hebrew text. Although independent of Jewish tradition from the time of *Nehemiah (cf. Neh. 13.23–31), it substantially corroborates the Masoretic recension, while containing some six thousand variant readings. Most of the divergences are due to scribal errors, ignorance, or a desire to facilitate the comprehension of difficult texts and to harmonize related passages. Doctrinal reasons account for other emendations (e.g., the substitution of Gerizim for Ebal in Dt. 27.4). A residual number of variants are of critical value, especially where these agree with the Septuagint. There exist Aramaic and Arabic translations of the Samaritan Pentateuch; but a Greek version (the Samareitikon) is known chiefly from patristic references. The first printed edition was in the Paris Polyglot Bible (1629–1665), and the editions of August Freiherr von Gall (Giessen, 1918) utilized many manuscripts.

SAMARITANS, the population of *Samaria after the destruction of the northern kingdom of Israel in 721 BCE. Known in Hebrew as Shomronim (cf. 2 Kgs. 17.29), or, in the Talmud, as Kutim (Cutheans), they call themselves Benei Yisra'el (Children of Israel) or Shomerim (Observant Ones). According to their own tradition, the Samaritans are the descendants of that part of the Israelite population that remained in the country after the deportation of the ten *tribes of Israel by Sargon II of Assyria. The biblical account describes them as descendants of the heathen colonists from various parts of Mesopotamia, especially Cuthah, whom Sargon II settled in the depopulated Samaria. The heterogeneous ethnic character of the new population (2 Kgs. 17.24) also produced a heterogeneous syncretistic religion, which provided fertile soil for friction, both political and religious, with the Judean exiles returning from Babylonia. According to the biblical account (Neh. 6), the Samaritans wished to participate in the rebuilding of the Temple but were rebuffed by the Jewish leadership. The resulting breach between the two groups developed into a permanent schism after Nehemiah expelled the son-in-law of Sanballat, governor of Samaria, who was a priest in Jerusalem, for marrying the daughter of a Samaritan (Neh. 13.28; Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews 11.8). In the fourth century BCE, by permission of Alexander the Great, the Samaritans built a temple on Mount *Gerizim; it was destroyed by John Hyrcanus (c.129 BCE). A second Samaritan temple was destroyed by Emperor Zeno in 486 CE.

The Samaritan religion has its origin in the Israelite traditions of the northern kingdom and resembles Sadducean Judaism (see SADDUCEES) in many respects; hence, also its resemblance to Karaism (see KARAITES), which likewise exhibits certain Sadducean features. The Samaritans believe in God, who is unique; Moses, the only prophet; the Torah; the sanctity of Mount Gerizim; and future reward and punishment, a concept linked with the advent of the messianic restorer (taheb), who will end the period of fanuta (God's displeasure) and introduce that of rahuta (divine favor). Their Decalogue begins with the Second Commandment in the Jewish tradition ("You shall have no other gods before me") and adds a new tenth commandment prescribing the building of an altar on Mount Gerizim. The Samaritans observe seven biblical festivals—Pesah, Matsot, Shavu'ot, Yom Teru'ah, Yom Kippur, Sukkot, and Mo'ed She-mini—and two minor feasts—Tsimmut (conjunction of) Pesah (15 Shevat) and Tsimmut Sukkot (15 Av). However, their calendar differs from the Jewish one in the determination of leap months; consequently there are numerous discrepancies in dates.

In some respects, the rabbis regarded the Samaritans as Jews (e.g., Ber. 7.1) and held that "when the Samaritans adopt a commandment they observe it more scrupulously than do the Jews" (Hul. 4a). However, with respect to marriage and other laws, they are treated like non-Jews. Talmudic law with regard to the Samaritans is summarized in the minor tractate Kutim*. The Samaritans recognize as holy scripture only the Pentateuch, which they have preserved in a pre-Masoretic Hebrew recension, written in archaic script developed from Phoenician writing (see SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH). The addition, at the end of the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20.17; Dt. 5.21), of a commandment to build an altar and to sacrifice on Mount Gerizim (cf. Dt. 27.6ff.) and the substitution of Gerizim for Ebal in Deuteronomy 27.4 are obvious interpolations. To this day, Samaritans sacrifice the paschal lamb on Mount Gerizim before Pesah. There is also a targum* (4th cent.) to the Pentateuch composed in the original Samaritan tongue, a dialect of western Aramaic. Some of the early Samaritan liturgical compositions (defter) and Midrashic writings (e.g., the Memar Markah) are likewise in Aramaic. After the Muslim conquest of Palestine in 632, the Samaritans gradually adopted Arabic as their vernacular (except for prayers, for which they continued to use Hebrew), translating the Bible into Arabic (11th–12th cent.) and producing a considerable body of literature, mainly religious, in that language. The history of the Samaritans under Muslim rule is one of persecution and decline.

There are now over five hundred Samaritan adherents in Nablus (adjoining Mount Gerizim) and Holon (near Tel Aviv). The Samaritans are recognized as citizens of the State of Israel under the Law of Return*. They continue to conduct their traditional rites on Mount Gerizim, and in 1963 the first Samaritan synagogue was dedicated in Nablus. According to their law, Samaritans may intermarry with Jews, provided that the Jewish partner fully observes the Samaritan customs. These marriages are recognized by the Israeli Ministry of the Interior but not by the Israeli chief rabbinate. The supreme Samaritan religious leader is the hereditary high priest. Until 1624, he was reputedly the direct descendant of Aaron, brother of Moses. With the death of Shalmiah ben Pinhas (1613–1624) the line died out, and the position was then held by the traditional descendants of Uzziel, uncle of Aaron. When a high priest dies, he is succeeded by the most senior of the Levites.

SAMBARI, YOSEF BEN YITSHAQ (1640–1703), known also as Qataya; Egyptian Jewish historian. Almost nothing is known of his life. His major work, Divrei Yosef (Jerusalem, 1994; much of it in A. Neubauer, Medieval Jewish Chronicles [1887], vol. 1, pp. 115–162; repr., 1965) shows his developed sense of history. It is possible that the disillusionment following the collapse in 1666 of Shabbateanism (which he bitterly opposed) moved him to complete his work in 1673. It begins in the sixth century and continues until his own time (a first part covering up to the sixth century is lost) and deals mainly with the Egyptian community in the Mamluke and Ottoman periods. He pays particular attention to leading Egyptian Jews and the role of the nagid, especially the descendants of Maimonides. His book is valuable for its information on the Jewish scholars of Spain, North Africa, and the Middle East from the fifteenth through the seventeenth century. His Porat Yosef on the Torah text, which reflects the insistence of Egyptian scholars on accuracy in the reading and writing of the Torah, was printed with Divrei Yosef. Sambari had a positive attitude toward Kabbalah, which he studied with Shemu'el Vital (see VITAL FAMILY), and his works betray a strong mystic influence.

SAMBATYON, legendary river beyond which the ten lost tribes* of Israel were supposedly condemned to live in exile. On weekdays, the river was impassable because of the rocks and debris it churned up; on Sabbaths, when it lay at rest, Jewish law prevented the exiles from crossing its banks. Targum Jonathan (Ex. 34.10) identifies it with the river Gozan of Israel's captivity (2 Kgs. 17.6, 18.11; cf. Y., San. 10.6; Gn. Rab. 73.5). The legend was current in Second Temple times and is found in accounts by Pliny the Elder (Natural History 31.24) as well as by Josephus, who claimed that the river flowed only on Sabbaths (The Jewish War 7.5.1). Rabbi Aqiva* ben Yosef also referred to the mysterious Sambatyon (San. 65b; Gn. Rab. 11.6). Widespread interest was later aroused by the tales of the ninth-century adventurer El-dad ha-Dani*, and Jews became convinced that the Sambatyon had a definite location in Asia or Ethiopia. This belief can be traced through the Book of Yosippon (953 CE), the bible commentary of Moses Nahmanides* (on Dt. 32.26), the journeys undertaken by Avraham ben Shemu'el Abulafia in 1260 and 'Ovadyah Bertinoro in 1489, and the travel tales of Gershom ben Eli'ezer ha-Levi (Gelilot Erets Yisra'el [1634]). Avraham Farissol, in his cosmography (Iggeret Orhot 'Olam [1524]), provided an exact location for the Sambatyon on a map of the New Indies. In his Miqveh Yisra'el (1650), written at a time when messianic speculation had reached new heights, *Manasseh ben Israel placed the lost tribes and the Sambatyon in America.

SAMSON (Heb. Shimshon), the twelfth and last of the judges (see JUDGE), from the tribe of Dan, whose twenty years of adventurous exploits are recounted in Judges 13–16. Samson, whose birth was predicted by an angel to his barren mother (a familiar biblical motif), was a *Nazirite from birth. He became the hero of a cycle of tales relating to his vengeful encounter with the Philistines that all took place between the borders of the tribes of Dan and Judah. Possessed of enormous strength, which resided in his uncut hair—the only one of the Nazirite vows which he fulfilled—he ripped a lion apart with his bare hands; killed thirty Philistines in Ashkelon; tied blazing torches to the entwined tails of three hundred foxes, incinerating Philistine fields; slew another thousand Philistines with the jawbone of an ass; uprooted the city gates of Gaza, carrying them all the way to Hebron; and eventually met his tragic end after toppling the pillars of the Philistine temple of Dagon in Gaza, where he was held captive. He also courted Philistine women, who tricked and betrayed him. One of them, Delilah, seductively coaxed out of him the source of his superhuman strength, which eventually led to the successive loss of his hair, power, eyes, and life. His final words, reflecting his personal vendetta, were “Let me die with the Philistines” (Jgs. 16.30).

SAMUEL (Heb. Shemu'el; 11th cent. BCE), prophet and the last Israelite *judge. Born to Elkanah and *Hannah after many years of childlessness and in answer to fervent prayer, he was dedicated by his mother to serve in the sanctuary as a *Nazirite. Samuel was therefore brought up at Shiloh by the high priest *Eli. As a child, Samuel received his first prophetic revelation, which foretold the destruction of the family of Eli. After the Philistine victory at Aphek (where the Ark of the Covenant was captured) and the death of Eli and his sons, Samuel became a leading national figure, acknowledged “from Dan to Beersheba” (1 Sm. 10) as a seer, judge, and military leader (1 Sm. 7.13–15). Residing in Ramah, he tried to restore traditional religious worship and judged cases in Israel on his regular circuit of the sacred towns of Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpah. The need for greater national unity, in view of the growing Philistine pressure, resulted, in Samuel's old age, in the popular demand for a king. Samuel considered the institution of monarchy to be a breach of the original covenant, according to which Israel was to have no king but God. In obedience to God's word, however, he anointed Saul as the first king of Israel (1 Sm. 10). Relations with Saul deteriorated over the years and ended in a complete break when Saul showed leniency toward Agag, king of the Amalekites (1 Sm. 15.1–23). Thereupon Samuel anointed *David as Saul's successor (1 Sm. 16.3–13). After Samuel died, Saul requested the sorceress of En-dor to bring up his spirit from the nether world in order to discover the outcome of his forthcoming battle with the Philistines (1 Sm. 28).

The Book of Samuel (originally third in the section of the Bible known as the Former Prophets) was divided into two books (1 Samuel and 2 Samuel) in the printed Hebrew Bible of 1516–1517, based on the Septuagint and Vulgate. It contains an account of Israel's history from the end of the period of the judges until David's old age. At the center of this formative period are the personalities of Samuel (whose death is related in 1 Sm. 28.3), Saul, and David. The chief purpose of the book(s) is to describe the factors that led to the rise of the monarchy, to show the divine roots of this institution, and to emphasize that the king, no less than his people, is bound by the terms of the divine covenant and is subject to God's will. The content of the book(s) may be divided as follows: the birth and dedication of Samuel, the capture of the Ark of the Covenant and its return, and Samuel's functioning as a judge (1 Sm. 1.1–7.17); the selection of Saul as king and his victory over the Ammonites, Samuel's farewell address, and Saul's military excursions against the Philistines and Amalekites (1 Sm. 8.1–15.35); the anointing of David, David's battle with Goliath, his stay at court and his outlaw activities, the sorceress of En-dor, David's sojourn with Achish and his battle against the Amalekites, Saul and Jonathan's deaths at the battle of Mount Gilboa, and David's lament over them (1 Sm. 16.1–2 Sm. 1.24); David becoming king first in Hebron and then over all Israel, his capture of Jerusalem, which he makes his political capital and resting place of the Ark of the Covenant, and Nathan's prophecy forbidding David to build a Temple for the Ark (2 Sm. 2.1–8.18); David's battles against the Ammonites and Arameans, the Bath-sheba affair, and the rebellion of his son Absalom and that of Sheba (2 Sm. 9.1–20; 26); a final appendix comprising the burial of Saul, a list of David's military heroes, a psalm of David, and his last words, followed by a census of the Israelites (2 Sm. 21.1–24.25). According to one Talmudic view, Samuel (as well as Judges and Ruth) was written by Samuel himself. Modern scholars distinguish two or more historical sources, worked over by Deuteronomistic redactors.

SAMUEL, MIDRASH, late midrash on the Book of Samuel, first quoted by Rashi in the eleventh century in his commentary to 1 Samuel 2.30. The work consists of aggadic commentaries taken from earlier Midrashic compilations and arranged in sequence by the collator. Primarily homiletic, it contains both early and late tannaitic and amoraic exegetical material. It is of Palestinian origin, but the author is unknown. It was first published in Constantinople in 1517, and a modern critical edition by Solomon Buber appeared in Kraków in 1893. A book by the same name, by Shemu'el Uzeda, a disciple of Yitsh'aq Luria, is a commentary on the tractate Avot.

SANCTIFICATION (Heb. qiddush) refers to the religious discipline or the process of spiritual growth by which a person increases in *holiness; the consecration, usually by a vow, of objects, persons, or specific times, which are thereby set apart and made subject to special ritual rules; or the formal acknowledgment of the character of sanctity attaching to persons or times. Religious practice from early rabbinic times established statutory acts of sanctification to mark the setting aside of holy days and times as separate (qadosh) and distinct from the ordinary (hol) and profane. Thus, at the beginning of the Sabbath and festivals the *Qiddush is recited, which declares the holy days as divinely set aside. The setting aside and lifting of the relationship of marriage into the dimension of the sacred is expressed in the act of qiddushin, marked by a public declaration that creates the marriage bond: Harei at mequddeshet li . . ., "Behold you are sanctified unto me . . ."

A focal prayer in the recitation of the morning and afternoon *Amidah is called the *Qedushah, which affirms the source of all sanctity in God. Its opening declaration is the celebrated quotation from the divine call to Isaiah (Is. 6.3), "Holy, holy, holy is the God of hosts, the whole earth is the fullness of God's glory." The *Qaddish (Aram.) is a doxology encouraging affirmation of the kingdom of God. Recited from late antiquity at the end of worship services or following Torah lectures, the Qaddish also became a memorial prayer for the dead.

Examples of sanctification by consecration are the *dedication of an animal or inanimate object to the Temple, or the consecration of something for religious use whereby it ceases to be profane and is reserved for a sacred purpose. In some cases a consecrated object can revert to its previous state by redemption. The legal and practical corollaries of sanctification are illustrated by the laws of priesthood. The priest is invested with an inherent sanctity as a result of his priestly descent ("They shall be holy unto the Lord their God," Lev. 21.6) and has the duty to preserve this sanctity ("and they shall not profane the name of their God," loc. cit.). For this reason priests are forbidden to contaminate themselves with the dead. It is solely on account of this duty to preserve their state of sanctity and transmit it to their descendants that a priest is forbidden to marry a divorcee or a convert; the offspring of such a union would be profane, that is, disqualified from the priesthood.

SANDALFON, an angel who figures prominently in the ancient divine-chariot mysticism (*Ma'aseh Merkavah), where he is identified as the 'ofan (wheel) of Ezekiel 1.15 and is said to stand "on earth but his head reaches to the heavens, being higher than his fellow angels by a distance of 500 years' journey." According to the Talmud, Sandalfon stands behind the divine chariot weaving crowns of prayer for his creator (Hag. 13b). The name Sandalfon is Greek and means "co-brother," but it does not occur in non-Jewish sources. It may refer to his identification as a brother of *Metatron. Sandalfon figures prominently in kabbalistic *amulets. See also ANGELS.

SANDAQ (סַנְדָּאָק; godfather), the person given the honor of holding the child on his knees during the *circumcision ceremony. The word is probably derived from the Greek sunteknos (companion to the child) and is found in the Talmud. Traditionally it was regarded as a great mitsvah to be a sandaq, and the honor was often given to a grandfather or to a man of outstanding piety. In some communities the woman who brings the child into the ceremony is called the sandaqit.

SANHEDRIN (סַנְהֶדְרִין; High Court), name of a Jewish court and of a Mishnaic tractate.

Jewish Court. The Sanhedrin, a term derived from Greek, was the Jewish court that held supreme religious, political, judicial, and legislative authority in Palestine during the Roman and Byzantine periods. Hellenistic sources depict the Sanhedrin as a political and judicial body headed by the ruler or high priest. Josephus writes of the Sanhedrin primarily in its capacity as a court: Hyrcanus, the governor of Judea, presided over the Sanhedrin trying Herod for murder (Antiquities of the Jews 14.168–170); Herod later had the Sanhedrin condemn Hyrcanus (Antiquities of the Jews 15.173); Augustus convened a Sanhedrin of Roman officials to try political rebels (Antiquities of the Jews 16.365); Ananus, a Sadducean high priest, convened the Sanhedrin to try James, the brother of Jesus (Antiquities of the Jews 20.200); and Herod Agrippa II had a Pharisaic Sanhedrin rule on a cultic matter (Antiquities of the Jews 20.216–218). In the New Testament, in the trial of Jesus, the interrogation of Peter and John Zebedee (Acts 4.3–6), and the trial of Paul (Acts 22.25–30), the Sanhedrin appears as a court presided over by the high priest. According to the New Testament, the Sanhedrin conducted its business on festivals and in the evening. Acts describes the Sanhedrin as “one part Sadducees and the other Pharisees.”

By contrast, the Sanhedrin appears in rabbinic sources as an assembly of sages headed by Pharisaic scholars—the nasi and the av beit din. Also referred to as the Great Beit Din, the Sanhedrin, consisting of seventy-one members, met in the Chamber of the Hewn Stone in the Temple and appointed small Sanhedrins of twenty-three members to function in every city or region. It is depicted as primarily a judicial body that dealt with religious matters, although it possessed some legislative and national-political functions, and it conducted its business during daylight hours and never at night or on Sabbaths and festivals. Only the Great Sanhedrin could try a whole tribe, a false prophet, or national figures, such as the king and the high priest. Only the Sanhedrin could appoint a king or high priest. Offensive wars required the sanction of the Sanhedrin, and additions to the city of Jerusalem and the Temple courts required its approval. As the final court of appeal and ultimate halakhic authority, the Sanhedrin could impose the death penalty on a scholar who defied its rulings. Finally, certain cultic procedures were performed under the supervision of the Great Sanhedrin.

Various resolutions of the conflicting data provided by rabbinic and Hellenistic sources have been proposed. Some scholars (e.g., Abraham Geiger) posit the existence of three twenty-three-member Sanhedrins in Jerusalem with distinct functions: a priestly Sanhedrin, a Pharisaic Sanhedrin, and an aristocratic Sanhedrin. Together the three smaller bodies constituted the Great Sanhedrin, which was headed by a *nasi and an *av beit din. Other scholars contend that there were two councils in Jerusalem, one political and one religious. Solomon Zeitlin would date this division to Hasmonean times, while Adolf Büchler maintains that the religious Sanhedrin described in tannaitic sources was merely the ideal. Finally, those scholars who argue for a single Sanhedrin generally must give greater weight to one or the other set of sources. David Hoffman accepts the rabbinic description of a body headed by a Pharisaic *nasi, who was ousted on occasion by the secular ruler. Emil Schürer simply dismisses the rabbinic sources and asserts that the Sanhedrin was a court headed by the high priest. According to other theories, the high priest and a Pharisaic sage filled the positions of *nasi and *av beit din, respectively. The conflicting data should probably be explained by the specific purpose of each source. Josephus, as a political historian, focused on the political role of the Sanhedrin; the New Testament, concerned with the trials of Jesus and his followers, depicted the Sanhedrin's activity as a court; and the tannaitic sources describe its legislative and judicial functions.

The Sanhedrin was probably at the peak of its power in the later Second Temple period. Alon maintains that Pharisees and Sadducees dominated the body in turns. John Hyrcanus (ruled 134–104) broke with the Pharisees, expelled them from the Sanhedrin, and annulled their religious rulings. They were reinstated by Salome Alexandra (ruled 76–67). Under Herod, the authority of the Sanhedrin was drastically reduced. After the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 CE, the term Sanhedrin designated the assemblies of Jewish scholars that functioned first as a religious body and then increasingly as a political body in Yavneh (in Judea) and, after the Bar Kokhba Revolt, in Usha', Shefaram, Beit She'arim (under R. Yehudah ha-Nasi'), Sepphoris, and Tiberias (in Galilee). Outside Palestine, the authority of the Sanhedrin depended on voluntary acceptance by the people; the Sanhedrin issued gezerot (decrees) and taqqanot (ordinances) according to the needs of the times. The Sanhedrin was apparently abolished with the patriarchate in 425 CE.

Tractate. The tractate Sanhedrin is in Mishnah order Neziqin, in eleven chapters, with related material in the Tosefta' and in both Talmuds. It deals with the rules and procedures of law courts. Sanhedrin lists several types of law courts, the functions of which include civil and criminal law as well as a variety of ritual and political responsibilities. The types of law courts are hierarchically arranged from the three-member courts of civil law, through the twenty-three-member courts of capital crimes, to the seventy-one-member high court, which deals with matters affecting the Temple and other issues of national importance.

Much of the tractate is concerned with the procedures for the two main areas of jurisprudence: monetary law and capital offenses. While the rules of evidence are similar in both areas, requiring at least two witnesses who are subjected to interrogation by the judges, there are significant differences between them, focusing mainly on the different orientations of the two kinds of courts. Whereas the monetary court strives for complete impartiality, the procedures of the capital offense court are weighted heavily in favor of acquittal (see MAKKOT). The ambivalence of Jewish law regarding the proper attitude toward criminals is poignantly expressed in Sanhedrin by several aggadic statements, which counterpoise the joy of ridding the world of wickedness (San. 4.5, 10.6) to the divine sorrow of losing one's child, wicked though he may be (San. 6.5). An additional aggadic digression (San. 1) promises all of Israel a portion in "the world to come," with several exceptions, notably proponents of heresies that were regarded by the rabbis as particularly dangerous. The lengthy Talmudic expatiation on this section is one of the most important sources of rabbinic eschatology. Tractate Makkot originally was included in Sanhedrin.

The Babylonian tractate was translated into English by Jacob Schachter and Harry Freedman in the Soncino Talmud (London, 1935).

SANHEDRIN, FRENCH, the seventy-one-member, largely rabbinical, authority convened in Paris by Napoléon Bonaparte (4 February–9 March 1807) to translate the "secular" resolutions passed by the *Assembly of Jewish Notables into "religious" imperatives. This caricature of the ancient, autonomous *Sanhedrin was headed by Joseph David Sinzheim (nasi'), two assessors (the av beit din and the hakham), and Abraham Furtado, lay president of the assembly. In accordance with Napoléon's directives, they first separated the "immutable" (religious) from the "defunct" (civil and political) laws of Judaism and then made it obligatory for Jews to contract or dissolve a marriage after civil procedures; to make a religious virtue of patriotism and army service; and to abandon their "discreditable" occupations. Ignoring the emperor's urge to "dilute Jewish blood," however, they refused to declare mixed marriages religiously valid.

As though empowered by his "Grand Sanhedrin," Napoléon exploited its new "precepts" in his discriminatory legislation of 17 March 1808. Consistories (see CONSISTOIRE) on the French Protestant model were established to regulate Jewish life, tax congregants, and even enforce conscription. The "Infamous Decree" suspended repayment of debts to Jews for ten years, restricted their immigration and freedom of movement, and often drove them into bankruptcy. Realizing that he and his fellow "notables" had been duped, Furtado made unsuccessful protests at the highest level. French Jewry's plight was alleviated with the Bourbon restoration in 1815, but substantial religious equality—including state support for rabbis and consistories—was only attained under King Louis-Philippe (1830). By compelling the Jews to pay a high price for their emancipation, Napoléon encouraged apostasy and assimilation.

SARAH, Abraham's wife and Isaac's mother (Gn. 11.29–31, 12, 16–21, 23–25; also mentioned in 49.31; Is. 51.2; Rom. 4.19, 9.9; Heb. 11.11; 1 Pt. 3.6). Her original name, Sarai, was changed to Sarah (Gn. 17.15); both names mean princess. Sarah is portrayed as a very beautiful woman (see GENESIS APOCRYPHON) who inspired lust in foreign rulers, which led to the wife-sister stories of Genesis 12 and 20. Like other *matriarchs, she was at first barren, which led Abraham to take Hagar in order to bear a son (Ishmael) to be his heir (Gn. 16). Upon being informed by an angel that she would give birth, Sarah broke out in laughter because of her and her husband's advanced ages; hence, her child's name *Isaac, which is derived from the Hebrew verb meaning "to laugh" (Gn. 18). After Sarah gave birth to Isaac (Gn. 21), she had Hagar and Ishmael exiled. Sarah lived to be 127 years old and upon her death was buried in the cave of *Machpelah in Hebron (Gn. 22.19).

SARUG, YISRA'EL (c.1560–1610), kabbalist and propagandist of Lurianic Kabbalah. He was born and educated in Egypt, where he became familiar with Yitshaq *Luria and his early kabbalistic doctrines. Sarug later claimed to have been Luria's personal disciple and was recognized as such by his contemporaries, although this has been disputed by modern scholarship. Between 1594 and 1600, he taught Lurianic Kabbalah in Italy, adding to it speculations of his own. Later, he taught Abraham *Cohen de Herrera in Ragusa, Illyria, and spent short periods in Salonika and Poland, where according to legend he taught Shelomoh Luria of Kraków. The main writings attributed to Sarug, such as Limmudei Atsilut and the commentary on Sifra di-Tseni'uta' (part of the Zohar), were published erroneously in 1897 under the name of Hayyim Vital (see VITAL FAMILY). Sarug's exposition of Luria's doctrine of the tsimtsum* was articulated in terms of the tenets of the malbush (garment) and shi'ashu'a (enjoyment). According to Leone Modena, and later to Gershom Scholem, Sarug's teachings were strongly infused with Platonic ideas, whereas other scholars find gnostic or atomist elements in his writings. It is evident, however, that his main disciples, Menaḥem *Azaryah da *Fano and Cohen de Herrera, did not attribute to him any philosophic background, nor did they mention any philosophic school with which he was affiliated. Sarug died in Poland.

SASPORTAS, JACOB (1610–1698), rabbinic scholar and anti-Shabbatean controversialist. Raised and educated in Oran, Algeria, Sasportas subsequently served as rabbi of Tlemcen and neighboring towns. After being dismissed by the government, he moved to western Europe, where he held rabbinic positions in London, Hamburg, and Amsterdam. Sasportas was the most persistent and vigorous opponent of Shabbetai Tsevi at the height of the messianic movement in 1666. At a time when most rabbis and lay leaders, impressed by the waves of repentance that they considered a very positive phenomenon, suppressed their hesitations concerning the messianic outburst, Sasportas persistently warned of its dangers. In his view, the movement ran counter to traditional teachings concerning the messianic era, contradicted rabbinic authority on many points, and, like early Christianity, contained the seeds of antinomian sectarianism. He continued to combat the movement after its failure and collected his correspondence concerning it, as well as letters and pamphlets issued by followers of Shabbetai Tsevi, in his Tsitsat Novel Tsevi (shortened version [Amsterdam, 1737]; full version [Jerusalem, 1954]), by all accounts a primary source for knowledge of the history of Shabbateanism. A comparison of the original documents with the edited final version, however, shows that Sasportas, to some extent, doctored his sources, hiding his moments of sympathy and near belief and depicting himself as the persistent, relentless, and unwavering opponent of the movement. His responsa, Ohel Ya'aqov, appeared in Amsterdam in 1737.

SATAN (שָׂטָן; adversary), word occurring in most of the Bible as a common noun and referring to human antagonists (e.g., 1 Sm. 29.4; 1 Kgs. 5.18). There are, however, intimations, even in preexilic biblical literature, of a malign influence, variously described, that seeks to mislead human beings (e.g., 1 Kgs. 22.22). Only in three passages, all of them late, is Satan depicted as an individualized superhuman being: in Zechariah 3.1–2 he appears as accuser; in Job 2.1 he is the heavenly persecutor (included among “the sons of God”) who tests Job’s piety on the rack of affliction; and in 1 Chronicles 21.1 he functions as seducer. In all these passages Satan, though hostile to humans, remains obedient to God (cf. Is. 45.6–7). In apocryphal and apocalyptic literature, however, and to an even greater degree in the New Testament, the concept of Satan evolved, probably under Persian influence, as the incarnation of evil and the supreme antagonist of God. Satan rules countless demons, and his kingdom extends throughout the world. He is cast out from heaven (a misinterpretation of Is. 14.12) but continues with other fallen angels (cf. Gr. 6.1–4) to work evil upon earth. In tannaitic literature, Satan is rarely mentioned. It is the later, chiefly Babylonian, aggadah that enlarges the scope of his influence and activities. He is identified—among others—with *Asmodeus, *Samael (prince of the demons), the evil inclination, and the angel of death. He first tempts, then accuses and slays. Kabbalah gives even greater prominence to the concept of evil and uses a variety of synonyms for Satan (e.g., qelippah [shell of evil]). Jewish tradition has circumscribed his powers: it is said that on Ro’sh ha-Shanah Satan is confused by the shofar, and on Yom Kippur his authority is annulled. Ultimately he will be vanquished by the Messiah. There are occasional allusions to Satan in liturgy, but these have the general connotation of “corrupting desires” and possess no doctrinal significance. See also DEMONS.

SATMAR, Hasidic dynasty originating in Satu-Mare, Hungary (now Romania). It is now one of the largest Hasidic groups in the United States. The dynasty began with Moshe Teitelbaum (1759–1841), an early Hasidic rabbi in Hungary. But it was Yo’el Teitelbaum (1888–1979) who, as rabbi of Satu-Mare from 1928, molded the sect’s anti-Zionism and isolationism. He served as its charismatic rebbe until his death. Escaping from Europe in 1944, Yo’el settled in Williamsburg in Brooklyn, New York, in 1947. His congregation has its own welfare organizations and the world’s largest yeshivah. He was succeeded by his nephew, Moshe Teitelbaum. The Satmar Hasidim participate in New York’s economic life but are unassimilated. Satellite communities exist in Kiryas Joel (Monroe, New York) and internationally. They consider modern Zionism and the existence of the State of Israel a violation of halakhah and believe its existence is responsible for delaying the coming of the Messiah and for all Jewish misery in the twentieth century, including the Holocaust. Rabbi Yo’el permitted his followers to live in Israel, but not to make mass ‘aliyyah, and forbade them to visit the Western Wall. They oppose the use of spoken Hebrew.

SAUL, the first king of Israel. His story is found in 1 Samuel 9 to 2 Samuel 1. Saul was a member of the tribe of Benjamin. The genealogies in 1 Chronicles 8.29–40 and 9.35–44 indicate that his family lived near Gibeon and may have continued to inhabit the area at least until the end of the First Temple period. The Bible relates that Saul was anointed privately by the prophet Samuel at Ramah. Upon reaching home, Saul was imbued by a divine spirit and behaved like an ecstatic prophet. Samuel called for the choice of the king by lot at a public convocation at Mizpah, at which time Saul was chosen, while hiding among the baggage. In the face of opposition to his election, Saul proved himself by rescuing the Gileadites of Jabesh from the harsh conditions of a treaty imposed by Nahash the Ammonite (1 Sm. 11.1–11).

Saul laid the groundwork for a centralized monarchy by first creating a royal court at the uninhabited Tel el-Ful, formerly Gibeath (Jgs. 19–21), which he renamed for himself: Gibeath-saul. Saul established the rudiments of an administration and a standing army, based on personal loyalty to the king, as well as a high court for judging the people. He supported the local cultic centers and the priestly community at Nob. His officials included his paternal uncle, Abner ben Ner, as commander-in-chief; Ahimelech the great-grandson of Eli, as high priest; and Doeg, the Edomite, in charge of the royal flocks. Saul followed a defensive military policy, securing the borders from the attacks of Israel's neighbors. He secured the eastern Transjordanian frontier from the Ammonites and the desert-dwelling Hagarites (1 Chr. 5.10), the northern border from Aramean incursions, and, on the southern side, he delivered the death-blow to the Amalekites (1 Sm. 15). However, the major enemy of the Israelites were the Philistines, whom Saul engaged several times. Saul died in the course of a battle with the Philistines; three of his sons were killed as well. He was survived by his son, Esh-baal, who was briefly king of a reduced territory (2 Sm. 2.9), and by his grandson, Merib-baal, the son of Jonathan, who became the father of a long line of descendants recorded in 1 Chronicles 8.34-40.

SAVIOR. See MESSIAH.

SAVORA' (סַבּוֹרָא; expositor), title given to scholars and heads of the Babylonian *academies in the period (6th cent.) following that of the amora'im and preceding that of the ge'onim. The title, first found in geonic sources, is based on the word savora' in the Talmud Yerushalmi, Qiddushin 2 and 63d, where it means a scholar competent to render decisions, implying that the scholar made private subjective decisions rather than authoritative ones. While the amora'im were the authors of the gemara'*, interpreting the Mishnah and handing down decisions on practical law, it would seem that the savora'im merely expounded certain obscure passages in the Talmud and added their explanatory notes to the text of the Talmud Bavli. They were also responsible for the final editing of the amoraic redaction of the Talmud Bavli. However, there is a wide divergence of scholarly opinion as to the extent of their editorial activity. Only a few major personalities have been identified as savora'im, such as Abba' Yosef, Aha'i ben Huna', Aha' of Hattim, Geviha of Argiza, Mordekhai Pappias, Rabbah of Rov, and Shemu'el ben Abbahu.

SCHECHTER, SOLOMON (1848-1915), scholar, theologian, and architect of *Conservative Judaism. Born in Romania, he taught in Cambridge (to where he brought the bulk of the Cairo *Genizah from 1890 to 1902) and thereafter in New York, where he headed the *Jewish Theological Seminary of America and laid the groundwork for the Conservative movement. He attracted a faculty of outstanding European scholars, presided over the movement's growth, and in 1913 created the United Synagogue of America (later *United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism). Schechter avoided broad programmatic statements, but the philosophy implicit in his writings still provides a major part of the ideological foundation of Conservative Judaism. His theology reflects a shift of emphasis from God, as a philosophical concept, to Israel as a historical entity. According to Schechter revelation is manifest in tradition: the scriptures reveal history, and it is in the history of the Jewish people that the raw material for any Jewish theology has to be found. Schechter's most influential contribution to American Jewish life was his popularization of the concept of a "catholic (i.e., all-embracing as opposed to denominational) Israel." This was meant to provide a theoretical basis for the continuation of the *Historical movement's search for Jewish unity. He stressed the "secondary meaning of the Bible" (i.e., the Bible as interpreted by Jewish tradition) over the Bible as a textbook of dogmatic theology, the authority of which was vested in "the collective conscience of catholic Israel as embodied in the universal synagogue." Judaism was a living organism that had developed through the ages within the framework of rabbinic tradition. Schechter saw Jewish nationalism as part of the essence of Judaism and supported Zionism. He maintained contact with Reform leaders, although he continued to criticize them. His writings include editions of ancient texts (Avot de-Rabbi Natan [London, 1887]; the Hebrew text of Ben Sira; Documents of Jewish Sectaries [Cambridge, 1910], the first publication of the Damascus Document*) and theological studies, including three volumes of Studies in Judaism (Philadelphia, 1896, 1908, 1924).

SCHENIRER, SARAH (1883-1935), founder of the *Beth Jacob schools for Orthodox girls. Born in Kraków to a Hasidic family, she was a self-educated woman who never attended high school. Beginning with a handful of girls, Schenirer, a dynamic educator, opened a school in her home in 1917 in Kraków and worked hard to convince Orthodox leaders of the need to respond to the sweeping forces of modernism and start a school system for girls. Formal religious education had been strictly reserved for males until that time. When enrollment reached 280 students, Schenirer was pressured by other communities to open additional schools, and she founded a teachers' seminary. Many of her graduates went on to open Beth Jacob schools in other cities or to serve as teachers in these schools. Schenirer's collected writings, translated into Hebrew from the original Yiddish, were published in Tel Aviv (1955–1960).

SCHICK, MOSHEH BEN YOSEF (1807–1879), rabbinic scholar; the intellectual and spiritual heir to Mosheh Sofer (see SOFER FAMILY), the German-born rabbinic leader of Hungarian Orthodoxy in the first half of the nineteenth century. Schick was born in Brezove, Slovakia. At the age of fourteen, he entered Sofer's yeshivah in Pressburg (Bratislava). In 1861 he became the rabbi of Hust, where he established his own yeshivah, which speedily won renown. He was considered the most prominent halakhist of his time in Hungary and received queries from the entire Jewish world.

Schick fought vociferously against *Neology. In the wake of the Hungarian Jewish Congress of 1869–1870, he advocated official separation from the non-Orthodox communities. This included those Jews, called the *Status Quo Ante, who continued to abide by the halakhah but did not share the views of the Orthodox establishment regarding communal issues. Despite this fact, in the context of Hungarian Orthodoxy, where extremes reigned, his was considered a middle position. For example, he refused to sign the Michalovic Declaration of 1865, which forbade entering a synagogue in which the rabbi preached in the vernacular. Similarly, Schick did not concur with Hatam Sofer's opposition to Mendelssohn's Bi'ur.

Schick's responsa were collected by his son as She'elot u-Teshuvot Maharam Schick (Munkács and Lwów [Lemberg], 1880–1884).

SCHIFF, ME'IR BEN YA'AQOV (1605–1641), German Talmudist; known as Maharam Schiff. Renowned as a youth for his Talmudic brilliance, Schiff was appointed in 1622 to the rabbinate of Fulda, where he developed a reputation as a talented preacher and a vigorous opponent of the use of pilpul in the study of Talmud. He wrote Talmudic commentaries under the title Hiddushei Halakhot. The commentaries to ten tractates were published in 1737 and 1741, achieved wide popularity, and are included today in most editions of the Talmud.

SCHLETTSTADT, SHEMU'EL BEN AHARON (14th cent.), rabbinic scholar, academy head, and Talmudic commentator. One of the few details known about his life is an incident in which he passed a death sentence on two Jews from Strasbourg, who were involved in a conspiracy with local knights to take economic advantage of other Jews. One of the Jews was put to death, but the other managed to escape and alert the knights, who then went to war against Strasbourg. Shemu'el was forced to flee Strasbourg, concealing himself with students of his yeshivah for a period of several years (1370–1376). Members of the Jewish community failed to appease the knights during that period. In 1376 Shemu'el traveled to the East, where he received a writ from the Babylonian authorities, and confirmation of this from a number of Jerusalem rabbis, instructing the Strasbourg community to reinstate him.

Rabbi Shemu'el's best-known work is his Ha-Mordekhai ha-Qatan or Ha-Qatsar, an abridgment (with addenda from subsequent halakic authorities) of Mordekhai ben Hillel's Sefer Mordekhai. The work has never been published, although it is found in many manuscripts. Shemu'el also wrote a number of responsa.

SCHNEERSOHN FAMILY, foremost family of *Ḥabad Hasidic masters for the past two hundred years. R. *Shneur Zalman established Ḥabad Hasidism in Lyady in Belorussia. The dynasty includes seven masters; among them are Shneur Zalman's son R. Dov Ber (1773–1827), the Mittler Rebbe, who instituted the Ḥabad center in *Lubavich; Shneur Zalman's grandson R. Menahem Mendel, ha-Tsemaḥ Tsedeq (1789–1866), who expanded the movement; the sixth rabbi, R. Yosef Yitshaq (1880–1950), who emigrated from Russia to America in 1940 and established the Lubavitch center in Brooklyn, New York; and the seventh rabbi, R. Menahem Mendel Schneerson (1902–1994), one of the principal Jewish religious leaders of the twentieth century. He studied with his father, Levi Yitshaq, in the Ukrainian town of Ekaterinoslav and later studied engineering in Europe between 1928 and 1940. In 1941 he settled in America and assisted his father-in-law, R. Yosef Yitshaq, the sixth Lubavitcher rebbe. Schneerson (the spelling had been changed in the United States) succeeded to the Lubavitch leadership in 1950 and led the movement until his death. His unique position among modern Jewish leaders rested on his perception of spiritual responsibility to the entire Jewish community, as well as on his comprehension of Torah and religious law, his organizational skills, and his scientific background, which enabled him to utilize modern innovation in mass communication. He founded the Ḥabad International Education Network, which dispatched personal envoys and assured religious instruction for all Jewish communities, concentrating on remote areas and those countries isolated from contact with Judaism. He established the custom of weekly assemblies, which were attended by multitudes of Ḥabad adherents as well as observant and secular Jews who all sought his advice and blessing. In his later days, Schneerson stood at the center of a clamorous controversy concerning messianic claims for him held by many of his followers.

SCHOLEM, GERSHOM GERHARD (1897–1982), the founder of the modern study of Jewish *mysticism. Raised in an assimilated family in Berlin, he was drawn to Zionism and studied Hebrew and the Talmud. He chose the Kabbalah as the subject of his doctorate, writing a study of Sefer ha-Bahir, which he translated into German. In 1923 he moved to Jerusalem, where he was the Judaica librarian at the National Library. He served as a professor at Hebrew University for forty years and was highly influential in shaping its academic development.

Until 1937, he published scores of studies and several books dealing with the history and development of kabbalistic literature, the biographies of some major figures, and works published from manuscripts, including a detailed catalog of kabbalistic manuscripts in the National Library. In 1937, his essay Redemption through Sin revolutionized the study of the Shabbatean movement and the concepts of Jewish medieval and early modern Jewish history. In 1941 he published his first great synthesis, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (rev. ed. 1954), which immediately was established as the standard textbook on Jewish mysticism.

In his lifetime, Scholem published about forty books and nearly seven hundred studies, almost all of them dealing with various aspects of Jewish mysticism, messianism, Hasidism, magic, and related subjects. Particularly noteworthy are his study Origins of the Kabbalah (Hebrew, 1948; German, 1962; and English, 1987) and Sabbatai Tsevi: The Mystical Messiah (Hebrew, 1957; English, 1978). He demonstrated in detail the role played by Jewish mysticism in Jewish religious culture, planting it firmly in the Jewish cultural mainstream and not considering it an aberration, as many had previously contended.

Scholem's studies, and a handful of nonscholarly essays dealing with essential problems facing contemporary Judaism, established his place as one of the most penetrating voices of Zionism and of the renewed cultural center in Jerusalem. He presented the Jewish past as vibrant and dynamic and described the intense spiritual forces that worked, in conflicting ways, throughout Jewish history. He denied the messianic nature of Zionism, insisting on its political, realistic approach to solving Judaism's contemporary problems.

After his death, many of his unpublished books were printed, including his annotated text of the *Zohar and a memoir, From Berlin to Jerusalem. Bibliographies of his writings are in Studies in Mysticism and Religion (1967) and Bibliography of the Writings of Gershom Scholem (1978).

SCIENCE, systematic knowledge arrived at by observation, experiment, induction, logical deduction, and so on. Different branches of science recognize varying premises and require the use of different methods—hence also the usage that restricts the term science to the natural and so-called exact sciences. Science and religion have clashed in modern times, but the conflict is merely a modern variation of medieval conflict between the spirit of rational enquiry and that of mute acceptance of traditional dogma. The conflict arises whenever contradictions are discovered between the findings or claims of science and the real or alleged teachings of religion. Sometimes not only specific religious doctrines (e.g., the account of Creation, the manner of the composition of Bible, etc.) are contested in the name of natural or historical science, but religion itself is turned into an object of rational enquiry (e.g., by psychology or sociology). Attempts to resolve the ensuing conflicts usually take the form of: limiting the sphere of competence of science, for example, by pointing out the a priori character of its axiomatic assumptions or by showing that some of its claims are not scientific at all but philosophical; limiting and defining the proper sphere of religious teaching, for instance, by distinguishing between what is held to be genuinely and essentially religious doctrine and what is outmoded science falsely claiming religious authority; and reinterpreting, by various methods of exegesis, the meaning of traditional statements and of biblical and other authoritative texts, so as to make them appear consonant with scientific views (e.g., when the six days of Creation are said to correspond to geological ages). Whereas Reform and Liberal Judaism generally accept the authority of the sciences in their respective spheres, Orthodoxy tends to be more fundamentalist and to insist on the literal acceptance of biblical and even rabbinic statements. Thus biblical criticism, theories of *evolution, and other scientific or critical views are still considered heretical in certain Orthodox circles.

SCRIBES. See SOFER.

SCRIPT, HEBREW. The ancient Hebrew script, as it is found on coins, seals, and other inscriptions from the First Temple period, was similar to neighboring Semitic (Phoenician, Canaanite) scripts but was replaced after the Babylonian exile by the square script currently in use. The Talmud refers to the former as ketav 'Ivri (Hebrew script) and to the latter as ketav Ashuri (Assyrian script)—although in San. 21b the Talmud explains the latter term as meaning “upright, square script”. Most Talmudic rabbis hold that scripture was originally written in the ancient script but was rewritten by *Ezra in accordance with the injunction of “a prophet who came up from Babylon” (San. 21b). A different view, found in the Talmud and accepted by *Azariah ben Mosheh dei *Rossi in the sixteenth century, claims priority for the square script and maintains that the Bible was originally written (by Moses) in the Assyrian script and then changed to the Hebrew script, after which the Assyrian script was reintroduced. Detailed regulations are laid down as to the ink and parchment or hide that may be used for sacred scrolls, as well as the manner of writing to be employed (see SEFER TORAH; SOFER SETAM). From the standard square script, various types of cursive scripts have developed (see RASHI SCRIPT). The ancient Hebrew script is still used by the *Samaritans.

SCROLL OF ANTIOCHUS, also known as the Scroll of the Hasmoneans; pseudepigraphous work written in Aramaic in the sixth or seventh century CE, extant also in Hebrew and Arabic translations. It describes various events of the Hasmonean Revolt and is entirely legendary in its character, even though its author was familiar with at least some of the historical accounts of 1 Maccabees (see MACCABEES, BOOKS OF THE). A number of its traditions—such as the miracle of the oil—are well-known from other rabbinic sources, while others—for example, the story of how Judah killed Nicanor—were probably invented for etiological purposes, to explain the origins of the festival known as Nicanor Day to an audience ignorant of 1 and 2 Maccabees.

SCROLLS (Heb. megillot). In ancient times, all biblical books were written on scrolls. Even after the introduction of bound leaves (codices), the scroll form was maintained for religious purposes, primarily the public reading of the Bible in the synagogue. The writing materials used and the length of the scrolls that were produced developed and changed over time; the regulations concerning these are dealt with at length by rabbis in their halakhic writings. The Torah scroll (see SEFER TORAH) used in the synagogue today dates from Talmudic times; prior to this, the individual books (see ḤUMMASH) were written on separate scrolls. In time, however, the manufacture of biblical scrolls became virtually limited to those books that were actually read in the synagogue: primarily, Torah scrolls and the Ḥameš Megillot, the Five Scrolls of the Hagiographa. Some synagogues employ parchment scrolls of the books of the prophets, from which the haftarah is read. See also MEGILLAH.

SECULARISM, a term that literally means “of this world” (the social, political, and cultural spheres as distinct from the religious sphere), has often taken on the meaning of “antireligious.” The notion of “secular” came late to Judaism; traditional Hebrew has no word for “secular” because both qodesh (the holy) and ḥol (the profane) were ritual terms.

Since the early nineteenth century, the authority of religious establishments and of religious law has been narrowed. After the Emancipation, Jews could increasingly define themselves as such without having to belong to the religious community. Activities formerly in the hands of religious bodies (education, charity, the administration of justice, punishment) have been taken over by secular agencies, which provide such services as social welfare, health care, and education. Most Jews send their children to state schools and participate in the secular cultural and political process. In Jewish communal life, many Jewish organizations, such as philanthropic federations, Zionist groups, and the like, function independently of religious direction.

The word secular (i.e., concern with this world as opposed to the realm of religion) should be distinguished from the word secularist (i.e., adherence to any ideology, such as Marxism, which rejects religion per se as illusory, escapist, or obscurantist). One of the strongest Jewish movements in eastern Europe in the first third of the twentieth century, the Bund, was outspokenly secular and antireligious. The Zionist movement, which emerged at the end of the nineteenth century, although having a religious component, was secular in leadership and goals, thus leading to the anti-Zionism of the ultra-Orthodox, who believed that the return to Zion could only be achieved through divine intervention. Soviet Russia was officially atheistic, and its ban on religious education meant that almost all Soviet Jews came to regard themselves as secular Jews.

Once the possibility of a secular Jewish identity came to be recognized, the Hebrew term hiloni (a secular person) was coined. While the Orthodox movement deplored the rejection of halakhah by secularists, it recognized that they were still Jews, if born of a Jewish mother. Secular Jews prefer either to identify Judaism with humanist values or to define Jewishness as an ethnic bond.

In Israel, the Knesset, a secular legislature, conferred many rights on the religious establishment and its law courts, but the Israeli rabbinate remains subject to the authority, in important legal matters, of the secular Supreme Court. Powers entrusted to the rabbinical authorities (all matters of personal status) have meant that there is no clear-cut wall of separation in Israel between state and religion, resulting in tensions between the secular and religious segments of the population. Since there are other forms of modern Jewish religiosity apart from Orthodoxy, secular Jews, properly so-called, are those who have no religious affiliation, especially in the Diaspora, but who adhere to an ethnic, cultural, or national Jewish identity. SEDER (סדר; arrangement), a term most commonly used for the home service on the first night (two nights in the Diaspora) of Pesah (see HAGGADAH OF PESAH). The term also refers to instructions for conduct; small books containing prayers, laws, or customs (for example, Seder Zemanim, a calendar; Seder Meliḥah, a book with laws about salting meat); the division of the Torah according to the *triennial cycle (also applied to the weekly reading of the annual cycle; see SIDRAH); the order of the *Mishnah; or the order of prayers (usually called siddur [*prayer book]).

SEDER ELIYYAHU, Midrashic work, also known as Tanna' de-Vei Eliyyahu. The book consists of homilies concerned with the reasons for the commandments, love of and study of Torah, and other religious and ethical teachings. The work was written between the third century and the tenth century CE, probably by one author, who claims to have lived in Jerusalem and Babylon.

SEDER 'OLAM ZUTA', a short historiographical work, so-called because of a superficial resemblance to the much earlier text Seder 'Olam*. This anonymous work presumably dates from the late geonic period, although in its present form it includes later additions. It begins with the reign of King David and attempts to demonstrate that the exilarchs of Babylonia were his direct descendants and continued the royal line, thus maintaining a sort of quasi-sovereignty after the end of the monarchy. Much of the text is devoted to a list of exilarchs of the Talmudic period and sages said to have been associated with them. There is a detailed account, at least partly legendary, of the career of Mar Zutra', who is said to have been executed after rebelling against Sassanian authority. His son, also called Mar Zutra', is reported to have gone to Erets Yisra'el in the early sixth century and achieved high rank there.

SEDER TANNA'IM VE-'AMORA'IM, a short anonymous work of the geonic period of which at least part dates from the end of the ninth century CE. It contains two major sections, one historical and the other methodological. The historical section, although beginning with Moses, is devoted primarily to Talmudic Babylonia and gives the dates of death of leading amora'im. The methodological section represents the first large-scale attempt to catalog rules concerning the interpretation of Talmudic sources and, more particularly, rules for adjudicating disputes between Talmudic authorities. This section may be further divided into a portion concerning the tannaitic period and another concerning amoraic sources. There are substantial differences in style and organization between the various sections of the work (and even within some of these sections), and it is doubtful whether the book as known is the work of a single author. The work, edited by K. Kahana, was published in Frankfurt in 1935.

SEER (Heb. ro'eh; hozeh), an early designation for prophet, indicative of the visionary aspect of *prophecy (cf. Nm. 12.6ff.). Ro'eh was the popular title for a man of God prior to the time of Samuel (1 Sm. 9.8) and probably referred to his function as a clairvoyant diviner who would be consulted for practical ends (e.g., Saul and his servant turned to Samuel in order to find the lost she-asses; 1 Sm. 9.6ff.). In the Akkadian prophetic texts from Mari, on the left bank of the Euphrates River, there are multiple references to a similar diviner called the barum, who interpreted the liver and other entrails of slaughtered animals. The term ro'eh fell into disuse with the development of the vocation of prophet from seer, diviner, and predictor to the recipient of the word of God, the message of whom was to be transmitted to the people and its rulers. The Hasidim bestowed the title of seer upon R. *Ya'aqov Yitshaq, ha-Hozeh mi-Lublin, who was reputed to possess the gift of second sight.

SEFER HA-BAHIR, earliest work of kabbalistic literature, written by an unknown author in northern Spain or Provence at the end of the twelfth century. This is the first work formulating the kabbalistic symbolism of the ten emanated "attributes" (called sefirot* by later kabbalists) that constitute the divine pleroma and the concept that there is a feminine aspect in the divine realm. The dating of the book is based on the presence of terminology derived from the works of *Avraham bar Haya' (mid-12th cent.), probably from Avraham *ibn Ezra (died 1167), and possibly from the translations of Yehudah ibn Tibbon (1170s; see IBN TIBBON FAMILY). Its teachings are quoted by the Gerona kabbalists in the beginning of the thirteenth century, when it became the standard kabbalistic text and had an impact on the Zoharic system of symbols.

The book was written in the form of a midrash. The first paragraph is attributed to *Nehunya' ben ha-Qanah, who has a minor role in Mishnaic tradition but is presented as the leader of the *Heikhalot mystics in Heikhalot Rabbati. Others in the book include R. Aqiva', but the main characters are the fictional R. Rehum'ai and the impossibly named "Rabbi Amora'," this being a generic term and not a personal name. In several paragraphs, a discussion between the speaker and a group of disciples is indicated. The main sources of the book are Talmudic sayings, Heikhalot traditions, and the Sefer Yetsirah, but use of these sources is creative; in almost every case the original meaning is obscured and a new one presented. The last section of the book is based on chapter thirteen in Pirkei de-Rabbi Eli'ezer*, a description of the sins of Adam and Eve and the actions of Samael in the garden of Eden. The author develops a unique style in presenting his teachings through parables, many of them including the figures of a king, queen, or princess, in reference to the divine world.

The divine pleroma is presented as a divine tree (ilan; only later kabbalists combined the divine ilan with the tree ['ets] of life) that is upside-down, its root reflecting the Hebrew letter shin. In the last third of the work, the pleroma is described as a sequence of ten divine utterances, the first being the supreme crown; the second, divine wisdom; and so on. This sequence served as a basis for later kabbalistic descriptions of the ten sefirot.

The femininity of the *Shekhinah is one of the most important innovative symbols of this work, but the intense erotic character of the dynamism within the divine world was developed only by later kabbalists; it is hardly hinted at in the book. Many paragraphs depict the powers of evil, but they do not acquire an independent status; the evil elements are described as the fingers of the left hand of God. This is the first Jewish work that accepts the concept of *transmigration of souls, long known but rejected by Jewish thinkers.

Gershom Scholem described Sefer ha-Bahir as "a renewed explosion of the mythical within the heart of rabbinic Judaism." He did not determine whether these mythical elements, many of them having distinct gnostic character, were derived from Jewish sources or from non-Jewish gnostic traditions. About eighty manuscripts of the book are extant. It was printed several times and translated into German by Scholem and appeared in several English editions.

SEFER HA-HINNUKH, one of the most popular books on the reasons for the commandments (see COMMANDMENTS, REASONS FOR) written in the thirteenth century. Some believe that the book was composed by R. Pinhas ha-Levi of Barcelona, a colleague and contemporary of Nahmanides, while others have ascribed it to his nephew, R. Aharon ha-Levi of Barcelona, a pupil of Shelomoh ben Avraham Adret. It is directed to students ages eighteen through twenty and is a précis of Moses *Maimonides' work on the rational nature of the commandments. Sefer ha-Hinnukh stresses observance of the commandments and says that performance should precede intention. A person must not try to calculate the reward for the fulfillment of a commandment but may consider its reasons. The author recommends that students read the book on Sabbath eves so that they will not run wild in the streets and states that the book is also of value to adults as a source for the study of halakhah. There have been many editions since its first publication (Venice, 1513); most recently in Jerusalem in 1991.

SEFER HA-QANAH, kabbalistic work by the anonymous author of Sefer Peli'ah, who seems to have written early in the fifteenth century in a Greek-Jewish rather than Spanish environment. Both works are in the form of dialogues between the wonder child Nahum, who received heavenly revelations at the age of five, and his father Qanah. The books contain, in the main, material from earlier mystical writings but are sharply critical of purely exoteric halakhic observance unaccompanied by mystical intentions. Some of the ideas in Sefer ha-Qanah and Sefer Peli'ah seem to have influenced *Shabbetai Tsevi. The first complete edition of Sefer ha-Qanah appeared in Poritsk in 1786; the first complete edition of Sefer Peli'ah appeared in Korets in 1784.

SEFER HA-RAZIM, ancient Hebrew work of magic and angelology, probably originating from the fourth century CE. Many sections of this work were known in a fragmentary form scattered in Ashkenazi Hasidic and kabbalistic collections (like the Sefer Razi'el). Mordechai Margulies found several parts of this work among the Cairo Genizah fragments and successfully re-created its text and structure in his edition of the book (1966). The treatise is divided into seven chapters, each describing the celestial powers in charge of the various aspects of one of the seven firmaments, starting with the lowest and ascending to the seventh. The description of the lower spheres includes detailed magical formulas by means of which these celestial powers can be utilized. This is one of the largest collections of Jewish spells and magical incantations for protection against thieves and enemies, the concoction of love-potions, and the securing of other worldly needs. The book abounds with Greek terms, including incantations based on pagan prayers, indicating the close ties between Jewish and Greek *magic during this period.

SEFER HASIDIM, the most extensive work in the field of Jewish *ethics written in the Middle Ages. Its author was R. *Yehudah ben Shemu'el he-Hasid of Regensburg (died 1217), one of the great teachers among the Hasidei Ashkenaz. Rabbi Yehudah dedicated many years to this work, and his son, R. Mosheh Zaltman, testifies that, in the last week of his life, he wrote two folios of the book. The work has not been preserved in its original form; two editions are extant, one—shorter and probably later—was published in Bologna in 1538, and the second—more extensive and probably earlier—was preserved in a Parma manuscript and published by J. Wistinezki (1896) and again, later, with a detailed introduction by J. Freimann (Frankfurt am Main, 1924). A facsimile edition of the Parma manuscript was published by I. Marcus (Jerusalem, 1986). Several early quotations from this work are not found in these two editions, suggesting that the original work may have been larger than the ones we have. It is probable that the first part of the Parma manuscript, dealing with the fear of God and repentance, was written by R. Shemu'el ben Kalonimos, R. Yehudah's father (see KALONIMOS FAMILY).

The book is made up of sections, some of them paragraph-length, and some extending to several pages (1,200 in the Bologna edition; 2,000 in the Parma ms.). Parts of the book are organized in chapters, each dedicated to a specific subject. Many of the sections are homiletical and present basic norms of Jewish ethics. Most of them deal with practical, everyday problems of conduct in ritual and ethical matters, as well as conduct for the teaching and studying of the Torah, social and family norms, attitudes toward gentiles, and the dangers of demons and witches. The work includes many stories, most of them exempla demonstrating correct behavior; others describe miracles, demonological phenomena, and historical events. The narratives in the work often reflect popular beliefs current in Germany in the twelfth century.

SEFER RAZI'EL, a mystical book ascribed to the angel *Raziel. According to its author, its secrets were imparted by Raziel to Adam when he was driven from the garden of Eden, and to Noah before he entered the ark, and ultimately came into the possession of Solomon.

The work contains much ancient magical and cosmological material as well as texts connected with the Mer-kavah (see MA'ASEH MERKAVAH) and *Heikhalot literature. Sefer Razi'el, compiled in its present form probably in the seventeenth century, had an unusually large circulation in eastern Europe, owing to the belief that its presence in a house ensured protection against fire and other dangers.

SEFER TORAH (סֵפֶר תּוֹרָה; Torah scroll), a scroll that contains the first five books of the Bible—the Torah or Pentateuch. The Sefer Torah is used for synagogue readings on Mondays, Thursdays, Sabbaths, and holy days. The entire scroll is written by a scribe (see SOFER SETAM) on strips of vellum or parchment that have been specially treated to be durable. Their source must be leather from a kosher species of animal, although the particular animal need not have been slaughtered ritually. Originally the use of a reed pen was considered obligatory, but later a quill was permitted. The strips of parchment are sewn together with threads made from the tendons of ritually clean beasts to form a long roll, both ends of which are wound around wooden staves ('atsei hayyim). In Ashkenazi and western Sephardi synagogues, the scroll is tied with a sash—sometimes decorated—then covered with an embroidered mantle (me'il). A decorative silver breastplate (hoshen) and pointer (yad)—the latter used to indicate the place during the Torah reading—are often suspended from the staves. The staves are frequently surmounted by either two silver finials (rimmonim) or a silver crown (keter Torah). In eastern Sephardi synagogues, the Sefer Torah is placed inside a wooden or metal cylindrical chest (tiq), and a cloth is draped on the outside of the chest. Jewish law forbids direct touching of the parchment; when necessary the parchment is handled by means of such a cloth.

When a scroll is being written, the scribe must maintain a devout frame of mind and utter each word aloud before writing it. He must copy the Torah scroll from another and may not write from memory. There are scribes who immerse themselves in a miquveh* prior to each writing of the divine name. Each letter in the scroll must be separated from the next by a space. In the event of a mistake, the scribe may erase a letter, unless this occurs during the writing of the divine name, in which case the scribe can either cut out the word and patch the parchment or elect to discard the entire strip and replace it with a new strip. If a mistake is found in a Torah scroll, it must be corrected before the scroll may be used again for the Torah reading. If three or more mistakes are found, the Torah scroll may not be used again until the corrections have been made and the entire Torah scroll has been checked for accuracy. The text is written without vocalization or accentuation. Decorative titles (tagin*) are appended to the tops of thirteen specific letters of the alphabet. There is no punctuation or verse division, but sections are indicated either by leaving a space equivalent to the width of at least nine letters within a line (setumah [closed section]) or by leaving the rest of the line blank (petuḥah [open section]). The location of each setumah or petuḥah has been handed down by tradition, and their placement is not at the scribe's discretion. Since the advent of printed guides for scribes, most Torah scrolls written in the past century have followed one of two standard patterns in terms of number of lines per page, number of words on each line, and so on. Most Torah scrolls today have either 245 or 248 columns. A column has no fewer than forty-two but not more than sixty lines. It is customary for six specific columns to begin with six specific letters, which together spell out, in Hebrew, the phrase "in God's name." In the case of one of the two models generally used for writing Torah scrolls today, all the columns, with the exception of the six mentioned previously, begin with the letter vav. The conclusion (siyyum*) of the writing of a Sefer Torah is an occasion for celebration; each member of the congregation writes one of the last letters. In most cases the scribe will outline the last letters, and participants will then fill in the outline.

The Sefer Torah is the central object of veneration in the synagogue*. When the Torah is carried, the congregation stands, and those nearest to it kiss the mantle as the Torah passes them. Should a scroll be dropped, the entire congregation is under obligation to fast. In early times, the rabbis would not allow any worshiper to leave the synagogue until after the Sefer Torah had been replaced in the ark following the reading of the Torah. The Sefer Torah is kept in the ark (aron or heikhal), which is located on the synagogue wall facing Jerusalem. One Sefer Torah may be placed on another, but a Sefer Torah may not lie under a scroll of the Prophets, the latter considered less holy. The open scroll is displayed to the congregation before (in Sephardi practice) or after (in Ashkenazi practice) the reading of the portion of the Torah. Usually, all readings are taken from a single scroll; however, on special days they may be taken from two or even three scrolls. On Simḥat Torah (in Israel, on Shemini 'Atseret*) all available scrolls are taken from the ark and carried in procession seven times around the synagogue. It is the custom of Ḥasidim outside Israel to carry the Torah scrolls in procession both on Shemini 'Atseret and on Simḥat Torah. If a synagogue is in danger, the scrolls must be rescued first. A Sefer Torah that is worn out or disqualified for other reasons is not destroyed but either placed in a special storeroom (genizah*) or ceremoniously buried. Should a Sefer Torah have been burned, its ashes, too, are ceremoniously buried. During the Second Temple period, a Sefer Torah was deposited in the Temple sanctuary and taken out on solemn occasions when the high priest or king would read portions to the public. The last of the 613 Torah commandments states that each male is obligated to write a Torah scroll; many rabbinic authorities rule that this commandment can be fulfilled by the purchase of a completed Torah scroll. In ancient times, Jewish kings were commanded to write two Torah scrolls and to keep one with them wherever they went. Laws regarding the Torah scroll are codified in the Shulhan 'Arukh, Yoreh De'ah 270–284.

SEFER YETSIRAH, ancient Hebrew treatise on cosmogony and cosmology dating from the third or fourth century CE; one of the most influential works of Jewish science, philosophy, and, because of the kabbalistic commentaries written on it, mysticism. It presents, in brief and enigmatic sentences, a systematic view of the principles of the process of creation and the laws governing nature and humans. It states that the world was created by "thirty-two paths of [divine] wisdom," which are the first ten numbers and the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew *alphabet. The basic concept follows the Mishnaic statement that the world was created by ten divine utterances (Avot 5.1) and the Talmudic view that the world was created by the letters of the alphabet (e.g., Men. 29b). Sefer Yetsirah systematized these concepts and presented a picture of the process of creation largely independent of the description in Genesis 1. The ten numbers (*sefirot) are the ten directions or five dimensions of the universe: north, south, east, west, up, down (space), beginning, end (time), good, and evil. They also express the evolvment of the three elements, air, water, and fire. Each letter of the alphabet is in charge of three realms, one in the universe (the stars), one in time (month, week, day), and one in humans (an organ or a sense). The author invented a system of Hebrew grammar, seeing in the rules of language the source of the laws of nature. The grammatical distinction between masculine and feminine governs all existence. He viewed the difference between good and evil as a grammatical one, and as such they are present in the universe and in individuals. The work does not deal with religious or ethical subjects, such as the commandments, the people of Israel, the human soul, or prayer. There is at the end of the book an indication that the understanding of these scientific laws brought Abraham into a religious union with God, and everyone following him in this may achieve the same goal.

The concept of the Hebrew alphabet in Sefer Yetsirah is more limited than that of the Midrash; no use is made of gimatriyyah, notariqon, or other methods. The one context in which the permutation of letters is mentioned is in connection with good and evil; evil is created by a minute change in the order of the letters in a "good" word. The author describes in great detail how the universe evolved and is governed by individual letters and their groupings. The most extensive description in this work is that of God "crowning" each letter and empowering it to "govern" an aspect of the universe. These "aspects" are portrayed as having three layers: universal, temporal, and anthropological. Each of the twelve "simple" letters, for instance, rules over one constellation of stars, one month in the year, and one human limb. Each of the seven "double" letters, after being "crowned," is in charge of a planet, a day of the week, and a human characteristic. At the top of the pyramid of the alphabet are the "mothers," the three principal letters alef, mem, and shin, which govern, respectively, the three elements of air, water, and fire (the author of Sefer Yetsirah does not recognize earth as an element); the three seasons of the year; and the three principal parts of the human figure.

While thus formulating a theory of divine creation and providence by means of the alphabet, the author also developed a theory of language; words are derived from roots, each of which is comprised of two letters. The 231 possible combinations of two letters are the source of all words. He describes the alphabet as two revolving wheels meeting at each point to create a root. The groupings of the letters indicate the first formulation of Hebrew grammar, centuries before Hebrew adopted its current grammar from Arabic examples. This highly sophisticated concept of the alphabet does not follow Midrashic concepts: there is no discussion of the shapes of the letters, their numerical value, transmutations, or their adornments.

Sefer Yetsirah is not mentioned in ancient Hebrew literature, and its terminology is original and unique. It was discovered by Jewish rationalists and scientists in the tenth century; *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on wrote a detailed commentary in Arabic, and Shabbetai *Donnolo, in Hebrew. Many rationalistic scientific commentaries followed until the twelfth century, the most detailed by *Yehudah ben Barzillai al-Bargeloni. Late in the twelfth century the treatise became a major source for Jewish mystics in Europe, kabbalists and non-kabbalists, many of whom derived their terminology from it; since then it has been regarded as an ancient expression of Jewish mysticism.

It first appeared in Latin translation in Paris in 1552 and then in Hebrew in Mantua in 1562. The best-known edition appeared in Warsaw in 1884. Various English translations have been published, including that of Knut Stenring and Akiva ben Joseph (1970).

SEFIROT HA-'OMER. See 'OMER.

SEFIROT (סְפִירוֹת; numbers), a term probably originating in the Sefer Yetsirah*, where it refers to the primordial numbers. In later kabbalistic writings under Neoplatonic and gnostic influence, sefirot refers to the *emanations and manifestations of the Godhead. Early kabbalistic literature has a variety of names for these ten sefirot. The usual designation and order is in the form of a kabbalistic "tree" in the following order: Keter Elyon, the "supreme" crown of God; Hokhmah, the "wisdom" or primordial idea of God; and Binah, the "understanding" of God—these form the first triad. Forming a second triad are: Hesed, "love" of mercy of God; Gevurah or Din, his "power," in particular the power of stern judgment; and Tiferet or Rahamim, the "beauty" or "compassion" of God. The last of the sefirot is Netsah, the "lasting endurance" of God, identified with the Shekhinah* and with Keneset Yisra'el (the mystical archetype of Israel), which functions as the recipient of the divine life that flows into it from all the others. (The names of the seven lower sefirot are based on 1 Chr. 29.11). A large part of kabbalistic speculation is concerned with describing the nature of the sefirot, their relationship with each other, as well as with their fountainhead, which is the unfathomable Godhead or Ein Sof*, and with the lower worlds. In terms of practical mystical life, this means that every religious commandment and observance is related to a specific sefirah, as are the accompanying mystical meditations.

SELAH (סֶלָה), a word of uncertain etymology and meaning that appears seventy-one times in the Book of Psalms, three times in Habakkuk (chap. 3), and in the third and eighteenth benedictions of the 'Amidah. It has been variously interpreted as meaning "forever" (Targum), "eternally, without interruption" (Eruv. 54a), or "it is so" (Avraham ibn Ezra on Ps. 3.3); as a musical instruction for a change in rhythm or tune, fortissimo ("lift up" your voices), an interlude during which musical instruments are played while the singers are silent, or a pause whose significance was concealed from those not engaged in the Temple service; or as a liturgical response by worshipers ("lift up" your benediction).

SELIHOT (סְלִיחוֹת), non-statutory additional prayers originally composed for Yom Kippur and fast days but later extended to other services. The kernel of all selihot consists of the recitation of Exodus 34.6–7, with its enumeration of the thirteen divine attributes: "The Lord! the Lord! a God compassionate and gracious, slow to anger, abounding in kindness and faithfulness, extending kindness to the thousandth generation, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin; yet he does not remit all punishment, but visits the iniquity of parents upon children and children's children, upon the third and fourth generations." The selihot were incorporated within the framework of the Amidah*, though early Palestinian payyetanim (see PAYYETAN) connected them with the qerovah*, as is still to be found in certain fast-day rites. In the Middle Ages, an amplified version of selihot came to be used on Ro'sh ha-Shanah and the intermediate days between Ro'sh ha-Shanah and Yom Kippur (the 'Aseret Yemei Teshuvah), and then during the whole period preceding Ro'sh ha-Shanah—from 1 Elul among Sephardim and among Ashkenazim from the Sunday before Ro'sh ha-Shanah (or from two previous Sundays when Ro'sh ha-Shanah falls on a Monday or Tuesday). Selihot are divided into several categories, according to their subject: tokhahah* (admonition), in which the worshiper is called upon to consider his ultimate destiny; baqqashah* (petition), not always poetical, which address the suffering of Israel and contain a request for God's mercy; gezerah* (evil decree), which describe various persecutions and sufferings, particularly those of the Crusades in the eleventh century; agedah* (the binding of Isaac), which address martyrdom; tehinna* (supplication), on the theme of the relationship between God and Israel; viddui (confession), in prose; and hata'nu, which address Jewish martyrdom, especially that of the Ten Martyrs (e.g., Elle Ezkerah, recited during the Musaf service on Yom Kippur). The poetical forms of selihot include sheniyah; shelishiyah; motsefab; and pizmon, a seliḥah consisting of strophes of more than four lines, with a refrain. The earliest known writer of selihot is *Yosei ben Yosei (5th cent.), one of whose compositions, Omnam Ashameinu, is included in the evening service of Yom Kippur. In the Italian rite, the Seliḥot service is called Taḥanunim (Supplications). The practice of having a minimum of four days before Ro'sh ha-Shanah when seliḥot are recited is connected to the Temple practice of examining the sacrificial offering for four days to ensure that it had no defects or blemishes; therefore, the need for four days of self-examination prior to repentance. In North America, it has become customary to hold a late night Seliḥot service on the Saturday night preceding Ro'sh ha-Shanah. Seliḥot have also served as an opportunity for liturgical creativity in the modern period; some have been inspired by the Holocaust. Seliḥot was re-introduced into the Reform movement by R. David Polish, and in recent years the Reform movement in North America produced a Seliḥot service entitled Gates of Forgiveness. Among its liturgical innovations is the use of feminine imagery to refer to God.

SEMAHOT. See EVEL RABBATI.

SEMIKHAH (סְמִיכָהּ, laying on of hands), originally, the laying of hands on *sacrifices prior to their being slaughtered, as mandated by the Torah (Lev. 1.4). Semikha was required of all sacrifices brought by individuals but not those offered by the community. The sacrificer placed his hands between the horns of the animal and, where required, made his confession. The term was also used to denote the passing on of permission to rule on questions of Jewish law, which was originally performed by a laying on of the hands (see ORDINATION).

SÉMINAIRE ISRAËLITE DE FRANCE, French rabbinical college, also known as École Rabbinique, that was founded as a yeshivah in 1704 in Metz. In 1859 the college moved to Paris and was supervised by the central consistoire. Rabbis are graduated after a five-year course of study; the college also trains cantors and teachers in a spirit of modern Orthodoxy.

SEMINARIO RABÍNICO LATINOAMERICANO, Conservative rabbinical seminary founded in 1962 in Buenos Aires, Argentina, by Jewish Theological Seminary of America graduate R. Marshall T. Meyer. The school was modeled after pre-World War II modern rabbinical seminaries in western Europe and the United States and was the first of its kind in Latin America.

Seminary functions include publication of new Spanish translations of major Jewish works and a journal (Majshavot), Jewish teacher training, and synagogue outreach as a beit din. The school also sponsors a professional rabbinic association.

In 1984 R. Meyer returned to the United States but remained active at the seminary until his death in 1993. The seminary is administered by graduates of its programs. Over forty rabbis and hundreds of Jewish educators have graduated from the seminary since 1962 and serve over eighty-five congregations in Latin and North America.

SEMITES, a term deriving from the list of the descendants of Shem, son of Noah, found in Genesis 10.21–31, which is used to designate the speakers of a family of related languages. Thus, the term is properly a linguistic and not an ethnic classification, with the adjective Semitic, first introduced by the German historian A. L. Schlözer in 1781, describing the languages spoken by these peoples. Remnants of the primitive Semitic religion can be discerned in aspects of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. The languages classifiable under the general heading of Semitic may be broken down into Northeast Semitic (Mesopotamia), Northwest Semitic (Syria-Palestine), and Southwest Semitic (Arabia and Ethiopia). Northeast Semitic is represented by Akkadian (Assyrian and Babylonian). The Northwest Semitic language group includes Ugaritic, *Aramaic (western Aramaic: Nabatean, Palmyrene, Samaritan Aramaic, Jewish Palestinian Aramaic, and Christian Palestinian Aramaic; eastern Aramaic: Syriac, Babylonian Aramaic, and Mandean), and Canaanite (the *Hebrew language, Phoenician, Punic, also related to Edomite, Ammonite, and Moabite). Arabic and Ethiopic constitute the Southwest Semitic language group. These various Semitic languages have in common a basic lexical stock, with the majority of words having a triconsonantal root to which various morphemes are affixed in order to modify the root meaning. Semitic languages are usually graphically consonantal, although most later added vowel signs. Semitic languages also have similar syntax, no neuter gender, and are all written from right to left with the exception of Akkadian and Ethiopic.

The term antisemitism* was first used in late nineteenth-century Germany to describe hatred of Jews and is therefore a misnomer as it does not relate to other Semitic peoples.

SEPHARDIM, form of the place name Sepharad, which appears in Obadiah 1.20 and which originally referred to the kingdom of Lydia in Asia Minor but was early identified by commentators with the country of Spain (the name Zarephath in the same verse was identified with France). As a result, the Jews of the Iberian Peninsula and their descendants came to be known as Sephardim, in distinction to the Jews of the Franco-German tradition, who are known as Ashkenazim* (Ashkenaz in Gen. 10.3 having been identified with Germany). It has been suggested that in ritual and liturgical matters, Sephardi Jewry represents a continuation of the Babylonian tradition, since all the Mediterranean countries came under the influence of the Babylonian ge'onim during the period of Muslim rule, while Ashkenazi Jewry largely followed the tradition of the Palestinian scholars, but the clear origin and demarcation of the two liturgies is still a matter of discussion. The Jews in medieval Spain created a rich and varied culture, and it was there that the Kabbalah saw its first flowering in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. The Sephardim differ from the Ashkenazim in their Hebrew pronunciation (see HEBREW LANGUAGE; the modern State of Israel—and in its wake, many Ashkenazi communities—has adopted the Sephardi pronunciation), aspects of their prayer rites (although the basis is identical), and many customs and traditions. After the expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492, Sephardim imposed their culture and traditions upon the Jewish communities of North Africa, the Balkans, and the Middle East. Subsequently Marranos* escaping from the Iberian Peninsula founded communities in western Europe and the Americas. Currently, Sephardim constitute some 20 percent of worldwide Jewry; some 50 percent of the Jewish population in Israel. Israel has both a Sephardi and Ashkenazi chief rabbinate*. SEPTUAGINT, oldest Greek version of the Bible. The name (septuaginta in Latin means seventy) is derived from a legend (Letter of Aristeas; Meg. 9a; minor tractate Soferim 1.8) according to which Eleazar, the high priest, at the command of the Egyptian ruler Ptolemy Philadelphus (c.288-247) sent seventy-two scholars from Jerusalem to Alexandria to render the Torah into Greek for the royal library. Each translator worked in his own cell, yet guided by divine inspiration, they finished simultaneously, and all the translations were identical. According to the church fathers, the seventy sages translated not only the Pentateuch but the whole Hebrew Bible. The Septuagint owes its existence to the fact that the growing Jewish population of Egypt had become sufficiently Hellenized to need a Greek translation of the Hebrew Scriptures, especially for liturgical purposes in the synagogue. The first Greek translations were probably oral and accompanied the public reading of the Hebrew text; later a written translation emerged, and in time the Greek version often took the place of the original. The legend appears to contain a core of fact: the Pentateuch was probably translated in the third century, possibly with the encouragement of Ptolemy Philadelphus II. The first translators may have been born in Palestine or else received guidance from Palestinian scholars; but the translation was made in Egypt. The Prophets and part of the Hagiographa were rendered in the second century BCE. In the Septuagint, the canonical books are arranged in a different order (law, history, poetry, prophecy) from that of the Masoretic Text (see BIBLE TEXT). In addition, the collection of Greek sacred writings also contains translations of a number of additional compositions known as the Apocrypha (see APOCRYPHA AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA).

The Greek translation is a composite and uneven work; at times it is literal to the point of unintelligibility; at times it is paraphrastic. The translators' knowledge of Hebrew often seems to have been inadequate, but in general their understanding of the language and subject matter is excellent (see BIBLE TRANSLATIONS). Based on a Hebrew text that differed in many respects from the Masoretic Text and other Hebrew texts found at Qumran, the Septuagint is of utmost importance for biblical criticism. The various manuscripts of the Septuagint (Vaticanus, Sinaiticus, and Alexandrinus, as well as early papyrus fragments) differ from one another, but they probably originate from a single translation. At first the Septuagint was viewed with favor by the Palestinian rabbis (Meg. 9b; Soferim 1.8; cf. Meg. 1.8). Hellenistic Jewry revered it and even instituted an annual celebration in its honor (Philo, Life of Moses 2.7). But the growing recognition of divergences between the text of the Hebrew Bible and that of the Greek, and at a later stage its acceptance as the official Christian Bible, produced a hostile reaction in rabbinic circles. The day on which the Septuagint was completed was likened to the day on which the golden calf was made (Soferim 1.7), and study of the Greek language, once highly esteemed, was frowned upon (Sot. 9.14, 49b). Thus, the Septuagint ultimately became a barrier between Jewish and Greek cultures and the instrument for the propagation of a rival religion. New Greek translations became necessary for Hellenistic Jewry, each of which revised the Septuagint. The best known of these are the translations of *Aquila, *Symmachus, and *Theodotion.

SERAPHIM, heavenly beings mentioned only once in the Bible, in Isaiah 6.2, where they are described as six-winged creatures who sing God's praise ("holy, holy, holy"). In the apocryphal Book of Enoch, the seraphim are identified with the "burning serpents" (nehashim seraphim) of Numbers 21.6. They are also mentioned in the liturgical elaboration of the *Qedushah in the daily morning service. See also ANGELS.

SERMONS. See HOMILETICS.

SERPENT. There are several terms referring to the serpent in Biblical Hebrew, and they often appear in different combinations in poetic parallelism. The two more prevalent contextual themes occurring in these verses have to do with snake venom (e.g., Dt. 32.33; Ps. 58.5, 140.4; Jb. 20.14, 16) and snake bites (e.g., Gn. 49.17; Nm. 21.6, 8; Jer. 8.17; Prv. 23.32). Other snake themes include procreation through the hatching of eggs (Is. 59.5); dwelling in holes in the ground and dens (Is. 11.8); hiding in walls and stone fences (Am. 5.19; Eccl. 10.8); eating dust (Is. 65.25); the lethal "tongue" (Ps. 140.4; Jb. 20.16); and snake charmers who chant magical spells against snakebites (Ps. 58.5-6; Jer. 8.17; Eccl. 10.11). All of these themes have parallels in ancient Near Eastern literature, especially in Akkadian and Ugaritic. In both Akkadian and Sumerian, a term for snake is used that literally means "fire-snake," paralleling the biblical term saraf, which, in light of this precedent, may be seen to derive from the Hebrew verb s r f (burn).

In the Bible the serpent was regarded as a symbol of evil, and as such figures as the tempter in the story of the garden of *Eden (Gn. 3). Its negative association with the tree of life stands in contrast to Babylonian myth, in which the serpent appears on a tree as one who bestows life. As proof of Moses' divine mission to Pharaoh, his staff turned into a serpent (Ex 4.2-4). A brazen serpent (*Nehushtan) served to cure the stricken Israelites in the wilderness (Nm. 21); the representation was kept in the Temple and must have constituted an object of superstitious worship until destroyed by Hezekiah

(2 Kgs. 18.4). The rabbis counted among the wonders of the Temple in Jerusalem the fact that serpents never caused any harm within its precincts (Avot 5.9).

SERVANT OF THE LORD. The concept of a servant of God, through whose suffering light and salvation will come to the world, is found in the second part of the Book of Isaiah (42.1–7, 49.1–9, 50.4–9, 52.13–53.12). The servant of the Lord is described as proclaiming justice and truth to the people through the divine spirit, but his path is strewn with obstacles: his own people do not recognize him, he is smitten by his adversaries, and he submits silently to suffering for the sins of others. God, however, will ultimately raise him up, and his message will triumph throughout the world. The interpretation of these somewhat obscure prophecies has been complicated by the early Christian identification of Jesus with the suffering servant (Acts 3.13, 3.26, 4.27, 4.30). Commentators disagree about whether the symbol of the servant refers to an individual (the prophet or a future messianic figure) or to a group (Israel as a whole or the righteous and loyal minority of the people). Jewish exegetes have, as a rule, favored the collective interpretation.

SE'UDAH (סעודה; meal), a festive meal on the occasion of the observance of a particular mitsvah* or on a special day. Such meals include those partaken of on Sabbaths and festivals (which in biblical times included Ro'sh Hodesh). A Se'udat Mitsvah (Meal of a Commandment) is a meal that is connected with a religious ceremony or celebration, such as a circumcision, bar or bat mitsvah, betrothal, or wedding. The rabbis held the completion of the study of a Talmudic tractate (siyyum*) to be an occasion for such a festive gathering (Shab. 118b). Such a se'udah is often arranged to fall on the day before Pesah; participation in it by firstborn males supersedes their obligation to fast on that day (see TA'ANIT BEKHORIM).

On festivals, the obligation is to consume two festive meals, but on the Sabbath a third meal is added in the afternoon—the Se'udah Shelishit (Third Meal). Eating three meals on the Sabbath became synonymous with giving the day full honor; hence, the Talmud says, “May my portion be with those who eat three meals on the Sabbath” and “He who observes the three meals on the Sabbath is delivered from three evils” (Shab. 118a). Although this meal has no Qiddush, in the course of time a special sanctity was attached to it, particularly under kabbalistic influence. Among the Polish Hasidim, the Se'udah Shelishit became a major feature of religious and social life. Gathering at the table of the tsaddiq*, Hasidim would spend hours at the sacred meal, until well after the end of the Sabbath, listening to their master's mystical discourse and singing hymns or wordless tunes that produced both ecstatic enthusiasm and quiet meditation. This inspired the custom of the Oneg Shabbat*.

The meal provided for mourners by their friends on their return from the funeral is known as Se'udat Havar'ah (Meal of Recovery). Tradition requires that it include round foods (such as eggs and rolls) to symbolize the recurring cycle of life and death. An appropriate addition is made to the Birkat ha-Mazon* on this occasion. The meal eaten prior to the fasts of Yom Kippur and Tish'ah be-'Av is called the Se'udah Mafseket. In the former case, it has a festive character, but the Se'udah Mafseket on 8 Av expresses the mournful nature of the occasion: one course only (no meat or wine) is served. According to one tradition, the meal consisted of simply a piece of bread and an egg dipped in ashes.

SE'UDAT RABBI HIDQA'. Rabbi Hidqa' (2d cent. CE) held that the Sabbath should be honored by four meals instead of the customary three (Shab. 117b). Hence, certain Orthodox Jews partake of a fourth Sabbath meal, usually after the Sabbath morning Qiddush, called “the meal of Rabbi Hidqa'.”

SEVARAH (סבירה; logical argument). Reason is one of the normative sources of Jewish law, and laws derived on the basis of sevarah are generally endowed with the status of biblical law. The rule that a person must allow himself or herself to be killed rather than shed the blood of an innocent individual is derived from an argument that asks, “Who says that your blood is redder? Perhaps the blood of the other person is redder?” (San. 74a). In the area of civil law, the rule that the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff is expressed in terms of the argument that just as a sick person who goes to the doctor must explain symptoms, so the plaintiff must prove that there is a case against the defendant (B. Q. 46b). Legal presumptions throughout the halakhah are based upon sevarah. The use of sevarah was particularly prevalent in the amoraic period, and the Talmud frequently reacts to the question of how to establish the source of a particular law with the remark that its origin may lie “either in Scripture or in sevarah” (San. 30a; Yev. 35b). The fundamentally rational approach characteristic of the Talmud makes sevarah into an almost meta-legal source of halakhah, and it is in this respect that later authorities observe that monetary matters, which are to a great extent sevarah-based, constitute the highest form of Torah study (B. B. 10.8).

SEX. Sexual relations play a central role in Jewish theology and law. Unlike Christianity, but like Islam, Judaism does not value celibacy, legislating instead that all men must marry and procreate. Rabbinic law also legislates a woman's conjugal rights ('onah; see Ket. 5.6 and Ket. 62b).

The Bible is repeatedly concerned with problems of fertility, and the creation of man and woman is accompanied by the divine blessing to "be fruitful and multiply" (Gn. 1.28). Strict laws defined the borders between legitimate and illegitimate sexual practices (Lv. 19–20). Incest, adultery, sodomy (i.e., male homosexual relations), bestiality, and sex with a menstruating woman are all forbidden. These laws may have been motivated in part by the belief that these practices either diminished fertility or confused genealogical lines. The prophets used sexual metaphors to describe Israel's relationship with God and condemned idolatry as adultery against God (see Hos. 1–2 and Ez. 16).

The rabbis of late antiquity, possibly under the influence of the Hellenistic concept of the passions, regarded the sexual drive as problematic. The rabbis termed it the yetser ha-ra' (evil inclination). Yet, properly channeled, this evil inclination was the necessary source for much that is positive in the world: "were it not for the evil inclination, no man would build a home, marry a wife, or have children" (Gn. Rab. 9.7). The rabbis ruled that men (although not women) were required to procreate (Yev. 63b–65b). This may have been designed to counter tendencies toward celibacy among the rabbinic elite, since the Talmud contains stories of rabbis who absented themselves from home for long periods for the purpose of studying (Ket. 62b–63a).

Medieval Jewish philosophers, influenced by medieval Neoplatonism and Aristotelianism, tended to devalue the material world and to create a hierarchy between soul and body. Moses Maimonides, for example, held that sexual intercourse should be undertaken solely for the purpose of procreation and the pleasures of the body minimized. He argued that circumcision was designed to curb the desire for sex both physiologically and psychologically (Guide of the Perplexed 3.49). Medieval mystics shared the philosophers' ambivalence toward the body but believed that proper sexual relations between husband and wife caused the male and female emanations of God (sefirot) to come together in a kind of spiritual union. Proper sexual relations required adherence to the law; even one's thoughts during intercourse, said the mystics, should be directed toward the divine and away from physical pleasure. The kabbalists celebrated eroticism through their erotic theology but also tended toward asceticism in their suspicion of male physical pleasure. Thus, the thirteenth-century Zohar, the classic text of Kabbalah, and the sixteenth-century teachings of Yitsḥaq Luria (the leading kabbalist of the Safed school) were both replete with powerful erotic images. The Zohar, however, considered minor sexual infractions, such as nocturnal emissions, great sins. Among eighteenth-century Ḥasidim, stories circulated about wonder-working rabbis who took vows of celibacy even within marriage.

Mainstream rabbinic culture in the Middle Ages viewed a healthy sexual relationship between husband and wife as the primary protection against illicit relations and fantasies. Jewish popular culture and folklore also contain rich speculations about erotic matters. At times, popular culture developed practices at variance with rabbinic law.

SEXUAL OFFENSES. In addition to *adultery and *incest, there are a number of biblical and rabbinic offenses of a sexual nature. Sodomy and *homosexuality are capital offenses under biblical law, as is the act of having carnal relations with a beast (Lv. 18.22–23, 20.13–16). A betrothed woman and her lover are both liable to the death penalty unless the former was raped, in which case the rapist alone is liable to execution (Dt. 22.20–27). The *rape of an unmarried, unbetrothed woman carries a financial penalty under biblical law (Dt. 22.28–29), and the Talmud specifies that compensation must also be paid for any physical or psychological damage sustained by the rape victim (Ket. 42a–43b). The penalty for sexual intercourse with a menstruant is *divine punishment (Lv. 18.19, 20.18). Lesser sexual offenses, the punishment for which is flogging rather than death, include intercourse with non-Jews and mamzerim, and relations between priests and women belonging to classes into which they are forbidden to marry. The Bible prohibits marrying a person whose testes are crushed or whose member is cut off (Dt. 23.2). It is also illegal to castrate (see CASTRATION) a man or a male animal (Maimonides, Laws of Forbidden Intercourse 16.10– 12). Sexual acts falling short of intercourse are prohibited between those individuals who are forbidden to marry one another (Lv. 18.6), and are expected to be punished by divine hand (see DIVINE PUNISHMENT). Behavior such as lesbianism, marital intercourse in public, and being secluded with a woman with whom intercourse is prohibited are offenses for which there is no positive sanction. Coercive sexual relations between a husband and a wife are forbidden by Jewish law and marital rape is recognized as a crime under Israeli law on that basis.

SEYAG LA-TORAH (סֵיג לַתּוֹרָה; fence around the law), preventive rabbinic injunction enacted to safeguard the observance of biblical commandments. The injunction to erect such safeguards is found in Avot 1.1, where it is given as one of the three precepts of the Men of the Keneset ha-Gedolah. The “fence” consisted of a stringent intensification of the law to safeguard the original commandments. An example of such a fence around the law, given in tannaitic sources, is the prohibition against eating the paschal sacrifice and other sacrifices after midnight, although according to biblical law they may be eaten until morning.

SFORNO, ‘OVADYAH BEN YA’AQOV (1475–1550), Italian philosopher, Bible commentator, and physician. He studied medicine in Rome and also taught Hebrew to the famous humanist Johannes Reuchlin. From 1525 Sforno lived in Bologna. His commentaries on the Torah and other biblical books are concerned mainly with the plain meaning of the text (peshat), although they reflect his philosophical propensities. Sforno rejected the then prevalent kabbalistic doctrines and also paid little attention to philological questions. Among his works are Or ‘Ammim, a polemic (which he himself translated into Latin) against Aristotelian theories on the eternity of matter, divine omniscience, and the nature of the soul; a philosophical commentary on Avot; a Hebrew grammar; responsa; and a translation of Euclid.

SHA’ATNEZ. See KIL’AYIM.

SHABBAT (שַׁבָּת; Sabbath), tractate in Mishnah order Mo’ed, in twenty-four chapters, with related material in the Tosefta and in both Talmuds. Despite frequent references to the *Sabbath and its observance in the Bible (Gn. 2.1–3; Ex. 16.22–30, 20.8–11; Lv. 19.3, 23.3; Nm. 15.32–36; Is. 58.13–14; etc.), the laws of the Sabbath are not elaborated in biblical sources and are regarded by the rabbis as a striking example of “mountains hanging by a hair, in which there is scant scriptural evidence but many oral laws” (Hag. 1.8). Shabbat divides the kinds of prohibited work on the Sabbath into thirty-nine categories, including activities relating to agriculture and the preparation of bread, making clothing, writing, building, and transferring items from private to public domains. All other forms of prohibited work on the Sabbath are classified as “offspring” of these thirty-nine categories.

The opening chapters of Shabbat focus on preparations for the Sabbath, specifically the need to ensure that work begun on Friday not be continued after nightfall. Much of the tractate is devoted to defining the laws governing transfer of items from private to public domains, including a discussion of the status of various articles worn by men, women, or animals. The last chapters of Shabbat primarily deal with care for animals or for the human body on the Sabbath, addressing such issues as childbirth, circumcision, medical practices, and treatment of corpses.

The tractate in the Talmud Bavli was translated into English by Harry Freedman in the Soncino Talmud (London, 1938).

SHABBAZI, SHALEM BEN YOSEF (c.1619–1680), the most outstanding Jewish religious poet of Yemen. He was born in Shabbaz and was apparently a weaver who lived a life of poverty. He was acquainted with Talmud and rabbinical writers, Kabbalah and philosophy, as well as Islamic literature. Shabbazi gave faithful expression to both the tribulations and the yearnings of his contemporaries in a difficult era. Many of his poems were written in reaction to the period of extreme communal suffering, culminating in the exile of all Yemenite Jewry, including Shabbazi, to the town of Mawza on the shores of the Red Sea (1679–1680) by the fanatical Imam Ahmed. Shalem ben Yosef Shabbazi's favorite theme, redemption, struck a responsive chord among his fellow Jews.

He wrote poems for Sabbaths and festivals, weddings and circumcisions, about Torah and the world to come. Some of his poems were incorporated into the Yemenite liturgy, and some, such as "Ahavat Hadassah," have become part of modern Israeli religious poetry. His five hundred fifty known poems (all of which incorporate an acrostic of his name) were written in Hebrew, Aramaic, and Arabic. His songs of Zion, like his other poetry, betray the kabbalistic influences of his time. His tomb in Ta'izz was a focus of pilgrimage by both Jews and Muslims, among both of whom he had a reputation as a wonder worker. He only became known beyond Yemen in the nineteenth century.

SHABBETAI BEN ME'IR HA-KOHEN (1621–1662), known as the Shakh from the initials of his best-known work; Lithuanian halakhist and rabbi. Shabbetai ben Me'ir ha-Kohen settled in Vilna, where he became dayyan (judge) and married the great-granddaughter of Mosheh Isserles. In 1655 during the Polish wars, he fled to Lublin, later leaving Poland for Bohemia and Moravia and becoming rabbi of Holesov, where he died.

His most famous work, published in Kraków in 1646, is Sifte Kohen, an incisive commentary on the Shulhan 'Arukh* aimed at clarifying its rulings (including those added by Mosheh Isserles). His work paved the way for Polish rabbis to accept the Shulhan 'Arukh after three generations of opposition; his commentary is commonly printed together with the Shulhan 'Arukh and his rulings accepted as standard. He engaged in a dispute with *David ben Shemu'el ha-Levi, whose parallel commentary, Turei Zahav, was published in the same year. Shabbetai ben Me'ir ha-Kohen's criticism of Turei Zahav, Nequdot ha-Qesef, was posthumously published (Frankfurt an der Oder, 1677). His other halakic works include Togfo Kohen on the laws of possession (Frankfurt an der Oder, 1677), Gevurat Anashim on chapter 154 of the Shulhan 'Arukh (Dessau, 1697), Po'el Tsedeq on the 613 commandments (Jesnice, 1720), and He-'Arukh on the Arba'ah Turim (Berlin, 1767). He gave an important account of the Chmielnicki uprising, Megillat 'Eifah (Amsterdam, 1651), and composed penitentiary prayers to be recited by eastern European Jewry (Amsterdam, 1651).

SHABBETAI TSEVI (1626–1676), messianic pretender. Born in Smyrna, he dedicated himself to Talmudic and kabbalistic studies and devoted himself to ascetic practices. He was surrounded by a circle of companions and disciples to whom, at the early age of twenty-two, he confided mystical revelations, possibly containing hints of his messianic calling. The fact that he was said by his followers to have been born on 9 Av, the traditional date of the birth of the Messiah, bolstered his claim. His not infrequent fits of strange and objectionable behavior, including uttering the Tetragrammaton in public, however, caused scandal, and he was forced to leave his hometown. Wherever he went (Salonica, Constantinople, Jerusalem), his behavior caused uproar and frequently led to his expulsion from the community. In Cairo he married Sarah, an orphan of the Chmielnicki massacres; the marriage was given mystic import by Shabbetai and his followers. Of decisive importance was his meeting (in the summer of 1665) with *Natan of Gaza, who recognized Shabbetai Tsevi as the Messiah and became his prophet. In December 1665 he publicly proclaimed himself king and Messiah in the synagogue at Smyrna. Practically the entire Jewish world was seized with the delirium of messianic fever. Prayers were offered up for Shabbetai Tsevi, and families even sold their houses in sure hope of imminent and miraculous transport to Erets Yisra'el. In 1666 Shabbetai Tsevi proceeded to Constantinople, where, immediately upon his arrival, he was arrested. After two months of imprisonment in the capital, he was incarcerated at Abydos. Since he was allowed considerable freedom, his imprisonment did nothing to diminish the messianic fervor. His followers referred to Abydos as Migdal 'Oz (Tower of Strength), and on Pesah, Shabbetai Tsevi, himself, sacrificed a paschal lamb there. Then, denounced by a certain Neḥemyah ha-Kohen, he was summoned before the Sultan's privy council, and following the advice of the sultan's physician, a Jewish apostate, Shabbetai Tsevi adopted Islam to save his life. His apostasy led to confusion and shame, except among his most fervent followers (the Shabbateans), who clung to their belief that his sham conversion was part of a divine plan (a belief retained by the *Dönmeḥ). Ultimately banished to a small village in Albania, Shabbetai died in obscurity. Shabbateanism was the last major messianic movement in Jewish history and left a long and bitter legacy. It has been suggested that the Hasidic movement in eighteenth-century Poland (see HASIDISM) was influenced by the Shabbatean movement, but that by "neutralizing" the messianic element, they remained a mystico-pietistic sect within traditional Judaism. The view has also been advanced that the radical Shabbateans, having burned behind them all bridges to the past, were particularly receptive to the ideas of the Enlightenment. SHADDEKHAN (שדכח; marriage broker), a professional intermediary who fulfilled an important social function in the traditional Jewish community, where it was considered unseemly for young people to do their own courting. The verb from which the term is derived is found in the Talmud (Shab. 150a), where it signifies "to arrange a marriage," a transaction permitted even on the Sabbath. The shaddekh was indispensable in the medieval period, when Jews lived in small and scattered groups. Jews regarded matchmaking as a highly praiseworthy and honorable occupation, and famous rabbis were proud to engage in it. It was even fancifully said that matchmaking was one of God's main functions (Pesiqta' de-Rav Kahana 2). Brokerage (usually a percentage of the dowry) was regulated by custom, and litigation on the subject (particularly when the marriage did not take place) is occasionally mentioned in rabbinic responsa. Women also worked as matchmakers, notably in eastern Europe and Muslim lands. In Jewish folklore and humor, the shaddekh and his profession have become the subject of many jokes. The shaddekh is still an institution in some Orthodox circles.

SHAḤARIT (שחרית; morning), the morning prayer service, recited daily before the first quarter of the day has passed. The Talmud (Ber. 26b) ascribes the institution of this prayer to the patriarch Abraham (on the basis of Gen. 19:27); it corresponds to the daily dawn sacrifice (tamid*) in the Temple. In its present form Shaḥarit is the most extensive of the daily services. First, various benedictions* of thanks and praise (Birkot ha-Shaḥar*) are recited (though these were originally intended to be spoken by each individual upon arising), followed by various private prayers and Bible passages (not obligatory). Then comes Pesuqei de-Zimra* (for which no minyan* is required). The synagogue service proper begins with Barekhu*, followed by the Shema* and its benedictions (Yotser*, Ahavah Rabbah*). After the last of these—Ge'ullah*—the Amidah* follows without interruption, thus welding the Shema and the Amidah* into a single, continuous entity. In Jerusalem, the Birkat ha-Kohanim* is recited daily in the course of the Shaḥarit Amidah*. After the Amidah* (which is repeated by the reader, with the inclusion of the Qedushah*) on ordinary weekdays there follow Taḥanun*, and the Half Qaddish*, Ashrei* and U-Va' le-Tsiyyon*, the Full Qaddish, Aleinu*, the daily psalm(s)*, and the Mourner's Qaddish. On Mondays and Thursdays, a section from the week's Torah portion is read from the Sefer Torah (see QER'AT HA-TORAH) after Taḥanun. Further additions are customary in some congregations. On Ro'sh Ḥodesh* and most festivals, Hallel* is read immediately after the Amidah*, followed by the Full Qaddish, then the reading of the Torah; on the Sabbath, too, the latter two follow the conclusion of the Amidah*. On Sabbaths and festivals, it is usual to recite Musaf* immediately after the Torah reading. For Shaḥarit, male worshipers clothe themselves in the tallit* and on weekdays also put on tefillin* (in recent years, some women have begun to put on tallit and tefillin). The tefillin are not worn on Sabbaths and festivals, while on Tish'ah be-'Av, they are worn at the afternoon service. On festivals, especially Ro'sh ha-Shanah and Yom Kippur, Shaḥarit is extended considerably by the addition of piyyutim.

SHAKNA, SHALOM BEN YOSEF (died 1558), Polish rabbi. A student of Ya'akov Pollak, he was appointed rabbi of Lublin by the king of Poland in 1541. In 1551 Shalom ben Yosef Shakna received royal appointment as one of two regional chief rabbis in southern Poland. He was one of the outstanding rabbinic authorities of his day and groomed many distinguished disciples (R. Mosheh Isserles* was his son-in-law), but he refused to permit any of his teachings to be published in order to allow future generations independence of thought. His use of pilpul in halakhic decision making was widely criticized. An autocratic figure, he was involved in many bitter disputes both within Poland and abroad.

SHALIAH (שלiah; messenger), a term with both legal and religious denotations. A shaliah can be either an agent* appointed by and empowered to act on behalf of his principal or an emissary appointed to fulfill religious functions (sheliaḥ mitsvah), who, the Talmud says, is divinely protected from harm while he is carrying out his duties (Pes. 8a). The sheliaḥ mitsvah can belong to one of two categories—one who leads worshipers in prayer (a sheliaḥ tsibbur*) and one who collects money on behalf of an institution (also known as a shadar; see MESHULLAH). An emissary who collects money for an institution in Erets Yisra'el is sometimes referred to as a sheliaḥ Tsiyyon (cf. Beits. 25b).

SHALOM 'ALEIKHEM (שלום עליכם; "Peace be upon you"), opening words of hymn welcoming the Sabbath angels to the home. Shalom 'Aleikhem is sung on the eve of the Sabbath, in some places at the end of the synagogue service, and in homes before the Qiddush or around the table. The hymn is of late composition; it is associated with the Talmudic statement (Shab. 119b) that on Sabbath eve two ministering angels accompany the Jew going home from the synagogue. The phrase is also used as a greeting (see GREETINGS AND CONGRATULATIONS).

SHALOM ZAKHAR (שָׁלוֹם זָכָר; peace to the male child), a gathering hosted by the parents of a newborn baby boy on the Sabbath eve before the circumcision or on the evening before the circumcision. Among the refreshments served to the guests, it is customary to offer lentils and peas. Lentils are traditionally the food of mourners, but in this case the “mourning” is related to the belief that the baby had knowledge of the entire Torah but that an angel made it forget at the moment of birth. Peas are eaten because of the association of the Yiddish word arbes with the divine promise to Abraham, harbeh arbeh et zar'akha, “I will multiply your seed” (Gen. 22.17). In Eastern communities, the gathering is called a shasha or blada and includes special prayers and readings in honor of the prophet Elijah who is welcomed at every circumcision. Some Sephardi and Eastern communities do not observe the ceremony but hold a festive gathering marked by readings from the Bible and Talmud on the eve of the circumcision.

SHALOSH REGALIM (שְׁלוֹשׁ רֵגָלִים; three pilgrimages), the three annual festivals when pilgrimages were made on foot to Jerusalem. Every male Israelite was enjoined to make the pilgrimage to “the place the Lord your God will choose” (later defined as Jerusalem) three times a year, on the festivals of *Pesah, *Shavu'ot, and *Sukkot (Ex. 23.17; Dt. 16.16), which were therefore termed the Shalosh Regalim (cf. Ex. 23.14). The pilgrim had to offer a sacrifice, the minimum value of which was specified in the Mishnah as three pieces of silver (Hag. 1.1–2). The pilgrims also brought with them the second *tithe of their produce, which had to be consumed in Jerusalem. The three festivals had agricultural origins (Pesah, the barley harvest; Shavu'ot, the end of the barley harvest and the beginning of the wheat harvest and the first ripe fruits; and Sukkot, the final ingathering of crops), as well as historical associations (Pesah, the Exodus; Shavu'ot, the giving of the Torah; Sukkot, the sojourn in the wilderness). In the Diaspora the historical aspects predominated, but the agricultural significance was revived over the past century with the return to living in Erets Yisra'el. In the synagogue *festival prayers, including the *Hallel, are recited on the pilgrimage festivals. These special statutory prayers vary from one festival to another only by the mention of the specific festival and its sacrifice and in the relevant scriptural readings. In addition, each festival has its specific liturgical features, ceremonies, and customs, such as the recitation of *Aqdamut Millin on Shavu'ot (among Ashkenazim), and the waving and procession of the *four species on Sukkot. Song of Songs is read on Pesah; Ruth on Shavu'ot; and Ecclesiastes on Sukkot. Doubt is expressed in the Talmud as to whether *Shemini 'Atseret is to be regarded as the final day of Sukkot or as an independent festival. See also YOM TOV SHENI SHE'L GALUYTOT.

SHAMM'AI (c.50 BCE–30 CE), tanna'. A colleague of *Hillel (together they form the last of the *zugot [pairs]), he was vice president of the Sanhedrin, succeeding Menahem the Essene (Hag. 2.2) in the first decades of the Common Era. Shamm'ai has been identified by some scholars with Samaias, the Pharisee leader during Herod's rule and mentioned in Josephus's works, but other scholars have rejected this identification (see SHEMA'YAH). Shamm'ai's severe character is often presented in contrast to the gentle personality of Hillel, who tended toward a liberal and progressive interpretation of the halakhah while Shamm'ai favored a strict and conservative interpretation. However, Shamm'ai's favorite maxim concludes, “Receive every man with a cheerful countenance” (Avot 1.15). Both Hillel and Shamm'ai established schools, known, respectively, as *Beit Hillel and Beit Shamm'ai, the members of which continued the traditions of their founders. A possible key to understanding Shamm'ai's legal approach, versus that of Hillel's, is that Shamm'ai considered the act more significant than the intention. The later authority *Eli'ezer ben Hurqanos followed Shamm'ai in this regard.

SHAMMASH (שָׂמָשׁ; servant), the sexton of a synagogue or a beit din. During the Middle Ages the shammash fulfilled a number of extrasynagogal functions, such as acting as the public crier, calling worshipers to prayer, making communal announcements, summoning the local residents to a town meeting, or inviting local residents to a celebration of some joyous event. Subsequently his duties became confined to matters pertaining to the synagogue. In large towns, the beit din would have its own shammash, whose duties included summoning people to appear before the court.

By extension of the meaning “servant,” the term shammash is also used to identify the additional (ninth) light used to kindle the *Hanukkah lamp.

SHAPIRA', ME'IR (1887–1934), Orthodox rabbi, leader, and educator in Poland. He was elected to the Polish parliament, the Sejm, in 1922, representing the Agudat Israel party, but resigned in 1924 in order to devote himself to education. In 1930 he opened the Yeshivat Hakhmei Lublin (the yeshivah of the Lublin sages). Unlike the other Polish yeshivot, which were centered around a particular dynamic individual—often a Hasidic rabbi—or were located within the confines of a local synagogue or beit midrash, this yeshivah was founded as an educational institution in its own right, with its own facilities, including a large Talmudic library, dormitories, and lecture halls. It served as a model for yeshivot throughout the world. It was closed by the Germans in 1939. The other major venture of Shapira', which still flourishes, is the dafyomi* cycle for the daily study of the Talmud.

SHAPIRO, PINHAS BEN AVRAHAM, OF KORETS (1726–1791), Hasidic master. An associate of Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer *Ba'al Shem Tov, R. Pinhas developed Hasidic teachings and practices that were somewhat independent of the emerging Hasidic movement. He did not accept the authority of *Dov Ber of Mezhibezh; instead R. Pinhas had a somewhat more worldly sense of the Hasidic message, one concerned with moral self-improvement and the struggle against temptation and evil. Though he was an avid student of the Zohar, he did not like the ready turn toward mystical otherworldliness that characterized some members of the Mezhibezh school. His teachings, often preserved in the form of brief aphorisms rather than homilies, are found in several collections (notably Imrei Pinhas ha-Shalem [Ramat Gan, 1988], some of which are still in manuscript. Rabbi Pinhas took an interest in worldly affairs and avidly supported the Poles in their struggle both against the Haidamaks in 1768 and against the Russians.

SHARABI, SHALOM (1720–1777), Jerusalem kabbalist. He was born in San'a, Yemen. Around 1740, he went to Jerusalem, where, in 1751, he became head of the yeshivah of the Beth-El kabbalists. Sharabi was one of the most renowned figures of the Lurianic school of Kabbalah. His prayer book, Nehar Shalom (Salonika, 1806), became a basic liturgical exposition of the annual cycle according to Lurianic Kabbalah, and was a standard prayer book in Erets Yisra'el, North Africa, Iraq, Persia, and Bukhara. It was an important vehicle in ensuring the predominance of prayers and rites inspired by kabbalah—especially in Safed—over previous liturgical usages. Sharabi was greatly revered. His life became embellished with legends, and his grave on the Mount of Olives was a place of pilgrimage.

The word came to be applied universally to the *Talmud as a whole and was widely used after Catholic censorship forbade the use of the word Talmud in the sixteenth century.

SHAVU'OT (שבועות), the second of the *Shalosh Regalim (pilgrim festivals), known as the Feast of Weeks, Pentecost, Hag ha-Qatsir (see HARVEST FESTIVALS), Yom ha-Biqqurim (Day of the *First Fruits), and Zeman Mattan Toratenu (Season of the Giving of Our Torah). It is observed only on 6 Sivan in Israel and by Reform Jews (though some Reform congregations have chosen to observe it for two days); elsewhere it is observed on 6 and 7 Sivan. It is called the Feast of Weeks because it occurs seven full weeks after the “morrow of the Sabbath,” when the “sheaf of the wave offering” of barley was offered up (Lv. 23.15; hence, the name Pentecost [fiftieth], i.e., the fiftieth day after Pesah). These seven weeks, which begin on the second day of Pesah, are marked by the counting of the *Omer (hence, the name 'Atseret [termination], given to the festival in the Mishnah). The interpretation of the words “on the morrow of the Sabbath” was a subject of controversy between the Pharisees and the Sadducees. The former maintained that the word Sabbath in this context referred to the first day of Pesah (with the result that the Feast of Weeks always fell on the same day of the week as the second day of Pesah); while the Sadducees (as well as the Samaritans and later the Karaites) maintained that the reference was to the first Sunday after the first day of Pesah (according to which the Feast of Weeks would always fall on a Sunday). The *Beta Israel interpreted the expression to mean the morrow of Pesah (i.e., after the festival was over) and observed the Feast of Weeks on 12 Sivan. The Pharisaic interpretation was accepted as normative. As in the case of the other two pilgrim festivals (Pesah and Sukkot), Shavu'ot has agricultural significance—it is the festival celebrating the conclusion of the grain harvest—and the Mishnah gives a vivid account of the bringing of the first fruits to the Temple on this festival (Bik. 3). Subsequently, however, the day also became associated with the commemoration of the revelation on Mount Sinai. Nowhere in the Bible is the date of revelation explicitly given, but the Talmud deduced it from the narrative in Exodus 19.1–16; the difference of opinion about whether the Sinaitic revelation took place on 6 or 7 Sivan was resolved in favor of the former date (Shab. 86b). The three days preceding the festival are known as *She-loshet Yemei Hagbalah. The liturgy follows the same pattern as that of the other two pilgrim festivals (see FESTIVAL PRAYERS). The scriptural reading, which is preceded in the Ashkenazi tradition by the recitation of *Aqdamut Millin, includes the Decalogue. The Book of Ruth is read in the synagogue because it mentions the barley and wheat harvests and also because its heroine is a proselyte who accepted the Torah; another explanation is that Ruth's great grandchild, King David, was born and died on Shavu'ot. A type of piyyut called azharot*, which enumerates the 613 commandments, also forms part of the traditional readings on the festival in many congregations. The synagogue is decorated with plants and greenery and dairy food is consumed instead of meat to stress the agricultural aspect of the festival. Under the influence of the Kabbalah, it became customary to spend the (first) night studying the Bible and rabbinic texts (tiqqun*). Among Conservative Jews in the Diaspora, it is customary to hold consecration ceremonies for first graders and/or *confirmation ceremonies for teenagers who have completed a prescribed course of study on Shavu'ot. Reform congregations generally hold confirmation services on Shavu'ot as well.

SHE-HEHEYANU (שֶׁ-הֵעֵינֵנוּ; Who Has Kept Us in Life), name given to the benediction of time, of which she-heheyanu is the first distinctive word. It is recited as a blessing of thanksgiving for certain things when they are enjoyed for the first time. The occasions may be general, such as the acquisition of new property or clothes ("He who acquires a new house or purchases new vessels" [Ber. 9.1]), or seasonal, as on eating the fruit of a new season or on the advent of festivals. The wording of the benediction is "Blessed are you, . . . who has kept us in life, and preserved us, and enabled us to reach this season."

SHEKEL, the most basic monetary weight, containing twenty gerah (Nm. 3.47). Abraham bought the cave of Machpelah for four hundred shekels of silver (Gn. 23.15). Originally a standard weight of silver (about fourteen grams), the shekel became a current coin in Maccabean times. A half-shekel, called beqa' (Gn. 24.22; Ex. 38.26), was paid into the treasury by all participants in the national census (Ex. 30.13–15). A per capita tax of one-third shekel was imposed to cover the cost of work connected with the restoration of the Second Temple (Neh. 10.33–34). During the Second Temple period, Jews everywhere paid an annual levy of a half-shekel for the maintenance of the Sanctuary. The Mishnah tractate Sheqalim* describes regulations concerning this levy, which is still commemorated in the symbolic "ceremony of the half-shekel," which takes place in many synagogues on the eve of Purim before the reading of Esther. The Zionist movement revived the idea of the shekel by giving the name to the small annual contribution that entitled members to participate in elections, and in 1980 the shekel was introduced as the basic currency in Israel.

SHEKHINAH (שְׁכִינָה; divine presence), the term, derived from biblical verses (e.g., Ex. 25.8; Lv. 16.16), speaks of God's "dwelling"—that is, presence—in the midst of Israel. At first sight, shekhinah might be regarded as one of the many circumlocutions employed by the Talmud to avoid mentioning the name of God directly. Closer analysis, however, shows that the rabbis used the term in the more specific sense of the manifestation of the divine presence in the life of man or to express the principle of divine immanence in creation. According to aggadic teaching, the shekhinah dwells only among Israel (Ber. 8a), and probably for this reason conversion to Judaism is called "being brought under the wings of the shekhinah." The shekhinah dwells among the children of Israel "even in their impurity," that is, sin (Yoma' 56b, based on Lv. 16.16). The shekhinah may also rest upon individuals: "The shekhinah rests upon man not through gloom, indolence, frivolity, or idle chatter, but only through the joy experienced in fulfilling divine commandments" (Shab. 30a). The shekhinah is present in every home where there is domestic peace and blesses that home (Sot. 17a). Study (Avot 3.7) and congregational prayer (Ber. 6a) call forth the presence of the shekhinah, whereas sin (Sot. 3b) and injustice (San. 7a) drive it away. When Israel goes into exile, the shekhinah accompanies the Jews, as it will accompany them on their return (Meg. 29a). The beatific vision of the future world is expressed in the words, "there the righteous sit and enjoy the splendor of the shekhinah" (Ber. 17a). In many cases the term shekhinah is synonymous with God. In the teachings of the Hasidei Ashkenaz, the shekhinah was equated with kavod (the created "divine splendor"), a notion derived from Sa'adyah Ga'on. In the kabbalistic doctrine of sefirot*, the Shekhinah plays a key role as the tenth and last sefirah, marking the point of contact between the divine and the lower spheres ("Gate of Heaven"), and representing the feminine aspect of the deity, the holy union of which with the male aspect constitutes the fullness of the life divine. Contemporary feminists frequently use the word shekhinah, a feminine noun, for God.

SHELIAH TSIBBUR (שְׁלִיחַ צִיבור), representative of the community), designation for the leader of prayer in the *synagogue. First mentioned in the Mishnah (R. ha-Sh. 4.9), the sheliaḥ tsibbur is often referred to by the acronym shats. Based on the rabbinical ruling that "one who hears the recitation is considered as if he himself had recited it" (T. Ber. 21b), the office of sheliaḥ tsibbur was introduced in the synagogue to fulfill the obligations of those who were unable to recite the prayers themselves—especially the 'Amidah. The Talmud (Ta'an. 16a) recommends that the sheliaḥ tsibbur be, among other things, a man with many children, whom he is unable to support; hence, he will pour his whole soul into the prayer. SHELOM BAYIT (שְׁלוֹם בַּיִת), peace in the house), domestic harmony between husband and wife and within the family. Many rabbinic regulations are said to have been made in order to promote shelom bayit and to protect the home from disturbance. "Where there is peace between husband and wife the divine presence dwells with them" (Sot. 17a). The kindling of the Sabbath lights is regarded as the outstanding symbol of shelom bayit (Shab. 23b). Where the Ashkenazi prayer book quotes as one of the supreme virtues "making peace between man and his fellow" (based on Pe'ah 1.1), the Sephardi prayer book adds "and between man and wife." SHELOSHET YEMEI HAGBALAH (שְׁלוֹשֶׁת יָמֵי הַגְּבָלָה; Three Days of Restriction), the three days prior to the festival of Shavu'ot (3 through 5 Sivan). The name is derived from Exodus 19.12, "You shall set bounds [vehigbalta] for the people." They correspond to the three days of preparation prescribed for the Israelites before the giving of the Torah at Sinai. On these days the special supplication Tahanun is not recited in the synagogue service.

SHELOSHIM (שְׁלוֹשִׁים, thirty), the thirty days of mourning following the death of a close relative (parent, spouse, sibling, child). The entire mourning period lasts for a year, of which the first week (shiv'ah) is a period of intense mourning; some of the most stringent rules of mourning are relaxed during the rest of the first month, which is reckoned from the day of the funeral, while during the remainder of the year the main expression of mourning is the recital of the *Qaddish. Traditionally the obligation to recite Qaddish was restricted to a male mourner. Today, in Reform, Conservative, and Reconstructionist Judaism, the obligation falls equally on men and women. After the conclusion of the shiv'ah, the mourner is permitted to leave the house and return to work and a normal routine, but law and custom still restrict some activities during the sheloshim. The mourner may not attend weddings or any parties or go to a place of entertainment (this restriction applies for the full year when mourning a parent). Many mourners will not shave or cut their hair during this period, although some halakhic authorities would seem to be more lenient in this respect (Kol Bo 'al Aveilut 352). If a festival (other than Hanukkah or Purim) falls during the sheloshim, and the shiv'ah has been concluded, the restrictions of the thirty days are canceled (except when mourning a parent). The origin of the sheloshim is traced to the Bible, where Aaron (Nm. 20.29) and Moses (Dt. 34.8) were mourned for thirty days, while R. *Yehudah ha-Nasi' left instructions that the assembly for study should be reconstituted thirty days after his death (Ket. 103b).

SHEMA' (שְׁמָעָה; Hear), the first word of Deuteronomy 6.4, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord is our God, the Lord is One"; the name given to three Bible passages (Dt. 6.4–9, 11.13–21; Nm. 15.37–41) that must be read (hence, qeri'at Shema' [the reading of the Shema']) every morning and evening. The Reform prayer book in North America eliminates the reference to divine retribution and to tsitsit*. The custom of qeri'at Shema' was part of the Temple service (Tam. 5.1) and was continued in the synagogue. In the Jerusalem Temple, Deuteronomy 6.4–9 was preceded by the recitation of the Decalogue, which was later eliminated because of heretics who argued that only the Ten Commandments were revealed by God to Moses. The recitation of the Shema' is considered an obligation prescribed by the Bible itself on the basis of the verse: "and you shall speak of them . . . when you lie down and when you rise up" (Dt. 6.7). While there is much discussion in the Mishnah and Talmud about when the Shema' should be recited, the obligation is taken for granted. In the morning, the Shema' should be recited before the first quarter of the day has passed; in the evening, before midnight, although if this is impossible it may be read any time during the night. The Shema' is not, strictly speaking, a prayer so much as a proclamation. It is the basic theological statement of Judaism—the Jewish "confession of faith." It is a vital part of the liturgy an integral part of the morning and evening services and benedictions must be recited before and after it.

After the Shema', the 'Amidah should follow immediately, without interruption. No minyan is required for the recitation of the Shema' or its benedictions; a min- yan is required, however, for the recital of *Barekhu, which precedes the benedictions and is a call to communal worship. In olden times, the Shema' was recited antiphonally, with the reader saying one verse, the congregation the next, and so on. In Ashkenazi communities today, the Shema' is recited silently by the entire congregation; among the Adot ha-Mizrah, it is customary to read it aloud in unison. Its recitation is immediately preceded by the phrase, El melekh ne'eman. After the first verse a doxology is added silently: Barukh shem kevod malkhuto le-'olam va-'ed*, "Blessed be the name of the glory of his kingdom for ever and ever"; on Yom Kippur this doxology is recited aloud. Apart from the twice-daily reading of the Shema' with its benedictions, the first passage is read by the individual before retiring at night (see QER'AT SHEMA' 'AL HA-MITTAH), and the first verse is also recited when the Torah scrolls are taken out of the ark, as part of the *Qedushah of Musaf, and at the conclusion of *Ne'ilah on Yom Kippur. Traditionally, the Shema' is uttered by a Jew on the deathbed. Its recitation has also figured prominently in Jewish martyrology.

SHEMA'YAH (1st cent. BCE), president (nasi*) of the Sanhedrin, who taught in the same beit midrash as *Avtalyon (Yoma' 35b); together they constituted the fourth of the *zugot (pairs). Traditionally (see Git. 57b) both Shema'yah and Avtalyon were said to be converts (or sons of converts). The most famous disciple of their beit midrash was the renowned *Hillel. Some scholars have identified them with Samaia and Pollio, Pharisee leaders in the time of Herod mentioned in the work of Josephus, but the identification remains uncertain (see SHAMMAI). Shema'yah was widely admired and respected as an authority, although no halakhot are directly quoted in his name. Avot quotes this maxim of Shema'yah: "Love labor, shun power, and do not become close with the ruling authorities" (1.10).

SHEMINI 'ATSERET (שְׁמִינִי אֶצֶרֶת; the eighth day of the assembly; cf. Nm. 29.35), last day of *Sukkot (22 Tishrei) in Erets Yisra'el; elsewhere Orthodox and Conservative Jews celebrate it as two days (22–23 Tishrei), and Reform Jews as one day. The Talmud (Suk. 47a) discusses whether Shemini 'Atseret should be considered an independent festival immediately following Tabernacles or whether it is actually the concluding day of that festival, comparable to the last day of Pesah (cf. Nm. 28.16, 25). The solution reached by the rabbis regards Shemini 'Atseret as an independent festival in certain respects (one of which is its name), but otherwise treats it as a continuation of Sukkot. The holiday is not linked to any specific historical event. The lulav and etrog, which are basic to the Sukkot ritual, do not figure in the service for the day, and the sukkah* is no longer an integral part of the holiday, although traditions vary in that area, from not using it at all to reciting the Qiddush and eating the midday meal there. Syrian Jews, for example, recite a prayer of farewell to the sukkah after eating there. The striking difference between the number of sacrifices offered during the previous seven days, which total seventy in all (Nm. 29.12–32) and the solitary "one ram, one bullock" of this festival (Nm. 36), is the basis of a midrash to the effect that the seventy sacrifices correspond to the "seventy nations" (i.e., humankind), while Shemini 'Atseret symbolizes the special relationship between God and Israel. In the Diaspora, where the biblical festivals are extended to two days, the conclusion of the Torah is read in the synagogue on the second day, which is called *Simhat Torah (though in the liturgy, the name Shemini 'Atseret is retained); in Erets Yisra'el the one day of Shemini 'Atseret is also Simhat Torah. The distinctive liturgical feature of this holiday is the prayer for rain (see TEFILLAT GESHEM), recited in the Musaf service, with the cantor, in traditional Ashkenazi synagogues, wearing a white robe as on the High Holy Days. In Ashkenazi synagogues, the *Yizkor prayer is recited in the Shaharit service. If there has been no intermediate Sabbath during Sukkot, the Book of Ecclesiastes is read in the synagogue on Shemini 'Atseret.

SHEMITTAH (שְׁמִטָּה; let fall, let rest), a sabbatical year. Every seventh year "the land must keep Sabbath unto the Lord" (Lv. 25.2). During this year, land must lie fallow; whatever grows on it is designated ownerless property (hefker*), to which all enjoy equal rights with the owner. The Bible (Lv. 25.22) promises a threefold crop in the sixth year to tide the farmer and the consumer over during the seventh year. It is forbidden to trade with produce of the shemittah year, which, in its ownerless state, is also free from *tithes. At the end of the year all debts are forgiven (Lv. 25; Ex. 23.10–11; Dt. 15.1–3). The precept of the sabbatical year is meant to emphasize the conditional nature of the possession of the Holy Land by the Jewish people ("for the land is mine . . . you are strangers and sojourners with me," Lv. 26.34; Shab. 33a). The laws of the sabbatical year are discussed in the Talmudic tractate Shevi'it* and in later rabbinic literature. Shemittah constitutes a problem for Orthodox Jews in the State of Israel; the Israeli rabbinate permits the land to be temporarily sold to non-Jews and worked during the shemittah year, but this is not accepted by all Orthodox. The actual yearly reckoning of the sabbatical year is no longer certain, but according to the system in place, a sabbatical year will be observed, for instance, in 5761 (2000–2001), counting from one Ro'sh ha-Shanah to the next. SHEMU'EL (died c.254), Babylonian *amora'; younger contemporary of *Rav. He was already established as a religious judge (dayyan) in *Nehardea when Rav returned from Palestine. The Talmud rules that in matters of civil law Shemu'el's opinion is to be followed; his dictum "The law of the land is binding on Jews who live there" (Git. 10b) became of far-reaching importance for Jews living in the Diaspora. Shemu'el had a broad education. He was a famous eye doctor who produced a widely used eye ointment, (B. M. 85b), and he was known for his medical theories relating health to climate (B. M. 107b). However, it was as an astronomer that he achieved his greatest renown, creating a fixed *calendar, although out of respect for the Palestinian gaonate he refrained from circulating it. He once said that "the paths of heaven are as familiar to me as the paths of Nehardea" (Ber. 58b). His discussions with Rav laid the foundation for the *Talmud Bavli. Shemu'el was a distinguished judge, who exercised the greatest personal integrity, refusing to adjudicate for anyone from whom he had received even the slightest benefit (Ket. 105b). He devoted his life to the community, especially to the underprivileged and particularly orphans. Even though lending money with interest was forbidden by biblical law, he permitted the lending of orphans' monies with interest for their benefit (B. M. 20a). He also controlled market practices, attempting in all ways to keep prices down (B. B. 90b; Suk. 34b; Pes. 30a). He was a person of humility, effacing himself before Rav (Eruv.* 90b), but he opposed asceticism (Ta'an. 11a), holding that the good things of the world were to be enjoyed—as long as the relevant blessings were recited (Ber. 35a). He summed up his attitude to messianism in his famous statement, "There is no difference between this world and the next except the subjugation of the kingdoms," that is, the absence of subjugation by foreign kingdoms (Ber. 34b). He was called Mar Shemu'el as a sign of special respect.

SHEMU'EL BEN 'ALI (12th cent.), the best known of the heads of the academy in Baghdad (see PUMBEDITA) during the period in which the Babylonian academies had lost their central role in the Jewish world. Several of Shemu'el's responsa have survived (a collection was published by S. Assaf in 1930), as have a larger number of his letters, which shed light on the nature and standing of the Baghdad academy. Shemu'el was involved in controversy both with the *exilarchs and with his contemporary Moses *Maimonides, who wrote disparagingly of Shemu'el's pretensions and contentiousness.

SHEMU'EL BEN HOFNI (died 1013), ga'on of *Sura from approximately 997 and father-in-law of Ha'i Ga'on of Pumbedita. In addition to writing responsa, as was usual for Babylonian ge'onim, Shemu'el followed the example of his illustrious predecessor, *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on, and produced a number of works in less traditional genres, all written in Judeo-Arabic, including a translation of and commentary on at least half of the Pentateuch, dozens of monographs on halakhic topics, and several works of religious philosophy. Most of these works have survived only in fragmentary form and have yet to be published, although his commentary on the Pentateuch was published in 1979, and sections from his introduction to the Talmud were published in 1990.

SHEMU'EL BEN ME'IR (c.1080–1160), rabbinic scholar and biblical and Talmudic commentator; known by the acronym Rashbam. He was the eldest son of R. Me'ir ben Shemu'el and Rashi's daughter Yokheved. He studied under his father in Ramerupt and with Rashi in Troyes, noting that Rashi accepted some of his suggestions with regard to biblical interpretations. Shemu'el earned his livelihood by raising livestock and from viticulture. He lived mainly in Ramerupt but also in Caen and Paris. He was involved in disputations with Christians and attacked their Christological scriptural interpretations.

He apparently commented on all the books of the Bible. His commentary on the Torah has survived almost in its entirety. Fragments of other books have also survived, including his commentaries to most of the Five Scrolls. The commentary on Ecclesiastes edited by Sara Japhet and Robert B. Salters (1985) has been judged by most scholars to be that of Rashbam.

Shemu'el's biblical commentaries stress the literal meaning in its most profound sense. He cites or utilizes Midrashic material if it follows closely the literal (peshat) meaning. He makes it clear, in several programmatic introductory statements, that the rabbinic interpretation of each verse is the most important one. Since there is a rabbinic dictum, however, that every verse can also be interpreted according to peshuto shel miqra' (its simple meaning), he aims to fill this gap without competing with rabbinic interpretations.

He was most interested in the study of biblical grammar and syntax. He explains certain conventions and phrases in biblical verses as derekh erets, based upon reality, rather than attempting to interpret the scriptural details. Like Rashi, he often uses Targum Onkelos. His desire to refute Christological explanations occasionally leads him to suggest that a particular interpretation is both "according to the literal meaning of the text and in response to heretics." S. Z. Ashkenazi wrote a supercommentary, Kerem Shemu'el, to Shemu'el's commentary on the Pentateuch (Frankfurt an der Oder, 1727).

Shemu'el supplemented Rashi's Talmudic commentary to the tenth chapter of Pesahim and his commentary to Bava' Batra' (from folio 29a). Although his commentary in these sections is similar in format to Rashi's running commentary, he raises and answers difficulties and proposes and weighs alternative explanations. He also wrote tosafot to a number of tractates. The anonymous commentary to Avot found in Mahazor Vitry contains large segments of Shemu'el's commentary to that tractate.

Shemu'el was the first rabbinic scholar in northern France to use R. Yitzhaq Alfasi's legal compendium. He also wrote commentaries to a number of piyyutim and composed a grammatical work entitled Sefer Daiqut. Although familiar with mystical works and concepts, Shemu'el downplays the need for esoteric wisdom in his commentary about the Creation and in his commentary to Ecclesiastes. He hoped, perhaps, to eliminate this aspect of early rabbinic culture in Ashkenaz.

SHEMU'EL HA-NAGID (993–1056), rabbinic scholar, Hebrew poet and grammarian, and highly skilled court secretary who rose through the ranks of state chancery in Muslim Granada to achieve prominence in the caliph's court. As a consequence of the unique range of his literary and scholarly activities and his political acumen, Shemu'el ha-Nagid was widely respected in both the Muslim civic sphere and the Jewish social and cultural milieu. He assumed the role of nagid (c.1027), unofficial head of the Jews of Spain (nagid means head of the community), and functioned as the highest financial and administrative official of Granada from 1038 until his death in 1056. He may also have served his ruler in some military capacity, although the nature and extent of this involvement are uncertain.

The first virtuoso poet of the "golden age" of Jewish culture in Spain, Shemu'el ha-Nagid extended the prosodic possibilities and thematic range of Hebrew verse by drawing creatively upon the forms and conventions of Arabic poetry. He composed one of the earliest strophic songs in Hebrew and employed a greater variety of poetic meters than earlier generations of Spanish-Hebrew poets. His love lyrics, drinking songs, laments, gnomic verse, and poems imitate Biblical Hebrew. He was the author of commentaries on books of the Bible (which have not survived); a treatise attacking the Qur'an and describing its contradictions; a major halakhic work Sefer Hilkhata' Gevarata' (existing fragments of which were published by M. Margalit in 1962 as Hilkhot ha-Nagid); and a Talmudic compendium based on both the Talmud Bavli and Talmud Yerushalmi, as well as on geonic responsa. Shemu'el ha-Nagid is considered one of the most significant representatives of Judeo-Muslim culture in eleventh-century Spain.

SHEMU'EL HA-QATAN (1st–2d cent.), tanna'. None of his halakhot is recorded, but he was well known for his gentleness, humility, and pacifism. At the request of the patriarch *Gamli'el, he composed (probably c.80–90) the *Birkat ha-Minim, which was inserted as the nineteenth benediction of the *Amidah (Ber. 28b). It has been suggested that the original version of this prayer, which was directed against heretics (minim*) in general, was subsequently worded specifically so that Judeo-Christians, who at that time still worshiped in synagogues, would henceforth be unable to participate in the prayer service. This practical expulsion of Christians from the synagogue contributed to the final separation between Judaism and Christianity.

An apocryphal tractate dealing with astronomy, Ba-raiyya' de-Shemu'el ha-Qatan, has been mistakenly attributed to him. It probably dates from the eighth or ninth century.

SHENI VA-HAMISHI (שְׁנִי וַחֲמִישִׁי; Monday and Thursday), two weekdays characterized liturgically by the reading of the Torah (the first section of the Pentateuch portion for the following Sabbath), to which three people are called, and the recitation of additional penitential and supplicatory prayers at the morning service. They are also the preferred days for voluntary fasts. In ancient times, villagers went to town on Mondays and Thursdays to attend the markets and the law courts, and the Talmud credits *Ezra with instituting instruction in the law on those days (Meg. 31b). The three voluntary fasts known as Behab, an abbreviation for Monday-Thursday-Monday, and observed shortly after Pesah and Sukkot, are meant to atone for unintentional sins and levity during the festive season, after the example of Job (Jb. 1.5).

SHEQALIM (שקלים; Shekels), tractate in Mishnah order Mo'ed, in eight chapters, with related material in the Tosefta' and the Talmud Yerushalmi. It deals with the half-shekel tax that was used for purchasing communal sacrifices during the Second Temple period, which was based on the half-shekel tax that was levied for the construction of the Israelites' desert sanctuary (Ex. 30.11–16). Many of the laws in Sheqalim reflect the Pharisaic insistence, against Sadducean opposition (see Men. 65a), that communal sacrifices had to be brought from communal property. Hence, the laws of Sheqalim help to define the rabbinic conception of community, as opposed to corporate partnership.

Sheqalim describes in detail the financial management of the Temple and its service, including a list naming Temple officials, which is of great historical interest. A hortatory pericope (Sheq. 3.2) admonishes the priest who draws money from the communal chest in the Temple not to wear garments with wide sleeves or flowing hems, lest he be suspected of misappropriating some of the funds, thus violating the command to "be blameless before God and before Israel" (Nm. 32.22).

An English translation of the tractate is in Herbert Danby's The Mishnah (London, 1933).

SHERIRA' BEN HANINA' GA'ON (10th cent.), ga'on of *Pumbedita. He succeeded to the gaonate when he was about seventy years old and restored the declining prestige of the Pumbedita academy. Toward the end of his long life, his son *Ha'i Ga'on was appointed as his assistant (av beit din); in a departure from tradition, father and son served jointly as heads of the academy for about a dozen years until Sherira' retired. Sherira' left a number of responsa, of which the most famous and important is his Iggeret Rav Sherira' Ga'on, written in 986.

This is a response to a number of questions raised by scholars of Kairouan, North Africa, concerning the nature of rabbinic tradition and literature. Sherira' provided an overview of the ways in which rabbinic literature developed from oral tradition and discussed such topics as the role of the individual teacher or editor within the context of collective transmission. In addition, he provided an annotated list of Babylonian *amora'im, *savora'im, and *ge'onim that constitutes the chief source for the chronology—and, to some extent, for the history—of the Babylonian center from the third to the tenth century. The epistle was translated into Hebrew (from Aramaic) and published by Aaron Hyman (London, 1910), and an English translation with commentary by N. D. Rabinovich appeared in 1988. The original was published by B. M. Lewin in 1921.

SHESHET (3d–4th cent.), Babylonian amora'. A wealthy clothing dealer by profession, he was famed for both his piety (cf. Shab. 118b) and his learning. He was known to have committed to memory an exceptionally large amount of traditional material, necessitated by the fact that he was blind and required his lessons to be read to him (San. 86a; Eruv. 67a; Shab. 41b); it was his habit to review his studies every thirty days (Pes. 68b). He studied with R. Yirmiyahu ben Abba' and R. Huna', and there are numerous scholars who transmit in his name. He taught in Nehardea before moving to Maḥza, and then to Shilḥe on the Tigris, where, according to the Iggeret Rav Sherira' Ga'on, he founded an academy. He made constant appeal to the tannaitic sources extant in his day, thus leaning heavily on the weight of precedent (Zev. 96b), and he disdained the more dialectical approach of the Pumbedita scholars (cf. B. M. 38b). Although some of his Midrashic comments are preserved (e.g., Shab. 63a to Prv. 3.16), he busied himself primarily with halakhah (cf. Suk. 52b), and the Talmud records many of his debates with R. Nahman. His most famous adage is "The borrower is servant of the lender" (Git. 14a).

SHETAR. See DEED.

SHEVA' BERAKHOT (שבע ברכות; Seven Blessings), the seven benedictions recited at the wedding ceremony. They are of ancient origin and are quoted in the Talmud (Ket. 8a). The first benediction is recited over the wine, and the following three praise God who has created all things for his glory, formed humankind, and created male and female in his image. The fifth benediction refers to the joy of the restoration of Zion, and the sixth evokes the joy of the first couple in Paradise. The seventh blessing gives thanks to God for having created "joy and gladness, bride and bridegroom" and concludes "Blessed

... who makes the bridegroom rejoice with the bride." During the seven days following the marriage, the Sheva Berakhot are recited during Birkat ha-Mazon after every meal at which a minyan is available (the minyan must include some new guests on each occasion).

SHEVAT (שבט), fifth month of the civil year, eleventh month of the religious year; its zodiac sign is Aquarius. The word shevat is Akkadian/Babylonian in origin; it appears only once in the Bible (Zec. 1.7), but it is the "eleventh month" referred to in Deuteronomy 1.3 when Moses began to read the Book of Deuteronomy to the people. Shevat always has thirty days, and *Tu bi-Shevat (New Year for Trees) falls, following the tradition of Beit Hillel, on 15 Shevat (the Beit Shamm'ai date—1 Shevat—did not gain acceptance).

SHEVAT, FIFTEENTH DAY OF. See TU BI-SHEVAT.

SHEVI'IT (שביעית; Seventh Year), tractate in Mishnah order Zera'im, in ten chapters, with related material in Tosefta' and in the Talmud Bavli. It deals with the laws pertaining to the shemittah (sabbatical), the seventh year, when Israel is commanded to let the land lie fallow (Ex. 23.10–11; Lv. 25.1–7) and to release debts (Dt. 15.1–3). The laws of shemittah are arranged in roughly chronological order, opening with a rabbinic interdiction against preparing the ground during the sixth year for agricultural work and concluding with laws governing the release of debts at the conclusion of the seventh year. In between, Shevi'it discusses in detail forbidden and permitted forms of agricultural activity during the seventh year and the laws governing the consumption of shevi'it produce.

According to the rabbis, not only was the owner of a field required to leave his produce to be taken and consumed by anyone who so desired (Lv. 25.6), but Beit Shamm'ai even forbade requesting permission of the owner to enter the field and pick fruit. This requirement gave concrete expression to the ideas of social equality (Lv. 25.6) and of divine sovereignty (Lv. 25.2, cf. 25.23) associated with shevi'it. However, many Jews were unwilling to abide by the laws; hence, a sizable portion of the tractate outlines laws designed to render the deceitful flouting of shevi'it more difficult, while maintaining cordial relations between shevi'it observers and nonobservers. The law of releasing debts was also widely disregarded, leading Hillel to institute the perozbol, a legal fiction that legitimated the collection of debts after the date of release had passed.

An English translation of Shevi'it appears in The Mishnah by Herbert Danby (London, 1933).

SHEVU'OT (שבועות; Oaths), tractate in Mishnah order Neziqin, in eight chapters, with related material in the Tosefta' and commentary in both Talmuds. The biblical oath, invoking the name of God to bolster a statement or commitment (e.g., Dt. 6.13; Lv. 19.12), was closely associated with the invocation of a divine curse (e.g., Nm. 5.21; Neh. 10.30), and violation of an oath was considered a desecration of the name of God (Lv. 19.12). Shevu'ot follows biblical law in differentiating between various categories of oaths.

The false "oath of utterance," defined in the Bible (Lv. 5.4) as the inadvertent violation of a commitment to deny or grant oneself a benefit, is expanded by R. 'Aqiva' (Shev. 3.5, pace R. Yishma'e'l) to include oaths affirming or denying events in the past. Shevu'ot opens with a formulaic encapsulation of the position of R. 'Aqiva': "Oaths are of two kinds [i.e., affirmative and negative], which divide into four [i.e., future and present]." Shevu'ot dwells at great length on defilement, by impurity, of the Temple or of sacred foods. In rabbinic as in biblical law, oaths played an important part in judicial proceedings, as attested to by the five chapters of Shevu'ot (chaps. 3–8) devoted to the laws of various forms of oaths arising out of monetary disputes.

An English translation of the tractate by A. E. Silverstone is in the Soncino Talmud (1935).

SHILOH, an important cultic center of premonarchic Israel, identified with Khirbet Seilun in the hill country of Ephraim. The Book of Joshua identifies Shiloh as the site that first housed the Tent of Meeting and from where Joshua apportioned the tribal allotments (Jos. 18.1–10). Other sources allude to an actual temple structure at Shiloh, where the prophet Samuel came of age (1 Sm. 1; cf. Jgs. 18.31). SHIM'ON BAR YOḤAI (2d cent.), tanna'; pupil of R. *Aqiva ben Yosef. He conducted his school at Tekoa in Upper Galilee, where his pupils included R. *Yehudah ha-Nasi'. The halakhic midrashim Sifrei* and Mekhilta de-Rabbi Shim'on bar Yoḥai* evolved from the teachings of his academy, which was noted for systematic classification of halakhot and attempts to adduce a rational basis for the law. Shim'on, who is frequently quoted in the Mishnah and other tannaitic sources as R. Shim'on, also had a reputation as a miracle worker. For speaking against the Romans he was condemned to death, and he and his son El'azar ben Shim'on consequently had to go into hiding—they are said to have spent twelve or thirteen years in a cave until the death sentence was annulled. After the Bar Kokhba' Revolt (see BAR KOKHBA', SHIM'ON) and subsequent persecution, Shim'on feared for the continuation of Torah studies and developed an ideology that gave ultimate priority to the learning of the law above all other activities. Many legends were woven around him, and kabbalists subsequently claimed that the *Zohar expressed the mystical doctrines revealed by Shim'on during his sojourn in the cave. At the reputed site of his grave in Meron in Lower Galilee, bonfires are lit and special poems composed in his honor are sung on *Lag ba-Omer, the date of his death.

SHIM'ON BEN 'AZZAI (2d cent.), one of the great tannaitic scholars of his generation, he died in his prime before being formally ordained; hence, his name is not preceded by the title "rabbi." He remained unmarried—contrary to the requirements of rabbinic law—in order to devote his time exclusively to study. Tradition connects him with a circle of mystics and attributes his premature death to a mystical experience (against the danger of which the rabbis frequently warned; cf. Ḥag. 14a-b). This tradition is further elaborated on in the mystical Heikhalot* literature that Gershom Gerhard *Scholem has shown dates back to the Talmudic period. Few halakhic statements have come down in his name, and his aggadic sayings reflect his great piety (Avot 4.2).

SHIM'ON BEN GAMLI'EL (1st cent.), tanna'; son of Gamli'el the Elder, whom he succeeded as nasi' of the Sanhedrin in the years immediately preceding the destruction of the Second Temple (Yohanan ben Zakk'ai was av beit din). He was a forceful and charismatic leader (Ker. 1.7), who belittled intellectual argument and pedagogic activity (he himself had no disciples) saying, "Not the study but the practice of the Torah is essential" (Avot 1.17). He served as a leader in the early stages of the rebellion against Rome, though later his views became more moderate. According to tradition, he was one of the *Ten Martyrs executed by the Romans, but it is possible that he was put to death by the Zealots during the last year of the war.

SHIM'ON BEN GAMLI'EL (2d cent.), tanna'; son of *Gamli'el and nasi' of the Sanhedrin at Usha' in the generation after the Bar Kokhba' Revolt (see BAR KOKHBA', SHIM'ON). Under his statesmanship, the position of nasi' and the status of the Sanhedrin recovered much of its significance. Shim'on was noted for his humility (B. M. 84a) and leniency but was firm and decisive in his judgments when necessary (Mak. 1.10). Many halakhot are quoted in his name, and in a later generation, R. Yohanan bar Nappaḥa' (died 279) ruled that, with the exception of three cases, whenever R. Shim'on ben Gamli'el's view is cited in the Mishnah, it is to be followed. Shim'on coined the phrase, "The world rests on three things: judgment, truth, and peace" (Avot 1.18).

SHIM'ON BEN LAQISH (died c.275), Palestinian amora'* also known as Reish Laqish. Originally a gladiator, he was influenced by *Yohanan bar Nappaḥa' to turn to sacred studies. Shim'on became an outstanding and independent scholar and noted aggadist; he was deputy to (and brother-in-law of) R. Yohanan, and their legal discussions constitute one of the main elements of the Talmud Yerushalmi. Shim'on was famed for his scrupulous honesty (Yoma' 9b), his saintly goodness, and his willingness to endanger himself to help others (Y., Ter. 8ff.). He was greatly respected but refused to gain personal benefit from the esteem in which he was held (Meg. 28b). Deeply aware of man's inner conflicts, he taught that, but for the help of God, man's evil inclinations would overcome him every day (Suk. 52b), though ultimately bad deeds were due to a "spirit of foolishness" (Sot. 3a). One of God's great gifts to man is repentance, which could turn the evil deeds of the past to positive merits (Yoma' 86b).

SHIM'ON BEN SHETAḤ (1st cent. BCE), scholar and president (nasi') of the Sanhedrin. A Pharisaic leader during the reign of Alexander Yannai and his widow Salome Alexandra (Shim'on's sister), Shim'on was renowned for his integrity. He and Salome Alexandra transformed the Sanhedrin from a Sadducean to a Pharisaic body (possibly by introducing scribes [soferim]) into its ranks, which hitherto had been composed of priests and lay aristocracy. He was forced to hide from the persecutions of the pro-Sadducee Alexander Yannai until the latter was pressured to reinstate him. Shim'on then recalled Yehudah ben Tabba'i from exile in Alexandria; together they constituted one of the zugot. Shim'on initiated several important legal and religious ordinances, for example, the institution of the marriage contract (ketubbah*) and the requirement that a court must pass judgment on the basis of the testimony of two witnesses and not on circumstantial evidence. He also laid the foundation for the elementary education of children. He vigorously strove to eradicate witchcraft, and legend has it that he hanged eighty witches in Ashkelon. Their relatives took revenge by fabricating evidence implicating his son in murder, thus forcing Shim'on to execute his own son, knowing that he was innocent.

SHIM'ON BEN ZOMA' (1st-2d cent.), Palestinian tanna'. He was the colleague of Shim'on ben 'Azzai, both of whom were highly regarded, although neither was ordained (cf. San. 17b; occasionally, however, each is called rabbi; cf. Ber. 6b). It was said that whoever saw Ben Zoma' in a dream could expect an increase in wisdom (Ber. 57b). He was given to mystical studies (particularly on creation and the divine chariot) and was one of the four sages who entered "the garden" (i.e., esoteric mysticism; according to others, heaven), going mad as a result ("he looked and became demented," T., Hag. 2.3; Prv. 25.16 is applied to him there). Shortly before Ben Zoma' died, his original teacher, R. Yehoshu'a ben Hananyah, found him absorbed in speculation on the upper and lower waters of the firmament and deemed him still deluded (T., Hag. 2.5). With his death, it was said that expounders of Torah (darshanim) ceased (Sot. 9.15). His aphorism on the nature of true wisdom, might, riches, happiness, and honor is found in Avot 4.1. His exposition of Deuteronomy 16.3 (Ber. 1.5), namely that the words "all the days of your life" include the nights, is preserved in the Haggadah of Pesah.

SHIM'ON HA-TSADDIQ (fl. 200 BCE), high priest. According to Josephus (Antiquities of the Jews 12.43), he is Shim'on I (4th-3d cent.), called "ha-Tsaddiq" (the Just) because of his benevolence and fear of heaven. However, Talmudic sources and Ben Sira (Ben Sira 50.1-6) indicate that he was Shim'on II (fl. 200 BCE), thought by scholars to have been head of the pro-Seleucid party. In rabbinic historiography Shim'on ha-Tsaddiq is referred to as "one of the survivors of the Great Assembly"; his influence is said to have spanned the period of the Great Assembly and the period of the paired authorities (zugot) that preceded the earliest tanna'im (rabbinic scholars). Ben Sira refers to Shim'on's communal activities in the aftermath of Antiochus III's conquest of Judea and to his Temple renovations. Shim'on is traditionally credited with formulating the liturgy and establishing the central role of study in Judaism, though there is little concrete historical evidence for these and other accomplishments attributed to him.

SHIMSHON BEN AVRAHAM OF SENS (died 1214), rabbinic scholar, tosafist, legal authority. Rabbi Shimshon was known as Rash (or ha-Sar) of Sens. In his youth, R. Shimshon studied with his brother-in-law, R. Ya'aqov ben Me'ir Tam, and with R. Hayyim ha-Kohen, but his most important teacher was R. Yitshaq ben Shemu'el of Dampierre. Rabbi Shimshon composed or dictated tosafot, known as Tosafot Sens, on almost the entire Talmud, and some were printed in standard editions of the Talmud. He also wrote a commentary to the Mishnah orders of Zera'im and Tohorot. Several of his Talmudic commentaries are not extant, and others are attributed incorrectly to him. He wrote numerous responsa that are scattered throughout medieval rabbinic literature. A collection of his legal decisions has been lost.

He was consulted by R. Me'ir Abulafia and others at the beginning of the *Maimonidean Controversy. He was opposed to Maimonides' views on resurrection and to other aspects of the Mishneh Torah, but he also recognized Maimonides as a great Torah scholar. Shimshon's own lack of philosophical training caused him to judge Maimonides' work solely as a rabbinic composition, a posture that did not satisfy the anti-Maimonists.

Rabbi Shimshon led a group of tosafists who emigrated to Erets Yisra'el around 1210. He died in Acre and was buried at the foot of Mount Carmel, the site of the famous contest between Elijah and the priests of Baal. He is referred to occasionally in tosafistic literature as R. Shimshon of Erets Yisra'el or of Jerusalem, where he apparently had also settled for a time.

SHIR HA-KAVOD (שִׁיר הַקְּבוֹד; Hymn of Glory; also known after its opening words as An'im Zemirot [I Shall Sing Songs]), alphabetic acrostic recited responsively by Ashkenazim at the end of the morning service (in some rites restricted to the conclusion of the Sabbath additional service, in Israel sometimes recited before the reading of the Torah, in other places omitted entirely). Shir ha-Kavod is often recited by a boy (or girl in non-Orthodox congregations) under the age of thirteen, with the congregation reading the responses. In certain rites Shir ha-Kavod is also sung on the eve of Yom Kippur. The composition of the hymn, a doxology that does not shun anthropomorphisms, has been attributed to R. *Yehudah ben Shemu'el he-Hasid.

SHIR HA-YIHUD (שִׁיר הַיְּהוּד; Song of [God's] Unity), hymn divided into seven sections, one of which is read (by Ashkenazim) at the end of *Shaharit on each day of the week, although in practice only the Sabbath section is recited in many congregations. The hymn, praising God by glorifying his attributes, seems to have been partly inspired by Shelomoh *ibn Gabirol's Keter Malkhut. It has also been suggested that the hymn is a poetic presentation of the philosophy of Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on, intermingled with the mysticism of the Hasidei Ashkenaz. Shir ha-Yihud is attributed to R. Yehudah he-Hasid (d.1217) or to his father, R. Shemu'el ben Kalonimos (b.1115). An English translation of the entire hymn, by Nina Salamon, Elsie Davis, and H. M. Adler, is given in Davis and Adler's Service of the Synagogue (London, 1908), pages 60–72.

SHI'UR QOMAH, mystical work dating from the geonic period, possibly earlier (in the light of its similarities to Ma'aseh Merkavah mysticism). It attempts to convey the greatness and majesty of God by attributing to him colossal dimensions of stupendous magnitude; for instance, "the soles of his feet cover the whole universe; the height of his soles is 30,000 thousand parasangs; from the sole to the heel 1,000 times 1,000 plus 500 parasangs; his square beard is 11,500 parasangs. Each parasang is 3 miles and each mile 10,000 cubits." Many authorities denounced the work as spurious, grossly anthropomorphic, and heretical, and Maimonides declared that it ought to be burned. Defenders of the Shi'ur Qomah claimed that it was esoteric, not meant to be taken literally, and that the fantastic numbers were meant to convey a sense of God's infinite greatness.

SHIV'AH (שִׁבְעָה; seven), the seven days of mourning following the death of one's close relative: a father, mother, son, daughter, brother, sister, husband, or wife. The period of the shiv'ah begins immediately after the burial and ends on the morning of the seventh day. On the seventh day, the mourners sit only briefly after morning prayers and then visit the cemetery to mark the conclusion of the shiv'ah. The first three days are regarded as the days of deepest mourning. Biblical authority for the custom is found, for example, in the account of the seven days of mourning that Joseph observed for his father, Jacob (Gen. 50.10); other rabbis ascribe its origin to Moses (Y., Ket. 1). The rules and customs for the week of shiv'ah provide the mourners with time away from their normal daily pursuits in order to give expression to their grief and to afford friends the opportunity of showing their respect to the deceased and offering their condolences to the bereaved family, traditionally comforting them with the phrase, "May the Almighty comfort you together with those who mourn for Zion and Jerusalem." The mourners are prohibited to greet others, though on the third day they may respond if greeted first. Shiv'ah commences on returning from the cemetery; it is customary for a light meal to be prepared by neighbors and served to the mourners. This meal is called Se'udat Havra'ah (Meal of Condolence) and consists, traditionally, of eggs and lentils. All mirrors in the home of mourning are kept covered during the shiv'ah, a late medieval custom probably stemming from folk beliefs. A *memorial light remains lit throughout the week. Mourners sit on the floor or on low stools, and since leather was considered a luxury, they wear cloth slippers instead of leather shoes.

The shiv'ah week is usually observed in the home of the deceased, where the three daily prayer services are held. It is forbidden to study the Torah, except for Job, Lamentations, and the laws of mourning. Shaving is prohibited during shiv'ah; bathing is permitted for hygienic reasons but not for pleasure (Shulhan 'Arukh, Yoreh De'ah 381.1–2). Marital relations are also prohibited during the week. Mourners do not work during the shiv'ah, though, if absolutely essential, some work may be performed after the third day. If essential, a doctor is allowed to see patients during his shiv'ah.

On the Sabbath, there is no shiv'ah or mourning in public, and mourners may leave the house and attend services in the synagogue. The shiv'ah is resumed after the Sabbath. If the funeral takes place before one of the major festivals (not Hanukkah or Purim), the onset of the festival cancels the shiv'ah. If, however, the funeral took place during the intermediate days of a festival (see HOL HA-MO'ED), the shiv'ah starts at the conclusion of the festival.

If news of a death and burial reach a close relative within three days of the commencement of the shiv'ah, the mourner observes the rest of the shiv'ah week and finishes at the same time as the rest of the family. If one receives the news after the third day, then the full seven days after that are to be observed privately. If the news comes after thirty days (sheloshim*), shiv'ah is not observed, except symbolically for one hour.

SHIV'AH 'ASAR BE-TAMMUZ (שִׁבְעָה עָשָׂר בְּתַמְמוּז; 17 Tammuz), the fast of the fourth month mentioned in Zechariah 8.19, commemorating the breach of the walls of Jerusalem three weeks before the complete fall of the city and the destruction of the Temple. According to Jeremiah 39.2, the breach of the walls by the Babylonians under Nebuchadnezzar in 586 BCE took place on 9 Tammuz, and the fast was presumably observed on that date until the building of the Second Temple, when minor fasts were abolished. When the break into Jerusalem made by Titus in 70 CE fell on 17 Tammuz, the latter date was chosen for the fast to commemorate both tragedies (Ta'an. 26a). The Mishnah (Ta'an. 4.6) adds other mournful anniversaries that occurred on this date, including the breaking by Moses of the tablets of the Law, the cessation of the daily sacrifice in 70 CE, and the burning of the scrolls of the Law by an otherwise unknown Apostomos, who also erected an idol in the sanctuary. The seventeenth of Tammuz marks the start of Bein ha-Metsarim* (the Three Weeks of Mourning), which culminates in Tish'ah be-'Av. Shiv'ah 'Asar be-Tammuz is observed from sunrise to sundown, and special Torah readings are inserted in Shaharit* and Minhah*, selihot* are read, and an addition is made to the 'Amidah. SHIVHEI HA-BESHT, the mythical biography of Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer Ba'al Shem Tov*, the founder of Hasidism*, first published in Kopyś, Belorussia, in 1814, fifty-four years after his death. This compilation of fanciful tales and typologically prescribed stories purports to relate the events of his life. During the second half of the eighteenth century, when first recounted, these tales were a meaningful relation of events, but through transmission they underwent embellishment and exaggeration. Nevertheless, close scrutiny reveals several levels of authenticity, and valuable historical data can be determined alongside obvious legendary narration.

SHIVVITI (שִׁיבִיטִי), plaque or paper inscribed with the verse, "I have set the Lord always before me" (Ps. 16.8). The name shivviti is derived from the first Hebrew word of this biblical verse. These decorative plaques are hung on the synagogue wall next to the cantor's podium or in the interior of a private home and are intended to serve as a constant reminder of God's presence. Shivvitis may also contain a variety of other biblical and Talmudic passages. Many feature the names of protective angels or magical formulas and function as amulets. They are commonly decorated with images of the seven-branched Menorah, the holy sites of Israel, animals, and flowers. Many shivvitis were created in eastern Europe during the nineteenth century; additional examples were produced in North Africa.

SHMUEL BUKH, a major Yiddish poetic work setting ancient Jewish content in a European form. Thought to be of fifteen century origin, it is attributed to Moyshe 'Esrin ve-Arba', a late fifteenth-century German-born rabbi who became an emissary of the Jerusalem community. The narrative features stories drawn from 1 and 2 Samuel and emphasizes the glory and tragedy of King David. The work is cast in the Germanic Nibelungen (Hildebrand) stanza form. The first printed edition is from Augsburg in 1544.

SHNEUR ZALMAN OF LYADY (1745–1813), Hasidic master and founder of Habad* Hasidism*, that is, the school of Hasidic thought and the organization that later became known as the Lubavitch movement. Shneur was born in Lithuania and achieved a reputation as a brilliant Talmudic scholar. He studied further in Mezhirech, in Volhynia, under the renowned Hasidic master R. Dov Ber* of Mezhirech, who recognized his exceptional talents and encouraged him to compose a revised version of the Shulhan 'Arukh*. Shneur completed this prodigious task at the age of twenty-five. Dov Ber then assigned to him and to R. Menaḥem Mendel of Vitebsk the task of proclaiming Hasidic ideology in Lithuania, the stronghold of the Mitnaggedim* (as the opponents of Hasidism were termed). After Menaḥem Mendel left for Palestine in 1777, Shneur became one of the foremost leaders of Hasidism in the northeastern provinces of Russia. He owed his prominence to great erudition in halakhah* and Kabbalah*, as well as to great mystical inspiration and to his charismatic personality. In Lithuania, he attempted to meet Eliyahu ben Shelomoh Zalman of Vilna*, the Vilna Ga'on, leader of the anti-Hasidic opposition, in order to bring about a reconciliation, but the latter refused to confront him. Shneur was twice imprisoned by the Russian authorities as a result of false accusations by the Mitnaggedim. His disciples and adherents of the Habad movement observe the date of his release, 19 Kislev, as a festival to this day. Shneur developed his system of mystical theology in several important works, the best known of which, entitled Liqqutei Amarim (or Tanya) [Slawita, 1796; English trans. Nissan Mindel [Brooklyn, N.Y., 1962]], is regarded within the Lubavitch movement as the fundamental text of Hasidic spirituality. Shneur offered a comprehensive conception of both the spiritual and pragmatic demands of life according to a dialectic principle embodied simultaneously in the relationship to God, to the world, and to fellow humans. Though deemed by his followers to be a tsaddiq, he denied the possession of miraculous faculties, stressing the need for mutual support and cooperation between the Ḥasid and his rebbe. His other works include Torah Or (Kopyś, 1837) and Liqqutei Torah (Zhitomir, 1948).

SHO'AH. See HOLOCAUST, RELIGIOUS RESPONSES DURING THE; HOLOCAUST THEOLOGY.

SHOFAR (שׁוֹפָר), a ram's horn sounded on ceremonial occasions, including the proclamation of the jubilee year (Lv. 25.9), the anointing of a new king (e.g., 1 Kgs. 1.34), or as a summons to war; today the sounding of the shofar is almost entirely confined to the synagogue, during the High Holy Days. Although Ashkenazi custom is to sound the shofar daily during the month of Elul (except on Sabbaths and the day before *Ro'sh ha-Shanah), Western Sephardim sound it on Hosh'ana' Rabbah, and it is sounded in all rites at the close of the service on Yom Kippur. The shofar is first mentioned at the Sinaitic revelation (Ex. 19.16, 19); however, it is enjoined in the Bible only for Ro'sh ha-Shanah (which is called a yom teru'ah, "a day of sounding [the shofar]"), with the phrase "it shall be a day of sounding to you" (Nm. 29.1). The phrase "A memorial of sounding" (Lv. 23.24) serves as an injunction against sounding the shofar on the Sabbath, although the shofar was sounded on Sabbaths in the Temple. A shofar may be made from the horn of any animal that is ritually pure (except a cow, excluded because of the incident of the golden calf); the custom of using a ram's horn was influenced by the story of the aqedah (the binding of Isaac; R. ha-Sh. 26b). The rabbis evolved an elaborate order of sounding the shofar: broken notes resembling sobbing (the shevarim sound) and wailing (the teru'ah sound), which are both preceded and followed by a long unbroken sound (teqi'ah); this order is repeated three times after the recital of each of the three sections of the 'Amidah of the Musaf service. In many places the tradition is that one hundred notes be sounded on each day of Ro'sh ha-Shanah. Sa'adyah Ga'on adduced ten reasons for the sounding of the shofar (for example, to proclaim God's sovereignty and as a symbol of the ingathering of the exiles). Maimonides gives as its message (Hilkhot Teshuvah 3.4), "Awake you sleepers from your sleep, and you that are in slumber, rouse yourselves. Consider your ways, remember God, turn unto him." The shofar was sounded on various solemn occasions including the imposition of an *excommunication. The use of the shofar on official occasions has been reintroduced in the State of Israel for the swearing in of the president. It is also sounded in Orthodox residential neighborhoods to herald the advent of the Sabbath. See also BA'AL TEQI'AH.

SHOFAROT (שׁוֹפָרוֹת), name given to the section of the 'Amidah including ten biblical verses that mention the sounding of the *shofar recited during the additional service on Ro'sh ha-Shanah (following the *Malkhuyyot and the *Zikhronot) and after which the shofar is sounded. The biblical selection is made up of three verses from each of the three portions of the Bible, the tenth verse being taken from the Pentateuch.

SHOFETIM. See JUDGES, BOOK OF.

SHO'HER TOV, midrash on Psalms (also called Midrash Tehillim), named after its opening words (cf. Prv. 11.27). It contains homilies and interpretations, collated from many aggadic sources, of 143 psalms. The work is not uniform and is divided into two sections, homilies on Psalms 1–118 and homilies on Psalms 119–150, with the exception of Psalm 123 and Psalm 131 (much of the latter is drawn from Yalqut Shim'oni). The date of the work is uncertain, and it may have been edited over a period of some centuries, beginning during the time of the ge'onim. It was certainly widely known by the eleventh century. It has been suggested that it was composed in southern Italy. It has also been suggested that this midrash reflects a *triennial cycle of reciting the Book of Psalms, parallel to that of the Torah (in Erets Yisra'el), and that this is the key to a deeper understanding of the homilies. However, this contention has not been proved conclusively. Sho'her Tov was first published in Constantinople in 1512; Solomon Buber edited an edition in 1891 (Vilna) based on eight manuscripts. William G. Braude translated the work into English in 1959. The name Sho'her Tov has been erroneously applied to Midrash Proverbs and Midrash Samuel.

SHO'ET (שׁוֹעֵט; slaughterer), one trained to perform shehitah (*ritual slaughter). In order to receive his diploma (qabbalah), a sho'et must not only know the laws and theory of shehitah but must also have had practical experience under the guidance of experts. In awarding the diploma, the personal habits and character of the candidate are fully considered; a person who is not punctiliously observant or God-fearing, or who rejects rabbinic tradition (e.g., a Karaite), is not to receive the qabbalah. According to custom, the person ordained must be at least eighteen years of age; he cannot be prone to drunkenness; and his fingers cannot have lost their delicacy of touch. Women, although permitted to perform shehitah, are not in fact so ordained. A non-Jew may not act as a sho'et. While there were historical eras in which many men received a qabbalah to perform ritual slaughter, the modern trend is that very few people are so trained, and those that are engage in the activity as a profession.

SHOLEM ZOKHER. See SHALOM ZAKHAR.

SHOMERIM (שומרים; bailees), people to whom property is delivered under contract of bailment. A bailment arises when one person (the bailee) is lawfully entrusted with the goods of another (the bailor) with the understanding that the goods will be returned. The law of bailment deals with the duty of the bailee to return the articles in good condition. In assessing the responsibility and liability of the bailee, Jewish law recognizes four categories of shomerim: the unpaid bailee (shomer hin'am); the borrower (sho'el); the paid bailee (nosei sakhar or shomer sakhar); and the hirer (sokher) (Ex. 22.6–14; B. M. 7ab). The Talmudic discussion of the subject is contained in the treatise Bava' Metsi'a'*. The Israeli bailment law, adopted in 1967, closely follows Jewish law. See also BREACH OF TRUST.

SHOMER YISRA'EL (שומר ישראל; Guardian of Israel), a late piyyut of unknown date and authorship, first found among the selihot* (penitential poetry) for the fast day of Asarah be-Tevet* in a thirteenth-century manuscript. Shomer Yisra'el was originally recited on fast days but later (apparently only in the 19th cent.) was incorporated into Tahanun* in the Ashkenazi and Hasidic rituals, while in other rites it is still reserved for fast days and also, with an additional stanza, for the ten days of penitence. The version given in the prayer book is greatly shortened, and further stanzas are found in some manuscripts. The title Shomer Yisra'el is derived from Psalm 121, verse 4.

SHOSHANNAT YA'AQOV (שושנת יעקב; Lily of Jacob), the concluding section of piyyut Asher Heni' ("who brought the counsel of the heathen to nought"), which is recited on Purim after the reading of the Book of Esther both in the evening and in the morning. While Asher Heni' dates from the geonic period, Shoshannat Ya'aqov is a later addition, consisting of two parts, the first of which is not contained in the Sephardi ritual.

SHOVAVIM TAT (שוקבי'ם ת"ת), Hebrew acrostic for the first eight weekly portions in Exodus. These are Shemot, Va-'Er'a, Bo', Be-Shelah, Yitro, Mishpatim, Terumah, and Tetsavveh. A medieval custom, prevalent among the kabbalists, was to fast during the weeks when those portions were read. Opinions differ as to the reason for such an observance. The most prevalent view holds that the first word of the acrostic, shovavim, suggests the theme of repentance and return, on the basis of the text shuvu banim shovavim, "Return you backsliding children" (Jer. 3.22). The second word of the acrostic, tat, can stand for talmud Torah (study of the Torah), Torah tefillah (Torah and prayer), teshuvah tefillah (repentance and prayer), or other similar sets of religious values beginning with those Hebrew letters. Another view holds that the fasts and the accompanying penitential prayers were instituted during those two months of the winter when those portions of the Torah were being read because epidemics and serious illnesses were prevalent, especially among children. Others find a folkloric origin in the kabbalistic custom of instituting fasts to protect against evil spirits (shovavim).

The degree of fasting varied from place to place and even from individual to individual. One custom was to fast only during the day. Another custom was to fast only during the first and last weeks of the period. Yet another practice restricted the fasting to Mondays and Thursdays during a leap year, since it was thought that a leap year called for more serious repentance. A special service of selihot* was recited in synagogues on Mondays and Thursdays during this period. The observance of Shovavim Tat has virtually dropped out of Jewish practice in modern times.

SHOWBREAD (Heb. lehem ha-panim [bread of the countenance]), twelve loaves of unleavened bread, baked of fine flour and sprinkled with frankincense, placed on the table in the Tabernacle and in the Temple (Ex. 25.30, 40.22–23; Lv. 24.5–9). The loaves were not sacrificed on the altar but were rather arrayed in two rows (or perhaps piles; in later times on six parallel golden-shelved trays) of six on display "before the Lord." Their location and the number twelve indicate that they were a regular, representative gift made on behalf of the twelve tribes of Israel. Each Sabbath day the high priest replaced the week-old loaves with twelve fresh ones, after which the previous week's loaves were eaten by the priests (in Nm. 4.7 they are called lehem ha-tamid [the regular bread]). Thus, the bread was considered an offering to God, and when eaten, it was as though the priests were given a share in the deity's sacred gifts. The showbread is mentioned occasionally outside of the Torah; David and his men were permitted by the priest at the Nob sanctuary to eat of the sacred loaves (since no other bread was available) once it was determined that they had avoided physical impurity (1 Sm. 21.1–7). In ancient Mesopotamia, Egypt, and among the Hittites, loaves of bread were placed daily before the statues of the gods, who were believed to consume them.

SHTIBL (יִי; שְׂטִיבֶל; little room), room used for prayer gatherings as distinct from a regularly consecrated synagogue. In the eighteenth century, adherents of the emerging Hasidism used such temporary prayer rooms for their services after having been forbidden, due to changes they had introduced into the prayer text, to lead prayer services in the local synagogues. As a result, the shtibl became the characteristic prayer house of the Hasidim. Partly due to Hasidic influence, partly to the desire of various groups to maintain their specific liturgical customs, and partly for economic reasons, the shtibl is more widespread in the State of Israel than is the formal synagogue.

SHUL (יִי; שֵׁל; school), term employed by Ashkenazi Jews to refer to the *synagogue. The origin of the term lies in non-Jewish sources: Romans, well aware of the great amount of study that took place in the synagogue, dubbed it a schola—a school. Later, in Germany, the name became Judenschule (Jewish school). Finally the name was transformed to shul in eastern Europe, where it was used by Mitnaggedim to describe their synagogue, whereas the Hasidim referred to their synagogue as a shtibl*.

SHULHAN 'ARUKH, the standard code of Jewish law and practice compiled by Yosef *Karo of Safed and first published in 1565. Karo wrote the Shulhan 'Arukh as a key to and synopsis of his larger work Beit Yosef, which was based in turn on the Arba'ah Turim of *Ya'aqov ben Asher. Following the pattern of the Turim, the Shulhan 'Arukh is divided into four parts: Orah Hayyim, dealing with the ritual obligations of daily life from waking to sundown and covering blessings, prayers, Sabbaths, and festivals; Yoreh De'ah, dealing mainly with dietary and ritual laws including mourning, vows, respect to parents, and charity; Even ha-'Ezer, on personal status, marriage, and divorce; and Hoshen Mishpat, which embraces the entire body of Jewish civil law as far as it is applicable in Diaspora conditions.

There was no reason to assume that the Shulhan 'Arukh would be more successful than the codes that preceded it. This was especially so since it only reflected Sephardi practice. However, Karo's contemporary, Mosheh *Isserles of Kraków, who was working on his own code when Karo's was published, abandoned his original plan and instead added notes to Karo's laws, covering Ashkenazi practice; these notes were called Mappah. The Shulhan 'Arukh, which was now understood in the larger sense as comprising the opinions of both Karo and Isserles, provided a normative framework and guide for Jewish practice.

From the time of the Shulhan 'Arukh on, the genre of codes of Jewish law lost popularity (see CODIFICATION OF LAW). The success of the Shulhan 'Arukh ensured that alternative codes would be ignored, and the way for scholars to register their disagreement with it was through the medium of commentary. The commentaries that are printed on the page of the standard edition of the Shulhan 'Arukh have assumed a special authority and are themselves often considered part of the Shulhan 'Arukh. Contemporary scholars are almost always reluctant to rule against Karo and Isserles without having the support of one of these commentaries. With all of the commentaries on the Shulhan 'Arukh, it was no longer a book that laymen could use, as was its author's intention. Therefore, a series of abridgments of the Shulhan 'Arukh have been published with a popular audience in mind. The most significant such works are Avraham Danzig's Hayyei Adam and Shelomoh Ganzfried's Kitsur Shulhan 'Arukh, both written for Ashkenazi Jewry, and Kaf ha-Hayyim by Ya'aqov Hayyim Sofer, which was written for the Sephardi community.

SHUL KLAPPER (יִי; שֵׁל קְלַפֶּטֶר; synagogue knocker), name given to the synagogue official whose duty was to make the rounds of the houses in villages in eastern Europe and call the men to prayer, usually for the morning service and for selihot*, which were recited in the very early hours of the morning. The shul klapper would knock on bedroom windows and announce in a plaintive chant, "Arise for the service of the Creator."

SHUSHAN PURIM. See PURIM.

SIBYLLINE ORACLES, a series of quasi-prophetic books written in Greek hexameters under the pseudonym of the Sibyl (pagan priestess) and dating from the second century BCE to the seventh century CE. Redacted in the early Byzantine period, these composite texts stem from Jewish, pagan, and Christian circles, with the Jewish passages concentrated mainly in the Third, Fourth and Fifth Sibylline Oracles. The earliest Jewish sections, in the Third Sibylline Oracle, come from second-century BCE Egypt, perhaps from circles connected with the Temple of *Onias, and foretell the prosperity of the Jews under the seventh Ptolemaic king. In this oracle, the Sibyl often calls upon all the gentiles to repent their idolatry and turn to the one true God and presents herself as the daughter-in-law of Noah, sent to the Greeks to foretell the future. The Fourth Sibylline Oracle, whose geographical provenance is unknown, foretells, among other events, the eruption of Vesuvius (79 CE), which is interpreted as God's punishment of the Romans for the destruction of the Jerusalem Temple in 70 CE. The Fifth Sibylline Oracle, most of which was probably written in Egypt, also foretells the destruction of the Jerusalem Temple and may even refer to the closing of the Temple of Onias by the Romans in approximately 71 CE.

SICK, PRAYER FOR THE. See MI SHE-BERAKH LE-ḤOLIM.

SICK, VISITING THE (Heb. biqqur ḥolim). The duty of visiting the sick ranks among the major acts of charity. When the rabbis wished to emphasize the special value of a moral act, they would describe God performing it himself. Thus, God appeared to Abraham after Abraham had undergone circumcision (Gn. 18.1) in order to fulfill the duty of visiting the sick (Sof. 14a). According to the rabbis, "whosoever visits the sick reduces their ailment by one-sixtieth" (Ned. 39b), and "visiting the sick can hasten recovery, just as refraining from doing so can hasten the death of the patient" (Ned. 40a). Visiting is only part of the obligation; the patient is to be assisted and his needs provided for. The schools of Shamm'ai and Hillel differed on the obligation to visit the sick on the Sabbath; because the Sabbath should be a day of unimpaired joy (Shab. 12a), the school of Shamm'ai forbade it. Societies for visiting the sick have been a prominent feature of Jewish social services throughout the ages. The visitor recites a special prayer for the patient's recovery (see MI SHE-BERAKH LE-ḤOLIM). The rules for the fulfillment of this commandment are formulated in the Shulḥan 'Arukh, Yoreh De'ah* 335.

SIDDUR. See PRAYER BOOK.

SIDELOCKS. See PE'OT.

SIDRAH (סדרה; arrangement), the weekly portion of the Pentateuch read publicly in the synagogues on Sabbaths (the first section of which is read on Sabbath afternoons and Monday and Thursday mornings). The term is found in Talmudic times (Shab. 116b; Yoma' 87a). Sephardim use the term parashah, which was the old Palestinian term (and is used by Ashkenazim for a section of the sidrah). The fifty-four sidrot are so arranged (two are sometimes joined together) that the public reading of the Pentateuch commences on the first Sabbath after Simḥat Torah (Shabbat Be-Re'shit) and concludes annually on Simḥat Torah. This follows ancient custom and is in contrast to the Palestinian custom whereby the Pentateuch, variously divided into 154 (the Masoretic total of sedarim), 167 (Yemenite scrolls), or 175 (Sof. 16.10) sidrot, was read once in approximately three years (the *triennial cycle). Each sidrah is named after one of its initial words. See also QER'AT HA-TORAH. • Iamar Elbogen, Jewish Liturgy: A Comprehensive History, translated by Raymond P. SIFRA' (Aram.), a tannaitic midrash on Leviticus produced by the school of R. 'Aqiva', also known as Torat Kohanim or Sifra' de-Vei Rav. Current editions of Sifra' include later additions from the school of R. Yishma'e'l ben Elisha', which were not originally part of Sifra'. Sifra' presents a verse-by-verse halakhic explication of Leviticus, with only relatively small amounts of aggadic material.

Many of the baraiyot in Sifra', which is written in Mishnaic Hebrew, have close parallels in the Talmuds, particularly the Talmud Yerushalmi. The Talmud Bavli explicitly mentions Sifra' and Sifra' de-Vei Rav, although these works are apparently not identical with the existing Sifra'. The exact identity of the redactor of Sifra' (variously identified by previous scholars as Rav or R. Hiyya') remains unclear.

SIFREI (Aram.), tannaitic midrashim on Numbers and Deuteronomy. These midrashim are distinct works and stem from different schools: Sifrei Numbers from the school of R. Yishma'e'l ben Elisha', and the majority of Sifrei Deuteronomy (except for most of pericopes 1–54) from the school of R. 'Aqiva'. Both works, however, offer verse-by-verse exegesis, in Midrashic Hebrew, of the biblical books in question. Both midrashim are primarily halakhic in nature, although both also contain significant amounts of aggadic material. Both books were evidently redacted no later than the third century CE and have parallels in the Talmuds.

Both Sifrei Numbers and Sifrei Deuteronomy have Midrashic counterparts produced by the rival exegetical school: Sifrei Numbers is paralleled by Sifrei Zuta'*; Sifrei Deuteronomy, by Mekhilta' de-Rabbi Shim'on bar Yoh'ai* on Deuteronomy, a fragmentary midrash that very closely resembles Sifrei Deuteronomy.

SIFREI ZUTA' (Aram.), tannaitic midrash on Numbers, produced by the school of R. 'Aqiva'. Sifrei Zuta' has been preserved in fragmentary form and is attested in citations in medieval midrashim, medieval commentaries, and genizah fragments, although the original mid- rash presumably included additional material. A similar midrash was apparently composed on Deuteronomy.

Sifrei Zuta is distinguished from other tannaitic midrashim by its unique language, style, terminology, and halakhah, as well as by the tanna'im cited therein. The work is written in Rabbinic Hebrew and deals primarily with halakhic matters.

It is not clear where Sifrei Zuta was redacted or by whom, although it is frequently at odds with the Mishnah, never citing R. Yehudah ha-Nasi, and apparently stems from different circles. The teachings of R. Eli'ezer ben Ya'aqov figure prominently in Sifrei Zuta. It has been suggested by Saul Lieberman that the work was redacted in Lydda by *Bar Qappara'.

SIGD, pilgrimage festival and partial fast observed by the *Beta Israel on the twenty-ninth day of the eighth month, forty-nine days after Yom Kippur. The name derives from the Ethiopic root sagada and means to bow or prostrate oneself. According to the Beta Israel, Sigd commemorated the renewal of the covenant of God and Israel in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah. On the day of the festival, the Beta Israel fasted and ascended a hilltop, uncontaminated by waste matter or graves, carrying rocks on their heads as a sign of submission. The Ten Commandments and passages from the books of Ezra and Nehemiah were read. When they descended, a festive meal was consumed. Ethiopian Jews in Israel have continued to observe Sigd at several sites.

SILENT PRAYER seems to have been unknown in ancient times, when worshipers called on God with a loud voice or at least moved their lips (cf. 1 Sm. 1.13). Originally silent prayer was a category of synagogue worship, connected with the *Amidah but not identical to it. Silent prayer was composed by each worshiper (a practice that has been revived in certain Reform congregations). In rabbinic usage silent prayer came to mean the formulated prayer recited silently by the individual during the recitation of the 'Amidah, during the sheliaḥ tsibbur's repetitions of the 'Amidah, and in some other parts of congregational service. In many cases formulations of silent prayer by rabbis or readers became incorporated as part of private (e.g., Elohai Netsor at the end of the 'Amidah) and even congregational prayer (see RESHUT).

SILVA, ḤIZQIYYAHU DE (1659–1695), rabbinical authority in Jerusalem. Born in Leghorn, he was the brother-in-law of Mosheh Ḥagiz (see ḤAGIZ FAMILY). He went to Jerusalem before 1679 and studied with Mosheh Galante (see GALANTE FAMILY), who sent him in 1688 as an emissary to central and western Europe. In Amsterdam (where he turned down an offer to become rabbi), he influenced the wealthy Jacob Pereira to found the Midrash Beit Ya'aqov in Jerusalem, which he headed from 1692.

He is best known for his Peri Ḥadash (Amsterdam, 1692, 1706, 1730) on sections of the Shulḥan 'Arukh, which strongly criticizes Yosef *Karo and other codifiers, with the exception of Maimonides, whom Ḥizqiyahu greatly admired. His independent approach is shown in his ruling on drinks prepared by a non-Jew. He held that while it was forbidden to partake of strong liquor in the house of a non-Jew, coffee may be drunk. He also permitted drinking milk in the house of a non-Jew, even without Jewish supervision. His book was popular in Europe but was banned by the Egyptian rabbis. A somewhat toned-down version was published in editions of the Shulḥan 'Arukh.

SIMEON (Heb. Shim'on), the second son of Jacob and Leah and the eponymous ancestor of the tribe and territory of that name. Simeon, along with his brother Levi, plays a central role in avenging the rape of their sister Dinah (Gen. 34), by killing all the males of Shechem. Simeon is the one brother singled out by Joseph to be held hostage until the brothers return to him with Benjamin (Gen. 42.24). In Jacob's last testament, Simeon and Levi are chastised for their uncontrolled violence, for which they will be punished by being scattered among the tribes of Israel (Gen. 49.5–7). In Joshua 19.1–9 and 1 Chronicles 4.24–32, the territory of Simeon overlaps the southwestern limits of Judah. When this area was overrun by Shishak I (c.924 BCE), some of the tribe might have been taken into Egyptian captivity. Members of the tribe were counted in the census taken by King Hezekiah (1 Chr. 4.41). Some of their number moved eastward to Seir (1 Chr. 4.42). The heroine of the Book of Judith and her husband's family, living in Jibleam near the Dothan valley and Jenin, are given Simeonite ancestry.

SIMḤAH BEN SHEMU'EL OF VITRY (died 1105), French scholar; pupil of *Rashi. Simḥah ben Shemu'el compiled the Maḥazor Vitry, which, in its complete version, is an encyclopedic work including Midrashic excerpts, responsa, a commentary on Avot, a treatise on the calendar, and the complete annual cycle of prayers, together with a codification of laws related to the liturgy and the synagogue service. Maḥazor Vitry reflects the ancient French rite, which is closely related to the more widespread German (Ashkenazi) rite, and has been a valuable sourcebook for students of liturgy and piyyut. It was published by Shim'on Hurwitz in 1893.

SIMḤAH BUNEM OF PRZYSUCHA (1765–1827), Hasidic master. He was the successor of Ya'aqov Yitshaq, the "Holy Jew," who founded the Przysucha school of Hasidism in Poland. In his youth, he received a Talmudic education at the yeshivot of Mattersdorf and Nikolsburg. He later came under the influence of Hasidism in Poland through associations with Yisra'el of Kozienice, Mosheh Leib of Sasov, and David of Lelów. However, it was while at the court of Ya'aqov Yitshaq, the Seer of Lublin, that he met his master, the "Holy Jew." His early experience was unusually worldly for a Hasidic master. He shunned Hasidic dress, indulged in secular entertainments, and was a licensed pharmacist. This early disregard for Hasidic convention would later color his teachings as a rebbe. After the death of his master in 1814, most of the Przysucha Hasidim chose Simḥah Bunem as successor. He continued his teacher's highly revolutionary approach, downplaying mystical sources and emphasizing study of the Talmud and the works of Yehudah Liva' ben Betsal'el of Prague (Maharal). His fundamental concern was for an uncompromisingly sincere, inner spiritual development and the eradication of all vestiges of conceit. This manifested in his disciples' efforts to conceal their spiritual accomplishments and virtues, sometimes to the extreme of feigning boorishness. His principal disciples included Menahem Mendel of Kotsk, Yitshaq Me'ir of Gora Kalwaria (Ger), Mordekhay Yosef of Izbica, and Hanokh of Aleksandrów. His Qol Simḥah was published in Bene Beraq in 1987.

SIMḤAT BEIT HA-SHO'EVAH (שְׂמִיחַת בֵּית הַשְּׂוֹאָה), the ceremony of the water *libation that took place in the Temple amid great popular rejoicing on the last six days of the festival of *Sukkot (except on the eve of the Sabbath and the eve of *Shemini 'Atseret). Prayers were offered for rain during the forthcoming winter, and huge bonfires were lit in the outer court of the Temple and by every household (Suk. 51a) so that the whole of Jerusalem was ablaze with light. The men danced and sang to the accompaniment of Levitical musicians, and even the leading sages took part in the public rejoicing. The cryptic reference in Isaiah 12.3 ("you shall joyfully draw water from the fountains of salvation") has been taken as indicating the ancient origin of the celebration. The *Pharisees considered it a Mosaic tradition, but this view was opposed by the *Sadducees. The popularity of the feast is reflected in the statement that whoever had not seen it did not know the meaning of joy (Suk. 53a). When the Sadducean king Alexander Yannai contemptuously threw the water on his feet, he was pelted with etrogim by the outraged crowd at the Temple (Suk. 34a). The rite ceased with the Temple's destruction.

SIMḤAT TORAH (שְׂמִיחַת תּוֹרָה; rejoicing of the Torah), name given in the Diaspora to the second day of *Shemini 'Atseret (see YOM TOV SHENI SHEL GALUYOT); in Israel, it is an additional name of the latter festival. Simḥat Torah is an outstanding example of a comparatively late custom becoming entrenched so firmly in the affections of the people that it came to rank as a major celebration. The Talmud knows nothing of it; during the geonic period there are only the vaguest intimations of this day having any special character. The name, Simḥat Torah, is found first in post-geonic literature and in the Zohar. Its emergence followed the abolition of the Palestinian custom of completing the synagogal cycle of Pentateuch reading every three years (Meg. 29b) and the universal adoption of the Babylonian custom of finishing the reading of the Torah each year. In the fourteenth century, Ya'aqov ben Asher codified the custom of immediately recommencing the reading of the Torah after its completion on Simḥat Torah "in order that Satan shall have no opportunity of accusing the Jews of having finished with the Torah." In the sixteenth century, Mosheh Isserles mentioned the Ashkenazi customs of taking all the scrolls out of the ark and making seven circuits of the synagogue with them on the analogy of the seven circuits (see HAQQAFOT) with the four species on Hosh'ana' Rabbah; of calling up an indefinite number of worshipers to the reading of the Torah; of calling children up to the reading in a group; and of celebrating the occasion with feasting. Other customs include reading from the Torah, on Simḥat Torah night, at whatever point at which the scroll is opened, calling up adults to the Torah in groups, and having children join the circuits with special Simḥat Torah flags. Later came the custom of appointing a hatan Torah* and hatan Be-Re'shit for the honor of reading the concluding and the beginning portions of the Pentateuch respectively. In recent years among non-Orthodox congregations, women, in addition to being called up for Torah readings, have been included in this custom, as kallat Torah and kallah Be-Re'shit. All these customs have now become "statutory law," and the celebrations are accompanied by singing, dancing, and merrymaking in the synagogue. The focal point of this holiday is the synagogue, rather than the home. The haqqafot and accompanying celebration is observed both at the evening service and again the following morning. In Israel, it has become the custom to have a further haqqafot on the evening following Simḥat Torah, often held outdoors with musical accompaniment. In the former Soviet Union, beginning in the 1960s, Jews evolved the custom of gathering together at synagogues on Simḥat Torah as an open expression of their Jewish identity.

SIN, any departure from the right path enjoined on man by God; in more formally legal terms, any transgression of the divine commandments as stipulated in covenantal law. In Biblical Hebrew the most frequently used term for sin is het' (miss the mark). A general term for sin in Rabbinic Hebrew is 'averah (crossing over [the line of right conduct]). 'Averot, like mitsvot, are divided into two main classes: those committed by man against his fellow man, and those committed by man against God. Only for the latter is Yom Kippur* effective; the former are not atoned for (see ATONEMENT) "until his fellow be appeased" (Yoma' 85b). The three cardinal 'averot are the shedding of innocent blood, adultery, and idolatry—rather than transgress these, a man must sacrifice his life; all other 'averot may be transgressed if human life is at stake (San. 74a). In Jewish law, a man may not engage another person to commit a transgression on his behalf (San. 42b). Jewish moralists generally assume that 'averot are committed not because of inherent wickedness but on account of spiritual lethargy and lack of awareness. A popular saying is that one transgression generates another (Avot 4.2).

In addition to the eloquent imagery of the expressions "transgression" and "departing from the way," biblical, Talmudic, and liturgical literature employ a great number of terms to signify and categorize sin. The most important of these are het', 'avon, and pesha' (cf. the high priest's confession of sin in behalf of the people [Lv. 16.21])—usually interpreted as unwillful sin, knowledgeable sin, and rebellious sin. The rabbis distinguish between additional categories of sin; for example, lighter and more serious sins (according to the punishment decreed by biblical law). However, a man should "not consider the gravity or lightness of the sin, but the greatness of him who has given the commandment." Though rabbinic (as distinct from kabbalistic) theology has no formal doctrine of original sin, it is assumed that no man is completely free of sin (1 Kgs. 8.46). No sin is unpardonable, however, since "man's power to sin cannot be greater than God's power to forgive" (Yosef *Albo). Medieval ascetic manuals gave detailed penitential prescriptions for specific sins, and some of these go to extreme lengths in prescribing fasts and ascetic exercises to atone for sins. SINAI, MOUNT, mountain located in the Sinai Peninsula, variously called Sinai (e.g., Ex. 19.11), Horeb (e.g., Dt. 4.10), or simply "the mountain of the Lord" (e.g., Nm. 10.33) or "the mountain of God" (Ex. 18.5). In biblical tradition, Moses first encountered God there at the *burning bush (Ex. 3), having chanced upon the mountain upon which God was residing. He was told that after leaving Egypt, the Israelites would worship God at the same mountain. The Israelites encamped at Sinai shortly after the Exodus (Ex. 19.1), remaining there for just under a year (Nm. 10.11). Their stay at Sinai had two interconnected purposes: the *giving of the Torah and the building of the portable *Tabernacle, which accompanied them on the journey through the wilderness. Once they left Sinai, however, the site was virtually forgotten. It never became a cultic or commemorative location. God's presence was said to have come from Sinai (Dt. 33.2) to abide among the Israelites and not to continue to reside there. Only one other biblical story refers to Horeb: the account of Elijah's flight from King Ahab (1 Kgs. 19.8). Several locations have been proffered as the exact site of Mount Sinai. The most popular choice is Gebel Musa, near Saint Catherine's Monastery in the southern Sinai desert. However, this identification is very late, stemming from Byzantine monks in the fourth century, and there is no evidence to support it. The geographic location of Mount Sinai played no role in Jewish consciousness, and no attempt was made to establish a holy site there, although in Jewish thought, Sinai is one of two sacred mountains (the other being Mount Zion/Mount *Moriah). His principal disciples include his son-in-law, *David ben Shemu'el ha-Levi (Taz), Menaḥem Mendel Krochmal, and Gershon Ashkenazi.

Sirkes's writings include glosses on the Talmud, several hundred responsa, and Meshiv Nefesh (Koretz, 1787), a commentary on the Book of Ruth; his Bayit Hadash (Kraków 1631–1639) is a comprehensive commentary on Ya'akov ben Asher's Arba'ah Turim (found in standard editions of that work) analyzing Talmudic sources and post-Talmudic legal interpretations. On a number of occasions, Sirkes rejected the legal rulings of Yosef *Karo's commentary Beit Yosef and declared that "those who determine laws according to the Shulhan Arukh [Karo's legal code] are not teaching according to halakhah" (Bayit Hadash, no. 80). Sirkes rendered several controversial legal decisions, including permitting the consumption of hadash* (grain of the new harvest, grown by non-Jews in the Diaspora) and the selling of hamets prior to Pesah without removing it from the premises. He also sanctioned rabbis' acceptance of remuneration for their services. His responsa vividly reflect Jewish communal, social, political, and economic life in seventeenth-century Lithuania and Poland; several of his responsa portraying tensions in relationships between Jews and gentiles were censored, the remainder were published after his death as She'elot u-Teshuvot ha-Bayit ha-Hadash (Frankfurt, 1697) and She'elot u-Teshuvot ha-Bayit ha-Hadash ha-Hadashot (Koretz, 1785).

SITRA' AHRA' (סִטְרָא אַחְרָא; the other [i.e., left] side), kabbalistic term used in the Zohar and subsequent literature to designate the realms of the powers of evil. The author of the Zohar coined this term following the structure of the divine worlds described in Ma'amar 'al ha-'Atsilut ha-Sema'lit (Treatise on the Emanations of the Left) by R. Yitshaq ben Ya'akov of Castile in the second half of the thirteenth century. Rabbi Yitshaq was the first kabbalist to suggest that the powers of evil existed as a countersystem to the divine emanations; Samael and Lilith represented its male and female elements, respectively. In the Zohar this notion was developed into a full-blown demonic mythology in which the sitra' ahra' attempts, sometimes successfully, to captivate the Shekhinah* and separate her from her husband, the sitra' di-qedusha' (the side of holiness, i.e., the right side). Later sitra' ahra' was used to indicate any satanic or evil entity. In the Zohar it is the tree of death, because in its form of the primeval serpent in the garden of Eden, it succeeded in turning the tree of knowledge into a tree of death.

SIVAN (סִיּוּם), ninth month of the civil year, third month of the religious year; its zodiac sign is Gemini. The word sivan, of Akkadian/Babylonian origin, is mentioned in the Bible (Est. 8.9). Sivan always has thirty days. *Shavu'ot, which marks the anniversary of the giving of the Torah (and also the traditional date of the death of King David), falls on 6 and 7 Sivan (in Erets Yisra'el on 6 Sivan). In addition, 3, 4, and 5 Sivan are known as Sheloshet Yemei Hagbalah, (Three Days of Restriction; Ex. 19.10–15), when, according to the Bible, the Israelites undertook strict physical and spiritual preparations for the Revelation at Mount Sinai on 6 Sivan. With the new moon of Sivan, the days of semimourning of the Omer* period come to an end (Sephardim terminate the mourning period much earlier, on Lag ba-'Omer). According to Megillat Ta'anit*, God performed miracles for the Jews during the Hasmonean period on 15, 16, and 25 Sivan, and fasting was therefore forbidden on those days. In eastern Europe a fast was observed on 20 Sivan in commemoration of the Chmielnicki massacres of 1648 and 1649.

613 PRECEPTS. See COMMANDMENTS, 613.

SIYYUM (סִיּוּם; end), celebration held at the conclusion of the study of a tractate of the Talmud. The occasion is considered a Se'udat Mitsvah (see SE'UDAH) and is usually accompanied by a hadran, a halakhic discourse relating to the tractate just studied. Individuals or study groups about to finish a tractate usually leave the last few lines for completion at the siyyum. These are followed by the recital of a special *Qaddish and a prayer expressing the hope that the person completing this tractate will be granted the opportunity to continue to study other tractates and that his offspring will likewise remain committed to the study of Torah. This prayer also expresses the hope that the Talmudic authorities mentioned in the tractate will serve as positive referees before the divine court at the judgment after death. The hadran itself is a special genre of homily that seeks to relate the conclusion of one tractate to the following one to be learned. It is followed by a brief reading of the first few lines of the next tractate to be studied. It is customary to arrange for a siyyum to be held on 14 Nisan (Ta'anit Bekhorim*) so as to exempt the participating firstborn from the obligation of fasting. Another type of siyyum is held upon the completion of the writing of a scroll of the Torah. Each man present writes one of the final letters (generally a letter contained in his own name), and the ceremony is followed by a festive celebration.

SKEPTICISM. See AGNOSTICISM.

SLANDER. The verse "You shall not take up a false report" (Ex. 23.1) forbids one from either originating a calumny or encouraging its propagation. Injury to another person's reputation caused by the spreading of falsehood, slander, or careless gossip is often mentioned in the Bible ("you shall not curse the deaf" [Lv. 19.14] is interpreted by the rabbis to apply to all kinds of slander about those absent or dead) and severely denounced by the rabbis. The Talmud says, "Calumny kills three—the slanderer himself, the one who listens, and the person spoken of." In certain cases, rabbinic law provides for monetary fines or even excommunication until the slander is retracted. Strictly speaking, the term often used for slander, lashon ha-ra' (evil tongue), applies specifically to talebearing (i.e., where the information transmitted is true), whereas the term motsi' shem ra' (causing a bad name) applies to one who tells untruths about another. Both are totally forbidden by Jewish law, even if the tellers had no intention of harming the people about whom they spoke. Jewish law permits—even requires—one, under scrupulously defined limits, to relate disparaging material about another if failure to do so can cause damage to a third party, such as when a person is consulted about the character of an individual who is being considered as a potential marriage or business partner.

SLAUGHTER, RITUAL. See RITUAL SLAUGHTER.

SLAVERY. The institution of slavery, whereby a person forfeits individual liberty and becomes bonded to an owner, is accepted by the Bible and Talmud as a normal feature of the economic and social system. Both the Bible and Talmud endeavored, however, to ensure humane and considerate treatment of slaves. There was a considerable difference between the status of the Hebrew male slave and the non-Hebrew (Canaanite) male slave (cf. Gn. 9.25). The Hebrew could become a slave only through being sold by the beit din in payment of debt (Ex. 21) or by voluntarily selling himself on account of poverty (Lv. 25.39). He had to be released after six years of service or before that if he paid off the outstanding balance of his debt. Upon his release, he was given a generous gift (Dt. 15.13–15). However, if he so chose, his ear would be pierced with an awl (Ex. 21.5–7), and he would remain a slave until the jubilee year (see YOVEL), when all slaves were freed. A Jew could not be sold as a slave to a non-Jew. Special regulations applied to the Hebrew female slave (Ex. 21.7–11). So liberal was the interpretation of the injunction not to treat the slave harshly that the Talmud declares, "One who acquires a slave acquires a master" (Qid. 20a).

The position with regard to the Canaanite bondman was very different. He was regarded as the property of his master and could be bequeathed to his master's heirs together with the other possessions of the legator (Lv. 25.46). He could be freed in return for payment, if his master wrote a document freeing him, or as a consequence of any ill-treatment resulting in the loss of an eye or a tooth (Ex. 21.26–27). If the slave was circumcised, he was regarded as a member of the community and bound to perform certain religious duties. In addition, if he became a full Jew, every encouragement was given for his manumission. The Bible bases its compassionate legislation for slaves on the recollection of the Israelite slavery in Egypt (Dt. 15.15).

SLOBODKA, suburb of Kovno (Kaunas) in Lithuania and seat of a famous yeshivah. In 1892 the *Volozhin Yeshivah was closed by Russian authorities for failing to introduce secular studies; its pupils flocked to the Slobodka Yeshivah, the enrollment of which by 1897 numbered some two hundred students. Its curriculum was influenced by the *Musar movement. After World War I, the yeshivah was divided into three sections based upon student age, since younger students often felt inferior in the presence of older, more learned students. In 1925 some of the yeshivah's students emigrated to Palestine and established a branch of the yeshivah in Hebron. After the 1929 Arab riots, the yeshivah moved to Jerusalem, where it was called the Hebron Yeshivah. It continues to carry on the traditions of Slobodka. Most of the students in the original Slobodka Yeshivah perished at the hands of the Nazis in 1941. A Slobodka Yeshivah has also been established in Bene Beraq, Israel.

SLONIK, BINYAMIN AHARON (c.1550–1619), eastern European Talmudist and rabbi. A disciple of Nathan Nata' Spiro, Shelomoh *Luria, and Mosheh *Isserles and an associate of Yehoshu'a ben Aleksander ha-Kohen *Falk, Mordekhai ben Avraham *Jaffe, and *Me'ir ben Gedalyah of Lublin, Slonik was a fine stylist and lucid writer. He wrote a volume of 112 responsa, Masat Binyamin (Kraków, 1633), and composed a guide for women, Seder Mitsvot Nashim, Eyn Schön Frauenbuechlein (Kraków, 1577), detailing the three halakhic areas of greatest concern for women: the laws of menstruation, the separation of hallah, and the kindling of the Sabbath lights. The latter volume, in Yiddish, proved to be exceedingly popular; it was reprinted three times during Slonik's lifetime and was translated into Italian (Padua, 1625).

Slonik's responsa reflect the turbulence of his era. A number of cases deal with the killing of Jewish merchants en route to trade and the problems of agunot* (women whose husbands were missing but whose deaths have not been verified). Slonik sought to free agunot* so that they might remarry.

Little is known of Slonik's rabbinic tenure. In his younger years he resided in Kraków and later served as rabbi in Silesia and Podhajce; in his later years he described himself as ailing, nearly blind, and destitute.

SOCIAL JUSTICE. The concept of social justice is a major component of biblical ethics, in both Mosaic legislation and prophetic pronouncements, and has characterized Jewish thinking through the ages. The biblical ideal of social justice has also deeply influenced the ideas and behavior of Western civilization. From its earliest sources in the Pentateuch, the law takes into account the needs of the less fortunate in society. The injunction to care for the "stranger, the orphan, and the widow" appears seventeen times in the Bible, eleven of these in the Torah. Provision is made in biblical law for the poor to have access to gleanings, to grain forgotten in the field, and to a corner of each field (see AGRARIAN LAWS). Furthermore, no land could be sold in perpetuity, and all land bought had to be returned to its original family (as determined in the original land division by tribe and clan after the Israelite occupation of Canaan) in the yovel (jubilee) year. In an agricultural society, where land was the key to self-sufficiency, this provision served to prevent the development of a permanent indentured class. No Jew could be sold into slavery forever, and one who had sold himself into slavery had to be freed automatically in the jubilee year. Furthermore, in order to prevent people from sinking permanently into the morass of debt, the Torah legislates that each shemittah* year all debts be canceled. The Torah cautions lenders that failure to lend money for fear that it might not be repaid "will be a sin to you" (Dt. 15.9). The prophets preached social justice as a natural and logical complement to ritual observance (see, for example, Is. 1.13–14). The failure to pay wages on time (Lv. 19.13) is a biblical offense (see LABOR). An employer does not have the right to force workers to put in a workday that is longer than customary for that locale (B. M. 7.1). Furthermore, workers have the right at any time to resign from their jobs—no person save a slave can be forced to work unwillingly—and the most they can be liable for is any damages their employer might sustain. The sages went beyond the letter of the law in order to secure justice for the weak, and rabbinic literature is replete with instances of such legislation and practice. See also JUSTICE.

SOFER (סוֹפֵר; scribe), a term used in the Bible to signify a high administrative official; in the early Second Temple period, it came to mean a literate man engaged in the interpretation of the Torah and the transmission of the *oral law. Soferim are generally considered the precursors to the *Pharisees and the initiators of the Jewish, as distinct from the Israelite, period of history. From their ranks came the Men of the Keneset ha-Gedolah, who were active in the two centuries after *Ezra (known as Ezra the Scribe). Information as to their activities is meager, but there are many Talmudic references to divrei soferim (words of the scribes, i.e., ancient post-biblical regulations), diqudei soferim (legal minutiae), and tagganot soferim (enactments not derived from the Torah). Many of their ordinances were said to have formed a fence around the Law (see SEYAG LA-TORAH). The Talmud ascribes to them regulations relating to prayer, tefillin, tsitsit, ritual slaughter, the blowing of the shofar, the institution of Hanukkah and Purim, and the introduction of eighteen emendations into the biblical text (see TIQQUN SOFERIM). Subsequently the term underwent another change of meaning to denote one who taught the Bible to children (in later Talmudic usage, the term local scribe is used for elementary teacher). The sages and rabbis of the tannaitic period were never called scribes. In the New Testament, the words scribes and Pharisees are used pejoratively to connote hypocrisy. Eventually the meaning of the term was limited to a penman (known as a sofer setam*) occupied in the writing of Torah scrolls, mezuzot, and tefillin, as well as documents that are valid only if written by hand, such as bills of divorce. Minor tractate Soferim*, appended to the Talmud Bavli, contains the meticulous laws that such scribes have to observe.

SOFER FAMILY, leading Orthodox family.

Mosheh Sofer (1762–1839), or the Hatam Sofer, as he is known in Orthodox circles, was the preeminent rabbinical figure in Hungary in the first half of the nineteenth century. His ideology, embodied in the slogan hadash asur min ha-Torah (all that is new is biblically forbidden), inspired the antimodernist, separatist Orthodoxy that developed there. Born in Frankfurt, at age nineteen he followed his teacher R. Natan Adler to Moravia. Twelve years later he began his formal rabbinic career in the town of Dresnitz (Moravia). In 1806 he was appointed to the prestigious post of rabbi of Pressburg (Bratislava). Sofer was an innovative scholar and educator. His reputation as a skillful halakhist provided the backing for the campaign against Emancipation, Has-kalah, and the Reform movement. Through his legal rulings, he sought to enhance the sanctity of all aspects of traditional life by proving its halakhic authenticity. Moreover, the yeshivah that he founded was considered the largest in the world at the time and served as a training ground for communal rabbis who popularized the ideas of their teacher. Sofer's legacy as a halakhist and ideologue is found in his posthumously published responsa (7 vols. [1855–1912]) and sermons (2 vols. [1829]). Among the issues discussed in these volumes is his strong attachment to Erets Yisra'el. In 1812 Sofer married the daughter of R. 'Aqiva' *Eger, the famed Talmudist and rabbi of Posen. Two of their sons made particular marks.

Avraham Shemu'el Binyamin Wolf Sofer (1815–1871), the oldest son of Mosheh, inherited the Pressburg rabbinic post as well as the directorship of the yeshivah. Although only twenty-four years old at the time of his father's death, he established himself as a scholar and leader of the Orthodox community. His approach to issues such as secular education was more pragmatic and less doctrinaire than his father's. Yet, he ultimately confirmed his identification with his father's ideology through his guidance of the Orthodox community in the fierce internal battles that erupted during the Hungarian Jewish Congress of 1869 and 1870. His erudition and his keen awareness of the changes that Jewish society was undergoing are reflected in the responsa collection Ketav Sofer (1873–1938).

Shim'on Sofer (1820–1883), Mosheh Sofer's second son, was rabbi of Kraków, where he fought with the modernists who had made inroads into this Hasidic stronghold. He gained membership in the parliament in Vienna in 1878, a position he sought in order to advance the cause of tradition. The descendants of Mosheh Sofer continued to lead the Pressburg community and yeshivah until World War II. After the war, the yeshivah was reestablished in Jerusalem under the guidance of Mosheh's great-grandson, 'Aqiva' Sofer (1878–1959).

SOFERIM, minor tractate, printed in standard editions of the Talmud Bavli at the end of tractate 'Avodah Zarah, dealing with the laws pertaining to the writing and public reading of scriptural texts. Soferim was probably compiled during the geonic period, even though some of its material appears to date from an earlier time. For the most part, Soferim reflects Palestinian practices and is based largely on the Talmud Yerushalmi; however, since there are several passages that would seem to indicate Babylonian provenance, not all scholars accept the prevailing opinion that Soferim was composed in Erets Yisra'el. Soferim served as an important source for many liturgical customs and practices. It was edited by Michael Higger (Jerusalem, 1970).

SOFER SETAM (סופר סטם; scribe of stam [an acronym for sefarim (Torah scrolls), tefillin, mezuzot]), one specially trained in the scribal arts. Jewish law requires that Torah (see SEFER TORAH), tefillin*, and mezuzot* parchments be written by hand, and there are numerous regulations concerning the shape of each letter and the writing of each word (enumerated in the minor Talmudic tractate Soferim*). Scribes are supposed to be particularly God-fearing; a Torah scroll, the holiest of objects, written by a heretic, must be burned and cannot be used even if it is letter-perfect. So important is the position of the sofer setam (often simply referred to as sofer*) that the Talmud (San. 17b) advises scholars not to live in a town that does not have a resident sofer. Yehoshu'a ben Levi reported that the Men of the Keneset ha-Gedolah fasted for twenty-four days, praying God not to allow soferim to become wealthy, for if they did, they might cease to practice their craft, indispensable to Jewish life.

SOLOMON (Heb. Shelomoh; 10th cent. BCE), son of *David and Bath-sheba, third king of Israel. His forty-year reign was characterized by peace, prosperity, and international political and economic ties. He had relations with Sheba in southern Arabia (1 Kgs. 10) and with Tyre in Phoenicia (1 Kgs. 9.26–28). With Phoenician aid he built a naval fleet that reached distant Ophir (1 Kgs. 10.11–12), and, most significantly, over a seven-year period, he constructed the *Temple with cedars of Lebanon and the help of Phoenician craftsmen (1 Kgs. 6–7). Solomon also dedicated thirteen years to building his palace (1 Kgs. 7.1–12), fortified the three key cities of Hazor, Megiddo, and Gezer, and strengthened and modernized his army with the introduction of cavalry and chariots, for which he constructed extensive stables. Since he was so renowned for his wisdom (1 Kgs. 5.9–14; he was said to have written 3,000 proverbs and 1,000 songs), Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Songs were attributed to his authorship. Resentment of Solomon's heavy taxation and multiple political marriages (700 wives and 300 concubines; 1 Kgs. 11.3) led to the division of his kingdom after his death.

SOLOVEICHIK FAMILY, Lithuanian rabbinical family whose members have been among the leading Talmud scholars and heads of yeshivot since the mid-nineteenth century.

Yosef Baer Soloveichik of Volozhin (1820–1892), a direct descendant of R. Hayyim *Volozhiner, served as joint head of the Volozhin Yeshivah (1854–1865) together with R. Naftali Tsevi Yehudah *Berlin. Because of tensions between the two heads, R. Yosef Baer left the yeshivah to become rabbi of Slutsk (1865–1875). He left Slutsk in 1875, primarily as a result of communal conflicts, and in 1878 became the rabbi of Brest Litovsk (Brisk), where he died. An exceptionally sharp-witted individual, known more for his acumen than his erudition, R. Yosef Baer's published writings, entitled Beit ha-Levi (1863–1891), include Talmudic novellae, sermons, and a homiletical commentary on Genesis and Exodus. The latter work is noted for its skillful combination of topicality and homiletic creativity.

Hayyim Soloveichik (1853–1918), son of Yosef Baer, became a member of the faculty of the Volozhin Yeshivah in 1880, retaining his position until the forced closure of the yeshivah by the czarist government in 1892. After his father's death in the same year, he succeeded him as communal rabbi of Brisk. R. Hayyim was recognized as the leading Talmudist of his day, and he brought a new method of rigorous, highly abstract, conceptual analysis to the study of Talmud. An exceptionally influential teacher, many of R. Hayyim's students went on to become the leading yeshivah heads of the next generation, carrying his method with them. The popularity of this "Brisker method," according to some, was due to its encouragement of intellectual creativity on the part of students, to its modern flavor, and to the sense that the method could serve as a protection against the intellectual lure of secular enlightenment. As a communal rabbi, R. Hayyim was known for his care and concern for the poor and needy. He was a staunch opponent of all attempts to modernize Jewish life, whether that meant Zionism or introducing secular studies into the yeshivot. A perfectionist, he published nothing in his lifetime. His novellae on Maimonides, published by his sons in 1936, is viewed as one of the classics of twentieth-century rabbinic literature and the finest exemplar of R. Hayyim's own method.

Mosheh Soloveichik (1876–1941), the eldest son of R. Hayyim, studied under his father and served first as rabbi of Rasseyn, a Lithuanian town near Kovno, and later as rabbi of Khislavichi in White Russia. After World War I, he headed the Department of Talmud of the recently founded Tahkemoni Rabbinical Seminary in Warsaw. As a result of conflicts with the noted historian and head of Tahkemoni's secular department, Me'ir Balaban, R. Mosheh left Tahkemoni in 1929 to become the head of the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary of New York's Yeshiva College. His lectures greatly raised the standard of Talmudic education in the American Orthodox community and helped spread his father's methodology within it. Some volumes of his Talmudic novellae have recently been published.

Yitshaq Ze'ev Soloveichik (1888–1962), the youngest son of R. Hayyim, also studied under his father, whom he succeeded as rabbi of Brisk. Rabbi Velvel, as he was popularly known, was viewed as his father's spiritual heir, and continued his father's tradition of Talmudic study as well as his tradition of opposition to secular studies and Zionism. He established a private beit midrash in Brisk, to which admission was eagerly sought by the finest yeshivah graduates in Europe. With the outbreak of war in 1939 he managed to escape from Europe and resettled in Jerusalem in 1941, where he established a private kolel, but refused to accept any public position. While he did not issue legal rulings, he did speak out in cases where he saw a danger to the foundations of faith. After the death, in 1953, of Avraham Yesha'yahu *Karelitz, the Hazon Ish, he was generally viewed as the leading rabbinic figure of the Haredi community in Israel. His published writings and lecture notes further develop his father's Talmudic methodology and are studied widely. Several of R. Yitshaq Ze'ev's sons became noted heads of yeshivot.

Yosef Dov Soloveichik (1903–1993), the eldest son of R. Mosheh, was born in Pruzana, Belorussia. A child prodigy, Yosef Dov mastered his grandfather's "Brisker method" under the guidance of his father. At the same time, under the influence of his mother, he acquired a strong interest in secular education. He studied political science at the Free Polish University in 1924, and in 1926 went to the University of Berlin to study philosophy, receiving his doctorate in 1932 for a thesis on the epistemology and ontology of Hermann *Cohen. That same year he went to the United States, where he became rabbi in Boston, which remained his home. In the 1930s, R. Yosef Dov headed a private Talmudic institute for advanced students, but this was disbanded when, in 1941, he succeeded his father as the head of the Talmud faculty of the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary; he also went on to teach Jewish philosophy at Yeshiva University's graduate school of Jewish studies. In the 1950s, R. Yosef Dov emerged as the leading rabbinic figure of American modern Orthodoxy, and became the honorary president of the Religious Council of Zionists of America and chairman of the halakhah commission of the Rabbinical Council of America. An outstanding teacher and a fine orator in both English and Yiddish, he lectured widely to the most varied audiences. Perhaps more than any other single individual, he molded the spiritual profile of the American Orthodox community in the last half of the twentieth century.

His unique authority stems from the fact that he was the only major halakhic scholar of modern times who also was a creative theologian and philosopher, having mastered the entire Western tradition of scientific and philosophic thought. His goal was an interaction of philosophy and halakhah. He sought to show how the ish ha-halakhah, "the man of halakhah" (a term he coined), combines the cognitive drive and this-worldly orientation of scientific man with the religious pathos and yearning for the divine presence of homo religiosus, how through the study and practice of halakhah the contradictions between rational consciousness and the revealed religion can be overcome, and how a combined halakhic-phenomenological analysis reveals that exteriority of deed and interiority of experience are built into the very fabric of such central commandments as prayer, repentance, mourning, and rejoicing on holidays. He used his great powers of poetic description, and of philosophic and halakhic analysis, to depict the life of halakhah, particularly as expressed in the central commandments of Torah study and repentance, as one of freedom, autonomy, intellectual creativity, and self-creation. At the same time, he highlighted the importance that the halakhah accords to submission to the inscrutable divine will, a submission which, he argued, is both cathartic and redemptive.

Soloveichik departed from the position of most yeshivah heads and from the tradition of his own family by affirming the value of secular studies and Western civilization and by urging that Orthodox Jews both participate in and contribute to that civilization. In a similar break, he became an adherent of and an eloquent spokesman for Religious Zionism, adopting a positive attitude to the State of Israel, despite the generally secular character of Israeli society. For Soloveichik, the establishment and flourishing of the state is God's great act of loving-kindness in our time, a reaffirmation of the divine covenant of fate, a particularist Jewish expression of the majesty and dignity of Western civilization. He also stated that faith in the ultimate redemption is dependent upon prior faith in the spiritual capabilities of the Jewish people.

His works include Ish ha-Halakhah: Galui ve-Nistar (1979); Shi'urim le-Zekher Abba' Mari (1982–1985); Halakhic Man (1983); The Halakhic Mind: An Essay on Jewish Tradition and Modern Thought (1986); The Lonely Man of Faith (1992); and *On Repentance: In the Thought and Oral Discourses of Rabbi Joseph D. SONG OF SONGS, BOOK OF (Heb. Shir ha-Shirim), also known as Canticles and as the Song of Solomon; fourth book in the Hagiographa section of the Bible, and first of the Five Scrolls. Its eight chapters consist of a series of lyric love songs and poetic dialogues and monologues. The two lovers give rapturous expression of their yearnings; their lavish praise of each other's physical beauty is expressed in language that is at times delicate and at other times frankly erotic. The beautifully simple descriptions of scenery are permeated with a love of nature and the land. From a literary standpoint the Song of Songs includes some of the most notable poetry in the Bible.

The work has much in common with other ancient Near Eastern love poetry, especially compositions from Egypt. As a result of its manifest secular character, its canonization was opposed by some. Its acceptance into the canon was effected only in the second century CE (see Yad. 3.5) on the basis of the allegorical interpretation of R. 'Aqiva, who declared that "All the writings are holy, but the Song of Songs is the Holy of Holies" and who identified the protagonists not as human lovers but as God, the groom, and Israel, the bride. The love expressed between the two was thus viewed as symbolic of the covenant of God and Israel. The Targum and the Midrash Rabbah go further and create an expansive text that understands the Song of Songs as a complete record of Israel's history in biblical times (Exodus, Sinai, entrance into Canaan, etc.). The tradition of allegorical interpretation was inherited by Christian exegetes, for whom Jesus became the bridegroom, and the church, the bride. Gershom Scholem, supported by Saul Lieberman, has argued that the symbolic interpretation of the Song of Songs in terms of ancient Merkavah mysticism (see MA'ASEH MERKAVAH) goes back to the tannaitic period. In late medieval exegesis, both Jewish and Christian, the allegorical understanding gave way to an individual-mystical one; the bride and groom symbolized the human soul and its divine beloved respectively. Traditionally, Jews have understood the work to be of Solomonic authorship, but the superscription in Song of Songs 1.1 is subject to various interpretations (e.g., by Solomon, concerning Solomon, etc.). The Talmud (B. B. 15a) assigned it to King Hezekiah and his contemporaries. Most modern scholars assign it a postexilic date on linguistic grounds, based on the presence of one Persian loanword, pardes (garden), and many Aramaic ones, for example, kotel (wall), but scholars have not reached a consensus on whether it is a unified composition or a collection of individual love poems. The book, redolent of spring, is read on Pesah in the synagogue and at the end of the Pesah Seder among Sephardim. In addition, in some communities (mainly Sephardi) the Song of Songs is recited every Friday evening, based on the view that casts the Sabbath as the beloved bride.

SONG OF SONGS RABBAH, aggadic midrash on the Song of Songs. This midrash, called Shir ha-Shirim Hazita' or Aggadat Hazita' by medieval authorities because of the opening scriptural quote (Prv. 22.29) of the first proem, or simply Midrash Shir ha-Shirim or Midrash Hazita', was composed in Erets Yisra'el probably in the sixth century CE. It draws on classical amoraic midrashim and on the Talmud Yerushalmi. The midrash, written in Galilean Aramaic and Rabbinic Hebrew, is rich in Greek loanwords. In the manuscripts, the midrash is divided into two uneven sections (sedarim), whereas it is divided into eight chapters in later printed editions.

Song of Songs Rabbah begins with five proems that include a Midrashic biography of Solomon and varied hermeneutic approaches to the Song of Songs, which are grouped at the end of the midrash on Song of Songs 1.1 and the beginning of 1.2. Scholars disagree about whether the king in the Song of Songs is emblematic of God or of Israel, about whether the Song of Songs was sung by God or by the angels, and about whether it originally was sung at the Red Sea, at Sinai, in the Tabernacle, or in the Temple. Song of Songs Rabbah was first published in Pesaro in 1519. An English translation by Maurice Simon appears in the Soncino Midrash (1939).

SONG OF SONGS ZUTA', small aggadic midrash on the Song of Songs*. First published by Solomon Schechter (Jewish Quarterly Review [1894]) and Solomon Buber (Lwów, 1895) independently, on the basis of the same Parma manuscript, the date of origin of this unusual midrash has not been satisfactorily established. Schechter believed it dated from the ninth century, Zvi Meir Rabinovitz suggested that the terminology, the sages mentioned, the theomorphic ha-Maqom, and some of the historical allusions indicated a tannaitic origin. Song of Songs Zuta' contains numerous allusions to the kanvod* (celestial visions) and messianic apocalypse, giving the work a more mystical bent than that of Song of Songs Rabbah*.

SONG OF THE THREE CHILDREN. See DANIEL, ADDITIONS TO BOOK OF.

SONGS OF THE SABBATH SACRIFICE, a series of hymns, manuscripts of which were discovered in Qumran and Masada. The collection is made up of songs for the first thirteen Sabbaths of the year (e.g., Song of the Sacrifice of the First Sabbath on the Fourth of the First Month). The cycle presumes a solar calendar of three hundred sixty-four days.

This earthly liturgy invites the angels to praise God and describes their worship in the heavenly Temple. Climaxes are the sevenfold calls to praise (Song 7), the description of the divine chariot throne (merkavah) with its attendant angels (Song 12), and the depiction of the angelic priests offering sacrifices (Song 13). It has been suggested that the songs were a liturgical accompaniment to the heavenly cult or a catalyst for the experience of being present in the heavenly Temple.

Nine manuscripts from Qumran indicate this liturgy's importance in the Qumran community; however, the Masada manuscript suggests a nonsectarian origin or use.

SONNENFELD, YOSEF (1849-1932), rabbinic authority. Born in Slovakia, he studied in various Hungarian yeshivot before settling in Jerusalem in 1873. There he helped to found schools, an orphanage, and a religious quarter (Batei Ungarn). Sonnenfeld vehemently opposed secular education, Zionism, and the establishment of a chief rabbinate in 1920. In protest, he founded a separatist community in Jerusalem ('Edah Haredit), serving as its rabbi until his death.

SON OF GOD, term occasionally found in Jewish literature, biblical and post-biblical, but nowhere implying physical descent from the Godhead. In general terms, the Jewish people are referred to as "the children of the Lord your God" (Dt. 14.1; cf. Ex. 4.22 and Hos. 11.1), in relation to the concept of the fatherhood of God. Genesis 6.2 mentions the "sons of God" who intermarried with the daughters of man; the phrase is generally taken to refer to angels (also in Ps. 82.6) and is used in this sense in the Berikh Shemei prayer (in its Aramaic form) from the Zohar*, which is recited in some rites at the opening of the ark of the covenant in the synagogue. The application of the term to Jesus by the early Christian church was probably a combination of the metaphorical use of the term in Jewish apocryphal literature (e.g., Wisdom of Solomon. 2.18) with the literal conception of the term in pagan tradition. When used by the rabbis, the reference was to Israel or to human beings in general.

SON OF MAN. With one exception, the phrase is used in the Hebrew Bible to convey the idea of an ordinary man, a mortal: "God is not a man that he should lie, neither the son of man that he should repent" (Nm. 23.19). The phrase is found most extensively (some 93 times) in Ezekiel, referring to the prophet himself. Ezekiel insisted that he possessed no special gift but rather was chosen by God as one of the people and to be a watchman (Ez. chap. 33). The term, which also occurs in an apocalyptic context in the Book of Daniel, "Behold, one like the son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of Days" (Dn. 7.13), has been interpreted to mean an exalted human being (a collective symbol for the Jewish people) or a heavenly angelic being, perhaps the archangel Michael. It eventually passed into eschatological terminology as a messianic title. As such, it played a great role in Christian phraseology, occurring frequently in the Gospels. The rabbinic view is evident in R. Abbahu's comment in an anti-Christian polemic on Numbers 23:19: "If a man says 'I am the Lord,' he lies; if he says 'I am the son of man' he will repent" (Y., Ta'an. 2.65).

SOTAH (סוֹתָה; Woman Suspected of Adultery), tractate in Mishnah order Nashim, containing nine chapters, with related material in the Tosefta and in both Talmuds. It expands and interprets the laws governing the sotah (Nm. 5.11–31). The rabbis held that a husband's jealousy, which initiates the sotah's trial by ordeal (Nm. 5.14), is not a baseless fit of passion but a legalistic procedure that serves, together with circumstantial testimony of immodest behavior, as grounds for suspicion of adultery. According to Sotah, a woman may forego the "ordeal of jealousy by agreeing to a divorce and the forfeiture of her ketubbah* payment. Further, the majority opinion in the Mishnah (pace R. Shim'on; Sot. 3.5) tempers the supernatural component of the ordeal of jealousy by the moral observation that good deeds done by the sotah may suspend the carrying out of divine justice. This observation leads to a dispute between two leading sages about whether study of Torah by women is meritorious or ought rather to be discouraged.

The fate of the sotah, both her humiliation by the hand of man and her divine punishment, is seen as a prominent example of justice "measure for measure," which is further illustrated in the Mishnah by examples that highlight the centrality of sexual impropriety (Samson) and of family commitment (Miriam and Moses). Another central theme of Sotah is the use in the sotah procedure of the divine name, both in the oath taken by the sotah and in the erasure of the sotah scroll into the bitter waters. Rabbi Yishma'e'l believed this exemplified the value of domestic peace, for the sake of which God allows his holy name to be erased (Shab. 116a and parallels).

Chapter 7 opens with a ruling permitting the sotah oath to be recited in any language, occasioning a lengthy digression regarding which liturgical recitations may be made in other languages and which must be performed in the holy tongue. Into the latter category falls the recitation associated with breaking the neck of the heifer, performed in cases of homicide where the murderer is unknown, a procedure with striking legal and conceptual similarities to the sotah ordeal. Sotah concludes with the abolition, prior to the destruction of the Second Temple, of the breaking of the neck of the cow and of the sotah procedures, occasioning a further digression that outlines the moral decline that accompanied the destruction and continued for several generations afterwards, as well as the moral turpitude that will signal the coming of the Messiah.

An English translation of the Talmud Bavli tractate is in the Soncino Talmud (1936).

SOUL. The belief that "something" in human beings survives physical death was current in biblical times, although the notion of a soul as an independent spiritual entity had not yet emerged. Life was not so much the presence of a soul as the animation of a body, and the original meanings of the biblical terms for soul are "breath" or "wind" (cf. Gn. 2.7). The seat of life was believed to be blood*. After death, the individual was thought to lead a "lifeless," shadowy existence in a Hades-like underworld (sheol); when Saul seeks to call upon the spirit of the deceased Samuel, the spirit emerges from below rather than from above (1 Sm. 28). During the latter half of the Second Temple period, the notion of a distinct soul-substance, joined to the body at birth and leaving it again at death, began to gain some ground. In accord with the Platonic tradition, the soul was held by the rabbis to be preexistent (see PREEXISTENCE) and of heavenly origin. According to the medieval thinkers it was "hewn from the throne of glory"; by being sent down into a body it is contaminated, or at least exposed to the danger of contamination through sin. Rabbinic thought generally steered clear of the radical Hellenistic dualism*, exemplified by Philo*, which equated spirit, soul, and good on the one hand, and matter, the body, and evil on the other. The traditional view on the subject is summarized in the daily morning prayer: "O my God, the soul that you gave me is pure; you did create it, you did form it, you did breathe it into me . . . and you will take it from me, but will restore it to me in the future" (see AFTERLIFE; RESURRECTION). The Platonic and Neoplatonic assumption of a spiritual and preexistent soul-substance also underlies the doctrine of the transmigration of souls*, elaborated by the medieval kabbalists. The Aristotelian thinkers, such as Maimonides, who defined the soul as the "form" of a living organism, had greater difficulty than the Platonists in giving a philosophical account and justification of the doctrine of immortality, which, they held, extended only to that part of the mind that humans acquired by intellectual effort and insight (the "acquired intellect*"). The development by philosophers of an increasingly complex doctrine of the soul also led to an increasingly differentiated terminology. In addition to the biblical words ruah, nefesh, and neshamah, the terms hayyah and yehidah were added. The usual view was that after death the soul was punished for sins committed during its life on earth (see GEIHINNO), for a maximum of twelve months, before being admitted to celestial bliss (see PARADISE). In the late Middle Ages, various rites were developed, intended to improve the lot of departed souls in the hereafter; some of these have become permanent features of the synagogue service (see ASHKAVAH; QADISH; YIZKOR).

SPEKTOR, YITSHAQ ELHANAN (1817–1896), Lithuanian rabbi and halakhic authority. After serving as rabbi in several smaller communities, Spektor was named rabbi of Kovno, a post he held for over three decades. From this communal base, he built an international reputation as a halakhic expert and as an intercessor on behalf of Russian Jewry in times of distress. Together with R. Yisra'el *Salanter, Spektor established an advanced Talmudic study institute in Kovno for married students. He maintained good relations with the Jewish plutocracy of Saint Petersburg and Moscow and participated in conferences held to discuss the plight of Russian Jewry. An underground information service organized by Spektor smuggled out of Russia details about the pogroms of 1881 and 1882, revelations that led to protest meetings in the West against Russia's Jewish policies. Spektor fought attempts to alter the nature of traditional Jewish education, defended Jewish tradition against its attackers, and helped provide for the needs of Jewish soldiers and communities threatened by plagues. He was often called upon to arbitrate communal disputes, both in Russia and abroad. He devoted much of his halakhic writing to freeing 'agunot (see 'AGUNAH) to remarry, a weighty responsibility few rabbis took upon themselves. Spektor gave his assent to the arrangement of selling Jewish-owned land in Erets Yisra'el to gentiles for the duration of the sabbatical year, a halakhic solution that was deemed crucial for the survival of the then struggling Jewish agricultural settlements (1889). Included among his written works are collections of responsa entitled Be'er Yitshaq (1858) and 'Ein Yitshaq (1889–1895).

SPICES (Heb. besamim). The use of spices both as condiments and for perfume was widespread in ancient times. The maiden in Song of Songs was perfumed with "myrrh and frankincense and with all the powders of the merchant" (3.6), and the maidens brought before Ahasuerus were prepared "six months with oil of myrrh and six months with sweet odors" (Est. 2.12). According to the Midrash, only women perfumed themselves (Gn. Rab. 17.13), and it was regarded as unseemly for a scholar to do so (Ber. 43b). It was customary to burn spices after a meal (Ber. 42b), and a blessing was to be said before smelling them. This is probably the origin of the one instance of this ritual used today—in the *Havdalah service marking the conclusion of the Sabbath, which includes the smelling of spices and an accompanying blessing. Just as specific blessings are recited upon eating or drinking, blessings are also recited upon smelling fragrances. The blessing over spices derived from trees is "Blessed are you, O Lord . . . who creates spice trees"; and over herbal spices, "Blessed are you . . . who creates herbal spices." For the use of spices in the Temple, see INCENSE.

SPINOZA, BARUCH (1632–1677), Dutch philosopher of a Portuguese *Marrano family that had escaped to Amsterdam; also known as Benedictus Spinoza. Spinoza had a traditional Jewish education and a good knowledge of the medieval Jewish philosophers, possibly also of kabbalistic teachings, but his own philosophic development, greatly influenced by Descartes, led him away from traditional Orthodoxy. His profound and elaborate monistic metaphysics, his radical demand for unfettered freedom of inquiry, and his moral stature have made him one of the great figures in modern European philosophy. His place, however, is in the history of Western thought rather than Jewish philosophy. His unorthodox views, which came close to "atheism" as understood by the Calvinist authorities in Amsterdam, led to his excommunication by the Sephardi community in 1656. For many eighteenth- and early nineteenth-century thinkers, Spinozism, or the mere suspicion of it, was held to be tantamount to atheism. Enlightenment philosophers and many Romantics sympathized, however, with Spinozism as the way to true religion. Spinoza's views on the Bible were contained in his Tractatus theologico-politicus. He denied traditional ascriptions of authorship and laid the groundwork for subsequent textual criticism by asserting that generations of scribes had introduced errors into the text. The text, while containing universal teachings, is of human, not divine, origin. Biblical laws retain their validity only when Jews have a polity. Bible stories are not to be taken literally but are intended to convey abstract value.

STATUS QUO ANTE, name given to those communities that, though traditionalist, remained nonaligned after the Hungarian National Jewish Congress of 1868 and 1869 and provoked a split between adherents of *Neology and traditional Orthodoxy. The Status Quo Ante group controlled Debrecen and a few other centers, but in 1930, two years after receiving governmental recognition, its total membership (17,440) was vastly outnumbered by the Neologist (292,159) and Orthodox (134,972) congregants within Hungarian Jewry. Following the Habsburg empire's collapse in 1918, Orthodoxy retained its hold on the Jews of Slovakia, where there were fewer Neologist than Status Quo Ante communities. These two smaller groups joined together in 1926 to establish a Union of Jewish Religious Communities (Yeshurun). After World War II, the competing trends were unified in Slovakia, and, when centralization was imposed in communist Hungary in 1950, the Status Quo Ante group disappeared.

STEINBERG, MILTON (1903–1950), U.S. Conservative rabbi. He served Congregation Beth-El Zedeck in Indianapolis and the Park Avenue Synagogue in New York City. A student of Morris Raphael Cohen and Mordecai Menahem *Kaplan, he emerged as a leading writer of philosophical theology. At first a leader of *Reconstructionism, he later criticized it for its lack of poetry and philosophical rigor. His writings deal with the range of issues of Jewish belief: faith and reason, the nature of God, and the meaning of Jewish history. His novel As a Driven Leaf (1939) was a rendering of the life of the Talmudic heretic Elisha' ben Avuyah. He also wrote Basic Judaism (1947); The Making of the Modern Jew (1934); A Partisan Guide to the Jewish Problem (1945); and Anatomy of Faith (1960).

STEINHEIM, SALOMON LUDWIG (1789–1866), philosopher of religion and German poet who was born in Bruchhausen, Westphalia, and practiced as a physician in Altona. From 1846, his main residence was in Rome. Besides works on medicine, he wrote several books of poetry and on theology. In his most important book, the four-volume Die Offenbarung nach dem Lehrbegriffe der Synagoge (1835–1865), he inveighed both against Christianity and against the rationalism of the school of Moses *Mendelssohn. He contrasted the speculations of philosophers that led to belief in a dualistic system of good and evil with the biblical revelation of creation out of nothing and the absolute oneness of God. Although he insisted that the insights of revelation were derived independently from those of natural reason, he nonetheless maintained that the truths of revelation must inevitably be confirmed by philosophy. Steinheim's ideas were rejected by the Reform community as being too supranaturalist and by the Orthodox as too rational. In particular, he did not accept the absolute sanctity of the written and oral law. He also attacked the writings of Hegel and Schelling but made little lasting impression on his contemporaries. Nonetheless his system, with its stress on personal experience rather than theory, was subsequently used by the German thinker Hans-Joachim Schoeps as a foundation for his own existentialism. Steinheim's view of religion as an element of human experience and as subject to the same tests of certainty as empirical experience is seen by some as prefiguring the methods of modern scientific investigation.

STERILITY. See BARRENNESS.

STERILIZATION. The Bible specifically disqualifies a castrated priest from serving in the Temple (Lv. 21:20) and a castrated animal from serving as a sacrifice on the altar (Lv. 22:24; see CASTRATION). The Talmud extends these prohibitions into a general ban on all forms of surgical sterilization of men, women, animals, and fowl (Shab. 110b). There is also a biblical prohibition against marrying a man with "crushed or maimed genitals" (Dt. 23:2), which, it is generally accepted, is limited to deliberate mutilations of a nontherapeutic nature. The prohibition against surgical sterilization does not apply if danger to life is involved; hence, it is permitted to remove a diseased prostate gland by surgical means if no other method is available. Indirect sterilization such as freezing the sexual organs or drinking a potion known in the Talmud as a "cup of sterility" (Yev. 65b) is forbidden to males but is permitted to females. A woman, therefore, is allowed to drink such a potion for medical reasons or to avoid extreme pain during childbirth. The Talmud extends the disqualification of castrated priests to judges and to those who lead the community in prayer (San. 36b; minor tractate Soferim 14.17).

STOICISM, philosophical school (founded c.300 BCE in Athens) that flourished in the Greco-Roman era. Its main emphasis was on ethics, and it stressed the ideal of the wise person whose virtue consists in becoming liberated from the sway of the passions and living in conformity with nature and the cosmic law. This cosmic law was conceived by the Stoics as an immanent divine principle (cosmic reason; see LOGOS); life in accordance with it was of the highest felicity. In spite of its pantheistic character (see PANTHEISM) and pagan origin, Stoicism, particularly its stern morality, its belief in a universal governing principle, and its conception of the divine principle active in the cosmos as reason, profoundly influenced Jewish thought (notably *Philo and the Mishnaic, Talmudic, and Midrashic teachers) and religious ethics. To the extent that Stoic elements became part of Greek philosophical tradition, the influence of Stoicism is evident throughout medieval Jewish philosophy.

STONING. See CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

STRANGER. In ancient times strangers (i.e., those who were not members of the ethnic or tribal group) were normally without legal or other protection. For this reason they are often mentioned alongside widows, orphans, and the poor, who are in need of assistance (Dt. 24.17–21). Hence, the insistence of the Bible on the duty of showing every consideration to the “stranger within your gates” and treating the stranger like the native Israelite, since the Israelites themselves were once strangers in Egypt (Ex. 22.21, 23.9). God “loves the stranger in giving him food and raiment” (Dt. 10.18) and has commanded humans to love the stranger (Dt. 10.19), for “the stranger who dwells with you shall be unto you as one born among you” (Lev. 19.33–34). According to Yehezkel Kaufmann, the idea of the resident alien evolved from an ethnic concept into a religious attitude, based on a rejection of idolatry. In the rabbinic view, the stranger, in order to qualify for the protection provided by Jewish law, was expected to adhere to the seven *Noahic laws. The word *ger, which in the Bible almost without exception refers to a resident alien (ger toshav, e.g., Gn. 23.4), is used in the Talmud to mean *proselyte (ger tsedek).

The thinkers of the Emancipation period stressed the liberalism of the biblical attitude to back their own claims to civil rights. Thus, Hermann Cohen stressed the ideal of civil equality found in ancient legislation (Religion of Reason out of the Sources of Judaism), while Shemu'el David *Luzzatto called his son Philxene (Love of the Stranger). In the State of Israel, the chief rabbi Yitsh'haq Herzog ruled that the country's minorities should be treated as the ancient ger toshav (even without the obligation to abstain from idol worship).

STRASHUN, SHEMU'EL BEN YOSEF (1794–1872), Lithuanian Talmudist. Strashun studied under R. Avraham Danzig in Vilna, where he later settled. He is best known for his many annotations on the Talmud, which are included in the back of the Vilna (Romm) editions. These notes are usually short and incisive, often offering new interpretations in a few words. They also reveal his great knowledge of history and languages. Although not trained in modern scholarly methods, Strashun approached Talmudic texts with a critical mind, leading him to correct many textual errors. He also wrote glosses and novellae to the Midrash Rabbah, Sifrei, Maimonides' Mishneh Torah, and portions of the Shulhan 'Arukh.

STUDY. The study of the Torah (talmud Torah) is one of the most highly esteemed duties. Among the first benedictions in the daily morning prayer service is one blessing God for the commandment “to engage in the study of the Torah.” In the list of meritorious activities enumerated in the Mishnah in Pe'ah 1.1, the study of Torah is said to surpass all others. The blessing preceding the reading of the Shema' in both the morning and evening services asks for the grace to be enabled to study the Torah. The divine presence dwells among those who study the Torah. According to Avot 1.15, study should be a regular habit. The earlier injunction to devote one-third of one's free time to the study of Torah, one third to Mishnah, and one third to Talmud (Qid. 30a) was later modified in favor of the Talmud, for, according to Rabbenū Tam, this contains all the others. According to Maimonides (Hilkhot Talmud Torah 1.12), the ideal division of time should be nine hours of study and three hours of pursuing one's occupation each day. The relative value of the study of Torah as compared with religious observance is expressed in the paradoxical summing up of a famous debate on the subject: “Study is the more important since it leads to observance” (Qid. 40b). The commandment to study Torah applies both during the day and at night (Y., Ber. 25b). Although it is not a time-related precept, women are exempt from Torah study ('Eruv. 27a); however, women studied the Bible and those sections of the oral law that applied to them. The high value placed on talmud Torah also implies honoring those who teach and study. Study of Torah has at all times been a central value and the student its incarnation. It became accepted in many places for the wife to earn the family's livelihood so as to enable the husband to devote himself to study. The emphasis on intellectual achievement occasionally led to counteractions stressing the more inward (i.e., devotional and moral) values of Judaism (see ḤASIDEI ASHKENAZ; HASIDISM; MUSAR MOVEMENT). In modern times, the duty of study has been extended to *women, even in very Orthodox circles

(although there boys and girls study separately). According to the aggadah, God himself studies, and the reward of the righteous will be to study with him in the world to come.

SUBBOTNIKI (Rus.; Sabbath Observers), name given to a Judaizing sect in Russia that first emerged at the end of the eighteenth century. Their main characteristic was observance of the Jewish Sabbath, but they also adopted various other biblical and Jewish customs, such as circumcision, abstention from unclean animals, rejection of the New Testament, and a strict monotheism. Subjected to cruel persecution by the Russian authorities at the beginning of the nineteenth century, the Subbotniki were exiled to Siberia in 1826. They obtained religious freedom only at the beginning of the twentieth century. A number of their descendants adopted Judaism and settled in Palestine. See also JUDAIZING SECTS.

SUFFERING becomes a theological problem if one maintains religious belief in a just God who rewards virtue and goodness, in which case suffering must be conceived as divine punishment for sin. This simple theological scheme, however, is not always confirmed by reality, and the problem of suffering occupies a prominent place in both the Bible and Talmud. It is the subject of the Book of Job, whose theme is that the righteous man can be made to undergo suffering in order to prove that he is capable of selfless piety. Other books of the Bible seem to assume a direct relation between suffering and sin. There is a distinct ambivalence in the approach of the rabbis to the problem. Although they lay down that suffering is the result of sin (Shab. 55a) and that it acts as an expiation for sin (Yoma 86a), they concede that suffering can come on an innocent person and that, in fact, it is the fate of the righteous in this world. According to a rabbinic legend, Moses protested against the agony of the martyrdom and torture of R. "Aqiva" ben Yosef, which he beheld in a vision, but God's reply was "Be silent! Such is my decree" (Men. 29b). Both views are combined in the passage: "If a person is visited by suffering let him examine his actions. Should he find them blameless let him attribute it to neglect of the study of Torah. If he still finds no cause, let him accept that they are the chastenings of love, as it is said [Ps. 94.12] 'For whom the Lord loves he chastens'" (Ber. 5a). The usual explanation of suffering resorts to "eschatology and to the doctrine of retribution (see REWARD AND PUNISHMENT) in the world to come. The common rabbinic view is that the righteous person expiates his few sins on this earth in order to enjoy the full reward for his righteousness in the world to come (cf. Qid. 40b) or that the righteous atone by their sufferings for the sins of the world. Ultimately the question is considered a divine mystery beyond human understanding. The sufferings, persecutions, and exile of the people of Israel, culminating in the Holocaust, have exercised Jewish thinkers throughout the ages. See also GOOD AND EVIL; HOLOCAUST THEOLOGY.

SUFISM, the traditional designation for Muslim mysticism (from suf, the coarse woolen cloth worn by early Muslim ascetics). The ultimate aim of the Sufis was to achieve a mystical union with God by passing through the stages of abstinence, renunciation, poverty, trust, purity of will and mind, and love of God. The teachings of Sufism were greatly influenced by the philosophy of *Neoplatonism and, in some branches at least, exhibited gnostic traits. Long suspected of being heretical and opposed by orthodox theologians, Sufism was finally reconciled with orthodox thought in the twelfth century. Sufism also exerted considerable influence on medieval Jewish piety and ascetic theology, notably on Bahya ben Yosef ibn Paquda, whose Hovot ha-Levavot contains Sufi terminology, ideas, and quotations. Another Jewish thinker who was deeply influenced by Sufism was *Avraham ben Moshe ben Maimon.

SUICIDE. Since an individual is not considered to be the owner or master of his own life, suicide, which amounts in rabbinic thought to *homicide, is strictly forbidden. "For your own lifeblood, I will require a reckoning" (Gn. 9.5) is considered a biblical prohibition against suicide. A man is permitted to sacrifice his life only to avoid committing one of three cardinal sins—murder, adultery, idolatry; indeed, many authorities hold that a man is to allow himself to be killed rather than violate these sins but that he must not actively destroy himself. Many examples of individual and collective suicide to escape the hand of the enemy and the threat of slavery or apostasy are recorded in Jewish history: King Saul (I Sm. 31.4–5); Ahithophel (2 Sm. 17.23); the fighters at Masada (71 CE); the martyrs of York (1190). That suicides have no share in the world to come is recorded as a Jewish doctrine by Josephus but does not appear in the Talmud. A suicide is to be buried in a separate part of the cemetery. However, today rabbis tend to consider those who commit suicide as being of unsound mind, and therefore they are not restricted to a separate area of the cemetery. The minor tractate Evel Rabbati* discusses laws concerning suicides (2.1–5).

SUKKAH (סוכה), name of a booth and of a Mishnaic tractate.

Booth. A sukkah is a booth or tabernacle (hut) in which the children of Israel were enjoined to dwell for seven days "in order that your generations may know that I caused the children of Israel to dwell in tabernacles when I brought them out of the land of Egypt" (Lv. 23.42–43) and from which the festival of *Sukkot derives its name. Booths probably played a part in the ancient *harvest festivals; hence, their association with Sukkot, which is also called the "harvest festival" in the Bible. The sukkah must be a temporary structure, its roof covered with cut vegetation and open to the sun, though it must give "more shade than light." An Orthodox tradition is to start building the sukkah shortly after the conclusion of Yom Kippur. Orthodox Jews take their meals in the sukkah (where a special blessing is recited), and many also sleep there during the seven days of the festival. In Western communities a sukkah is built adjacent to the synagogue and visited by the congregation for light refreshments after the services on the festival. Although the rite of the *four species is considered independent of that of the sukkah (Lv. 23.40), it appears that *Nehemiah (Neh. 8.15) regarded the four species as the materials from which the sukkah was to be constructed; a similar opinion voiced in the Talmud by R. Yehudah (Suk. 37a) was overruled. A sukkah must have a minimum of three walls and stand not more than twenty cubits (approximately 30 feet) high. Inclement weather absolves one from the duty of dwelling in the sukkah. Women are exempt from the obligation to dwell in the sukkah (as they are from all commandments that depend upon a fixed time for their performance), but they may do so if they wish. The kabbalistic custom of welcoming Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, Aaron, and David to the sukkah, each one on a different day of the festival, is called *ushpizin (guests), and an appropriate invocation is recited. The halakhic regulations regarding the sukkah and Sukkot are expounded in the Mishnah and both Talmuds.

Tractate. The tractate Sukkah is in Mishnah order Mo'ed, in five chapters, with related material in the To-sefta' and in both Talmuds. It discusses the laws of the festival of *Sukkot, described in the Bible as a fall harvest festival (Ex. 23.15, 34.22; Lv. 23.27ff.; Nm. 29.12ff.; Dt. 16.13ff.), marked by the requirements of the taking of the branches and fruit of *four species of trees (Lv. 23.40) and of dwelling in booths for seven days (Lv. 23.42).

Sukkah requires the four species to be free of blemishes, physical as well as moral (such as items that had been stolen or used for idolatry), rendering them fit for divine service. They were used in the Temple as part of a multifaceted ceremony, in which a water libation and the symbolic planting of willow branches near the altar were performed, expressing thanksgiving for the previous year's harvest as well as offering a petition for abundant rainfall in the coming year. After the destruction of the Temple, the waving of the four species before God was incorporated into the festive recitation of Hallel. During the Sukkot festival an ongoing water-drawing celebration took place in the Temple (see SIMḤAT BEIT HA-SHO'EVAH), marked by festive candelabra and music, as well as dancing and juggling led by distinguished scholars and pious men. The great joyousness of these festivities led the sages to erect a partition in the women's courtyard to prevent immodest mingling of men and women and prompted the remark that "whoever has not seen the rejoicing of the drawing of the water has never in his life seen rejoicing" (Suk. 5.1).

The tractate in the Talmud Bavli was translated into English by I. W. Slotki in the Soncino Talmud (1938).

SUKKOT (סוכות; Tabernacles), the third of the pilgrim festivals (see SHALOSH REGALIM). The Hebrew name derives from the main aspect of the festival, which involves the celebrant's dwelling in a sukkah* (booth). Originally one of the *harvest festivals (Ex. 23.16; Dt. 16.13), Ḥag ha-'Asif (Festival of the Ingathering [of the Crops]), it was given added historical significance as a commemoration of the forty years of wandering in the wilderness (Lv. 23.43). The festival became so popular that in Mishnaic times it was known simply as Ḥag, that is, the festival par excellence. Liturgically, it is described as zeman simḥatenu (the time of our rejoicing) following the biblical injunction to be completely joyous on this festival (Dt. 16.15). The Bible enjoins Jews to dwell in the sukkah and to take the *four species. A circuit of the synagogue with the four species in hand is made daily to the accompaniment of chanted Hosha'not, and the four species are waved in prescribed fashion during the recitation of the *Hallel. During the festival, religious Jews take their meals and spend the day in the temporary sukkah structure, and many synagogues also construct an adjoining sukkah. The symbolic welcoming of biblical guests (see USHPIZIN), a custom of sixteenth-century kabbalistic origin, is also observed during Sukkot. On the seventh day of the festival, which has been given the name *Hosha'na' Rabbah, a sevenfold circuit of the synagogue is made with the four species (see HAQQAḤOT). Most of these ceremonies originated in ancient Temple custom. During the intermediate days of the festival, the Feast of Water-Drawing (see SIMḤAT BEIT HA-SHO'EVAH), of which a vivid description is given in the Talmud (Suk. 53a), was celebrated in the Temple as the most joyous occasion of the year. Sukkot begins on 15 Tishrei and lasts seven days; the eighth day (according to some, a separate festival) is *Shemini 'Atseret, on which a prayer for rain is recited (see TEFILLAT GESHEM). In the Diaspora, a ninth day is added for *Simḥat Torah (in Erets Yisra'el, this is combined with Shemini 'Atseret), when the annual cycle of the reading of the Torah (see QERAT HA-TORAH) is concluded and a new one begun. The ancient ceremony of Haqhel during Sukkot has been revived in modern Israel. Work is prohibited only on the first and last days of the holiday (in the Diaspora, the first two and last two); the intermediate days are ḥol ha-mo'ed. Hallel and the Musaf service are recited each day (see FESTIVAL PRAYERS). In addition, the Book of Ecclesiastes is read in the synagogue. The unusual order of the *sacrifices offered during the festival in Temple times (thirteen bullocks were offered on the first day, and the number was progressively reduced by one daily until on the seventh day only seven were offered, making a total of seventy; Nm. 29.12–32) has given rise to the tradition that these sacrifices represent the offerings made by Israel on behalf of the seventy nations that traditionally inhabit the earth. One of the festival's prophetic readings is from Zechariah 14.16–19, which states that all nations will go to Jerusalem to keep the feast of Sukkot. There is evidence that in Second Temple times greater numbers of people made the pilgrimage to Jerusalem on this festival than on the other pilgrim festivals, since at this time the harvest had been fully gathered, and farmers were free to leave their fields. The laws concerning the festival are in Talmud tractate Sukkah.

SULZER, SALOMON (1804–1890), Viennese cantor and composer. From the age of sixteen, he served as an itinerant cantor in Germany, Switzerland, and France. In 1826 he was named cantor of the Stadttempel in Vienna, a post he held for fifty-five years. A student of Ignaz von Seyfried, Sulzer was one of the first modern cantors to receive classical musical training, which he employed in his efforts to reconstruct traditional synagogue music to suit the modern era. Sulzer's monumental Shir Tsiyyon (with volumes published in 1840 and 1866) included cantorial recitatives, congregational responses, and choral settings for the entire liturgical year. Sulzer's strength of personality and impressive voice earned him the admiration of Franz Schubert and Franz Liszt, as well as the other cantors of his day, whose eagerness to emulate him assured the acceptance of his compositions. Sulzer is often regarded as the father of the modern cantor and is considered an important reformer of synagogue song; his published work represented a compromise between synagogue traditions and the prevailing musical style. His accomplishments won him widespread renown well beyond the Jewish community, but he was reviled for his reforms by more traditional elements from eastern Europe. Nevertheless, Sulzer's music continues to be sung throughout the Ashkenazi world.

SUMPTUARY LAWS, laws issued by Jewish communities directed against ostentation and public displays of luxury. The reasons for such restrictions were to prevent people from constantly outspending one another, with the less affluent often going into debt by trying to emulate the more fortunate, or to keep individual Jews from flaunting their wealth before their non-Jewish neighbors. Often such laws were also enacted by local rulers prohibiting Jews in their realms from appearing in costly attire. One example of a sumptuary law is found in the Talmudic statement (Mo'ed Q. 27a–b) that "formerly, [the body of] the rich was brought [for burial] in an ornate litter and that of the poor in a plain box and the poor felt ashamed; they [the rabbis] therefore instituted that all should be brought in a plain box." Sumptuary laws restricted the number of guests who might be invited to a wedding, the weight of silver goblets, and the number of rings it was permissible to wear. In actual fact, sumptuary laws were often ignored, and community minutes frequently refer to the need to find ways to force people to comply.

SUN. The sun was created on the fourth day "to rule the day" (Gn. 1.16). In the Bible, it is a symbol of joy, light, and blessing (cf. Ps. 19.5–7; Mal. 3.20), while an eclipse of the sun presages impending judgment and doom (cf. Is. 13.10; Am. 8.9; Mi. 3.6). The movement of the sun can be arrested by divine intervention; for example, when it stood still to enable the Israelites to defeat the Amorites (Jos. 10.12–14). Sun worship was common in the ancient Near East, and the fact that King Josiah's monotheistic reforms abolished all worship of "sun, moon, and stars" (2 Kgs. 23.5) indicates that it was practiced to some extent in Israel. A rabbinic legend relates that God originally intended the sun to be the sole luminary, but to avoid it becoming an object of worship, he also created the moon (Gn. Rab. 6.1). Similarly, it is said of Abraham that he was tempted to regard the sun as God, but when night fell, and it was replaced by the moon, he realized that there must be a higher power. Calendrical needs, both for the purpose of establishing the solar year and its solstices and for accurately determining the beginning and conclusion of the Sabbath and the festivals and the times of prayers and sacrifices, stimulated close study of the sun by the rabbis. The length of the year and the exact determination of sunset, sunrise, and the onset of *twilight were all exhaustively debated and finally determined. See also BIRKAT HA-ḤAMMAH; CALENDAR; MOON.

SURA, city in southern Babylonia where *Rav founded (c.219 CE) a famous *academy that flourished for eight centuries. Prominent leaders of the academy during the third and fourth centuries included Ḥisda' and Huna'. In the fifth century, it was headed by *Ashi, one of the chief editors of the Talmud Bavli. During the geonic period (see GA'ON), the academy of Sura maintained closer ties with the court of the *exilarch than did its sister academy of *Pumbedita. Another institution closely associated with Sura was the ancient synagogue known as Beit Rabbenu shebe-Bavel, believed to have been founded by Rav, the customs of which are frequently cited. Other outstanding heads of the academy include: *Yehuda'i ben Naḥman Ga'on in the mid-eighth century (although he received his training in Pumbedita); Mosheh Ga'on, and *Natrona'i bar Hila'i in the ninth century.

In the tenth century, the position of the Sura academy became increasingly tenuous, and the school was transferred to Baghdad, though retaining its name. It was on the verge of closure until the appointment in 928 of the dynamic but controversial *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on gave it a new lease on life. After his death, the academy closed for almost half a century; it was reopened toward the end of the tenth century. The most important figure associated with Sura in this period was *Shemu'el ben Ḥofni.

SURETY (Heb. 'arevut), a person who guarantees the financial obligations of another. Such guarantees are valid, even if given orally, whether at the time of the loan or later, although guarantees of repayment provided after the loan was made must be effectuated with a qinyan (see ACQUISITION). There are two different types of guarantors. The first, an 'arev, is only obligated to pay when the debtor cannot. The second, an 'arev qablan, agrees to pay whether the debtor has defaulted or not. In cases where the debtor fails to pay and the surety pays, the surety has the right to recourse from the debtor for all of his expenses. In situations where the debt has been canceled for any reason, the surety is also canceled.

SURROGACY. It is a general principle of Jewish law that maternity, like paternity, is established by nature and not by law. According to one view, the birth mother is the mother for all halakhic purposes. This view is based upon various Talmudic passages regarding the conversion to Judaism of pregnant women (Yev. 78a–b, 97b). The common theme underlying these passages is that the child born after the mother's conversion is Jewish. There is, however, another view, according to which maternity is established at conception rather than birth, and Talmudic support is also available for this (Nid. 31a; San. 91b). A third approach suggests that the genetic mother is sometimes the legal mother, depending upon the time that elapses between conception and implantation in the surrogate. It has also been suggested that the product of a surrogate birth might have two legal mothers, that is, the birth mother and the genetic mother. The establishment of maternity is particularly significant from a halakhic perspective, since it is the mother who determines the Jewish identity of the child. Other problems related to surrogacy are the possibilities of incest or adultery. In light of these, surrogacy is generally frowned upon by contemporary halakhists. In 1995 the Israel Supreme Court ruled that surrogate motherhood be permitted; some rabbinical authorities concurred, with the proviso that the requirements of Jewish law be met. SYMBOLISM. A distinct vocabulary of visual symbols has been used by Jews from antiquity until today to signify community and convey religious concepts. Often they indicate that particular sites, buildings, art, or artifacts are Jewish. Depictions of the Temple façade are common, as are depictions of Temple implements such as the *Menorah, priestly garb, and Ark of the Covenant, which are frequently represented in Spanish medieval Bible manuscripts, on Italian ritual silver, or on central European aron ha-qodesh valances. Representations of the Temple and implements reflect shared remembrance of the destroyed First and Second Temples and messianic longings for the construction of the Third. The Menorah, the seven-branched candelabrum, that is described in Exodus 25.31–40 and 37.17–24, is the most commonly represented Temple implement. It frequently appears in art of the Second Temple and Talmudic periods. It became symbolic not only of the Temple service, but of Jews and Judaism as a whole. Also common in Jewish art from antiquity through modernity are items used in Jewish ritual, such as the lulav, etrog, or shofar, symbolizing ritual practice and frequently signifying particular festivals (for example, a shofar signifies Ro'sh ha-Shanah). *Zodiac symbols frequently decorate the mosaic floors of ancient synagogues; such images were used throughout the centuries as symbols of the Jewish calendar. Animals appear frequently in Jewish art. Birds flank images of the Torah shrine in ancient synagogue mosaics and adorn the earliest extant decorated medieval ketubbah (Tudela, 1300). Eagles and lions often appear on Torah ornaments, symbols of majesty and strength. Animal motifs are very common in eastern European Jewish folk art. Depictions of animals are often associated with the text, "be as strong as a leopard, as light as an eagle, as swift as a deer, as brave as a lion to do the will of your Father in heaven" (Avot 5.20). Images of the Aron ha-Qodesh stress the centrality of the Torah in Jewish life. The two tablets of the Law, often with abbreviated text, are commonly used as a symbol of the Mosaic faith and became the preferred symbol in Reform synagogues, although their use precedes the Reform movement. Images of Torah scrolls are used similarly. The tree of life symbolizes the Torah (Prov. 3.18) or refers to the garden of Eden or messianic times. Portals, frequently flanked by columns or figures, represent entrances to forgiveness, learning, or righteousness and frequently appear on frontispieces and Torah ark curtains, often associated with the text "This is the gateway of the Lord" (Ps. 118.20). Two flanking columns are also associated with Jachin and Boaz, the two pillars at the front of Solomon's Temple. Crown forms symbolize the majesty and strength of God or the Torah, or are associated with the text "there are three crowns: the crown of Torah, the crown of priesthood, and the royal crown, but the crown of a good name surpasses them all" (Avot 4.13). Apotropaic symbols are used on amulets and other objects to ward off evil spirits and include formulaic representations of angels and the hamsa (hand). On tombstones, hands raised in the pose of priestly blessing are used as a symbol of a kohen; a pouring jug of water is a symbol of a Levite. The six-pointed Star of David (see MAGEN DAVID) has only been used exclusively as a Jewish symbol in recent centuries. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in central Europe, most frequently in Prague, the star was first widely used in a Jewish context. In the nineteenth century the star became widely accepted as the central symbol of Jews and Judaism and was adopted for use by the Zionist movement and the State of Israel. See also ART.

SYMMACHUS (c.2d-3d cent.), translator of the Bible into Greek. Various conjectures have been made about his identity; for example, that he may have been a member of the *Ebionites, a Samaritan convert to Judaism, or a Jewish disciple of R. Me'ir. Symmachus's translation, which was included in Origen's Hexapla, was transmitted as part of the Hexapla. On the whole, although he often represented the sense of the words rather than their literal meaning, Symmachus's translation was very precise; however, very little of his translation has been preserved.

SYNAGOGUE, a term from the Greek meaning "assembly"; in Hebrew beit ha-keneset (house of meeting). The exact origin of the synagogue is unknown. Although prayer was an integral part of the sacrificial service from early times, there is no record of special prayer houses. The synagogue may have originated during the period of Babylonian captivity, although some scholars trace its beginnings to the period of the monarchy. The first Babylonian exiles (597 BCE) seem to have met for the purpose of exposition of the scriptures and public worship on Sabbaths and festivals; when the bulk of the people were exiled to Babylonia (586), the institution of meeting for prayer and instruction already was in existence. Such gatherings are recorded in the Book of Ezekiel, and the reference in Ezekiel 11.16 possibly reflects the emergence of the synagogue in the Babylonian exile. To the allegation of the inhabitants of Jerusalem that the exiles, being far removed from the Temple, had forfeited the presence and protection of God, the prophet replied with the divine message that God himself would be a miqdash me'at (little sanctuary) to Israel in exile (Ez. 11.15-16). This was interpreted by the rabbis to refer to the "houses of worship and houses of learning." No definite reference to the existence of the synagogue is known until long after the return from the Babylonian exile. By the time Ezra instituted the reading of the Torah on Sabbath afternoons and on Mondays and Thursdays (B. Q. 82a), as well as statutory daily prayers (Ber. 33a; Meg. 17b), assemblies for worship were possibly already in existence throughout the land. The first archeological evidence comes from Schedia, near Alexandria, Egypt, from the third century BCE. By the end of the Second Temple era the synagogue was a well-established institution both in Erets Yisra'el and in the Diaspora. Matter-of-course references in the New Testament speak of Jesus' preaching in the synagogues in Galilee, and pre-70 CE synagogues have been excavated in Masada, Herodion, and Gamla. A synagogue existed even in the precincts of the Temple (Yoma 7.1; Suk. 4.3), but the date of its establishment is unknown. Until the destruction of the Temple, synagogues were places for reading the Bible and for sermons, and there is no evidence that they were used for communal prayer. According to the Talmud (Ket. 105), when Titus took Jerusalem in 70 CE, he destroyed 394 synagogues in the city. The Talmud relates (Suk. 51b) that the great synagogue of Alexandria was so large that it was impossible for those far removed from the center to hear the reader, and a man was appointed to stand and wave a scarf at the times when the congregation had to utter "amen" to the prayers. The epistles of Paul attest to the centrality of the synagogue in Diaspora life; thirteen synagogues flourished in Rome. The synagogue had so much become the focus of religious life that the destruction of the Second Temple left much less of a vacuum than had the destruction of the First Temple. The rabbis adopted the *liturgy as a substitute for and a reminder of the Temple ritual.

About a hundred synagogues, dating up to the eighth century, have been excavated in Israel, most of them conforming to the rabbinical teaching that synagogues should be built on hills, so that other buildings would not rise above them, or near bodies of water. The rabbis taught that a synagogue should be constructed wherever a Jewish community exists, and, after 70 CE, the synagogue became the focus of spiritual and communal life in its triple role of prayer house, place of study and religious instruction, and center of communal assembly. From earliest times, synagogues were oriented toward Jerusalem (inside Jerusalem, toward the Temple mount). There was no prescribed form, and the buildings were at all times heavily influenced by the architecture of their environment (and indeed, for the most part, the architects were non-Jews). In the classical period, they reflected Greco-Roman public buildings. At different times and in different places the attitude toward artistic decoration varied (see ART). Sometimes it was austere, and no human forms were depicted; at other times, the attitude was liberal, and human figures in biblical scenes were depicted, and even the hand of God (as in the third-century synagogue at Dura-Europos in Syria and the sixth-century synagogue at Beth Alpha in Israel). In Babylonia, synagogues were often situated outside towns, as the rabbis considered the cities to be filled with unclean things. Although reverence for the synagogue is enjoined, the atmosphere often tended to be informal and decorum not too stringent, with the congregants feeling very much at home. Architecturally, the central feature is the ark (aron ha-qodesh*) on the wall facing Jerusalem, which contains the scrolls of the Torah (see SEFER TORAH). In ancient times the ark was portable; it was brought into the prayer hall only for services and placed in a special niche. In front of the ark burns the ner tamid, reminiscent of the perpetual light in the Temple (Nm. 8.1-4). The seats along the wall where the ark is situated are regarded as especially privileged. The medieval period saw various architectural changes. Special arrangements were made for the separate seating of women, in balconies, annexes (see 'EZRAH NA-SHIM), or behind partitions (mehitsah), which were unknown in the ancient and classical periods. Hostile Christian and Muslim restrictions limited the height of buildings and sometimes prohibited the erection of new synagogues. To compensate for the lack of external height, synagogues were often built below the street level (the rabbis interpreted this as a fulfillment of Ps. 130.1, "From out of the depths I call on you, O Lord"). Apart from the ark, the other main feature was the reader's platform (bimah*), which was usually in the center of the prayer hall but was also sometimes to be found against the western wall.

No priest or ordained official was required to conduct the service; any competent member of the congregation could lead the prayers, although later, paid *cantors, chosen for their vocal accomplishment rather than learning, were employed. The synagogue was the hub of communal life and the venue for all its activities. Its original role as a gathering place for congregational worship profoundly influenced Christian and Muslim forms of worship.

When the Italian Jews were forced into *ghettos, they were only allowed a single synagogue building; in Rome this housed a number of prayer halls, while in Venice the synagogues were constructed in the top stories of existing buildings, inconspicuous from the outside but with interiors rich with examples of Renaissance art. In eastern Europe, wooden synagogues were popular, reflecting the architecture of the region (almost all of the last surviving examples were destroyed by the Germans in World War II). Some synagogues were built as fortresses so that the Jews could protect themselves in the event of attack. Characteristic of many eastern European synagogues were the four pillars supporting the building and surrounding the reader's platform. In Muslim lands, Jewish worshippers replicated certain Islamic customs and often removed their shoes for worship or sat on the floor. Muslim rulers sometimes enacted harsh laws forbidding the construction of synagogue buildings, but ways were found to circumvent such decrees, and prayer rooms could also be found in private homes. In India, the *Bene Israel, when first discovered in the eighteenth century, had no synagogues; they were only introduced when the people moved to the large towns. The Chinese Jews of K'ai-feng had a notable synagogue, including a hall of ancestors, but this was destroyed in the nineteenth century. In Ethiopia, the synagogues were divided into three sections, admission to each regulated by Levitical law. The eastern entrance was reserved for the monks of the community.

The era of Emancipation brought revolutionary changes to the European synagogue. Jews sought to proclaim their status as equal citizens by building imposing and monumental edifices in prominent places, but at the same time indicated their difference by preferring an Oriental-style architecture. Internal changes introduced by the Reform movement included family seating, the abolition of the separate platform for the reader, which was now situated in front of the ark, and places for organ and choir. Reform Judaism also preferred the term temple to synagogue. Most of the monumental synagogues in central Europe were destroyed by the Nazis on Kristallnacht (9-10 Nov. 1938).

Since World War II, the most imaginative building manifesting new aesthetic standards has taken place in the United States. Leading architects, sculptors, painters, and other artists have participated in the building and decoration of synagogues. The synagogue has resumed its role as a community center, providing educational, social, and athletic activities in addition to its religious functions. In the Soviet Union, where religious expression was suppressed, few synagogues remained by the 1980s, but to the extent that Jews began openly to display their national identity from the late 1960s, the synagogue and its vicinity was the focus. In Israel, where there are many other avenues for Jewish self-expression, the synagogue is primarily a place of prayer.

SYNCRETISM, the act or system of blending or reconciling heterogeneous elements. In the history of religion it signifies the mixing of beliefs and practices of different—and at times conflicting—character and origins. Syncretism (originally a pejorative term of abuse) occurs wherever different cultures meet. The biblical record contains indications of much popular syncretism between Israelite and Canaanite religion, an amalgamation that the prophets had continually to combat. An example of conscious theological syncretism can be found in Genesis 14.22, where Abram (see ABRAHAM) identifies his God with Melchizedek's El Elyon. In a narrower sense, syncretism refers to the blending of Greek and Oriental religions in the Hellenistic period; from the point of view of Jewish monotheism this was merely another form of paganism (see HASMONEANS).

TA'ANIT (תענית; Fast), tractate in Mishnah order Mo'ed, in four chapters, with related material in the To-sefta' and in both Talmuds. It deals with laws related to various forms of fast days (see FASTS), primarily with fasting in times of drought. Ta'anit opens with the chronology of the yearly prayers for rain, outlining a sequence of liturgical acts and prayers in which the inhabitants of Erets Yisra'el anticipate the rainy season by various modes of addressing God who grants rain. The fast days, which begin shortly after the earliest signs of delay in the falling of rain and increase in intensity, are presented in Ta'anit as a response to the rejection of Israel's prayers, as well as to the imminent danger of drought. The later, more intense fast days are observed by a cessation of work, as the community assembles in a public square for a ceremony that includes signs of mourning and humiliation and a call by prominent leaders of the community to repent their evil actions. Special prayers are recited, highlighting God's responsiveness to his people in previous times of distress, accompanied in the Temple by the sounding of trumpets.

Similar fast days are mandated for other occasions of communal distress and danger, such as plague, locusts, and war. The fourth chapter of Ta'anit focuses on various elements of the Temple service incidentally related to fasting and concludes with two fast days (Shiv'ah 'Asar be-Tammuz and Tish'ah be-Av) that commemorate historical tragedies, national as well as spiritual, which befell the Jewish people. Prominently featured among these tragedies are events connected to the destruction of the two Temples, underscoring the central role of the Temple both as a national and as a spiritual center. These two historically oriented fast days are counterbalanced by two days of rejoicing, Tu be-Av and Yom Kippur, on which daughters of Jerusalem, clothed in white, dance in the vineyards, and sons of Jerusalem select their mates. The rather paradoxical characterization of Yom Kippur as a uniquely festive day underscores the dialectical interrelationship of fasting and feasting that underlies many of the laws and features of Ta'anit.

TA'ANIT BEKHORIM (תענית בכורים), fast traditionally observed by male firstborns (whether on the father's or mother's side) during all or part of the day preceding the Pesah festival (14 Nisan) in memory of the saving of the Israelite firstborns when the Egyptian firstborns were killed (Ex. 12–13). Until a firstborn reaches maturity, his father fasts on his behalf. The fast is mentioned in minor tractate Soferim 21.3 and was instituted in the geonic period. Later it became customary to conclude the study of a Talmudic tractate on that day, thereby permitting the breaking of the fast with a festive Se'udat Mitsvah (see SE'UDAH). According to some authorities, the rabbis thus bent the rules on this occasion to avoid any comparison to the Christian practice of fasting in the pre-Easter period, often on the same date. If the fast falls on a Sabbath, it is observed on the preceding Thursday.

TA'ANIT ESTER (תענית אסתר), fast day observed on 13 Adar, the day preceding *Purim; if this should fall on a Sabbath, the fast (from sunrise to sunset) is observed on the preceding Thursday. While this has become linked with the fast ordered by the biblical Esther (Est. 4.16), it is in fact unconnected to that fast, which occurred in the month of Nisan (cf. Est. 3.12); (there was an ancient custom to observe three "fasts of Esther" during the month of Nisan [Massekhet Soferim 21.1]). From the time of Judah the Maccabee, 13 Adar was a day of celebration—Nicanor Day (see 1 Mac. 7.43–50), commemorating Judah's victory over the Syrian general Nicanor—when fasting was specifically prohibited (cf. Megillat Ta'anit). This celebration, however, fell into disuse after the destruction of the Temple. As fasting became forbidden during the joyous month of Nisan, the fasts of Esther were transferred to Adar. The custom of fasting on 13 Adar is first mentioned in the eighth century CE (in the She'iltot of R. Aḥa' of Shabḥa). As it is of late origin, its observance is less strictly enforced than other fasts, although it was kept with particular stringency by Persian Jews. Special penitential prayers are said in the Orthodox synagogue service on this day.

TABERNACLE (Heb. Mishkan [Dwelling Place, Abode], the portable shrine erected by the Israelites in the wilderness (Ex. 25.9, 26.1). It is also referred to as the Miqdash (Sanctuary; Ex. 25.8; Nm. 10.21) and as the Ohel Mo'ed (Tent of Meeting; Ex. 29.10, 30.16; see also Ex. 39.3, 40.2). These names express the Tabernacle's three functions, respectively: an earthly abode for the enshrined deity (Ex. 25.8, 29.45); a sacred domain for sacrificial worship; and the place where Moses was to meet with God in order to receive the laws (Ex. 25.22, 29.42–43). The Tabernacle is also referred to as Mishkan ha-'Edut or Ohel ha-'Edut (Abode or Tent of the Testimony; Ex. 38.21; Nm. 1.50, 17.23, 18.2; see ARK OF THE COVENANT).

According to the biblical account (Ex. 25–31, 35–40), when Moses ascended Mount Sinai to receive the tablets of the Law, he was first given detailed instructions for the building of the Tabernacle. In order for Moses to carry out these instructions properly, God also displayed to him a heavenly image of the Tabernacle (Ex. 25.9, 40; 26.30, 27.8). The orders were then delivered to the people, who willingly contributed all the necessary materials and participated enthusiastically in the construction under the divinely inspired direction of Bezalel and Oholiab (Ex. 35.20–36.7). By the start of the next year, the entire project was completed, after which the majestic presence of God (kevod YHVH), in the form of a fiery cloud, took up residence (Ex. 40). In a series of meetings with Moses, with the voice of God emanating from the inner sanctum, the laws of sacrifice were given (Lv. 1–7); then the Tabernacle and its priesthood were consecrated (Lv. 8–9), and the sacrificial worship of God commenced. Following this, the remainder of the laws were given. When the Israelites departed from Sinai to begin their wanderings in the wilderness (Nm. 10.11–28), the shrine was dismantled and transported by the priests and Levites (Nm. 3.14–4.20). At each new location it was reassembled, and on each new journey it was taken apart again. The Israelites brought the Tabernacle with them into Canaan, where it was erected for the last time at Shiloh (Jos. 18.1). There it remained and eventually became a fixed sanctuary (1 Sm. 1).

The tabernacle is described as a rectangular structure of 30 × 10 cubits (45 × 15 ft.). On three sides (north, west, and south) were walls consisting of upright wooden planks inserted in sockets and held together by bars and bolts. Stretched over the top of the Tabernacle, forming its roof, and draped down over the three sides was a set of curtains of fine fabrics with the cherub motif embroidered onto them; over these was draped a set of goat-hair curtains; and these, in turn, were draped with skins. The fabric coverings and the absence of any other roof made the Tabernacle a tent. The fourth side, to the east, was a woven screen of fine fabrics suspended on five pillars, which formed the entrance. Another screen of fabric embroidered with the cherub motif, called the Parokhet (Veil), divided the inside of the Tabernacle into two parts. At the western end was the smaller, inner sanctum (10 × 10 cubits), the Holy of Holies (Qodesh ha-Qodashim). The eastern end (10 × 20 cubits) was the outer sanctum or Holy Place (Qodesh). In the pitch-black inner sanctum, containing only the Ark, the deity was said to reside in isolation, enthroned on the cherubim. The outer sanctum contained three golden furnishings: the lamp stand (see MENORAH), the table (see SHOWBREAD), and the incense altar. These featured in the twice-daily tamid ritual. Entry into the inner sanctum was confined to the annual purification ritual performed by the high priest on Yom Kippur. The gold, silver, bronze, fine wool and linen, skins, and expensive woods said to have been used to make the Tabernacle and its furnishings gave the Tabernacle its majestic splendor. These materials were arranged in graded fashion; the nearer one got to the inner sanctum, the more expensive the materials and the more intricate the workmanship. An inseparable part of the Tabernacle was its courtyard (100 × 50 cubits), enclosed by hanging screens, delineating the sacred precincts. In the center of the eastern court, opposite the entrance to the Tabernacle, stood the sacrificial altar; this is where the main sacrificial rituals took place "in the presence of the Lord." The Tabernacle was thus the forerunner of the Jerusalem *Temple, its design, proportions, and ritual functions making it a miniature, portable version of the future, permanent abode of Israel's God.

Modern scholars find that the Tabernacle belongs exclusively to the Priestly source of the Pentateuch; the non-Priestly sources make no mention of it. Some scholars describe the story as an idealized, retroactive account of the origins of Israel's institutions of worship, written in light of later developments and greatly embellished. It is possible, however, that the historical kernel is to be sought in the sanctuary at Shiloh, which, according to Priestly tradition, had its origin in the wilderness period.

TABLETS OF THE LAW (Heb. luhot ha-berit or luhot ha-'edut), two tablets of stone received by Moses from God at Mount *Sinai (Ex. 24.12–18, 31.18, 32.15; Dt. 9.9–11). As the written record of the revelation at Sinai, they functioned as physical evidence of the divine covenant with Israel. In the biblical tradition, the original divine tablets were engraved "by the finger of God" (Ex. 31.18), and the writing miraculously covered both sides (Ex. 32.15). Moses, however, smashed these to bits when he discovered the Israelites worshipping the *golden calf, and he was instructed to make a new set to replace them. After Moses returned to the top of Mount Sinai with a new set of tablets, God wrote upon them precisely what had been on the original tablets, the Ten Words (Ex. 34.28; Dt. 10.1–4; see TEN COMMANDMENTS). The tablets were placed in the Ark (in rabbinic legend, along with the fragments of the original set), which was thus known as the *Ark of the Covenant. According to 1 Kings 8.9, these tablets were still in the Ark at the inauguration of Solomon's Temple in Jerusalem. Rabbinic tradition holds that the size of the tablets was $6 \times 3 \times 6$ cubits (B. B. 14a), and the Ten Words were arranged in two parallel groups, five on each tablet. Legend deals copiously with the substance of the tablets, the wondrous nature of the script, and the circumstances of their transmission. The later fate of the tablets is not known; according to one legend they were hidden by Josiah; another says that they were taken into the Babylonian exile when the first Temple was destroyed in 586 BCE. By Second Temple times, the tablets had disappeared. The later artistic use of the tablets as a symbol of Judaism was probably inspired by Christian art, which depicted the tablets as a vertical rectangle rounded at the top to symbolize the meeting between heaven and earth. In medieval sculptures of "church and synagogue" on cathedrals, the synagogue was often pictured with the tablets upside down to hint that Judaism did not understand the implication of their teaching. In Jewish art, the earliest depictions of the tablets date from the fifteenth or sixteenth century and were placed as decoration over the ark in the synagogue. The use of the motif became widespread in the nineteenth century, especially in central Europe, where designers of Reform temples found them a more universal symbol than the particularistic menorah. Mosaic law was stressed as the antithesis of Talmudic tradition. Today, tablets are frequently found not only in synagogues of all kinds but also on ceremonial objects and on items possessing religious associations.

TADSHE'. See MIDRASH TADSHE'.

TAGIN (Aram.; תָּגִין; crowns), decorative crownlike flourishes that are added to the tops of certain letters of Torah scrolls. Their origin is traditionally ascribed to Sinaitic revelation, and Talmudic and Midrashic sources assign them a mystical significance. A work called Sefer Tagin (copied by Simḥah ben Shemu'el of Vitry in his Maḥazor Vitry [edited by Shim'on Hurwitz (1923)]) sets out the rules for their correct application. Tagin also appear on the mezuzah* and tefillin* but not in printed texts of the Bible.

TAHANUN (תַּהֲנוּן; Supplication), petition for grace and forgiveness (the name is derived from the original introduction: "... and receive my supplications [tahanunai]") said daily, except on Sabbaths, festivals, days of joy (e.g., in the presence of a bridegroom), on Tish'ah be-'Av, and in houses of a mourner during the week of mourning after the morning and afternoon 'Amidah. The liturgical Tahanun replaced the earlier, silent, personal petitions for mercy. Tahanun is also called Nefilat Appayim (Falling on the Face) from the attitude in which it was originally recited. Today worshipers lean their heads on their left arms (or on their right arms when tefillin are on the left). *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on described the worshiper as "half sitting and half kneeling" during Tahanun, but the Western tradition is to sit. Since the eighteenth century, the prayer has been introduced with the verse "And David said . . . 'I am in a great strait; let us fall now into the hand of the Lord'" (2 Sm. 24.14), which is followed by Psalm 6 and the piyyut Shomer Yisra'el* (Guardian of Israel). The prayer concludes with the paragraph, "As for us, we know not what to do." The Sephardi ritual (followed by most Israeli Ashkenazim) omits Psalm 6 and substitutes Psalm 25. In the Israeli Sephardi and Hasidic rites, Tahanun commences with the confession of sins (Vidui) and the thirteen divine attributes; in the Diaspora, in the Sephardi rite, these are recited only on Mondays and Thursdays. Kabbalistic interpretations of Tahanun include a view of it as ritual death or as spiritual "fall," following the supreme elevation of the worshiper during the 'Amidah. See also VE-HU' RAḤUM.

TAHARAH. See TOHORAH.

TAHARAT HA-MISHPAHAH (טְהֻרַת הַמִּשְׁפָּחָה; family purity), term popularly used to denote the observance of the laws of niddah (see MENSTRUATION). The use of the word purity indicates that lack of observance in this area serves to render the family impure and subjects its offspring to a certain taint and stigma. Indeed, the Talmud records the opinion of R. 'Aqiva that the son of a niddah is a mamzer (Yev. 29). This opinion is not normative halakhah. The title "son of a niddah" is, nevertheless, a pejorative one and the Talmud attributes improper conduct among children, inter alia, to the fact of their being the offspring of a niddah (cf. Massekhet Kallah). The major thrust of the concept of taharat ha-mishpahah is, however, a positive one, and it has traditionally been understood to refer to the effect of the practice of the laws of niddah in reducing sexual tension in a marriage during a period in which the wife may not be inclined to respond to her husband's physical desires. In addition to the shift in focus from the sexual to other forms of communication between spouses, the practice of the laws of niddah may also aid in maintaining sexual excitement in a marriage. According to R. Me'ir, the reason for the seven-day waiting period of a menstruant is "in order that she shall be beloved by her husband at the time of her first entry into the bridal chamber" (Nid. 31b). The observance of these laws was widespread among Jewish communities in the past, and continues to be so among Sephardi and Ḥaredi communities.

TAITAZAK, YOSEF (died before 1545), exegete, halakhic scholar, and kabbalist in Salonika. Taitazak went from Spain to Salonika with his father and soon earned a reputation as one of the leading rabbinic authorities there. His students included R. Yitsḥaq Adarbi, who continued his teacher's exegetical tradition and cited teachings from Taitazak in his works; R. Shemu'el de *Medina; and R. Shelomoh *Alkabez. His circle was known for its Talmudic scholarship as well as for its intense kabbalistic pursuits. It was, in fact, the latter which attracted the young ex-Marrano Shelomoh *Molkho, after his escape from Portugal, to Salonika. Taitazak left no kabbalistic writings. His non-halakhic writings are evidently based on Midrashic and Jewish philosophic texts, including the works of *Mosheh ben Yehoshu'a of Narbonne and Ḥasda'i ben Avraham *Crescas. They also display a deep knowledge of scholastic literature, such as the works of Thomas Aquinas and Aegidius Romanus. Major themes of his philosophical thought include the infinite character of the divine, the nature of the divine light, God as the paradigm of all existence, and the soul as divine in origin. His works include a commentary to Ecclesiastes, entitled Porat Yosef (Venice, 1576); a commentary to Daniel and the Five Scrolls, Lehem Setarim (Venice, 1608); and various other works still in manuscript. Taitazak's legal decisions appear in printed responsa literature of his period, such as She'erit Yehudah of his brother Yehudah and Avqat Rokhel by Yosef *Karo.

TAL. See TEFILLAT TAL.

TALLIT (טלית), four-cornered cloth with fringes (cf. Nm. 15.38), worn as a prayer shawl during the Shaḥarit and Musaf services. It is called tallit gadol (large tallit) to distinguish it from the tallit qatan (small tallit), or tsitsit*, worn beneath the outer garments. The tallit is donned before the tefillin* are put on (on those days when tefillin are worn). After the recitation of a special blessing, the tallit is wrapped around the head and then dropped to the shoulders. The tallit must be at least large enough to cover the head and upper body of a youngster. In some areas, particularly in eastern Europe, only married men wore the tallit. Sephardim wear it from the age of bar mitsvah, as do Jews of German descent, and this has become a widespread practice. The tallit should be made of wool with wool fringes attached, but it may be made of other fabrics, in which case the fringes must be made of the same fabric. Today, prayer shawls are often made from silk. Unless an alternative is unavailable, a linen tallit should not be used. "To glorify the mitsvah," some prayer shawls have a band (atarah*) across the top. At the Minḥah and Ma'ariv services, only the officiant wears a tallit; on Yom Kippur, worshipers wear their prayer shawls at all five services; and on Tish'ah be-'Av, the tallit is worn at the Minḥah service instead of at the Shaḥarit service. Priests called to give the Birkat ha-Kohanim* cover their heads and hands with their tallit. Women are exempt from wearing the tallit because the commandment is related to a specific time, but in recent years, it has become the practice for many non-Orthodox women to wear a tallit. The biblical prescription ordains that a blue thread be added to the fringes, but although some Hasidic sects still attach a blue thread, most Orthodox Jews do not, since the proper process for making the blue dye (tekhelet*) is still unclear. The tallit is usually decorated by several stripes running from top to bottom near the ends. This design and the blue color of the thread inspired the pattern of the Zionist banner, which was later adopted as the flag of the State of Israel.

TALLIT QATAN. See TSITSIT.

TALMID ḤAKHAM (תלמיד חכם; disciple of the wise), the favorite term in rabbinic literature for a scholar, implying that the true scholar is always a student and that the study of the Torah is never ending. His learning must cover all fields, and no matter what question he is asked in any realm of Jewish law, he should be able to answer immediately (Shab. 114a). He is the embodiment of a religious ideal, and, according to the Talmud (Hor. 13a), "a mamzer* who is a talmid ḥakham takes precedence over a high priest who is an ignoramus." Scholarship must, however, be combined with moral qualities, and a scholar "whose inside is not like his outside is not a real talmid ḥakham" (Yoma 72b). The rabbis are exacting in the standards of personal conduct they demand from the talmid ḥakham; actions considered normal for others would be a "profanation of God's name" (hillul ha-Shem*) in a Torah scholar, even as regards outward appearance. Thus it is said with deliberate hyperbole (Shab. 114a) that a talmid ḥakham who has a stain on his garment is worthy of the death penalty. Rabbinic law provides certain privileges (e.g., exemption from taxes) for the talmid ḥakham.

TALMUD (תלמוד; Teaching), name applied to each of two great compilations, distinguished respectively as the Talmud Yerushalmi (Palestinian Talmud) and the Talmud Bavli (Babylonian Talmud), in which are collected the teachings of the major Jewish scholars (amora'im) who flourished between 200 and 500 CE, the classic period of rabbinic Judaism.

After the Mishnah* was edited in approximately 200 CE, the sages studied and interpreted it with intense scrutiny during the amoraic period in their two major centers of Palestine and Babylonia, often yielding conflicting opinions that were themselves subject to debate and clarification. The Mishnah's laws were extended into general legal principles and, at the same time, were applied to specific new cases. This material forms the basis of the Talmuds, which, however, include additional genres corresponding to the wide range of intellectual activity carried on by the amora'im, among which are new legal enactments, biblical interpretation, and the recording of the sacred history of their society. Neither Talmud covers the entire span of the Mishnah's six orders. Despite this fact, a popular term for the Talmud is the Shas (an acronym for shishah sederim, "six orders [of the Mishnah]"). However, the central orders Mo'ed, Nashim, and Neziqin are largely included in both. The Talmuds have correctly been described as dealing with religion and ethics, exegesis and homiletics, jurisprudence and ceremonial law, ritual and liturgy, philosophy and science, medicine and magic, astronomy and astrology, history and geography, commerce and trade, politics and social problems. Thus the Talmuds serve as prime source material for knowledge of the real and intellectual world of late antiquity in general, and of classical Jewish law and doctrine in particular.

The two Talmuds are separate works in their final form but in their earlier stages can be viewed as individual records of the same intellectual activity. The two centers were in constant communication; traveling sages (naḥotei*) reported the opinions of the Palestinian sages in Babylonia and vice versa.

Materials contained in the Talmudic passages (also called gemara*) are of three types: pericopes of tannaitic material (see TANNA'); dictums of individual amora'im quoted by name; and later anonymous connective and discursive constructions. Identical or similar passages of tannaitic or amoraic material are often recorded in both Talmuds, with the Talmud Bavli exhibiting a greater tendency to editorial reworking; the anonymous framework (setam ha-Talmud) is likewise more extensive in the Talmud Bavli than in the Yerushalmi. The tannaitic material largely parallels passages in existing tannaitic works, but its Hebrew is influenced by later linguistic forms. The amoraic dictums are in amoraic Hebrew or Aramaic, but rarely a mix of the two. The anonymous dialectical framework is essentially in Aramaic. A given textual unit of gemara is called a sugya and usually contains materials of each of the three types.

The Talmuds are the outgrowth of the intense scholarly activity of generations of sages and their institutions of learning, of which they represent only a partial distillation. The literary expressions of this activity were transmitted orally, compiled and edited, and eventually committed to writing. The compilation of the Talmud Yerushalmi (c.400 CE) preceded that of the Talmud Bavli by about one hundred years. As a result, the Yerushalmi often preserves more pristine and accurate versions of material; the more developed Bavli achieved a greater sophistication of juristic abstraction and dialectic analysis. Disseminated throughout the entire Jewish world (including Palestine) under the aegis of the Babylonian gaonate, the Talmud Bavli became the source of all legal authority for subsequent Jewish law and has been subjected to extended and diverse scholastic treatment over the last fifteen hundred years.

The Talmud Bavli. The sugya is the basic literary unit of the Talmud Bavli; one or more can appear for any specific mishnah. The sugya is presented dialectically, with all material appearing in a connected succession of questions and answers. A linear reading of Talmud Bavli sugyot leads to a perception of them as a flowing record of live debate in the amoraic academies. Actually they are careful literary constructions. In their earlier stages they often contained unconnected tannaitic and amoraic dictums around which was woven the anonymous framework connecting the parts into a whole, sometimes through an adaptation of their basic meaning. A monolithic reading of a sugya yields an extended inquiry of dogmatic quality; a critical reading reveals a skillful composition of independent components with precise literary shape and a dual level of meaning.

The Talmud Bavli is based on diverse literary sources. Dictums of Babylonian amora'im are the main building blocks, with an amoraic statement or dispute often serving as the point of departure for a sugya in place of a mishnah or baraiyta. The use of Palestinian literary sources is evident, whether in a single tannaitic pericope (baraiyta) or amoraic dictum, or in longer units such as entire Palestinian sugyot, collections of statements by a given authority, or a complex aggadic composition artistically re woven into the Talmud Bavli sugya.

The amora'im were a society of masters and their disciples, whose activity extended over more than five generations in several centers. In the first generation (early 3d cent. CE), Shemu'el* was the outstanding authority in the academy of Nehardea*, and Rav* emigrated from Palestine and established a center of learning in Sura*. In the fourth generation under Abbaye* at Pumbedita*, and afterwards under Rava* in Maḥoza, amoraic activity reached its acme. Fifth-generation rav Ashi* is considered the editor of the Talmud Bavli in traditional writings. While earlier amora'im concentrated more upon the detailed legal exegesis of the Mishnah, later generations developed sophisticated juristic principles. The Talmud Bavli might be considered the most developed work of legal conceptualization of antiquity.

The final literary touches to the Talmud were the work of the savora'im (see SAVORA'). Concepts in the Talmud Bavli were extended to logical completeness and harmony, more so than in the Talmud Yerushalmi. Legal positions in the Talmud Bavli were attributed to individual tanna'im in quasi-quotations (de-amar, "who said," has the force of "who held") more encompassing and balanced than actual quotations. Harmonizations were suggested for uneven juxtapositions in the Mishnah. Savora'ic sugyot used hermeneutic methods (see HERMENEUTICS) in explicating the language of the Mishnah. Precise language and technical terminology were gradually developed.

The Talmud Bavli contains rich aggadic passages (see AGGADAH) that often exhibit unbridled imaginative embellishments when compared to their Yerushalmi parallels. The Aramaic* used in the Talmud has affinities with Syriac, Mandaic, and other eastern dialects.

The compilation or editing of the Talmud Bavli was not performed in a uniform manner; thus Nedarim, Nazir, and Keritot, Me'ilah, and Tamid can be distinguished from the rest of the tractates largely by the different technical terminology that appears in them. This group of tractates contains early amoraic strata, on the one hand, and, on the other, an anonymous editorial stratum composed later than the rest of the Talmud. Several middle stages of development are apparently missing. Both chronological and geographic factors have been considered by scholars in explaining the uniqueness of this group of tractates.

In addition to printed editions of the Talmud Bavli (the first published in Venice, 1520–1523), about two hundred codices of one or several tractates have been preserved (c.11th–15th cent.) as have many manuscript fragments, perhaps from as early as the eighth or ninth century. It was too difficult to produce the entire Talmud in one codex or even a coordinated set of codices; the Munich Codex must be considered a carefully planned exception in this regard. The textual variants that can be culled from this corpus and from quotations in medieval literature are significant for scholarly research. Some scholars had suggested that these variants derived from the oral transmission of the Talmud after its editing, which did not produce a fixed text but only fixed contents. More recent research has indicated that a relatively fixed text of the tractates existed after their editing, but the transmission of the text was sometimes in the hands of conservative tradents and at other times handled in a liberal manner, allowing some early tradents to update vocabulary and terminology and perform other editorial functions. Basic reworking was extremely rare; however, a manuscript text of Mo'ed Qatan with far-reaching variants has recently been brought to scholarly attention.

Various works entitled Introduction to the Palestinian Talmud, in which the Talmud Bavli is used as a point of comparison for the Talmud Yerushalmi, contain much of the scholarly enterprise describing literary aspects of the Talmud Bavli. Abraham Weiss has written extensively on the Talmud Bavli. Several English translations of the Talmud are available, notably the Soncino Talmud (London, 1935–1952), as is a dictionary devoted exclusively to Babylonian Aramaic. Scholars are at work on the first modern edition of the Talmud Bavli with a critical commentary.

The Talmud Yerushalmi. Also called the Jerusalem Talmud, the Talmud Yerushalmi is the commentary on the Mishnah produced in Palestine during the third and fourth centuries CE. Some medieval scholars termed this work Talmud ha-Ma'arav or Talmuda' di-Venei Ma'arava', although Talmud Yerushalmi, which is actually a misnomer since it was produced in Galilee and not in Jerusalem, is more commonly used.

The Talmud Yerushalmi includes the orders Zera'im, Mo'ed, Nashim, and Neziqin (except for tractates 'Eduyyot and Avot), and part of tractate Niddah. The final chapters of tractates Shabbat (chaps. 20–24), Makkot (chap. 3), and Niddah (chaps. 4ff.) are no longer extant and were apparently lost during the early medieval period. By contrast, there is no conclusive evidence that the Talmud Yerushalmi ever contained Qodashim and Tohorot, although Palestinian amora'im clearly studied these orders of the Mishnah.

The Talmud Yerushalmi includes the dictums of hundreds of amora'im. Five generations of Palestinian amora'im and perhaps a few sixth-generation scholars are cited. Likewise, Babylonian amora'im from the first three generations are cited, although there is hardly any mention of later Babylonian scholars. No explicit information about the Talmud Yerushalmi's redaction or chronology has been preserved in its pages or in the works of reliable post-Talmudic chroniclers; hence, the identity and date of the work's redactor(s) cannot be determined with certainty. However, it would appear that the bulk of the redaction took place in Tiberias, although material from other academies (e.g., Sepphoris and Caesarea) is also cited frequently. Since the latest named scholars flourished at the end of the fourth century, it reasonably may be assumed that the work was redacted at that time, although it is possible that some activity took place later. Some scholars have suggested, on the basis of its unpolished style, that the work was concluded in haste and never adequately edited due to the difficulties prevailing in fourth-century Palestine. Conscious stylistic decisions, however, also may have played a part.

The Talmud Yerushalmi contains numerous baraiyot, many of which bear a strong resemblance to the baraiyot in the 'Tosefta', although it is clear that the baraiyot in the Yerushalmi as a whole were not derived from the Tosefta'. Likewise, the Talmud Yerushalmi cites many halakhic midrashim as well as several hundred aggadic passages, both isolated dictums and complete pericopes, many of which closely resemble classic Palestinian aggadic midrashim (Genesis Rabbah, Leviticus Rabbah, etc.). These nonlegal passages occur in virtually all of the tractates. The aggadah is both tannaitic (much of it paralleling the aggadah in the Tosefta') and amoraic. Virtually all aggadic genres are represented in the work: biblical exegesis, homiletics and hermeneutics, history (as seen through rabbinic eyes), exempla, and other tales.

The nonlegal material serves diverse functions: illustrating (and occasionally even contradicting) halakhic rulings cited in the legal portions of the Talmud; supplementing and explaining aggadic passages in the Mishnah; and expanding the purview of the primary discussion with tangential material. Some of the aggadot were ostensibly taken en bloc from ancient aggadic compendiums, and certain passages were apparently introduced by ancient copyists, although most of the nonlegal material was presumably included there by the work's authors or redactors.

The aggadah in the Talmud Yerushalmi generally lacks a clear-cut ideological or theological orientation. In addition, it is generally devoid of the literary embellishments characteristic of the nonlegal material in the Talmud Bavli and is often considered more historically reliable than its Babylonian counterpart.

The Talmud Yerushalmi's principal concern is explanation of the Mishnah, usually interpreted in accordance with the plain sense of the text. The complex dialectic characteristic of the Talmud Bavli is rarely found in its Palestinian counterpart. The give and take in the Talmud Yerushalmi is generally shorter and more straightforward than in the Bavli.

One of the most prominent features of the Talmud Yerushalmi is the frequent citation of identical pericopes in different places. These pericopes were presumably copied by scribes, who sought to enlarge the scope of the work by duplicating relevant material wherever feasible. However, some of these parallel pericopes were apparently duplicated or briefly alluded to by the authors and editors and later filled in by copyists.

The language of the Talmud Yerushalmi is a mixture of Galilean Aramaic and Hebrew. The work is formulated in a terse, allusive, and often cryptic style, as a result of which the meaning of numerous passages remains obscure, despite the best efforts of exegetes.

The numerous dictums of Babylonia amora'im cited in the Talmud Yerushalmi frequently differ in form and content from their parallels in the Talmud Bavli. (The same holds true for the dictums of Palestinian scholars that appear in the Bavli.) Very few complete sugyot of Babylonian provenience are found in the Yerushalmi. Thus, while its scholars were clearly acquainted with many Babylonian teachings, they apparently were not familiar with the Talmud Bavli as such. Similarly, the Talmud Yerushalmi, as it now stands, was apparently unknown to the scholars of the Talmud Bavli, although they were clearly familiar with many of the teachings of their Palestinian counterparts.

The text of the Talmud Yerushalmi is relatively corrupt. Few text witnesses are extant, and these witnesses apparently derive from a common ancestor as evidenced by the presence of similar discriminative errors. Only one manuscript of all of the Talmud Yerushalmi is extant (MS Leiden, Scaliger 3, 13th cent.). Other manuscripts include MS Vatican 133 (highly corrupt, on Zera'im and tractate Sotah), MS Escorial (Neziqin), and Cairo Genizah fragments. Superior readings are frequently found in medieval testimonia.

The Talmud Yerushalmi was first printed (without commentaries) in Venice in 1523 and 1524 by Daniel Bomberg from a corrected version of MS Leiden (although these corrections are often unfounded). The most important later editions, all of which are based on the Venice edition, were published in Krotoszyn in 1866 (without commentaries); in Zhitomir between 1860 and 1867; in Piotrków between 1899 and 1901; and in Vilna in 1922 (a photographic reproduction of the Piotrków edition, with additional commentaries).

Hardly any medieval commentaries on the Talmud Yerushalmi are extant, although medieval commentators on the Talmud Bavli frequently cite and discuss individual passages. The first extant commentary on a major portion of the Yerushalmi was written in the sixteenth century by R. Shelomoh Sirillio (on Zera'im and tractate Sheqalim). The only commentary on the complete work is Penei Mosheh, by R. Mosheh Margalit, who also composed a more in-depth commentary on select sections (Mar'eh ha-Panim). Other important commentators include R. Eliyahu of Fulda (17th–18th cent.), R. David *Franckel (18th cent.), and R. *Eliyahu ben Shelomoh Zalman of Vilna (the Vilna Ga'on), whose comments on the Yerushalmi were recorded by his students. Modern scholars, particularly Louis *Ginzberg, Jacob Nahum *Epstein, and Saul *Lieberman, have significantly advanced the understanding of the Talmud Yerushalmi, although there is still no comprehensive commentary or critical edition.

Medieval halakhists generally considered the Talmud Yerushalmi less authoritative than its Babylonian counterpart, although their views about the extent of its authority vary considerably. Some scholars disregarded the work almost entirely (including most ge'onim), while others accorded it a position of prominence in deciding halakhic issues (e.g., Maimonides).

TALMUD, BURNING OF THE. In the year 1240, the apostate Nicholas Donin laid a charge before the authorities in northern France that the *Talmud contained blasphemies against Jesus. The Jews were compelled to surrender their copies of the Talmud pending clarification of the charge; this took the form of the Disputation of *Paris, at the end of which Louis IX ordered that all copies of the Talmud be confiscated and burned. Twenty-four cartloads were consigned to the flames in 1242. The occasion was commemorated in R. *Me'ir ben Barukh of Rothenburg's dirge Sha'ali Serufah be-'Esh, which was subsequently included in the dirge of the Ashkenazi rite recited on 9 Av. The precedent of 1242 was followed in later centuries; instances of Talmud burnings are recorded in Italy, Poland, and elsewhere. After 1242 the popes continued to advocate burning the Talmud. In general, although censored, the Talmud was not burned on a large scale until a renewed order in 1552 by Pope Julius III led to a big bonfire in Rome (commemorated thereafter by an annual fast among the Jews of Rome), followed by many others in Italy under the instructions of the *Inquisition. It was reported that in Venice over a thousand copies of the Talmud and other sacred literature were burned. The last such public burning was held in Kamieniec-Podolski in Poland in 1757, when a thousand copies were put into a pit and burned following a *disputation between the Jews and the Frankists (see FRANK, YA'AOV), who played a leading role in hunting down copies of the Talmud for incineration.

TALMUD COMMENTARIES. The first Talmud commentaries covering full tractates appeared at the beginning of the eleventh century CE in Kairouan, the North African center of Jewish learning. Rabbi *Hanan'el ben Hushi'el wrote a commentary that summarized the basic Talmudic argument and clarified difficult sections. His short elucidations became the model for later Talmud commentators. Hanan'el's contemporary, R. *Nissim ben Ya'akov ben Nissim ibn Shahin, wrote a work called Sefer Mafteah Man'ulei ha-Shahud in which he defined difficult terms and explained complex concepts by comparing their uses in different sections of the Talmud and other rabbinic works. Though his commentary is wide-ranging, it, too, did not cover the Talmud's argument in a line-by-line fashion. Only fragments of these commentaries have survived.

The most famous commentary on the Talmud was written by *Rashi. It covers nearly the entire Talmud and is the first line-by-line Talmudic commentary. Rashi's extremely concise comments help connect one point to another, clarify difficult terms, and fill in the lacunae that the Talmud's terseness often generates. To this day, all traditional editions of the Talmud include Rashi's indispensable aid to Talmud study.

Despite its general excellence, Rashi's commentary occasionally exhibited contradictions. Sometimes a wider reading of the Talmud itself indicated that Rashi's commentary was not as cogent as it could be. This led to the *tosafot (additions), whose authors, the tosafists, sought to correct and improve Rashi's work. Once, however, the work of uncovering and correcting flaws and contradictions in Rashi's commentary began, the tosafists recognized that the Talmud often contradicted itself. Given their view that the Talmud was a well-edited, authoritative statement of the Jewish tradition, they turned to harmonizing discrepancies between Talmudic passages. They often claimed that contradictory passages, for all their similarities, in fact discussed different cases. Thus, they created or recognized subtle distinctions between Talmudic sources that broadened the scope of Jewish legal rubrics and concepts. This movement began in the twelfth century and continued until the late fourteenth century, spreading from Germany and France to Spain.

Between the fifteenth and eighteenth centuries, the tosafists' successors commented less on the Talmud than on Rashi and tosafot. The most famous of their super-commentaries are those by Shemu'el Eli'ezer *Edels, *Me'ir ben Gedalyah of Lublin, and Shelomoh *Luria. In the eighteenth century, however, interest in the neglected Talmud Yerushalmi began to flourish, and two major commentaries were written on it: Penei Mosheh, by Mosheh *Margalit; and Qorban ha-Edah, by David *Frankel. Both are line-by-line commentaries on the Talmud Yerushalmi modeled on Rashi's work.

With the birth of modern critical-historical Talmudic studies in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, scholars have distinguished between the Talmud's attributed dictums and its unattributed editorial comments and connectives. Two modern scholars have written Talmud commentaries to individual tractates, trying to solve textual problems and difficulties in content by using this distinction as the basis of their commentaries; they are David Weiss Halivni (Megorot u-Mesorot) and Shamma Y. Friedman (Ha-Ishah Rabbah and Talmud 'Arukh). Their commentaries take up problems generated by Talmudic passages rather than individual lines. Adin Steinsaltz has returned to Rashi's style of leading the student through the Talmud's arguments step by step. His work on several tractates has appeared in Modern Hebrew and English.

TALMUD TORAH (תלמוד תורה; study of the Torah), a term that refers both to Torah study and to the place in which education, particularly of an elementary nature, is provided. From the Middle Ages up to the threshold of the modern period in eastern Europe, elementary Jewish education was provided privately in the heder or through community-supported talmud Torahs. Unlike the heder, which was the equivalent of a one-room schoolhouse—often in the teacher's home—the talmud Torah would customarily have a number of classes. Although the famous talmud Torah established in Amsterdam in the sixteenth century served rich and poor alike, the typical eastern European talmud Torah was for poor and orphaned children only. Talmud Torah classes were in session throughout the day and into the night. The curriculum consisted entirely of religious subjects, the talmud Torah being regarded as a preparatory school for the yeshivah*. Only a select few talmud Torah pupils, however, actually entered yeshivot; the vast majority went out to work shortly after their bar mitsvahs. Under the influence of the Haskalah*, modernized talmud Torahs, with more up-to-date methods of instruction, were set up, particularly in Russia. Old-time talmud Torahs still exist, especially in more Orthodox communities, and the instruction in these schools incorporates a considerable degree of rote learning, especially in classes for younger students. Much of this involves the recitation of the Torah verse by verse, first in Hebrew and then in Yiddish translation. In the Diaspora, many religious day schools or afternoon Hebrew schools call themselves talmud Torahs. See also EDUCATION.

TAMID (תָּמִיד; Perpetual Burnt Offering), tractate in Mishnah order Qodashim. There is no parallel Tosefta', and there is gemara' in the Talmud Bavli only to the first four chapters. Tamid has six chapters, according to reliable manuscript versions, whereas printed editions of Tamid divide the sixth chapter into two, yielding seven chapters. Tamid describes the daily Temple service, focusing on the tamid sacrifice (see PERPETUAL OFFERING) that was offered twice daily, in the morning and toward evening (Ex. 29.38ff.; Nm. 28.1ff.). A central theme of Tamid is the division of labor and organization of the priests. The daily tasks were apportioned by a system of lotteries, and Tamid portrays the close coordination among the selected functionaries, together with the entire body of priests. The sacrificial service included recitation of central scriptural passages and benedictions, as well as the Birkat ha-Kohanim.

TAMMUZ (תָּמוּז), tenth month of the civil year, fourth month of the religious year; its zodiac sign is Cancer. The word Tammuz is of Babylonian origin, Tammuz being the name of a god who figured prominently in the Sumerian and Babylonian pantheon. While the Bible refers several times to the "fourth month," the word Tammuz is only used to refer to the Babylonian god (Ez. 8.14). Tammuz always has twenty-nine days. On 17 Tammuz (*Shiv'ah 'Asar be-Tammuz) the breachings of the walls of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 BCE and by Titus in 70 CE are commemorated. The Talmud also associates this date with several additional sad and memorable events; namely, the day Moses smashed the first tablets of the Law, the day daily sacrifices in the Second Temple came to an end, and the day Romans set up an idol in the Temple. This date marks the commencement of the annual three weeks of mourning (see BEIN HA-METSARIM) culminating in the fast of Tish'ah be-'Av.

TANHUMA'. See TANHUMA'-YELAMMEDENU.

TANHUMA' BEN ABBA' (4th cent.), Palestinian amora'. A student of R. Huna' ha-Kohen and the last of the great Palestinian aggadists, he devoted himself to the systematic collection of aggadic materials (cf. the reference to the masoret aggadah—the chain of aggadic tradition—in Y., B. B. 6.2, 15c). His homiletical compilations are commonly believed to form the basis for Pesiqta' de-Rav Kahana', Pesiqta' Rabbati, and the Tanhuma'-Yelammedenu midrashim, all of which frequently cite teachings in his name and often bear his trademark proems, which begin with the citation of a biblical verse followed by, "[With this verse] R. Tanhuma' began his discourse" (cf. Midrash Tanhuma', Lekh Lekhah sec. 5). While little is known about his personal life and background, the Talmud recounts his polemics with non-Jews regarding Judaism, claiming that, as the result of besting the emperor in personal debate, he was thrown to the wild beasts (San. 39a).

TANHUMA'-YELAMMEDENU, category of Midrashic literature*, including the following works: Tanhuma' (to the entire Pentateuch), extensive parts of Exodus Rabbah*, Numbers Rabbah*, Deuteronomy Rabbah*, and Pesiqta' Rabbati (see PESIQT'A'). Many medieval quotations (often citing "Tanḥuma" or "Yelammedenu") and fragmentary manuscripts (many from the Cairo Genizah) of other partially preserved versions testify to the diversity and popularity of this type of Midrashic work.

Tanḥuma'-Yelammedenu consists primarily of literary homilies based on the triennial cycle of weekly biblical lections. Unlike structurally similar works such as Leviticus Rabbah and Pesiqta' de-Rav Kahana, it contains relatively little Aramaic, having been written in late Rabbinic Hebrew, although it still employs many Greek and Latin loan words. Another distinguishing feature is the special halakhic proem (often beginning with the expression Yelammedenu rabbenu, "Let our master teach us") that precedes the series of proems, each beginning with a different verse, with which each composite homily normally begins. Many passages are attributed to the homilist R. *Tanḥuma' ben Abba' who was active during the second half of the fourth century in Palestine.

Earlier scholars made conflicting claims about the date and identity of the "early" Tanḥuma' or Yelammedenu, which was thought to be the original source of all the surviving works of this type. Recent research has allowed scholars to distinguish relatively early traditions and sources within early, middle, and late redactional strata running through the various works. Tanḥuma'-Yelammedenu literature is best regarded as a particular Midrashic genre that began to crystallize toward the end of the Byzantine period in Palestine (5-7th cent.) but continued to evolve and spread throughout the Diaspora well into the Middle Ages. For example, Tanḥuma' (the first printed version was published in Constantinople [1520-1522]) seems to have undergone final redaction in geonic Babylonia, while Tanḥuma' Buber (first published by Solomon Buber in Vilna [1875]), whose books of Genesis and Exodus differ considerably, seems to be a European (Italian-Ashkenazi) recension of similar Midrashic material. An English translation of Tanḥuma' Buber on Genesis by J. T. Townsend was published in 1989 (Hoboken, N.J.).

TANḤUM BEN YOSEF OF JERUSALEM (died 1291), biblical exegete and grammarian from Fostat, Egypt. He wrote his biblical commentaries in Judeo-Arabic and also wrote a dictionary to the Mishneh Torah of Maimonides. He was acquainted with a broad spectrum of knowledge in medicine, geography, astronomy and physics. He wrote commentaries on many biblical books: Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, the Major Prophets (except for Isaiah), the twelve Minor Prophets, and the Five Scrolls. While most of these commentaries await modern editions, his dictionary on the Mishneh Torah had two recensions and has been found in community libraries throughout the Middle East. Tanḥum ben Yosef also wrote a general introduction to biblical exegesis which he referred to in all of his subsequent commentaries. The introduction provides material on Hebrew grammar, a method of interpreting passages in the Bible which appear to contradict the Pentateuch, and a guide to those biblical characters who are given different names in different parts of the Bible. His primary goal was to provide the plain meaning of scripture, but he did not hesitate to suggest philosophical explanations, which he derived primarily from Maimonides. In addition, he incorporated details of Muslim history, culture and customs, which helped to explain details in the Bible. His commentary on Jonah provides a Neoplatonic allegory of the journey of the soul. In contrast with many other Jewish scholars, he maintained a positive attitude toward the Arabic language.

TANNA' (Aram.; תנא; one who studies, teaches, or repeats traditions), a teacher mentioned in the Mishnah or baraiyta'. The classical period of the tanna'im began after Hillel and Shamm'ai (although there are sources in the Mishnah attributed to even earlier teachers) and ended after R. Yehudah ha-Nasi' in the early third century CE. Most of the best-known tanna'im lived after the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE.

The teachings of the tanna'im take two forms, mishnah-form and midrash-form. Mishnah-form is a brief statement of a legal norm or ethical teaching, usually without biblical support or citations. Midrash-form connects the teachings of the tanna'im to a biblical verse, mostly, but not exclusively, from the Torah. The large collections of tannaitic midrash-form works cover the Torah from Exodus to Deuteronomy and include both legal and nonlegal materials.

Mishnah-form teachings are collected in the Mishnah and in the *Tosefta'. One of the earliest tosafot (San. 86a) appears to be a tannaitic commentary to the Mishnah rather than a separate, Mishnah-like work, which is what the Tosefta' is.

Among the best-known tanna'im are the Houses of Hillel and Shamm'ai, Rabban Gamli'el, R. Eli'ezer ben Hurqanos and R. Yehoshu'a ben Ḥananyah, R. 'Aqiva' and R. Yishma'e'l ben Elisha', and R. Yehudah ha-Nasi'. The last is credited with the Mishnah's redaction. Maimonides enumerates one hundred twenty-eight tanna'im mentioned in the Mishnah at the end of his introduction to Zera'im.

In the post-tannaitic period, the term tanna' was also applied to reciters or repeaters of the Mishnah and other tannaitic texts. They excelled in memorizing these texts and provided ready references for major amora'im, who used their citations as the basis for exegesis, extension of tannaitic laws, and support for their views.

TANYA'. See SHNEUR ZALMAN OF LYADY.

TAQQANAH (תקנה; regulation), a regulation or an ordinance promulgated for the public welfare or for the purpose of strengthening religious and moral life and supplementing the law of the Torah. Rabbinical authorities have introduced taqqanot throughout the ages, usually to accommodate traditional law to new situations, but those ordinances enacted after the Talmudic period were regarded as binding only on the country or community directly under the jurisdiction of the promulgating authority. The Talmud attributes to Moses himself the taqqanah of reading excerpts from the Torah on Sabbaths, Ro'sh Hodesh (the New Moon), festivals, and on the intermediate days of festivals (Y., Meg. 4.1). The taqqanah to recite the *Amidah is traditionally considered to have been issued by the Men of the Kneset ha-Gedolah. Among tannaitic taqqanot are included provisions that a wife's marriage settlement (ketubbah*) be considered a general lien on the whole of the husband's property (issued by *Shim'on ben Shetaḥ), that communities must appoint elementary school teachers (by Yehoshu'a ben Gamla'), that a father must support his minor children (by the Sanhedrin at Usha'), and that compulsory education be provided for children from the age of six (B. B. 21a). Among the first taqqanot introduced by rabbinical authorities in Christian Europe are those of *Gershom ben Yehudah (11th cent.). His twenty-five ordinances (including those prohibiting polygamy and opening letters addressed to others) were accepted as binding on Ashkenazim. An ordinance enacted by a beit din for a particular reason is not invalidated, even if that reason no longer exists, and only a beit din of greater authority can annul it. Nevertheless, many taqqanot, particularly those of a local or communal nature, fell out of use. Taqqanot ha-qahal* (community ordinances) were a special type of taqqanot enacted by community leaders (as opposed to rabbinic authorities) that governed the internal life of communities and congregations. In Sephardi communities, congregational taqqanot were called ascamot. See also GEZERAH; HO-RA'AT SHA'AH.

TAQQANOT HA-QAHAL (תקנות הקהל; communal enactments). The Talmud recognizes the power of communal leaders to enact legislation in matters relating to public welfare and social administration. It also empowers associations of artisans and traders to regulate their own affairs and to take action against recalcitrant members (B. B. 8b). Communal legislation became a significant element, however, only with the rise of the autonomous medieval Jewish community in the tenth century. The appointed or elected representatives of these communities eventually enjoyed powers similar to those of a beit din in the financial sphere, although in ritual matters they enjoyed no such status (Resp. Rashba 4, no. 142; 3, no. 411; Resp. Ribash, no. 399, 305). Issues such as the power of the majority and its representatives to bind the minority and the judicial review of communal enactments by halakhists are widely discussed in the medieval responsa literature. Rabbinic authorities generally acted as the guardians of minority rights in the many communal disputes that they were required to adjudicate. In matters affecting the smooth running of public affairs, taqqanot ha-qahal were often passed to suspend the formalities of the halakhah; for example, the signature of the town clerk was treated as that of two valid witnesses, and testimony was accepted from individuals who had an interest in the case in question (Shulḥan 'Arukh, Hoshen Mishpat 7.12, 37.22). Because of the ability of the taqqanot ha-qahal to bridge halakhic and lay interests, it has been adopted by some scholars as a model for absorbing Israeli Knesset legislation into Jewish law.

TARFON (1st–2d cent.), *tanna'; teacher of R. 'Aqiva', with whom he differed on a number of halakhic issues. Tarfon was an advocate of the abolition of the death penalty (Mak. 1.10). In a year of famine, Tarfon, who was a priest, underwent a formal ceremony of betrothal with three hundred women so that they might share in his priestly emoluments (T., Ket. 5.1). After the destruction of the Temple, he became a leading authority in *Yavneh and was called "the teacher of all Israel." Tarfon was one of the most vigorous opponents of the *Jewish Christians, declaring that he would unhesitatingly burn their books even though they contained the name of God (Shab. 116b), and said that a person being pursued by a snake should sooner take refuge in a house of pagan idolatry than in a church, for one could more easily recognize the dangers of idolatry than those of Christianity. Some scholars have identified him with the Jew Tryphon in the dialogue of the early church father Justin, but this identification has little basis. Tarfon's best-known saying is "The day is short and the work is great . . . the workmen are lazy and the Master is demanding. It is not for you to complete the work, but neither are you free to desist from it" (Avot 2.20–21).

TARGUM, Aramaic translation of the Bible. After the Babylonian exile, Aramaic became the language commonly spoken by Jews in Erets Yisra'el as well as in Babylonia, and it became necessary to translate the biblical portions read in the synagogue into the vernacular (see Neh. 8.8; Meg. 3a), at first in an oral version. Each Hebrew verse of the Pentateuchal reading was consecutively translated aloud, and to some extent interpreted, by the meturgeman* (translator). The need for such translations became particularly pressing with the spread of Christianity, when proponents of the new religion began to interpret certain passages to accord with their own doctrines. According to the Talmud, two translations of the Pentateuch were then made: one by Akylas (*Aquila) the proselyte into Greek (2d cent.), and one by Onkelos the proselyte into Aramaic, both at the dictation of R. Eli'ezer ben Hurqanos and R. Yehoshu'a ben Hananyah (Y., Meg. 1.11). Modern scholars doubt the reliability of this tradition, which, they think, arose from a confusion of the name Onkelos (who probably was no translator at all) with Aquila. The Targum Onkelos, some argue, reflects Babylonian and not Palestinian Aramaic. Some scholars think that the anonymous second-century Aramaic translator used Aquila's Greek version, and his Targum was hence called Targum Onkelos by the Babylonian Jews. Targum Onkelos came to be accepted as the official and authorized translation of the Torah, and it was obligatory to read it in conjunction with the Hebrew text of the weekly portion; the custom in public worship was to read the Hebrew twice and the Targum once (Ber. 8a). Targum Onkelos gives the plain meaning of the Hebrew text, except for a few instances in which it translates according to halakhic interpretation and except for the poetical sections that contain many exegetical elements. Whether composed in Palestine or Babylonia, Targum Onkelos was subsequently adopted by the Babylonian Jews and was referred to as the Babylonian Targum by the tosafists. Several Palestinian Targums are known. One is the Targum Yerushalmi, a translation of the Torah (also known as Targum *Pseudo-Jonathan). Targum Jonathan (attributed to Yonatan ben 'Uzzi'el; Meg. 3a) extends to the Prophets and part of the Hagiographa. A Targum known from a single manuscript, Vatican Neophyti 1, discovered in 1956, contains a Palestinian Targum to the Torah. Finally, the so-called fragmentary Targum is known from some manuscripts and printed editions. There are also Targums to the Five Scrolls, Targum Sheni on Esther, and a sizable fragment of a Targum on Job (1st cent. CE) found in Qumran. Most Palestinian Targums are paraphrastic, and some Targums include homiletical interpretations. The Job Targum from Qumran contains a literal translation, however. Though all the Targums originated earlier, several of them were not put into final form until the fourth or fifth century CE. All the known Targums, with the exception of the Job Targum from Qumran, reflect a Hebrew text that is almost identical with the Masoretic Text. Common to the Aramaic versions are their fidelity to rabbinic exegesis and their avoidance of anthropomorphic and anthropopathic expressions found in the Bible.

TARGUM SHENI, a collection of homilies in Aramaic (but containing many Greek words) on the Book of Es- ther. It is probably Palestinian in origin, dating to the late seventh or early eighth century, and makes extensive use of earlier Midrashic sources, such as Targum Onkelos, Targum Yerushalmi to the Prophets, and aggadot from the Talmud, which have been incorporated into the work, adapted, embellished, and paraphrased in a free fashion. The author was fond of long speeches and included lengthy prayers in a poetic style. Targum Sheni contains an important passage listing Haman's accusation against the Jews, an early antisemitic tract that contains many interesting details on otherwise unknown Jewish religious customs.

TASHLIKH (תְּשִׁלְיָה), the custom on the first afternoon of *Ro'sh ha-Shanah (or on the second day, if the first falls on a Sabbath), after the Minhah service, to visit a river, the seashore, or some other place where water is found, and to recite verses from Scripture concerning repentance and the forgiveness of sins. These verses include: "He will again have compassion upon us; he will subdue our iniquities; and you will cast all their sins into the depths of the sea" (Mi. 7.19). The custom, which apparently originated in the late Middle Ages (it is first mentioned in Sefer Maharil [Warsaw, 1834], 38a, by R. Ya'akov ben Mosheh ha-Levi *Molin), possibly influenced by non-Jewish folk practices, symbolizes "the casting out of the sins into the sea"; some even turn out the pockets of their garments and let crumbs fall into the water. Different communities introduced variations in the ritual, and many kabbalistic additions were made, especially among Eastern Jews.

TASHMISHEI QEDUSHAH (תְּשִׁמְשֵׁי קִדְּשָׁהּ; appurtenances of holiness), ritual objects (e.g., the shofar, spice box, menorah, Seder plate) or items used to decorate ritual objects (e.g., the keter Torah or rimmonim ornaments for the embroidered parokhet [curtain] that covers the synagogue ark). The verse, "This is my God and I will glorify Him" (Ex. 15.2) is interpreted by the rabbis as "I will adorn him," and the rabbis emphasized the need to beautify the various ritual objects (Shab. 133b). Tashmischei qedushah must be treated with reverence and not put to secular use, although the regulations concerning sacrilege (me'ilah) do not, in the strict sense, apply to them. TAXATION. Talmudic law refers to two basic types of taxation: municipal, imposed by local authorities; and national, imposed by a central authority or sovereign. The sages recognized the validity and necessity of municipal taxes levied to cover all legitimate expenditures for the benefit of the general public—for example, city defenses (walls, doors, gates, and guards), water and sewage, communal religious facilities and ritual objects, and support of the poor. Twelve months were generally considered to be the minimum term of residence for local tax liability, unless a home was purchased, in which case liability was immediate. Taxes were to be imposed at graduated rates, depending on the taxpayer's means, as well as the relative benefit enjoyed vis-à-vis other citizens unless local custom relied on other yardsticks.

Because of the loss of Jewish independence and sovereignty in Erets Yisra'el, national taxation imposed by Jewish central authorities was not a relevant issue in the development of Jewish law, although various taxes are imposed in the Bible, including mekhes paid to the priests (Nm. 31.28) and the king's tax levies (1 Sm. 8.11–17). The legal issue generally addressed in this context was, therefore, the degree to which taxes imposed by the non-Jewish central government, in Erets Yisra'el or in the Diaspora, were binding on Jews as a matter of Jewish law; the discussion was guided by the Talmudic legal principle, "dina' de-malkhuta' dina" (the law of the kingdom is law). Initially, a distinction was made between the applicability of this rule in the Babylonian Diaspora, which dictated compliance with the tax laws of the central government, and Erets Yisra'el, where non-compliance was recognized as a legitimate expression of resistance to Roman rule. As rebellion waned, so did the perceived legitimacy of tax resistance, to the point where Maimonides and other codifiers declared an absolute prohibition against tax evasion, whether the sovereign be Jewish or gentile. Ultimately, tax evasion came to be regarded with particular severity, the sages describing it not merely as gezel (theft), but as gezel ha-rabbim (theft of the public), since tax not paid by any one individual effectively increased the burden on the remaining members of the community.

In the post-Talmudic period, tax was typically imposed by the central authorities on each Jewish community as a whole, leaving to the organized community the burden and responsibility of individual assessment and collection. Such autonomy provided a significant impetus for the development of legal principles for community government and for the fiscal relationships between the local authorities and the citizenry. The burdens of taxation contributed greatly to the refinement of the laws of partnership, which initially provided the theoretical framework for the legal notion of community. Ultimately, this approach was found to be inadequate, and the legal system came to rely instead upon the more flexible tools of taqqanot ha-qahal* (communal legislation) and minhag* (custom) in order to address, at the local level, the increasingly complex problems of community tax administration.

TEACHER OF RIGHTEOUSNESS, a personality mentioned in the *Dead Sea Scrolls. Although no historical figure has been definitely identified as the Teacher of Righteousness, it is generally believed that he was the founder and most important leader of the Qumran community. He was their teacher par excellence, who saw the fulfillment of biblical prophecies in the contemporary situation. His teachings were authoritative and centered on the correct interpretation of the law, over which he publicly disputed with an opposing leader described as the Liar. The Teacher of Righteousness was a priest and prophet, whose other main antagonist was the Wicked Priest, a figure often identified with Jonathan or Simon the Maccabee (c.150–134), and he may have been the originator of the so-called peshet form of biblical exegesis and may also have composed several hymns.

TECHNOLOGY AND HALAKHAH. The interaction between modern technology and Jewish law is a complex issue that covers at least three distinct activities: the legal responses to changes in technology; the scientific responses to some unique legal problems that can be realized through technological advances; and the challenges posed to the underpinnings of Jewish law, philosophy, and ethics by certain modern scientific advances.

Legal Responses to Technology. Jewish law directs its adherents' conduct on a wide variety of issues, and advances in technology change the nature of many of the questions asked. Advances in biomedical technology have created a field—Jewish bioethics—devoted exclusively to addressing the legal response to modern biological problems. The same is true in the area of ritual law. Modern technological advances have made Sabbath observance both easier and harder in comparison to a century ago, and whole new areas of ritual law analysis have been created to respond to them. For example, the exact parameters for the use of electricity on Jewish holidays remains an area of considerable debate. From surrogate motherhood to Sabbath observance, significant efforts have been made to understand advances in technology and to develop suitable responses to them.

Responses to technological advances are by no means limited to ritual law. Financial law is as much an area of research as any other. There is a body of literature that discusses whether electronic money transfers are a form of payment or money according to Jewish law and whether video testimony is a valid form of witnessing. The application of modern principles of agriculture to law has created a literature addressing problems of hydroponics.

The process used to respond to new advances varies significantly from decisor to decisor, and perhaps by era as well. Decisors of the last century were much more inclined to use analogical methods of discourse that were not always predicated upon a full understanding of how the technology functioned. Starting with the classical work Me'orai Esh by R. Shelomoh Zalman Auerbach (1938), concrete attempts have been made by a number of decisors and modern law institutes to ensure that rules addressing technology are firmly grounded in the analytic principles of Jewish law and a modern understanding of technology. Among the other leaders of this approach are R. Yitshaq Halprin and Professor Ze'ev Lev.

Technological Responses to the Mandates of Jewish Law. Many detailed rules governing daily life address the mechanisms of actions and not the desirability of the underlying activity itself. Thus, for example, Jewish law is generally understood to prohibit the intentional, direct engagement of electricity on the Sabbath. With that in mind, timers that automatically turn appliances on and off are used to reach a desired effect (i.e., turn on a light at a specific time) and yet avoid a religious prohibition. These issues have become more numerous and pressing in the last quarter century, as technological advances invade many more areas of life. Technological solutions to technical problems are recognized as desirable, particularly in areas of ritual law. Thus, there are institutes that design electric wheelchairs with capacitors for use on the Sabbath, wind-operated microphones for use on the holidays, and blast furnaces that need not be operated on the Sabbath. There is also consideration of other areas, for example, family law, with its significant issues of family planning.

Modern Scientific Advances and Jewish Thought. Perhaps the greatest impact of technological advance is in the area of Jewish thought. The scientific revolution, both in terms of methodology and in terms of believable data, has challenged contemporary thought on a number of different fronts. Essentially, the scientific truths are not always fully consistent with classical teachings on many different matters. Three responses to scientific advances have come forward that are consistent with classical law. There are those who deny the validity of scientific progress and maintain that not one iota of the historical Jewish tradition should be abandoned because of scientific or historical data. Others maintain that the tradition should follow the Maimonidean motto to accept truth from whoever speaks it and that Torah concepts are fully compatible with modern scientific truth because they have to be. Finally there are those who seek to bridge this chasm and minimize the conflicts through selective reading of both scientific data and Torah traditions. See also MEDICAL ETHICS.

TEFILLAH (תפילה), a prayer; applied specifically to the *Amidah, as the prayer surpassing all others. Among Sephardim, the word is used for a prayer book.

TEFILLAH LI-SHELOM HA-MEDINAH (תפילה לְשֵׁלוֹם הַמְּדִינָה), a prayer for the Welfare of the State [of Israel]), a prayer introduced by Israel's chief rabbis Isaac *Herzog and Ben-Tsiyyon Me'ir H̄ai *Ouziel; it is recited in most Israeli synagogues during the Sabbath service and on state occasions. In many Diaspora synagogues it is added after the prayer for the welfare of the country and its rulers. The prayer describes the Jewish state as "the beginning of the burgeoning of our redemption" and contains petitions for the victory of its defenders, the ingathering of all the Diaspora, and peace for the land and the kingdom of God on earth. It is not recited in some Orthodox synagogues, and the chief rabinate of the British Commonwealth has substituted a version that omits the redemptive, military, and ingathering references that are included in the authorized daily prayer book of its United Hebrew congregations.

TEFILLAH QETSARAH (תפילה קצרה; Short Prayer), a prayer that in extreme emergency is substituted for the *Amidah, the central prayer of the liturgy. When the worshiper reaches the security of his home, he is expected to pray the *Amidah in full. Five versions of the prayer are given in the Talmud (Ber. 29b). For occasions of lesser urgency, an abridgment of the thirteen intermediate benedictions of the *Amidah is provided. This prayer, Havinenu, is inserted between the first three and final three benedictions of the *Amidah.

TEFILLAT GESHEM (תפילת גשם), prayer for rain (in the Sephardi rite, Tiqqun ha-Geshem) said in anticipation of the winter rains in Erets Yisra'el. It is recited on Shemini 'Atseret in the Musaf service, and its concluding phrase mashiv ha-ruah u-morid ha-geshem is incorporated in every *Amidah thereafter until Pesah. Tefillat Geshem is recited before an open ark, and in Ashkenazi custom the reader wears a white *kitel. The prayer consists of piyyutim that mention the merits of the patriarchs, Moses, Aaron, and the twelve tribes. The rabbis say that on Sukkot "the world is judged for water" (R. ha-Sh. 1.2), but the prayer was delayed until Shemini 'Atseret so that rain would not spoil the festival rejoicing.

The Reform liturgy incorporates an abbreviated form of the prayer. In Temple times, the prayer was accompanied by a water libation.

TEFILLAT HA-DEREKH (תפילת הדרך), prayer recited on setting out on a journey. It is enjoined in the Talmud (Ber. 29b), from which its form (with additions from Derekh Erets Rabbah 11 and of appropriate biblical verses) has entered the rites of both Ashkenazim and Sephardim. Different versions exist for land, sea, and air voyages. The Sephardi rite has the prayer in the first person singular; the Ashkenazi version, in the first person plural, following the view (Ber. 29b–30a) that all travelers should be included in the prayer. Recited on reaching a spot about a hundred yards from the outskirts of the place of departure, the prayer is for a minimum journey of about three miles, or for a shorter one if dangerous. *Nahmanides, on sailing for the Holy Land, composed a special version for a sea voyage.

TEFILLAT TAL (תפילת טל), a special piyyut for dew recited in all rites in the Musaf service on the first day of Pesah. During the winter months a prayer for rain and a prayer for dew ("Give dew and rain for a blessing upon the face of the earth") is inserted into the ninth blessing of the 'Amidah (Blessing of the Years). The prayer is recited from the sixtieth day after the autumnal equinox (3 or 4 December, or, in leap years, 5 December; in Israel, from 7 Heshvan) until the first day of Pesah. An alternative benediction is recited by Sephardim during the same period. Some rabbis suggested that the prayer should be offered during the appropriate season in one's individual country of residence, but, on the grounds of safeguarding Jewish unity, the suggestion was rejected. In the summer months a prayer for dew is included by Sephardim and by worshipers in the State of Israel in the second of the 'Amidah blessings. According to the aggadah, God will send the "dew of resurrection" when the dead are about to be resurrected. See also TEFILLAT GESHEM.

TEFILLIN (תפילין; phylacteries), two specially made cubical black leather boxes traditionally worn by adult males during the weekday morning service (originally worn during the afternoon and evening services as well). These boxes, which are bound by black leather straps to the left hand (or to the right hand for a person who is left-handed) and to the head, contain four scriptural passages. These passages (Ex. 13.1–10, 13.11–16; Dt. 6.4–9, 11.13–21), which include the injunction to wear tefillin, are written twice on parchment. In the tefillah worn on the head (shel ro'sh [of the head]), these four passages are written on four separate pieces of parchment that are inserted into the four compartments of the leather box. In the tefillah for the hand (shel yad [of the hand]), the four passages are written on one piece of parchment and inserted in one compartment in the leather box. The shel ro'sh is placed on the head so that the front edge of the box lies just above the spot where the hair begins to grow and directly above the space between the eyes. It is held in position by a strap (retsu'ah) that circles the head and is fastened by a knot at the nape of the neck. The knot is made to resemble the Hebrew letter dalet. The shel yad is placed on the muscle of the inner side of the left forearm so that the section through which the strap passes is toward the shoulder. A strap knotted in the form of the Hebrew letter yud secures it and is then wound seven times around the arm and three times around the middle finger. The remainder of the strap is passed under the palm and wound around it, thus forming the Hebrew letter shin; these three Hebrew letters form the word Shaddai (Almighty), one of the biblical divine names. This procedure is kabbalistic in origin.

Tefillin are put on at the commencement of the morning service. A special benediction is recited before the fastening of the shel yad to the forearm, and a separate benediction is recited before the placing of the shel ro'sh on the head. At the completion of the service the shel ro'sh is removed first and then the shel yad. The object of wearing tefillin is to direct the thoughts of the wearer to God and to the teaching contained in the four paragraphs. According to one tannaitic text, God said to Israel, "Observe the commandment of tefillin and I shall account it to you as though you were engaged in the study of the Torah day and night." Maimonides (Mishnah Torah, Hilkhot Tefillin 4) expresses this as follows: "The holiness of tefillin is great, for as long as the tefillin are on the head and the arm of a man, he is humble and God-fearing, he eschews levity and idle talk and does not conceive evil thoughts but turns his heart exclusively to words of truth and justice." *Rashi and Rabbenu Tam (see YA'AOV BEN ME'IR TAM), renewing an ancient dispute (illustrated by variant tefillin from the late Second Temple period found in the caves of Qumran near the Dead Sea), differed in their opinions as to the order of the texts on the four parchments; some pious Jews, particularly Hasidim, put on two pairs of tefillin. Tefillin are not worn on the Sabbath or festivals (since the observances of these days are regarded as sufficient reminders of the events and concepts that the tefillin are also worn to recall). Custom differs as to the wearing of tefillin on the intermediate days of festivals (in Erets Yisra'el they are not worn). Tefillin are not worn by a mourner on the first day of mourning, by a groom on his wedding day, by a leper, or by one who has been excommunicated; on Tish'ah be-'Av, tefillin are put on at the afternoon service instead of the morning service. It is customary to have one's tefillin examined by a scribe once every seven years. The Reform movement dropped the tradition of wearing tefillin. Abraham *Geiger maintained that they were originally pagan amulets; Leopold *Zunz advocated their retention. However, the wearing of tefillin has been reinstated in recent Reform usage. Conservative Jews have always worn them. A Talmudic passage (Eruv. 96a) indicates that in those times they were worn by women, too, and this has been renewed in contemporary feminist circles.

TELS, town in Lithuania (today Telšiai); seat of a famous yeshivah established in 1875 that rose to renown under R. Eli'ezer *Gordon, who was appointed rabbi of Tels in 1882 and brought his disciples with him from Kelme. He was succeeded by his son-in-law R. Yosef Leib Bloch, who headed the yeshivah from 1910 to 1930 and in many ways pioneered its educational structure. The student body was divided into four classes, based on achievement. Brighter students advanced rapidly from one class to the next, while slower students remained in the same class for longer periods of time. Class participation was the gauge of a student's performance. During the period between World Wars I and II, the yeshivah added elementary schools for boys and girls, a girls' high school, a boys' preparatory school, a women's teachers seminary, and a kollel*. In 1940 a branch of the yeshivah was established in Cleveland. Most of the rabbis and students of the yeshivah in Europe were killed by the Nazis. In Cleveland, the yeshivah branched out into various other educational enterprises. In the 1970s, a branch of the yeshivah was established near Jerusalem, in the Telshe-Stone community.

TEMPLE (Heb. Beit Elohim [House of God] or Beit YHVH [House of YHVH]), in biblical times, considered to be a place where God resided. Over a dozen Israelite temples were located in such places as Jerusalem, Shiloh, Bethel, Dan, Gilgal, and Mizpah.

The temple par excellence (Heb. Beit ha-Miqdash [the Home of the Sanctuary]; 2 Chr. 36.17) was built by *Solomon in Jerusalem on the traditional site of Mount *Moriah and was dedicated in approximately 964 BCE. The Solomonic Temple is portrayed as the legitimate heir of the premonarchal temple at Shiloh, from which it received the holy *Ark of the Covenant as well as the Divine Majesty. From the time of King Hezekiah of Judah, this Temple came to be recognized as the only legitimate place of sacrificial worship to the God of Israel. Centralization of Israelite worship in the Jerusalem Temple was reemphasized again under King Josiah. Nonetheless, archaeological and written evidence indicates that temples were built both inside Erets Yisra'el and outside (e.g., at Elephantine and Heliopolis in Egypt even after the time of Hezekiah). While the prophets frequently condemned sacrifices and prayers as mechanical performances, they never spoke disparagingly of the Temple itself. The Jerusalem Temple was destroyed by the Babylonians in Av 586 BCE (2 Kgs. 25; Jer. 52). During the Babylonian exile, its rebuilding was foretold and described in detail by the prophet Ezekiel. It was restored some seventy years after its destruction by those who returned from the Babylonian exile (Ezr. 1–6) and was known as the Second Temple. The Temple was looted and desecrated by the Syrian Antiochus IV Epiphanes between 169 and 167 BCE and reconsecrated in 165 by Judah the Maccabee. King Herod completely rebuilt the Temple, turning it into one of the most beautiful buildings in the Roman empire. It was destroyed by the Roman general Titus in 70 CE. The fast of *Tish'ah be-Av commemorates the destruction of both Temples. The site of the Temple (see *TEMPLE MOUNT) has been occupied since approximately 700 CE by the Muslim Dome of the Rock, popularly called the Mosque of Omar. Beginning in the Middle Ages, the *Western Wall of the Herodian Temple complex became a site of Jewish worship. Excavations in Jerusalem since 1967 have uncovered further remains around the Herodian Temple complex.

The Temples were originally conceived as God's dwelling place (mishkan) on earth. This concept is also reflected in the oldest portion of the dedication prayer ascribed to Solomon: "I have now built for you [God] a stately house, a place where you may dwell forever" (1 Kgs. 8.13). The Ark, which was placed in the Holy of Holies, had always been the symbol of God's presence, serving as his mobile throne or chariot. This corporeal concept of the house of the Lord was replaced no later than the seventh century BCE by the notion that although God dwelled in heaven, the Temple served as the place of his "name" (Dt. 26.15; 1 Kgs. 8.26–53).

1 Kings 6 describes the Temple built by Solomon as a two-room building with a porch in front, surrounded by two courtyards. The western, innermost room, or Holy of Holies (Qodesh ha-Qodashim or Devir), was entered only once a year by the *high priest on Yom Kippur. Inside stood two immense olive-wood cherubim, under which was placed the Ark containing the *tablets of the Law. The outer room, or heikhal, contained ten lamp stands, a gold-plated altar for incense, and an offering table. In front of the Temple was a porch or forecourt (ulam), in which stood two free-standing bronze columns named Jachin and Boaz. In the courtyard stood ten large bronze wagons, each supporting a basin, as well as a larger basin called the Brazen Sea on the backs of twelve bronze bulls. The courtyard objects provided water for priestly ablutions and washing sacrifices.

The Bible contains no explicit account of the regular, daily order of service in the Temple. However, at least toward the end of the First Temple period, it apparently was similar if not totally identical to that prescribed for the Tabernacle. Regular public worship was almost exclusively sacrificial (see SACRIFICES). The sacrifices were performed by all members of the priestly caste. The rituals performed within the Temple were carried out only by the high priest. Chronicles relates details of the cultic music instituted by David and performed by *Levites. Numerous psalms seem to have been composed to accompany individual sacrifices of petition or thanksgiving and were accompanied in their recitation by instrumental *music.

The biblical prescription for the Tabernacle cult also served as the model for Second Temple practices as reflected in rabbinic literature. Certain changes were introduced, some procedures were elaborated upon, and numerous prayers were added.

In the Second Temple period the institution of ma'amadot was established. The priests and Levites had previously been divided into twenty-four mishmarot (courses), each mishmeret performing the Temple services during its allotted week, twice a year. Israelites throughout the country were now also divided into twenty-four ma'amadot, each representing a section of the country, and every week at least five men from each ma'amad went to Jerusalem to witness the offering of the tamid (public sacrifice). In this way every Jew had a share in the daily offering.

In the later Second Temple period, the *Sanhedrin had its seat inside the inner forecourt of the Temple mount. There is also reference to a *synagogue within the Temple premises (Sot. 7.7-8). A detailed description of the Second Temple is found in Mishnah tractate Middot*.

The prayer service constructed after the destruction of the Second Temple was modeled on the sacrificial service offered in the Temple, while mourning over the destruction gave rise to numerous ceremonial customs. Restoration of the Temple and its sacrificial worship have been a major theme of Jewish prayer. The third benediction in the Birkat ha-Mazon* includes a prayer for "the great and holy house over which your name has been called." In Temple days, the prayer was for the continuation of the existence of the Temple, but after the destruction the prayer was for its rebuilding. After each recital of the Amidah*, a petition is added: "May it be your will that the Temple be rebuilt soon in our days." The same petition is offered after the counting of the Omer*. The Musaf service on Sabbaths and festivals contains a prayer that "You may have mercy on your Temple and rebuild it soon." Wherever a Jew prays, he faces in the direction of the Temple in Jerusalem. There is hardly a traditional occasion or a prayer in which reference is not made to the destruction of the Temple; the ancient custom of having the groom break a glass at the wedding has been interpreted as a commemoration of the destruction of the Temple. According to halakhah, a Jew should leave a square cubit of a wall unwhitewashed in memory of the destruction of the Temple. Some pious Jews, sitting on a low stool in the manner of mourners, recite prayers known as Hatsot (Midnight) each midnight for the rebuilding of the Temple. Most Talmudic authorities held that the site of the Temple remained sacred even after the destruction. Maimonides wrote of the Temple that would be built in the future (Mishnah Torah, 8.1.1.4). Reform and Conservative prayer books have deleted wishes for restoration of sacrifices and refer to them only as past history.

*Reform Judaism adopted the term temple in place of synagogue*. It was first applied to the Hamburg Temple (1818) and expressed the Reform viewpoint that the synagogue had replaced the ancient Temple, in opposition to the Orthodox belief that the Jerusalem Temple would ultimately be restored. Isaac Mayer *Wise claimed that "worship in a temple is conducted in gladness, not in perpetual mourning as in the synagogue" and that a further object of the temple was to proclaim the universal religion of the future, which would be patterned after the faith of Israel. The term has lost any negative connotation and is often used in the United States in the names of Reform, and occasionally Conservative, congregations.

TEMPLE MOUNT, the elevated and walled rectangular area in *Jerusalem on which stood the first and second Temples. It is the most holy place in Judaism and is also regarded as the site of the agedah (Gn. 22.2, 14) and the place where Jacob rested his head (Gn. 28.10, 17, 22). A mishnah (Kel. 1.8) outlines the varying degrees of sanctity of the Temple mount, from the Holy of Holies, which only the high priest was permitted to enter once a year on Yom Kippur, to the outside area of the mount, where the people could worship after purification. The Temple mount proper, to which the biblical and Talmudic restrictions of entry applied, was probably situated between the present Dome of the Rock on the north side and the El Aqsa mosque to the south, constituting somewhat less than half of the present area, which was walled in and extended by Herod (first century BCE). After the destruction of the Temple, most rabbinic authorities maintained that the sanctity of the mount remained unchanged. The Temple mount has been in Muslim possession since the seventh century (with the exception of the Crusader period). This meant that entrance was halakhically forbidden to Jews, because all Jews were regarded as ritually impure, and purification was impossible since the lapse of the ceremony of the ashes of the *red heifer (cf. Num. 19). When Jews regained access to the area after the Six-Day War, the Israeli rabbinate posted a notice at the gate leading from the *Western Wall site of Jewish pilgrimage to the Temple mount, prohibiting entry to Jews, since it had become impossible to determine the actual boundaries of the sanctified area. This has remained a matter of controversy, with former chief rabbi Shelomoh Goren issuing a minority view specifying those areas of the Temple mount that can be entered after performing the statutory ablution and removing the shoes. The Israeli government, in pursuant of its policy of maintaining the status quo of holy places of all faiths, has left the Temple mount under Muslim control and prevented Jews from attempting to pray there.

TEMPLE SCROLL, the longest complete scroll (11Q19, Temple Scroll^a) found at *Qumran (Cave 11, 1956). The scroll, which consists of nineteen sheets of leather preserving sixty-seven columns of text, is written in Hebrew. The handwriting on the scroll has been dated to the Herodian period (late 1st cent. BCE). In addition to the large scroll from Cave 11, one or possibly two other copies were found in the same cave (11Q20, Temple Scroll^b; ?); further, fragments that overlap with portions of the Temple Scroll were found in Cave 4 (e.g., 4Q365a?).

The Temple Scroll presents itself as a direct revelation from God (speaking in the first person) to Moses. The text, classified as "rewritten Bible," is a collection of laws concerning the Temple buildings, festivals, purity, and king, heavily dependent on Exodus, Leviticus, and especially Deuteronomy. However, in many cases the Temple Scroll presents a thoroughgoing rewriting of large passages of the Pentateuch, often with additions of its own to make its halakhic position clear. The Temple Scroll contains no overtly sectarian language, as is found in other Qumran documents, although it has much in common with some Qumran sectarian texts, such as the Damascus Document*. Therefore, the Temple Scroll, while not a strictly sectarian composition, may be part of an older body of material inherited and used by the Qumran community. The work was originally published by Yigael Yadin (3 vols. [Jerusalem, 1977; English ed. Jerusalem, 1983]).

TEMPLE VESSELS, cultic implements utilized in the Jerusalem *Temple. In the courtyard stood a large bronze *altar for sacrifice (1 Kgs. 8.64). Smaller accessories necessary for sacrificing on the altar included pots (sirrot) and shovels (ya'im) for cleaning ashes from the altar and bowls for receiving and pouring out sacrificial blood (mizraqot). There was also a large basin (yam) that stood upon twelve bronze bulls (see BRAZEN SEA), as well as ten large bronze wagons (mekhonot), each of which carried a smaller basin (kiyyor). The water in the smaller basins was used for washing sacrifices, while that in the yam was for priestly ablutions (2 Chr. 4.6). These water vessels may have symbolized the cosmic sea upon which the world was founded and the rivers flowing from the divine garden. On the porch (ulam) at the entrance to the Temple were two free-standing bronze columns named *Jachin and Boaz. In the outer sanctum (heikhal) stood three gold-covered furnishings, including an altar for incense, a table for presenting bread and drink, and ten lamp stands. The lamp stands were outfitted with lamps (nerot) and tongs (melqahayyim); the table was set with bowls (sippot), jars (mizraqot), and musical instruments (mezammerot); while the incense altar was provided with incense spoons (kappot) and pans for handling coals (mahtot). There were also keys (potot) to the outer and inner doors of the Temple (1 Kgs. 7.48–50). In the inner sanctum, two large cherubim made of olive wood and plated with gold stood on the *Ark of the Covenant, which contained the tablets of the Law. All these items were associated with the regular, fixed Temple ritual. In addition, the Temple treasures stored numerous vessels that had been presented either by the king or private individuals. Other vessels came into the Temple as spoils of war. The Temple vessels themselves were occasionally handed over to foreign kings as tribute or were plundered as spoils of war (1 Kgs. 14.27; 2 Kgs. 12.19, 16.17, 24.13, 25.13–17; Jer. 27.16–22, 52.17–23). When vessels were replaced, the new ones may have been made of less valuable materials than the ones lost. The exiles returning from Babylonia brought with them numerous Temple vessels that were restored to them by the king of Persia (Ezr. 1.7–11). These vessels had been stored in the temple of Nebuchadnezzar's gods. Their restoration symbolized the ultimate victory of the God of Israel over the gods of Babylon. According to Daniel 5, King Belshazzar and his court drank from the Temple vessels at an idolatrous banquet, provoking the "hand-writing on the wall" predicting the king's imminent demise. According to the rabbis, Ahasuerus used the Temple vessels at the great banquet described in Esther 1. In reading the scroll of Esther at Purim, it is customary to chant the words "and all sorts of vessels" (Est. 1.7) to the melody of the Book of Lamentations in commemoration of the destroyed Temple. Although synagogues bear certain resemblance to the Temple, it is forbidden to furnish synagogues with implements identical with the Temple vessels. For example, it became customary for synagogue candelabra to have either six or eight rather than seven branches, as would have been found in the Tabernacle and the Temple.

TEMURAH (תְּמִירָה; Exchange), tractate in Mishnah order Qodashim, containing seven chapters, with related material in Tosefta' and in the Talmud Bavli. It deals with the transfer of sanctity from a sacrificial animal to an unsanctified animal. Biblical law, while forbidding such an exchange, considers as sanctified both the original sanctified animal and the animal for which it was "exchanged" (Lev. 27.10, 33). Opening with an elaboration of the laws defining such exchanges, Temurah broadens the discussion to include a far-ranging treatment of the conditions under which various forms of sanctity may be transmitted, removed, or transformed. The main determinant of these conditions is the purpose of the animal's or object's sanctification. Animals or objects may be sanctified as designated sacrifices or as gifts to be utilized for the maintenance of the Temple. A second determinant of a broad range of questions affecting the status of animals designated as sacrifices is the distinction between public and private ownership of the sacrifice. The concept of sanctity is revealed, within Temurah, as an outgrowth of the concept of ownership. Only an owner may confer sanctity, and sanctity may be defined as a form of ownership by the Temple. Temurah investigates the similarities, differences, and interactions between the concepts of ownership and sanctity.

TENANCY. The Mosaic code contains no legislation regarding the duties and obligations of the tenant, except for provisions relating to the shemittah*. In rabbinic law, the conditions of tenancy are subject to both contract and local custom and can be changed only by common agreement between the parties. The presumptive rights of the person in occupancy are of great force in halakhah and render summary eviction extremely difficult. Rabbinic legislation distinguishes between a tenant who pays rent proportionate to his produce (aris) and one who pays a fixed rent (hokher or sokher). During the Middle Ages, special taqqanot* dealing with tenant rights were enacted in order to ensure equitable regulation of the crowded ghetto tenements in which Jews were forced to live. See also HIRING.

TEN COMMANDMENTS, also called the Decalogue (Gr.; Ten Words), spoken by God at Mount Sinai (Ex. 20; Dt. 5). According to Exodus, the giving of the Law at Sinai began with a public theophany, at which God spoke to the entire people (after this event, additional laws were communicated privately to Moses), which was preceded by the appearance of the divine fire cloud; three days of preparation; and manifestations of fire, thunder, and lightning; and accompanied by the sounding of the horn. God's speech was designed to convey to the Israelites a representative sampling of the laws to be given subsequently but was in no sense to be a summary of them, much less an act of legislation in its own right. Thus it contains some of each of the two main types of religious law: those pertaining to the individual's obligations toward God and those pertaining to his relations with other people. It also contains both forms of command, positive and prohibitive. The Ten Commandments were said to be the quintessence of the Law, somehow containing or alluding to all six hundred and thirteen commandments therein (Y., Sheq. 6.1).

The account of the giving of the Ten Commandments in Deuteronomy (4.9–14, 5.1–28) essentially follows that in Exodus 20. The main difference is that Deuteronomy describes the promulgation of the Ten Commandments as a covenant in its own right and the subsequent giving of the laws as a second, complementary covenant. Deuteronomy explains that the full body of laws was communicated privately to Moses as the result of the people's fear of direct confrontation with God, a motif already adumbrated in Exodus. In both accounts, the "Ten Words" were inscribed by God on the first set of tablets given to Moses. When, after the worship of the golden calf*, Moses smashed the original tablets, he was required to hew a new set, upon which God wrote the same text. These were deposited in the Ark of the Covenant* (along with the fragments of the first set, according to the rabbis) for safekeeping and for reference but primarily as physical evidence of the encounter with God and the hearing of his word. The primary revelation of the Ten Commandments, however, was the oral one.

The Bible nowhere refers to the Decalogue as ten commandments. The text of the Decalogue does not even divide naturally into pronouncements; the number of commands (positive and negative) is more than ten, whereas the number of topics is nine: forbidden forms of worship, swearing falsely, observance of the Sabbath, respect for parents, and the prohibitions against murder, adultery, theft, false testimony, and covetousness. Yet the Bible refers to it as "the ten words" (Ex. 34.28; Dt. 10.4), apparently using this round number as an expression of totality, as is found in other places in biblical and Talmudic literature. Various methods arose for dividing the passage into ten commandments. One ancient rabbinic tradition was to count "I am the Lord" and "You shall have no other gods" as one pronouncement, separating the prohibition of foreign gods from that of idolatry in order to arrive at ten. Traces of this tradition may be found in the Middle Ages, as well as in Christian divisions of the Ten Commandments. Another rabbinic tradition became the normative one: "I am the Lord" was considered a separate pronouncement, interpreted as a command to believe in God, and each of the nine topics enumerated above was counted as one commandment. This method led to the tradition of dividing the Ten Commandments into two parallel groups of five each (on the supposition that God inscribed five on each tablet), which were then interpreted in Talmudic literature as being interrelated: the pronouncement "I am the Lord" corresponding to "you shall not murder" (man being created in God's image); "you shall have no other gods beside me" corresponding to "you shall not commit adultery" (both being types of unfaithfulness); "you shall not swear falsely in the name of the Lord your God" paralleling "you shall not steal" (since theft leads to false oaths); "remember the Sabbath" corresponding to "you shall not bear false testimony" (since the Sabbath is testimony that God created the world in six days); and "honor your mother and your father" corresponding to "you shall not covet . . . your neighbor's wife" (because the latter leads to the deterioration of family life). In light of the style of Near Eastern treaties, which commence with a self-identification clause introducing the king, in which he recounts his former beneficent acts to the vassal with whom he is making the pact, scholars now interpret the first statement, "I the Lord am your God who brought you out of the land of Egypt," as the prologue to the ensuing series of commandments.

The two versions of the Decalogue (in Ex. and Dt.) differ in several particulars, all of which are stylistic and not substantive in nature. The simplest explanation for this is the special rhetorical style of Deuteronomy, in which Moses recapitulates the words of God. Thus the phrase "as the Lord your God commanded you" is added twice. "Observe the Sabbath day" replaces "Remember the Sabbath day," which reminds Jews of the redemption from Egypt and is an imperative to provide rest for all—a humanistic interpretation of the commandment that is characteristic of Deuteronomic legislation, rather than the creation of the world by God, as is found in Exodus. In the last portion of the last commandment, the verb crave replaces covet, both virtually synonymous in their contexts. Midrashic interpretation, however, took literally Moses' statement (Dt. 5.19) that "these words" precisely were spoken by God and written on the tablets. It thus dealt with the differences by postulating that both versions of the Decalogue were spoken by God simultaneously. This was one of a number of Midrashic statements designed to express the rabbinic concept of the miraculous nature of divine speech. God is said to be capable of conveying multiple senses and multiple versions of the same statement, and even conflicting statements, in one utterance.

The Talmudic sages differed on the question of how much of the Decalogue the Israelites actually heard directly from God. In one view, closer to the biblical text, the people listened to the divine voice until it ceased. According to another interpretation, after the words "I am the Lord . . . you shall have no other gods" were spoken the people withdrew in terror, and the remainder of the Decalogue was transmitted by Moses. This version emphasized the overpowering nature of divine speech.

The tradition of reading the Decalogue as part of the daily liturgy, first in the Temple and then during Talmudic times, was ultimately discarded, probably in order to combat the mistaken view propounded by sectarians that the Ten Commandments alone were valid (Ber. 12a) or that they were more important than the remaining ones. Representations of the Decalogue are, however, prominently displayed in synagogues (see TABLETS OF THE LAW), and the biblical festival of Shavu'ot became, in rabbinic tradition, a commemoration of the day on which the Decalogue was heard. When the Ten Commandments are recited in the course of the Torah reading, the congregation rises to its feet.

Two sets of cantillation notations are used to divide the text of the Decalogue. One divides it into verses of normal length; the other views each of the ten pronouncements as one verse, regardless of length; and it is these notations that are used today for the public reading of the Decalogue from the Torah (in some congregations, only on Shavu'ot). According to rabbinic legend, which suggests the universality of the Decalogue, the tablets were made prior to the creation of the universe (Pes. 54a). It is also said that they were offered to other peoples, who turned them down, before they were brought to the Israelites, who accepted them (Sifrei on Dt. 33.2). However, when they were issued, all the peoples of the world heard them in their own languages (Shab. 88b).

TEN MARTYRS (Heb. 'asarah harugei malkhut). During the Hadrianic persecution following the defeat of Shim'on Bar Kokhba* in 135 CE, many tanna'im suffered martyrdom at the hands of the Romans. They were charged with various offenses and executed at different times; for example, the offense of R. Hanina ben Teradyon was the public teaching of the Law and that of Yehudah ben Bava' was the conferring of the prohibited ordination (semikhah)* on five of his disciples. This gave rise to the legend of the Ten Martyrs (as found for example, in the Midrash of the Ten Martyrs, varying versions of which have been preserved) that turned these individual cases into a tale of a single collective martyrdom. This midrash occurs in two poetic versions: Elleh Ezkerah, incorporated in the penitential prayers of Yom Kippur; and Arzei Levanon, in the elegies for 9 Av. The latter only enumerates seven martyrs by name; the former, in addition to the two mentioned above, lists 'Aqiva ben Yosef, Yishma'e'l ben Elisha', Hutzpit the Interpreter, Yeshevav the Scribe of the Sanhedrin, El'azar ben Shammu'a, Hananiah ben Hakhin'ai, Shim'on ben Gamli'el, and El'azar ben Dama'. The legend of the Ten Martyrs became one of the outstanding examples of Jewish martyrology.

TEN PLAGUES. See PLAGUES OF EGYPT.

TENT OF MEETING (Heb. Ohel Mo'ed), one of the names used in the Torah for the elaborate portable shrine and divine abode that accompanied the Israelites in the wilderness (see TABERNACLE). In a number of passages, however, the Tent of Meeting appears as a simple tent pitched by Moses outside of the camp, which could only be reached by leaving the camp. Joshua, as Moses' prophetic apprentice, was said to remain in the tent at all times, while Moses (and others) visited it as necessary to seek an audience with God (Ex. 33.7–11; Nm. 11.16–29, 12.4–10; Dt. 31.14–15). In these passages, God does not reside in the tent; rather, he arrives when summoned, descending from heaven in the form of a cloud, and meets with the prophet at the entrance to the tent—the prophet on the inside, God on the outside. The meetings take place not in order for God to give legislation but rather to provide instruction as needed. No reference is made in these narratives to worship or ritual, nor to an ark or other sacred objects. The stark contrast between this tent and the Tabernacle led some medieval commentators to suppose that there were two separate tents. However, since the two tents appear in distinct literary contexts, each making no mention of the other, modern scholars tend to view this as evidence for separate traditions: "Tent of Meeting" being used as a name for the Tabernacle in sections belonging to the Priestly* source; while the simple Tent of Meeting, representing non-Priestly tradition, is preserved in the Yahvist* source, the Elohistic* source, and the Deuteronomistic* source.

TEOMIM, YOSEF BEN ME'IR (1727–1813), rabbinic authority. He studied with his father in Lemberg (Lwów) and in Berlin. In 1774 he succeeded his father as dayyan in Lemberg and in 1781 became the rabbi of Frankfurt an der Oder. His outstanding work is Peri Megadim (Berlin, 1771–1772; and subsequently in major editions of the Shulhan 'Arukh), a commentary on the Shulhan 'Arukh*. Teomim is often referred to by the name of this book. He extended the earlier commentaries on the Shulhan 'Arukh—Turei Zahav of David ben Shemu'el ha-Levi* and Sifte Kohlen of Shabbetai ben Me'ir ha-Kohen*—and added laws they had omitted, while subjecting their statements to a thorough Talmudic and halakhic analysis. Teomim's work is especially valuable because he brings together the codifications of various earlier works.

TEQI'AH. See SHOFAR.

TEQI'ATA' (Aram.; תְּקִי'אָתָא; sounding of the shofar), three series of biblical verses added to the Musaf service on Ro'sh ha-Shanah when the shofar* is sounded. They are known as Malkhuyot*, Zikhronot*, and Shofarot*, which refer, respectively, to the affirmation of God's sovereignty, to remembering the covenant, and to the triumphal blast of the shofar at the time of redemption. The Mishnah (R. ha-Sh. 4.5–6) discusses the basic structure of each series and the varying views of the rabbis. Today each series consists of ten verses, three each from the Pentateuch, the Prophets, and the Writings, with a concluding verse from the Pentateuch. Each section concludes with a blessing: "Praised are you . . . king of the whole earth . . . who remembers the covenant . . . who hears the sound of the shofar of his people Israel."

TERAPHIM, human images used as household gods and consulted for purposes of divination. Rachel stole Laban's teraphim (Gn. 31.19), in order that they would protect her and her family on their way back to Canaan and also probably as insurance that her husband, Jacob, would become heir to the family estate, a legal custom alluded to in several of the cuneiform texts from that period. Samuel denounced the teraphim as witchcraft (I Sm. 15.23), and their banishment from Israel was part of Josiah's drive for religious reform; they retained their popularity until the Babylonian exile. The prevalence of household teraphim is attested by the story of David's wife, Michal (1 Sm. 19.11–16).

The function of the teraphim originally referred to an active, protective spirit of the individual, but the term is used in the Bible only passively, meaning "household idols" (Gn. 31.19; cf. Gn. 31.30, 32, 35.2–4; Jgs. 18.17–18; cf. Jgs. 18.24), with emphasis on the imagistic (Gn. 31.19, 34, 35; 1 Sm. 19.13, 16) and fetishistic (Jgs. 17.5, 18.14, 17, 18, 20) aspects. Some scholars suggest that teraphim were actually figurines of deceased family members.

TEREFAH (תֵּרֶפָּה; among Sephardim, taref), a term that originally referred to the tearing or mauling of an animal by a wild beast (Gn. 31.39) but now a generic term for any defect that renders an animal unfit for food or any food prepared contrary to the *dietary laws. Early tradition lists a number of defects that render an animal terefah. These were expanded by the Mishnah to eighteen (Hul. 3.11) and by Maimonides to seventy (Hilkhot Shehitah 10.9–13). The eighteen terefot are a pierced gullet, a torn windpipe, a pierced brain membrane, a pierced heart, a broken spine, a severed spinal chord, a missing liver, a pierced lung, a pierced maw, a pierced gall bladder, pierced intestines, a pierced inner stomach, a heavily torn outer coating, a pierced second stomach, a pierced third stomach, a beast that has fallen from a height, a beast with several broken ribs, and a beast that has been mauled. Any animal suffering from an illness or injury and unlikely to live for a full year is also considered terefah (Hul. 42a). Terefah may not be eaten, but other benefit (e.g., sale to a non-Jew) may be derived from it (Ex. 22.30). The use of the term was broadened in the course of time and is now applied to all nonkosher food. The term was even applied by the Orthodox to followers of the *Haskalah.

TERU'AH. See SHOFAR.

TERUMAH (תְּרומָה; from Heb. herim min [lift up from]), heave offering. According to the Torah, a number of sacred gifts are said to be lifted, that is, separated or set apart for God. These are the breast and right thigh of the *peace offering, first given to the priests at their consecration and then ordained to be their portion forever (Ex. 29.27–28; Lv. 7.32–34; see also WAVE OFFERING); the cakes of the *thanksgiving offering (Lv. 7.12– 14); the first yield of baked bread (Nm. 15.19–20; see HALLAH); and the *tithes and their tithes (Nm. 18.24–29). According to rabbinic interpretation, these gifts required an actual "lifting up" ritual (Men. 5.6). Apparently the word terumah could also indicate any offering made by selecting a gift out of one's property; thus, the materials for the building of the Tabernacle (Ex. 25.2–3, 35.5), the census silver (Ex. 30.13–15), the dedicated spoils of the Midianite war (Nm. 31.29ff.), as well as sacred gifts in general (Nm. 5.9, 18.8ff.; Lv. 22.12, 15) are all called terumah. In rabbinic law, terumah came to refer primarily to the tithe given to the priest.

TERUMOT (תְּרומֹת; Heave Offerings), tractate in Mishnah order Zera'im, containing eleven chapters, with related material in Tosefta' and in the Talmud Yerushalmi. It deals with the laws governing the heave offerings that Israelites and Levites were required to bring to the priests (Nm. 18.8ff., 25ff.). The biblical discussion of terumot focuses on the special privilege of the priests, who have no portion in the land inasmuch as God "is their portion and heritage" (Nm. 18.20). Terumot focuses on such questions as who may designate terumot; under which conditions may terumot be designated; what is the nature of the consecrated status of terumot; what is the status of terumot that have been intermingled with secular produce or that have been planted; and in what manner may terumot be consumed by the priest. Post-Temple rabbinic discussions focus on the inherent requirement of produce to be tithed and on the status of the designated terumot as consecrated food. A common rabbinic theme stressed in several pericopes in Terumot is the importance of intention or human calculation in the designation of terumot. This may be seen especially in the latitude given to the owner to determine the percentage of the terumot tithe (Ter. 4.3, 5), as well as the requirement of tithing on the basis of an estimate rather than on the basis of measurements (Ter. 1.7; contrast 4.6).

An English translation of the tractate is in Herbert Danby's The Mishnah (London, 1933).

TESTAMENT LITERATURE, a genre of literature, popular in Hellenistic times, that contained the deathbed instructions and predictions of famous biblical figures. These deathbed scenes were already found in the Bible, for example Genesis 49 (Jacob) and Deuteronomy

33 (Moses), and were expanded in the Hellenistic period into full-length literary works, in which the patriarch is usually found on his deathbed, surrounded by his family, to whom he delivers his final discourse. The most complete example of a testament is the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs*, a series of twelve self-contained pieces, each purporting to be the deathbed instructions of one of the twelve sons of Jacob. A consistent pattern is present in each of the testaments: a historical retrospective, ethical instructions, and future predictions. The present form of the text is Christian, but with clear Jewish roots. Certain texts from Qumran may contain the antecedents of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, for example, the Testaments of Naphtali, Judah, Joseph, and the Aramaic Levi document, all found in Cave 4. Other examples of Jewish testaments include the Testament of Moses and the Testament of Job. The Testament of Abraham falls outside the genre, since it does not contain a farewell discourse by Abraham.

TESTAMENT OF ABRAHAM, pseudepigraphous work extant in two Greek recensions and probably composed in that language. It is also extant in Slavonic, Coptic, Arabic, Ethiopic, and Romanian. Its date and place of composition are hard to determine, and although its author may have been an Egyptian Jew living between the first century BCE and the second century CE, the author may have been a Christian. It recounts how God sends the archangel Michael to bring Abraham's soul to heaven, but Abraham refuses to die. Upon his request, he is taken on a heavenly tour, during which he sees the whole world and the judgment of the souls. Still refusing to die, he is tricked by the angel of death into submission, and his soul is taken to paradise.

TESTAMENT OF JOB, pseudepigraphous work written in Greek and extant in Greek, Slavonic, and Coptic. It probably is a Jewish work, written in the first century BCE or CE, but a second-century CE Christian origin cannot be ruled out. It recounts how Job, about to die, collected his sons and daughters and told them his life story. He describes his righteous behavior and his destruction of a pagan shrine, which provoked Satan to destroy his wealth, kill his children, and afflict him with a severe plague. Next, Job spoke of the three kings who came to see him, of his wife's death, and of his vindication and restoration by God. Having ended his discourse, Job divided his property among his male children and gave his daughters mysterious cords that endowed them with the gift of prophecy. The work ends with Job's death and burial and the ascent of his soul, flying to the east. The Testament of Job was excluded from the Apocrypha in the fifth century and only rediscovered in the nineteenth century.

TESTAMENT OF MOSES. See ASSUMPTION OF MOSES.

TESTAMENT OF SOLOMON, pseudepigraphous work written in Greek and extant in several Greek recensions as well as an Arabic version. In its current form(s) it stems from Christian circles of the third or fourth century CE, but it is possible that behind it lies a lost Jewish book that was reworked by a Christian redactor. Its geographical provenance is unknown. The work consists of Solomon's account of how the archangel Michael provided him with a potent ring with which to summon numerous demons, individually or in groups, and interrogate each of them as to his or her name, destructive powers, and the name of the angel who has power to thwart him or her. Some of the demons also prophesied events in the distant future, including the arrival of *Jesus, while others were forced to assist Solomon in building his Temple or were simply locked up in a safe place.

TESTAMENTS OF THE TWELVE PATRIARCHS, pseudepigraphous work, purporting to record the parting words of the sons of Jacob to their children, made up of twelve separate testaments, most of which include the patriarch's account of his life, his exhortations to his offspring, and his predictions of the distant future. Thus, in the Testament of Judah, Judah lists the many brave deeds of his youth, both his battles with wild beasts and those with Israel's sworn enemies, the Canaanites, the Shechemites, the sons of Esau, and so on. He then briefly recounts his embarrassing encounter with Tamar and mentions some of his other transgressions, exhorting his children to lead better lives. He warns them against drunkenness, promiscuity, cupidity, and other vices. He also encourages them to pay special respect to Levi and his priestly descendants, foretells the future trouble that will befall the Jewish people, which will ultimately end with the arrival of the Messiah and the final salvation. The testaments are extant in Greek, Armenian, and Slavonic, and contain several obviously Christian passages. Thus, it is not easy to determine whether they are a Jewish composition interpolated by its Christian transmitters or an original Christian composition of the late second or early third century CE. Moreover, various Hebrew and Aramaic fragments of the testaments, or of related materials, are known. Some of these are found in medieval Hebrew texts and probably represent a medieval translation from the Greek. The Aramaic fragments, however, were found both in the Cairo *Genizah and among the *Dead Sea Scrolls, and while their exact relationship with the Greek testaments cannot always be determined, they do suggest that much of the material contained in the testaments was written in Erets Yisra'el, in Aramaic, and perhaps partly in Hebrew, in the second century BCE.

TETRAGRAMMATON. See GOD, NAMES OF.

TEVAH. See BIMAH.

TEVEL (טֶּבֶל), agricultural produce that has not yet been tithed and is therefore forbidden for profane use. The rabbis ruled on the basis of Deuteronomy 26.13 that liability for *tithes commenced only "when it [the crop] has seen the front of the house," that is, when the crop is gathered in, thus permitting tevel to be eaten by the agricultural worker in the field (Ber. 35b; B. M. 87a). The Talmud reports that this rule was often abused; people would bring in their produce through the roof, so that it would not have "seen the front of the house." If there is doubt about whether the tithe has been taken, the produce is called dema'i*.

TEVET (טֵבֶת), fourth month of the civil year, tenth of the religious year; its zodiac sign is Capricorn. The word Tevet is of Akkadian/Babylonian origin, and the month always has twenty-nine days. Tevet is mentioned by name in the Bible only in the Book of Esther (2.16), although there are references elsewhere in the Bible to the "fourth month." The new moon of Tevet occurs during Hanukkah. The tenth day of Tevet ('Asarah be-Tevet) is a fast day in commemoration of the commencement of the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kgs. 25.1). The Israel chief rabbinate has named 10 Tevet as General Qaddish Day (Yom ha-Qaddish ha-Kelali) in memory of the millions of Jewish victims of the Holocaust whose exact date of death is unknown. According to tradition, 9 Tevet is the anniversary of the death of Ezra and 20 Tevet the anniversary of the death of Maimonides. In ancient times, a fast day was observed on 8 Tevet to mark the completion of the *Septuagint translation (minor tractate Soferim 1).

TEVUL YOM (טֵבֻל יוֹם; He Who Immersed Himself That Day) tractate in Mishnah order Tohorot, in four chapters, with related material in Tosefta. There is no gemara in either Talmud. In biblical law, ritual impurity persists, even after ritual immersion, until sundown (Lv. 11.32, 22.6–7). The sages remark (Tev. Y. 3.6) that "the tevil yom is not regarded as impure," even though he is not yet regarded as entirely pure. The tractate's analysis of the nature of the residual impurity of a tevil yom is roughly equivalent to a secondary impurity, one that disqualifies rather than defiles priestly foods (i.e., the sacred food is rendered unfit, but does not transmit impurity further), such as terumah and hallah. The tractate also discusses some of the intricacies of the laws of impurities, most prominently the laws concerning the conjoining of foods contiguous to one another.

An English translation of the tractate is in Herbert Danby's The Mishnah (London, 1933).

THANKSGIVING. In the biblical era, thanksgiving offerings were brought by individuals to the Temple in Jerusalem as an expression of their gratitude to God. Biblical expressions of thanksgiving frequently begin with barukh (blessed be; e.g., Gn. 24.27; Ex. 18.10; 2 Sm. 18.28; Is. 28.6); hence the statutory opening formula ("Blessed are You, O Lord, our God, king of the universe . . .") of *benedictions uttered before enjoying anything in this world (Ber. 35a). Thanksgiving is the theme of many *psalms which have, for this reason, been included in the liturgy (e.g., the *Hallel). Psalms of thanksgiving have been discovered among the *Dead Sea Scrolls. The introductory part of the daily Shaḥarit service, known among the Ashkenazim as *Pesuqei de-Zimra (passages of song), and among the Sephardim as *Zemirot, includes the thanksgiving of David (hodu [give thanks unto the Lord]; 1 Chr. 16.8–36). The eighteenth benediction of the *Amidah is referred to in the Mishnah as Hodayah (Thanksgiving); its shorter form, recited by the congregation during the reader's repetition, is known as the Modim de-Rabbanan (Thanksgiving of the Rabbis) because the passage is compounded of several rabbinic prayers. The special thanksgiving additions for Purim and Hanukkah (*Al ha-Nissim) are inserted at this point to commemorate the deliverance granted on these days. In the second and third paragraphs of the *Birkat ha-Mazon (nodeh [we thank thee] and ve-'al ha-kol [for all this . . . we thank . . . you]), thanksgiving is offered for the land God has given his people, for his covenant, and for his Torah (Ber. 48b–49a). A rabbinic statement (Lv. Rab. 9:7) declares that, in messianic times, all sacrifices and prayers will be abolished, except the thanksgiving offering and the prayer of thanksgiving to God, because individuals will always want to express gratitude to the source of all blessings.

THANKSGIVING OFFERING (Heb. zevah todah), one of three types of *peace offerings (or well-being offerings). The thanksgiving offering belonged to the category of sacred meals; after the prescribed portions of the animal had been offered on the altar (blood and fat) and to the priest (thigh and breast), the flesh accompanied by unleavened loaves and cakes was eaten by the worshiper and his guests. A thanksgiving offering would be made by an individual who had recovered from an illness, been rescued from danger, or survived a journey (Lv. 7.11–18; Ps. 107) and was typically accompanied by prayers of thanksgiving, proclaiming to all present the beneficence of God enjoyed by the offerer. It would seem that the paschal sacrifice was a special type of thanksgiving offering. In later times, the thanksgiving sacrifice was replaced by the *Birkat ha-Gomel pronounced by the worshiper in public on similar occasions. See also SACRIFICES.

THANKSGIVING PSALMS, a series of hymns, discovered in Qumran, in which the formula “I thank you, Lord” appears. The speaker thanks God for his election and endowment with the gift of knowledge. The highly personal Hymns of the Teacher are distinguished from the Hymns of the Community, which introduce “we” language and discuss the human condition, communal affiliation, and congregational praise.

Hymns of the Teacher appear en bloc in the middle of 1QHodayot. The Cave 4 manuscripts indicate several different collections of Thanksgiving Psalms circulated at Qumran and shed light on the question of their function—private devotion or public liturgy. THANKSGIVING SCROLL, one of the original seven *Dead Sea Scrolls found in Cave 1, in Qumran, which takes its name (Hodayot) from the verb that regularly introduces the hymns contained in the text: “I thank you [O Lord].” The text, written in Hebrew, exists in two copies from Cave 1 and seven from Cave 4, which were written at various times in the first century BCE. The most complete text, 1QH, contains approximately twenty-five poetic compositions. These hymns are individual rather than communal and are usually considered sectarian, unique to the community at Qumran, rather than an outside composition. The hymns are most often divided into two groups. In the first, which is written in first person, the speaker talks about his divine mission, his role as a leader of a community, and his struggles against opposition. This group is often attributed to the *Teacher of Righteousness himself, the putative founder of the Qumran community. The second group of hymns refers to the more general experiences of a member of the community, for example, the struggle of the righteous against the wicked, and contains praise for God, who creates all things and will guarantee the triumph of the righteous. An English translation is in Theodor H. Gaster’s The Dead Sea Scriptures (New York, 1956), pages 111–228.

THEFT. A thief is one who purloins without the knowledge of the owner, as opposed to the robber, who openly and forcibly appropriates another’s goods (see ROBBERY; B. Q. 79b). The prohibition “You shall not steal” (Ex. 20.13; Lv. 19.11) carries no corporal punishment with it, since the crime of theft may be rectified by restoration of the stolen goods. The thief who admits his theft of his own free will must restore the goods or their value and is free from further punishment. If, however, he is convicted by a court, or the goods are traced to him by the authorities, he is fined and must restore double their value to the owner (Ex. 22.3); for the theft of an animal followed by its sale or slaughter, four- or five-fold restitution must be made (Ex. 21.37). If the owner despairs of receiving back the stolen property, ownership passes to the thief, who has only to pay the owner the value at the time of the theft (B. Q. 114a–b). Theft of sacred property (heqdes), or from another who had stolen such, does not carry a double fine. If a thief is unable to repay the amount he stole (but not if he is unable only to pay the additional fine), he may be sold into the service of the owner of the property (Ex. 22.2). A woman is not sold into service even if she is unable to repay the value of the stolen goods. Other punishments were imposed in Talmudic times. Maimonides summarized the general law: “Anyone who steals an object worth a penny or more trespasses a negative prohibition.” This applies to thefts from Jews or non-Jews, whether the theft is great or small. One must not steal even in fun or with the intention of returning the object (Mishneh Torah, Hilkhot Genevah 1). It is forbidden to receive or deal in stolen goods, and one who receives such goods from a known thief is obliged to restore them to the original owner without receiving compensation from him. See also BURGLARY; KIDNAPPING.

THEISM. See MONOTHEISM.

THEOCRACY, term used by *Josephus Flavius to describe the constitution of the postexilic Jewish commonwealth (Against Apion 2.165). Since then the term has come to mean any system of government where power is vested in the spiritual leadership wielding its authority in the name of God. The concept has often, although incorrectly, been identified with the biblical idea of "kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Ex. 19.6) and the prophetic vision of the kingdom of God on earth. The Jewish concept of God is frequently expressed in terms of kingship, to which the liturgy constantly refers.

The opposition of the prophet *Samuel to the people's demand for a king was made explicitly on the grounds that they wished to substitute a human monarchy for the kingship of God (1 Sm. 8.7). Thereafter the king was seen as responsible before God for the people's observance of his commandments. He was subject to God's authority, and God's messengers, the prophets, castigated him harshly if he and the people went astray. A sacerdotal theocracy developed in early Second Temple times under Persian domination. According to Josephus, the motives of the *Zealot rebellion were less political than religious, in their insistence that God should rule over them (The Jewish War 2.8.1; Antiquities of the Jews 18.1.1–6). During the Middle Ages and until the period of the Emancipation, Jewish life was, in a sense, theocratically governed, since it was dominated by the rabbinate that exercised legislative functions based on the halakhah, especially in the frequent instances where Jewish communities enjoyed internal autonomy. According to *Maimonides the messianic rule is theocratic, since it is characterized by the messianic being enforcing obedience to and conformity with the halakhah.

In the State of Israel, the term theocracy is occasionally used in discussions regarding the demand of religious groups that the state be subject to religious halakhah as administered by the rabbinate. Secularists claim that the Orthodox rabbinic authorities are already given too much power by the secular legislative body, for example, in entrusting laws of personal status entirely to ecclesiastical auspices. In this debate theocracy is used as a slogan rather than as an exact term. Ultra-Orthodox Jews, including those who reject the State of Israel, anticipate a messianic era in which God will rule the Jewish state and, indeed, the entire world.

THEODICY. See REWARD AND PUNISHMENT.

THEODOTON (c.2d cent.), translator of the Hebrew Bible into Greek who revised the earlier Greek translation of the *Septuagint. It is not known how much of his translation was actually written by him, since an anonymous earlier translation (c.1st cent. BCE), named by scholars Kaige-Theodotion, was ascribed to Theodotion in antiquity. His version was one of the first Jewish revisions of the Septuagint and formed the basis for later revisions by *Aquila and *Symmachus. Theodotion's translation is literal and follows some of the rabbinic hermeneutical rules. Theodotion's version was included in Origen's Hexapla and was transmitted as part of the Hexapla, but on the whole, very little of Theodotion's translation has been preserved. The best-known section is the Book of Daniel, which has been completely preserved, together with the apocryphal sections of that book, since this version replaced the old Greek translation in the manuscripts of the Septuagint.

THEOLOGY, the science of subjects pertaining to God, his nature, and his acts. The term, derived from the Greek words theos and logos, has acquired a distinct Christian flavor as a result of the history of its usage, but is nevertheless applied in current Jewish discourse. In Medieval Hebrew the noun and adjective elohi was often used in a sense similar to the English divinity and divine, referring to theological learning and its specialists. Systematic Jewish teaching being primarily concerned with the normative determination of halakhah*, theological matters were left in a more fluid and less rigidly defined state (see AGGADAH). In the words of Leo *Baeck, the theology of Judaism is one of teachers and not of a supreme ecclesiastical authority. The authoritative character of the various sources (Bible, Talmud, kabbalistic writings) and of the commentarial traditions is viewed differently by different schools. In the Middle Ages, *philosophy was the major vehicle of theological thinking, and there is practically no distinction between philosophical theology and theological philosophy. This situation has occasionally prompted exaggerated statements to the effect that Judaism has no theology, when the intention was to say that there was no systematically elaborated, official, dogmatic theology of the type developed by the church. Contemporary theological thinking is overshadowed by the experience of the Holocaust (see HOLOCAUST THEOLOGY).

THERAPEUTAE (Gr.; Healers), an ancient sect of Jewish ascetics who lived near Lake Mareotis, not far from Alexandria, Egypt. The existence of this sect is attested solely in one of the writings of *Philo (De vita contemplativa). The Therapeutae, men and women alike, lived in individual chambers apart from society and devoted themselves to solitude, prayer, and the study of the scriptures, which they interpreted by way of allegory. On the Sabbath, they assembled for communal study followed by a communal meal that consisted of bread with salt, herbs, and spring water. Most of the Therapeutae ate only twice a week, while others fasted from one Sabbath to the next. In many aspects, the Therapeutae bear a marked resemblance to the *Essenes, and it has often been suggested that the two groups may have been connected.

THINNUS (תִּינּוּס; supplications), Yiddish word (derived from the Hebrew tehinnaḥ) for prayers written primarily to be recited by women. Thinnus are voluntary and are often said privately. These prayers first began to appear in print in the late sixteenth century; the rise of thinnus as a genre was stimulated by the growing pietism stemming from the popularization of Jewish mysticism. Early thinnus were often derived from voluntary Hebrew devotions for men originating in works such as Natan Neta' Hannover's Sha'arei Tsiyyon. Other early thinnus addressed the specific religious concerns of women, including the three "women's mitsvot" (lighting Sabbath candles; taking a portion of dough for hallah; and observing niddah, the menstrual restrictions and purification), pregnancy and childbirth, and visiting the cemetery. While most of the seventeenth-century anthologies of thinnus published in western Europe (such as Tkhines [Amsterdam, 1648]) were anonymous, the eighteenth-century thinnus published in eastern Europe were often attributed to individual authors. One such author, Mattityahu Sobotki of Prague, was male; most others were female: Sarah Rivqah Rakhel Le'ah (c. 1710–1790), daughter of Ya'aqov Yudel Horowitz, rabbi of Bolekhov and later Brody; Serl (fl. 1760 in Volhynia), daughter of Ya'aqov ben Wolf Kranz, the Maggid of Dubno; and Sarah bas Tovim (fl. 1740 in Podolia). Popular topics of thinnus included the Yamim Nora'im, the Sabbath, the announcement of the new moon, and the making of candles for the synagogue. In the mid-nineteenth century, some men, influenced by the Enlightenment, began to write thinnus pseudonymously, attributing them to fictitious women; this practice gave rise to the erroneous impression that all thinnus attributed to female authors were actually written by men. Many thinnus had Reformist content. They stressed the importance of home hygiene and certain sorts of emotional relations within the family, showing the influence of rising bourgeois sensibilities. Thinnus are still being published in Yiddish in small Yiddish-speaking communities in New York and Israel. The genre has recently aroused interest as a possible model for the prayers of contemporary Jewish women (see WOMEN'S PRAYERS).

THIRTEEN ATTRIBUTES. Based on Exodus 34.6–7, rabbinic tradition frequently refers to God's thirteen attributes (middot) of mercy. There is no unanimity among the commentators as to the precise nature of these attributes and the distinctions between them, as well as to their correlation to the words of the biblical text. The divisions of the scriptural verses are artificial; for example, the Lord, the Lord, God, merciful, gracious, long-suffering, abundant in lovingkindness, truth, keeping mercy unto the thousandth generation, forgiving iniquity, forgiving transgression, forgiving sin, and clearing (the guilty). There are alternative enumerations, some of which include only one mention of the divine name, some none, but always the words are divided so as to make a total of thirteen. The tradition associating this particular verse with God's attribute of mercy, as well as the number thirteen, seem to be ancient, although other numerical traditions also appear to have existed. Some of these are preserved by the *Karaites, who list nine to eleven attributes. The Talmud quotes R. Yoḥanan as stating that the Almighty said to Moses, "Whenever Israel sins, let them recite these middot before me and I will forgive them," while R. Yehudah states, "A covenant has been made with the thirteen middot—when the children of Israel recite them they will not be turned away empty-handed" (R. ha-Sh. 17b). As a result, they form the central motif of supplicatory prayers on all special occasions. The chapter in which the passage occurs is read as the Pentateuchal lesson on all public fasts, and the verses of the thirteen attributes are recited by the whole congregation before being repeated by the reader. In some rites they are solemnly recited on festivals (but not if these occur on the Sabbath) when the synagogue ark is opened, and they form the most important element of the seliḥot* prayers. During the concluding service (Ne'ilah) on Yom Kippur, they form the refrain of a composite seliḥah. The kabbalists correlated the thirteen attributes with the ten sefirot* (also called middot) of their system, and the problem of how to accommodate the additional three middot is much debated in kabbalistic literature.

THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES OF FAITH, customary designation for Moses *Maimonides' formulation of the basic principles underlying Judaism. The first mishnah of the tenth chapter of tractate Sanhedrin reads, "All Israelites have a share in the world to come . . . and these are they that have no share in the world to come. . . ."

Maimonides took the last clause to mean that those denying the beliefs enumerated there were heretics. In his otherwise succinct commentary to the Mishnah, he expands his explanation of this particular statement into a long and detailed examination of the principles of Judaism: The existence of God, Creator of all things; his absolute unity; his incorporeality; his eternity; the obligation to serve and worship him alone; the authenticity of prophecy; the superiority of Moses above all other prophets; the Torah as God's revelation to Moses; the immutability of the Torah; God's omniscience and foreknowledge; divine retribution; the advent of the Messiah; and the resurrection of the dead. Many philosophers disputed the number of formulations or the formulations themselves. Others disputed the very concept of formal dogmas. Although they were never formally adopted, Maimonides' Thirteen Principles of Faith found their way into the prayer book in two versions: a prose version in which each principle is introduced with "I believe with perfect faith" (ani ma'amin), and a rhymed version known as Yigdal*. THIRTY-SIX SAINTS. See LAMED VAV.

THIRTY-TWO PATHS OF WISDOM, a mystical concept, introduced in the Sefer Yetzirah*, that refers to the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet, which, with the numbers one through ten, constitute the elements of creation (an interpretation given also by Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on* and Yehudah ha-Levi*). In kabbalistic literature, the notion of the thirty-two paths was reinterpreted in terms of the doctrine of sefirot*. The highest sefirah (disregarding the almost utterly transcendent first sefirah, Crown) is Wisdom, the first recognizable flash of the divine reality manifesting itself. This flash then assumes form and structure and emanates or descends into the lower sefirot through thirty-two paths or channels. These paths reflect the manner in which the various sefirot unite with each other in order to draw the divine flow into the world.

THRONE OF GOD, an ancient image associated with the idea of divine majesty. In 1 Kings 22:19, Micaiah the prophet says to the king, Jehoshaphat, "I saw the Lord seated upon his throne, with all the host of heaven standing in attendance to the right and left of him." The call of God came to Isaiah, who "beheld my Lord seated on a high and lofty throne" (Is. 6:1). A vivid vision of the divine throne was reported by Ezekiel, in which it appears as a chariot accompanied by strange creatures (Ez. 1). This passage became the basis of an important aspect of early Jewish mystical thought (see MA'ASEH MERKAVAH). The divine throne is mentioned in Daniel 7:9–11 and by the author of the Ethiopic Apocalypse of Enoch (1 En. 14:18–19). Early rabbinic literature is replete with references to the celestial throne. The Ark of the Covenant is described as being an image of the throne. When it was carried on the march in the wilderness, it was covered with a blue cloth similar to the color of the throne. The throne is said to be one of the seven objects fashioned prior to the creation of the heaven and the earth (Shab. 152b). Some texts speak of two thrones, the throne of mercy and the throne of justice (e.g., 'A. Z. 3b). The throne of glory is frequently mentioned in the Talmud (e.g. Yoma 86b; 'A. Z. 3b). The earliest Jewish mystics, using the imagery of Ezekiel, described their experience as an ascent of the soul to the celestial throne to view the majesty of God. The throne and its dimensions are described in detail (Hag. 13a). The idea of the throne of God was also connected with that of kavod*, the visible manifestation of the incorporeal God. All of this had an influence on the liturgy of the synagogue and on Kabbalah, in which the throne was linked with one of the sefirot*. The medieval philosophers accepted the concept but often interpreted it allegorically (cf. Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed 9).

TIBERIAS (Heb. Teveryah), town in Erets Yisra'el, established between 14 and 18 CE on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee by Herod Antipas; in recent centuries Tiberias has come to be regarded as one of the four holy cities*. In Mishnaic times, leading tanna'im lived in Tiberias as did R. Yehudah II (3d cent.) and members of his Sanhedrin, making it the center of Palestinian Jewry's political and religious leadership until the Arab conquest in the seventh century. Around 400, the Talmud Yerushalmi* was edited there; it was also home to many batei midrash and synagogues. In the seventh century, Tiberian Masoretes developed a system of Hebrew vocalization*; and payyetanim, including Yann'ai*, composed piyyutim. Moses Maimonides* was buried there in 1206 and his grave is still visited; the grave of Yesha'yahu Horowitz (see HOROWITZ FAMILY) is located nearby. After centuries of sporadic settlement, the Jewish community was reestablished in 1777 by a group of Hasidim*.

TIQ (תִּיק; case, sheath), term used in the Mishnah to designate two types of containers: (1) the square black leather tefillin* box or, according to an alternate interpretation, the bag in which the tefillin boxes are stored (Shab. 16.1) and (2) a case in which the Torah scroll is contained (Meg. 26b). Sephardi communities apply the word to the casing of wood or silver in which the Torah scroll is rolled up and that is placed upright on the reader's desk, the scroll being read in this vertical position (see TORAH ORNAMENTS).

TIQQUN (תִּקּוּן), order of service for certain occasions, mostly recited at night. Tiqqun Hatosot (Midnight Tiqqun) are prayers—generally consisting of Psalm 79, Psalm 102, Psalm 137, the Viddui (confessional), the thirteen divine attributes, and dirges (qinot)—recited at midnight by individuals or small groups, sitting on the ground, in mourning over the destruction of the Temple. Instituted in the sixteenth century by kabbalistic circles in Safed, the custom of Tiqqun Hatosot spread quickly and became very popular in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Tiqqun Shomerim la-Boqer (Tiqqun of Watchmen for the Morning; cf. Ps. 130.6) is similar to Tiqqun Hatosot but is said shortly before sunrise. Tiqqun Leil Hoshana'na Rabbah (Tiqqun for the Eve of Hoshana'na Rabbah) includes the reading of Deuteronomy, Psalms, and passages from the Talmud, Midrash, and Zohar. This Tiqqun continues through the night, a custom originating in the fourteenth century when the Pentateuch was read during this night. Tiqqun Leil Shavu'ot (Tiqqun for the Eve of Shavu'ot) was introduced by Shelomoh Alkabez and his circle of sixteenth-century kabbalists in Salonika. It includes extracts from the Bible, Mishnah, Talmud, Midrash, and Zohar, as well as prayers and azharot* on the 613 commandments; it is recited throughout the night. The practice has now been taken up in creative ways by Reform, Reconstructionist, and Conservative Jews. Tiqqun Shabbat (Sabbath Tiqqun) is a collection of piyyutim, excerpts from Mishnah Shabbat, and so on. Its composition is attributed to the kabbalist Yitshaq Luria and it is recited on Friday evenings and Sabbaths. Some rites observed tiqqunim on various other occasions, such as on the traditional anniversary of the death of Moses (7 Adar) and of the death of Yitshaq Luria (5 Av). See also TIQQUN 'OLAM.

TIQQUN 'OLAM (תִּקּוּן עוֹלָם), The verb t q n (set straight, put in order) occurs in no biblical book except Ecclesiastes. The Mishnah (e.g., Git. 4.1) already uses the combination in the sense of a proper ordering of the world ('olam), thus justifying rabbinic ordinances designed to improve social and legal arrangements. In the liturgy, the term is used in a more eschatological sense: the perfection of the world by the establishment in it of God's kingdom. In Lurianic Kabbalah, the term refers to the mystical process of repairing the primordial catastrophe of the breaking* of the vessels, by which the fallen world of chaos ultimately becomes the redeemed 'olam ha-tiqqun. See also LURIA, YITSHAQ.

TIQQUN SOFERIM (תִּקּוּן סוֹפְרִים; correction of the scribes), corrections of the biblical text (mostly changes in pronominal suffixes) traditionally ascribed to the Men of the Keneset ha-Gedolah* (see SOFERIM). There are—according to various opinions expressed in Talmudic literature—eight, eleven, or eighteen such changes, intended to avoid anthropomorphism (e.g., Gn. 18.22—"but Abraham stood yet before the Lord," instead of a presumed original "but the Lord stood yet before Abraham") or to eliminate offensive terms by a resort to euphemism (e.g., Jb. 2.9, where Job is counseled to "bless God and die," meaning "to curse God"). For these verses, the rabbis use two main terms, namely kinnah ha-katuv (the verse uses a euphemism) in the early sources, and tiqqun (correction) in the later lists. Tiqqun soferim is also the colloquial term for an unpointed printed text of the Torah used in preparation for the reading of the Torah (see QERYAT HA-TORAH).

TISH (יֵטִי; טִישׁ; table), name for a Hasidic gathering around the table of a rebbe, usually for one of the Sabbath or festival meals, especially on Friday night or for the third Sabbath meal on Saturday. The rebbe's followers assemble while the rebbe blesses and partakes of the food; in some courts, portions of the food (shirayim) are distributed. The meal is accompanied by the singing of special melodies and features a discourse by the rebbe.

TISH'AH BE-'AV (תִּשְׁעָה בְּאָב; 9 Av), day of mourning in commemoration of the destruction of the two Temples; the culmination of the semi-mourning periods of the Three Weeks and the Nine Days (see BEIN HAMETSARIM). In the words of the Talmud, "disasters recurred again and again to the Jewish people [on that date]"; in point of fact, only the fall of Betar, the last stronghold of Bar Kokhba' (see BAR KOKHBA', SHIM'ON), captured by the Romans in 135 CE, possibly occurred on that day. According to 2 Kings 25.8–9, the First Temple was burned on 7 Av; according to Jeremiah 52.12, the date was 10 Av; however, the Talmud (Ta'an. 29a, possibly influenced by the fall of Betar) explained that the destruction of the Temple took place on 9 Av, and all subsequent major catastrophes that happened around that time were ascribed to that sad day. The Second Temple was destroyed on 10 Av, but by tradition, this date was set back to 9 Av. The Karaites, however, observe the fast on 10 Av. The Mishnah (Ta'an. 4.6) adds to the list of tragic events of 9 Av God's decree against the entrance of the children of Israel into the Holy Land after the incident of the twelve spies and the plowing up of Jerusalem in 136 CE. Yitshaq Abravanel repeatedly maintains that the expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492 (he, himself, was one of the exiles) took place on 9 Av, though the actual date, the last day of July, was a few days earlier. The 9th of Av is observed as a fast, the only fast day, except for the biblical fast of Yom Kippur, to start at sunset and last for twenty-four hours. There is a ban on bathing, shaving, and wearing leather shoes. It is customary not to work or sit on ordinary chairs before midday. The essential features of the special liturgy for the observance are the reading of the Book of Lamentations (at the evening service, and in some congregations again the following morning) and the recital of qinot (dirges) composed not only in commemoration of the events of 9 Av but in commemoration of all the tragic occasions of Jewish history. In many synagogues, congregants sit on the floor or on low benches and read the qinot by dim candlelight as signs of mourning. In some synagogues, the curtain over the ark is removed; and among some Sephardi congregations, a black curtain is placed over the ark. A unique feature of the commemoration is that prayer shawls and phylacteries are donned not in the morning but at the afternoon service (except among Yemenite Jews), which also includes a moving prayer for the occasion. If 9 Av falls on a Sabbath, the observance of the fast day is postponed until the next day. The Midrash (Lam. Rab. 1) states that "The Messiah, the Savior, was born on the day that the Temple was destroyed," and Jews have traditionally believed that the Messiah would be born on 9 Av; consequently in certain eastern communities, the women anoint themselves with oil after midday of the fast. It is a custom to visit the cemetery on Tish'ah be-'Av. In Erets Yisra'el, pilgrimages are made to the *Western Wall, and places of entertainment are closed. Reform Jews do not observe 9 Av as a fast day but in recent years have developed alternative ways to mark the day. *Shabbetai Tsevi was said to have been born on Tish'ah be-'Av, and his followers observed it as a feast day to mark the beginning of the messianic age.

TISHREI (תִּשְׁרֵי), seventh month in the religious calendar and the first month in the civil and chronological calendar. Tishrei always has thirty days. The name does not occur in the Bible, in which the seventh month is referred to as Ethanim (1 Kgs. 8.2). The word Tishrei derives from the Akkadian (Tashritu) or from the Aramaic sherei, meaning "to begin." Its zodiac sign is Libra, which was related homiletically to the penitential season at the beginning of the month. This period covers the first ten days of the month, known as the Ten Days of Repentance (see 'ASERET YEMEI TESHUVAH), which begins with *Ro'sh ha-Shanah and concludes with Yom Kippur. According to the aggadah, during the month of Tishrei the world was created, the *patriarchs were born, and *Moses descended for the second time from Mount Sinai. Notable days during the month are 1–2 Tishrei, Ro'sh ha-Shanah; 3, *Tsom Gedalyah; 10, Yom Kippur; 15, first day of Sukkot; 16, second day of Sukkot, observed as a holiday in the Diaspora; 16–21, hol ha-mo'ed Sukkot in Israel (17–21 in the Diaspora); 21, *Hosha'na Rabbah; 22, *Shemini 'Atseret (together with *Simhat Torah in Israel); 23, Simhat Torah in the Diaspora.

TITHES, the tenth part of one's annual income, set aside for a specific purpose. During the biblical period, detailed laws were promulgated concerning the tithing of agricultural produce and livestock. The earliest biblical reference to the practice concerns Abraham's tithe to Melchizedek (Gn. 14.18–20). All produce, fruits, and vegetables, are liable to be tithed. Untithed produce is called tevel*, and may not be eaten except incidentally while it is still in the field. In addition to the heave offering (see TERUMAH), the first tithe (ma'aser ri'shon), second tithe (ma'aser sheni), and poor tithe (ma'aser ani) must be separated. For the purposes of tithing, the calendar is divided into seven-year cycles. The first tithe is to be separated in each of the first six years; the second tithe in the first, second, fourth, and fifth years; the poor tithe in the third and sixth years. Produce of the seventh year (shemittah*), produce of the heqdash*, ownerless property (hefker*), gleanings (see LEQET, SHIKHIAH, AND PE'AH), and corners of fields left for the poor are not liable to be tithed. The first tithe (Nm. 18.24) is given to the *Levites, who could own no land themselves, and who, in turn, must give one-tenth of what they receive (that is, one-hundredth of the total produce, called terumat ma'aser [the heave offering of the tithe]), to the priest (Nm. 18.26). The Levites may then use the remainder as they wish. The second tithe (Lv. 27.30–31; Dt. 14.22–26) must be taken to Jerusalem and consumed there (according to the rabbis, animal tithes were also brought to the Temple). The second tithe may, however, be exchanged for money, and this amount, together with an additional fifth, must be taken to Jerusalem and spent there. The poor tithe (Dt. 14.28–29, 26.12), or its cash equivalent, is distributed to the needy anywhere. Produce untithed at its source is liable to tithing by whoever possesses it. One may not substitute tithes from one type of produce for another, nor from bad produce for good produce, nor produce grown in one location for produce from another. Twice during the seven-year cycle, in the fourth and seventh years, before Pesah, all tithing obligations must be brought up to date, the tithes removed (bi'ur; cf. Dt. 26.12 ff.; Ma'as. Sh. 5), and a relevant confession recited. Tithing was obligatory only in Erets Yisra'el, but the custom arose among some Jews of allocating a tenth of their income to charity. A symbolic tithing ceremony has been developed in modern Israel. Rabbinical discussion of the subject can be found in the Talmudic tractates Terumot*, Ma'asrot*, and Ma'aser Sheni*.

TOBIT, an apocryphal work of unknown authorship that dates from approximately the third century BCE. Probably written in Aramaic, it is extant in its entirety only in Greek translation and later translations based upon the Greek, but Aramaic and Hebrew fragments of the work were discovered among the Dead Sea Scrolls*. The Book of Tobit consists of a first-person account of the righteous Tobit, of the tribe of Naphtali, who was exiled to Assyria in the days of Shalmaneser. Tobit describes how, upon suddenly becoming blind, he sent his son, Tobias, to Media to collect an old debt. Tobias, accompanied by the angel Raphael, goes to Ecbatana and meets Sarah, whose seven husbands had all been killed by the evil spirit Asmodeus* on their wedding night. Tobias marries Sarah and drives Asmodeus* away with a secret recipe given to him by Raphael. Upon returning to Nineveh, Tobias uses a similar recipe to restore Tobit's eyesight. The Book of Tobit ends with Tobit's final words to Tobias, in which he foretells the restoration of Jerusalem, the ingathering of the exiles, and the coming of the gentiles. English translations can be found in standard versions of the Apocrypha.

TODAH. See THANKSGIVING OFFERING.

TOHORAH (טְהוּרָה; purification), the preparation of a corpse prior to burial*. The rite, which is performed by the hevrah qaddisha'* (burial society), involves the careful washing of the entire body, including the orifices and between the fingers and toes, with warm water, while certain biblical verses and prayers are recited. The body is then dried and wrapped in a plain linen shroud. Women members of the hevrah qaddisha'* attend to women, and men attend to men. The practice is of post-biblical origin. It is not performed in Reform Judaism.

TOHOROT (טְהוּרוֹת; Purities), sixth and last order of the Mishnah, dealing with the laws governing ritual impurity and rites of purification. It has twelve tractates: Kelim*, Ohalot*, Nega'im*, Parah*, Tohorot*, Miqva'ot*, Niddah*, Makhshirin*, Zavim*, Tevul Yom*, Yadayim*, and Uqtsin*. All appear as well in the Tosefta, but only one, Niddah, has gemara', in both Talmuds. Tohorot is the largest of the six orders of the Mishnah, indicating its continuing centrality in the religious consciousness of rabbinic Judaism even after the destruction of the Temple.

TOKHAHAH (תּוֹכַחָה; Rebuke), the name given to two sections of the Pentateuch (Lv. 26 and Dr. 28) that prophesy a series of drastic punishments to be visited upon the Israelites should they forsake the Torah. When these sections are read as part of the weekly portion in the synagogue, it is customary in many places for the reader himself to be called to this portion of the Torah and to read it in an undertone and without a break.

TOLEDOT YESHU, a work about the life of Jesus* that circulated among Jews during the Middle Ages. It dates from the tenth century or later but was compiled from earlier sources. Various versions circulated, and Samuel Krauss* published nine of these. The work gives ignoble interpretations of many details of Jesus' life. In some versions, he was said to have been the illegitimate son of Mary fathered by a Roman soldier named Panthera (as first stated by Celsus in the second century); in others, Mary was said to have been raped by a neighbor. Jesus' powers were purportedly derived from black magic or from stealing a holy name from the Temple. The dates given do not correspond to the historical Jesus, and the work is an expression of vulgar polemics written in reaction to the no less vulgar attacks on Judaism in popular Christian teaching and writing.

TOMB OF RACHEL. See RACHEL.

TOMBS. In the Bible, the Hebrew word qavar (bury) is used both for burial in the earth and for interment in tombs, burial* being the only permitted method for the reverential disposal of the dead. In Talmudic times, however, the word qavar was confined to a grave in the soil, while the word kukh was used for the rock-hewn tombs that were a prominent feature of the hill country of Judah and Galilee. The traditional tombs of the members of the Sanhedrin in Jerusalem and the discovery in recent years of the extensive burial place at Beit She'arim in Galilee are outstanding examples of these tombs. The Bible makes occasional mention of a matsevah, that is, some kind of monument or pillar placed over a tomb (for example, that placed by Jacob over the tomb of Rachel, Gen. 35:20; the one Absalom prepared for himself, 2 Sm. 18:18), but the custom of erecting tombstones over graves is of comparatively recent origin among Jews (as late as the sixteenth century Yosef Karo declared that it was not obligatory; Shulhan 'Arukh, Yoreh De'ah 364). It is extremely common in North America, where the tombstone is unveiled (a cloth covering is removed as part of the ceremony) usually a month or a year after the death. Among Sephardim and among Ashkenazim in Israel the tombstones are laid flat; elsewhere it is the Ashkenazi custom to place tombstones in an upright position. Few inscriptions on Jewish tombs have been found from before the first century BCE, but from that period on, they are a regular feature of Jewish tombs. The epitaphs, though mostly in Hebrew, appear in the classical period in other languages as well, especially in Greek, and the tombs are frequently decorated with typical Jewish symbols (menorah, etrog, lulav, etc.). In the Middle Ages, inscriptions were entirely in Hebrew, but in recent centuries the vernacular has again appeared on tombstones, with or without Hebrew. On the tombstones of priests, it is customary to portray two hands in the traditional gesture of the Birkat ha-Kohanim*, and on the tombstones of Levites, it is customary to carve a ewer above the inscription, symbolic of the Levitical function in the ancient Temple. In some communities it became customary for visitors to place a stone on the grave.

TOPHETH, designation of cultic installations built in Gei Ben Hinnom, west of Jerusalem, in the time of Jeremiah, just prior to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians (2 Kgs. 23.10; Jer. 7.31–32). These shrines were dedicated to the worship of the Canaanite deity Molech*, which consisted of child sacrifice—a practice abhorrent to Israelite law (Lv. 18.21; Dt. 12.30–31, 18.10) and condemned by Israel's prophets (Jer. 19.5–6, 32.35; Ez. 16.21, 23.37). The word topheth refers to the stand over the fire or the whole hearth on which the victim was burned; in later usage it became synonymous with unspeakable horror and eventually, along with Gei Ben Hinnom (see GEIHINNOM), with hell.

TORAH (תּוֹרָה), a term applied both to the entire corpus of sacred literature and to the first section of the Hebrew Bible.

Corpus of Sacred Literature. The word torah (instruction, teaching, or guidance) is probably derived from yarah (throw [lots for divine guidance by oracle]). In biblical usage, the word has no particular prominence and appears together with similar terms and in the plural form torot (commandments, laws, ordinances). The first more specific use of the term, in the singular, seems to be in Malachi 3.22, "Remember the Torah of Moses my servant." Only in the Second Temple period, under the influence of Hellenistic usage that considered every religion as a nomos (law) and the founder of a religion as a nomothetēs (lawgiver), did torah (translated in the Septuagint* as nomos) come to mean "law" in the more specific sense. This Hellenistic usage is also common in the Greek New Testament (and especially in the Pauline Epistles) and has contributed decisively to the negative Christian stereotype of Judaism, according to which Christianity is a religion (defined as a religion of love) whereas the Jews only have a "law." In rabbinic literature, torah is used in a variety of senses, all based on the general understanding of torah as the guidance and teaching imparted to Israel by divine "revelation." Thus, Torah designates the Pentateuch as distinct from the other two main sections of the Hebrew Bible—the Prophets and the Hagiographa (see BIBLE)—but in a wider sense also applies to scripture as a whole and to biblical legislation in contradistinction to rabbinical enactments. Scripture, however, is only the torah she-bi-khetav, the "written law, which is supplemented by the equally divine torah she-be-'al peh, the "oral law. Both of these together constitute "the Torah" in its most comprehensive sense. In the Bible, the term is often applied to specific laws and regulations, for example, the law (torah) of various offerings (Lv. 6–7) or "the law [torah] of the leper" (Lv. 14.2), where rabbinic writing would have used din or halakhah*. The concept of torah is wider than that of halakhah, which is only part of Torah. The study of Torah was considered by the rabbis a major religious duty (see EDUCATION; STUDY; TALMUD TORAH) and its fulfillment the highest goal of piety and virtue. Unlike wisdom*, which is shared by all nations, Torah is the exclusive possession of the Jewish people: "If one shall say to you that there is wisdom in Edom, believe it; if he says there is Torah in Edom, believe it not" (Lam. Rab. 2). The divine injunction to Joshua (Jos. 1.8) "this book of the Torah shall not depart from your mouth, but you shall meditate on it day and night" was interpreted as an exhortation to devote the whole of one's time to the study of the Torah. The daily prayers include a blessing to God for the commandment to occupy oneself with the study of the Torah, while the blessing immediately preceding the reading of the Shema*, both in the morning and the evening (known as Ahavah Rabbah* and Ahavat 'Olam), is one of praise to God for giving the Torah and of prayer for divine grace in its acquisition. The rabbinic passage enumerating those things the fruit of which man enjoys in this world, while the main reward is reserved for the world to come, concludes "but the study of the Torah is equivalent to them all" (Pe'ah 1.1). The idea that the Torah is the source of life of the Jewish people is expressed in many rabbinic parables and homilies, but particularly in the liturgical blessings (see BIRKAT HA-TORAH) recited by the person called to the synagogal reading and in the daily morning prayer: "Blessed is our God, who has created us for his glory and has separated us from them that go astray, and has given us the Torah and thus planted everlasting life in our midst. May he open our heart unto his Torah."

First Section of the Hebrew Bible. The Torah is subdivided into five sections (see HÜMMASH), also referred to as "books": *Genesis, *Exodus, *Leviticus, *Numbers, and *Deuteronomy. Christians thus refer to the Torah as the "five books of Moses." This, as well as the common term Pentateuch (Gr. pentateuchos [five-volumed work]), are really misnomers. Jewish tradition, as well as modern scholarship, sees the entire Torah as a single book, a continuous literary work that was divided into five parts after it was completed, since in ancient times there were not scrolls large enough to contain such a long work. Nowhere in the Bible is the biblical book known in Judaism as the Torah called by this name; this is a post-biblical tradition.

Literarily, the Torah is a unique combination of narrative and law. It is a continuous story, but more than half consists of laws and commandments, which are encased in the story's framework. The story divides into two unequal parts. The first, the introductory "universal history" traces the history of mankind from Creation, until, by gradually narrowing its focus, it centers on one family: that of Terah, father of Abram (Gn. 1–11). The second portion, the main body of the narrative (Gn. 12–Dt. 34), recounts the saga of the family of Abraham, which, through the line of Isaac and Jacob, becomes the Israelite people. The account begins with the patriarchs' wanderings in Canaan, during which time God promises them that this land will eventually become their national territory and that their numerous progeny will fill it and even expand beyond its borders. At the end of the patriarchal period, however, this two-part promise (see COVENANT) seems quite unrealizable: Jacob's descendants are few, and they leave Canaan to settle in Egypt, where they are ultimately enslaved and threatened with extermination. The remainder of the narrative recounts how their fortunes are reversed and how the divine promise is fulfilled. Despite bondage, the Israelites increase vastly in number, after which, under the divinely appointed leadership of Moses, they are delivered by God from slavery and led through the wilderness to the frontier of the Promised Land, which they have but to enter and conquer.

The bulk of the Torah—from Exodus 19 through Numbers 10—is taken up by the Sinai section. At Sinai, Israel receives God's laws, and the covenant with God becomes conditional on their faithful fulfillment. All the institutions of Israelite society and religion are established. Yet the narrative itself is scant, relating only how the Israelites arrived at Sinai and experienced the revelation of God there; most of the text records the actual laws and statutes. The wilderness section (Nm. 11–Dt. 34) also contains the laws and teachings given in the wilderness and in the Plains of Moab. Thus, most of the work is comprised of the law codes themselves; the purpose of the narrative is to explain how Israel received them and pledged to follow them, why they are obligated to do so, and what rewards and punishments are in store for them if they comply with the laws or fail to do so.

The story is told by an anonymous, omniscient, third-person narrator, who stands at some distance from the events (Gn. 12.10) and is located on the western side of the Jordan, that is, in Canaan (Dt. 1.5). Moses is introduced only when the story line arrives at his birth (Ex. 2), and his death is recounted by the narrator (Dt. 34.1–12). Moreover, the audience addressed is composed of Israelites already living in their land, after the establishment of the monarchy (Gn. 36.31) and before the exile to Babylon. Many biblical scholars thus date the Torah to the middle First Temple period. Despite the overall unity, the text is often discontinuous, contradictory, stylistically and theologically diverse, and illogically repetitious. In particular, the several law codes occasionally duplicate and contradict each other and show no awareness of each other's existence. Thus, scholarship detects a multiplicity of traditions, several periods of creativity, various separate authors, and distinct developmental stages in the composition of the work. Some scholars have suggested that the book of *Joshua was originally part of the same unit that they call the Hexateuch.

Tradition, on the other hand, ascribes to Moses the writing of the Torah as a whole, presuming it to have been verbally dictated to him by God, including the accounts of his own birth and death and what preceded and followed them. Maimonides wrote in his *Thirteen Principles of Faith, "the entire Torah in our hands was given to our master, Moses." There are differing views on whether this was done all at once or in stages. Several mediating positions between the scholarly and the traditional views have been proposed by commentators and theologians.

The belief in divine authorship gave rise to the method of midrash, by which all of the text's unusual and stylistic features were taken as expressive of additional meaning, since divine language, unlike that of humans, is omniscient. In order for the laws to be implemented to the fullest, in an internally consistent fashion, considerable supplementation and harmonization was indispensable. The authoritative body of such creative exegesis, as found throughout Talmudic literature, eventually came to be given divine status as well.

The text is read in the synagogue by a trained reader from a parchment scroll (see SEFER TORAH), written with meticulous care by an authorized, pious scribe (see SOPER SETAM). This constitutes a central part of the synagogue service (see ACCENTS; QER'AT HA-TORAH). Its purpose is twofold: to instill a thorough knowledge of the Torah in every Jew, reinforced throughout his entire life, and to reenact symbolically the giving of the law at Mount Sinai, reaffirming the Jewish people's commitment to follow the Torah. Sermons in the synagogue on the Sabbath are generally based on the weekly reading from the Torah, a practice that was instituted in rabbinic times.

TORAH, READING OF THE. See QER'AT HA-TORAH.

TORAH ORNAMENTS. The *Sefer Torah is known to have been ornamented and protected with appurtenances from early sources. The Mishnah discusses "figured" wrappers that covered Torah scrolls (Kel. 28.4). Today, most Sephardi and 'Adot ha-Mizrah communities both house and read the scroll upright within a tiq, a rigid, hinged, cylindrical case. A tiq is mentioned in a document, dated from 1075, found in the Cairo Genizah and is first depicted in early fourteenth-century Spanish Haggadah. A tiq is generally crafted of wood or metal and is cylindrical or polygonal, often twelve sided to symbolize the twelve tribes. Many examples feature ornamentation typical of Islamic metalwork; lavish carved and gilded wood examples from Italy or Tunisia are also known. Finials ornament the top or sides of the tiq, and scarves are often draped on the tiq and used to cover the open scroll before it is read. The reader often uses a pointer (yad) to follow the text and to avoid directly touching the Torah scroll. Scrolls in both Ashkenazi and Sephardi congregations are generally attached to carved or inlaid Torah staves ('atsei hayyim [trees of life]), and lengths of fabric are used as binders (wimpels) to hold the two sides of the scroll together. Binders were generally crafted of beautiful fabrics. In Italy they were often made and dedicated by women. The Roman liturgy includes a prayer for "every daughter of Israel who makes a mantle or cover in honor of the Torah." It was customary among many German Jews to create Torah binders from the swaddling clothes that wrapped an infant at his circumcision. The wimpel has been understood as a physical link between the covenantal relationship established through circumcision and the Torah. The swaddling clothes were cut into strips, sewn together, and embroidered or painted with an inscription specifying the child's name, birth date, and a blessing for his future cited from the circumcision liturgy. The wimpel was often presented when the boy was first brought to the synagogue. In many communities a length of fabric, known as a mappah* in Italy, is rolled with the Torah to cover the outside of the area opened for reading. A textile cover may also be placed over an open scroll. A closed scroll is covered with a fabric mantle (me'il), generally of velvet or fine silks. Extant full-skirted mantles from the seventeenth century on, featuring soft or rigid circular or oval tops with two holes for insertion of the staves, are known from Sephardi communities in western Europe, the Ottoman empire, and America. This form is portrayed in the Sarajevo Haggadah (Spain, 13th cent.). Early Ashkenazi mantles were flat, joined segments of fabric, resembling pillow cases, with spaces at the top for staves. A 1592 example of this type is found in Prague, and similar mantles appear in the Ulm mahazor (Germany, 14th cent.). Most Ashkenazi mantles feature a rigid oval top and a tight, straight skirt, often decorated with dedicatory inscriptions and symbols (e.g., crowns, lions, the Decalogue).

Other Torah ornaments, generally crafted of metal, usually silver, are also frequently used. The Torah staves are topped with a crown (keter*) or a pair of finials, used simultaneously in many communities. Torah crowns made out of jewelry to be used on Simhat Torah are discussed in a responsum by Ha'i Ga'on (939–1038); the earliest extant crowns are sixteenth-century Italian examples. In some communities, Torah finials are known as rimmonim (pomegranates) or tappuḥim (apples), suggesting their fruit shapes; in the Spanish and Portuguese communities of England and America they are also known as bells because of the bells attached to most examples. Other finials resemble towers, corresponding to the vertical form of the staves and often reflecting local architectural traditions. Crown-shaped finials are also known. First mentioned in twelfth-century texts, the earliest extant examples of Torah finials are a late fifteenth-century pair now in the cathedral of Palma de Mallorca. A shield (tas) is suspended on a chain over the staves in front of the mantle. Torah shields were originally used to label the reading to which a scroll was turned but were later used for purely decorative purposes. Pointers are usually suspended on a chain over one stave. Often made of silver, carved ivory or wood examples of pointers are also known; they generally terminate in a hand shape, often with an extended finger. See also ART; CEREMONIAL OBJECTS.

TORTOSA, DISPUTATION OF, one of the Jewish-Christian *disputations, held in Tortosa, Spain, between 1413 and 1414. From the mid-thirteenth century on, the Roman Catholic church was deeply committed to missionizing among the Jews of western Christendom. It was predominantly on the Iberian Peninsula that this commitment was most fully manifested. With the co-operation of the secular authorities, Jews were regularly forced to present themselves for proselytizing sermons. A variant of the proselytizing sermon was the forced disputation, in which a Christian spokesman would make his case publicly against a major Jewish protagonist or set of protagonists.

The Disputation of Tortosa was one of the most public, protracted, and damaging of these missionizing efforts. It took place under the auspices of Antipope Benedict XIII. Aragonese Jewry, still reeling from the violent attacks of 1391, was forced to send representatives to respond to the claims advanced by the former Jew Yeho-shu'a ha-Lorki, who had been baptized as Hieronymus de Sancta Fide. The twenty-two Jewish representatives included R. *Zerahyah ben Yitshaq ha-Levi Gerondi and the philosopher Yosef *Albo. The arguments presented by Hieronymus were hardly new. They derived from the thirteenth-century initiative of another former Jew, Friar Paul Christian, who had pioneered in the utilization of rabbinic sources as proof texts for the truth of Christianity (see BARCELONA, DISPUTATION OF). The Tortosa confrontation was distinguished from its predecessors by the intensity of the proselytizing, the protracted nature of the deliberations, which extended from January 1413 through April of 1414, and the significant number of Jews who were moved by the spectacle to renounce Judaism and embrace Christianity.

TORTS (Heb. neziqin), acts that cause injury or damage to a person or property, for which compensation is required (see Ex. 21). Default on a contract falls into the category of torts as well. As a general rule, the Mishnah states that "a man is always considered forewarned (and therefore liable for any tort caused by him), whether the damage is done in error or wantonly, awake or asleep" (B. Q. 2.6). The rabbis enumerated five types of compensation that must be made: compensation for damage to property, pain, medical expenses, loss of income due to injury, and shame. In cases of error, however, one is liable only for damage done but not for pain or shame. An owner is responsible for torts caused by his property on the grounds that he is responsible for guarding his property and taking reasonable precautions to see that no damage occurs through his negligence. In cases where the owner could not reasonably have prevented the tort, he incurs payment of only half of the damage. The major types of torts caused by property (avot neziqin) are classified under the following headings: ox (shor), damage done directly by an animal; pit (bor), damage caused by a stationary obstacle placed in a public thoroughfare; grazing (mav'eh), damage in which advantage accrues to the animal; fire (hav'er), inanimate property that travels to do damage. Slander, insult, and betrayal are torts in law. The subject is fully treated in Talmud order *Neziqin and in the Hoshen Mishpat section of the *Shulhan 'Arukh.

TOSAFISTS. See TOSAFOT.

TOSAFOT (תוספות; additions), novellae (see HIDDUSHIM) to the Talmud written between the twelfth and fourteenth centuries in France and Germany. They are printed on the outer columns of Talmud pages and complement the work of *Rashi. While Rashi provided a line-by-line commentary to the Talmudic text, the tosafists (authors of the tosafot) undertook a consideration of the Talmud in its entirety. The Talmudic discussion is reexamined, contradictory passages—even if they originate in different tractates—are harmonized or distinguished, and new interpretations are suggested. Thus the tosafot are both additions to Rashi and a continuation of the dialectics of the Talmudic process itself. Rabbi Shelomoh *Luria said "they treated the Talmud as a ball . . . rolling it from place to place . . . though the different pericopes seem to us contradictory."

The tosafists generally are considered to have originated in twelfth-century northern France among the grandchildren of Rashi, on whose work they build. Most tosafot begin by citing Rashi and pointing to the difficulties in his interpretation before presenting an alternate perspective. In his work, A. Grossman has argued that the salient intellectual characteristics of the movement are found in late eleventh-century Germany, in Worms and Mainz; the tosafists' major focus is their critique and synthesis of varied Talmudic texts. The tosafists' interest also lies in the practical decision implied by these texts. The influence of Christian glossators and canonists has been detected in tosafist terminology and dialectic, as has the influence of twelfth-century cathedral schools on the organization of the nascent tosafist academies. However, no concrete evidence for these dependencies has surfaced.

Tosafist method quickly spread beyond France and Germany. Some scholars believe that the great Spanish Talmudists of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, Moses *Nahmanides and Shelomoh ben Avraham *Adret (and their pupils), adopted the tosafist view of the Talmud and mode of argumentation, fusing these with native Spanish traditions and earlier geonic interpretation.

The tosafot printed in the Talmud, a staple of Talmudic study, reflect a number of different collections. Independent works of individual tosafists (such as the Or Zaru'a of R. Yitshaq ben Mosheh of Vienna or the Sefer Ra'abiyah of R. Eli'ezer ben Yo'el ha-Levi of Bonn) have also appeared in print in the last one hundred fifty years. Of the three hundred tosafists, R. *Ya'akov ben Me'ir Tam, *Shemu'el ben Me'ir, *Shimshon ben Avraham of Sens, Yehudah ben Yitshaq of Paris, and Shemu'el (Sir Morel) of Falaise are among the best known. The printed tosafot cover thirty-eight tractates of the Talmud.

TOSEFTA' (Aram.; תוספתא; Addition), compilation of oral law designed to serve as a supplementary volume to the *Mishnah. It generally follows the same arrangement as the Mishnah and is divided, like the Mishnah, into six orders, containing tractates, which are subdivided into chapters and halakhot. Most halakhic Mishnah tractates have corresponding Tosefta' tractates, with the exception of three tractates from the order Qodashim (Tamid, Middot, and Qinnim). The aggadic Mishnah tractate Avot has no corresponding Tosefta' tractate, but Avot de-Rabbi Natan, one of the "minor tractates, serves as a kind of supplement to tractate Avot.

While the bulk of the Tosefta' consists of tannaitic material, there is some question regarding the date of its redaction and the relationship between the material in the Tosefta' and Mishnaic material. On occasion the Tosefta' refers to R. Yehudah ha-Nasi', redactor of the Mishnah, as well as to other scholars of his generation and the following generation, and there are passages of the Tosefta' that can only be understood as glosses on the Mishnah. The Talmud refers to toseftot (Yoma 70a; Meg. 28b; Qid. 49b) or tosafot (Y., Pe'ah 2.6, 17a; Y., Hor. 3.9, 48c), some of which are attributed to scholars who preceded the redaction of the Mishnah (see San. 86a). Clearly, "our" Tosefta' cannot antedate the redaction of the Mishnah. However, the question of whether it is related to the Tosefta' known to the amora'im remains the subject of considerable scholarly dispute.

Traditional sources, such as Iggeret Rav Sherira Ga'on, have identified the redactor of the Tosefta' as R. Hiyya', a leading disciple of R. Yehudah ha-Nasi'. Some scholars, such as Hanokh Albeck, have argued for a late dating of the Tosefta', citing Talmudic passages that make no mention of relevant material in the Tosefta' as evidence that the Tosefta' was not compiled until after the redaction of the Talmud Bavli. Other scholars hold that the redaction of the Tosefta' took place within a generation or two after the redaction of the Mishnah, although some of them believe that subsequent to the original redaction of the Tosefta' additional material was added.

Normally the language and formulations of the Tosefta' correspond more closely to baraitot (tannaitic material not incorporated into the Mishnah) cited in the Talmud Yerushalmi than to those cited in the Talmud Bavli, indicating a Palestinian provenance for the redaction of the Tosefta'. However, Saul Lieberman has argued that the Tosefta' has incorporated collections of Babylonian baraitot as well.

In many places the Tosefta' serves as a commentary on the Mishnah, explaining or expanding upon laconic Mishnaic formulations. In other places the Tosefta' supplements the Mishnah by noting variant opinions or citing variant formulations, as well as by including expanded treatment of subjects briefly touched upon in the Mishnah. Abraham Goldberg has noted that the Mishnah itself already contains Tosefta'-like material, in which earlier strata of Mishnaic redaction are explained, expanded, or supplemented by later strata. In his view, the redaction of the Tosefta' follows the same patterns as the redaction of the later strata of the Mishnah, with the difference that, following the closure of the Mishnaic corpus, commentarial and supplemental material could no longer be included in the Mishnah and needed to be incorporated in a separate text.

However, in many places the Tosefta' seems to operate independently of the Mishnah, treating topics not discussed in the Mishnah or treating them in a different order from that of the Mishnah. This has led some scholars, such as J. N. Epstein, to argue that the Tosefta' often reflects an earlier recension of the Mishnah. Some scholars argue further that there are instances in which the Mishnah seems to be a gloss or variation on Tosefta' material. It seems clear that the Tosefta's redaction is uneven in character. In some places it follows the Mishnah closely, and in others it does not. In some places it displays a tight structure, and in others it does not.

Keen scholarly interest in the Tosefta' in recent years may be attributed to the uneven character of the redaction of the Tosefta', as well as to the insight that deeper understanding of the nature of the Tosefta' may afford regarding the nature and history of the Mishnah's growth and redaction.

Two complete manuscripts of the Tosefta' exist, MS Vienna and MS Erfurt. The complete critical edition of the Tosefta', edited by M. S. Zuckerman, follows MS Erfurt. The leading Tosefta' scholar, Saul Lieberman, followed MS Vienna in his critical edition of Tosefta' orders Zera'im, Mo'ed, and Nashim, and of tractate Neziqin (Bavot). The most important Tosefta' commentaries include R. David Pardo's Hasdei David and Saul Lieberman's Tosefet Ri'shonim and Tosefta' ki-Feshutah. Jacob Neusner has produced an English translation of the Tosefta'.

TOVAT HANA'AH (תּוֹבַת הָנָא'אֵה; a benefit), term referring to the freedom of choice for a person who has set aside the appropriate tithes, charity funds, and other gifts, which are required by law to be given to the priests, the Levites, and the indigent, to decide which specific recipient shall receive these gifts. Thus, for example, if a priest or Levite requests that he be given such gifts, the donor may refuse to comply, and choose to grant the gifts to some other qualifying recipient as he sees fit. The Talmud and the post-Talmudic literature record several significant disagreements regarding the scope of tovat hana'ah, in light of the biblical passage, "and each man's consecrated property shall be for him" (Nm. 5.10), since "for him" does not convey a clear notion of the extent to which the donor may benefit, even indirectly, from his reserved right to choose the recipient of his gifts. Thus, there are different opinions as to whether the donor may validly receive any monetary remuneration in exchange for his selection of a particular recipient, and, similarly, whether or not this reserved freedom of choice may be deemed a pecuniary right of substance (tovat hana'ah mammon), which can be conveyed to others by transfer or inheritance. The consensus was that this right is not pecuniary, and the donor therefore cannot receive remuneration or transfer this right to another.

TOVIYYAH BEN ELI'EZER (11th cent.), biblical exegete who lived in Castoria, Bulgaria. Toviyyah was the author of a commentary on the Pentateuch and the Five Scrolls called Leqah Tov, which was published in an edition by Solomon Buber, entitled Midrash Leqah Tov (Lyck, 1884). Leqah Tov adapts the Midrashic form, utilizing halakhic midrashim and other Midrashic works that have not been preserved, as well as material from the Talmud Bavli. It does not simply repeat the earlier material, but translates the Aramaic passages, as well as Greek and Latin words, into Hebrew. In addition, Toviyyah provides his own interpretations, focusing on the plain meaning of the verses, giving attention to the Masoretic notes and to grammar. He explains anthropomorphic passages as parables, citing the rabbinic dictum, "The Torah speaks in human language." Leqah Tov contains allusions to contemporary historical events, such as the martyrdom of Jewish communities during the First Crusade (1096).

TOVIYYAH BEN MOSHEH (11th cent.), *Karaites scholar known as ha-'Avel (the Mourner) or as ha-Ma'atiq (the Translator). He traveled from Constantinople to Jerusalem in the 1030s to join the *Avelei Tsiyyon and studied there with Yosef Basir and Yeshu'a ben Yehudah. Toviyyah played a central role in the transmission of the teachings of the Jerusalem Karaite school, written in Arabic, to the Byzantine empire through his translations into Hebrew and his own compilations of material from the Jerusalem scholars. By 1048, he had returned to Byzantium to become the leader of the Karaite community there. In this capacity, he traveled to Egypt (some of his letters were preserved in the Cairo Genizah) and maintained a correspondence with the scholars of Jerusalem.

His translations from Arabic into Hebrew include the works of Yosef Basir: Kitab al-Muhtawi (translated as Sefer Ne'imot); Kitab al-Tamyiz (translated as Makhkikat Peti); and Sefer ha-Mo'adim, a section from Kitab al-Ishtibsar. Among Toviyyah's compilations are the philosophical work Meshivat Nefesh and Otsar Nehmad, a legal commentary on the Bible (only the part on Lev. 1–10 has survived). These works provided a literary basis for the Byzantine Karaite community. He also introduced into Byzantine Karaism the concept of ha'taqah (tradition) which paved the way for the establishment of new customs and reforms of Karaite law.

TOWER OF BABEL, a structure erected after the *Flood by the inhabitants of Sinar (Babylonia) for the purpose of reaching heaven (Gn. 11.1–9). Looking down upon the builders and finding their purpose ill-conceived, God is said to have confounded their speech and scattered them over the earth. The object of the story is to show that the cradle of humanity was also the provenance of the first rebellion against God, which in turn resulted in human estrangement from one another. God's omnipotent rule was, however, beyond the challenge of humankind. While the exact etymological origin of the term Babel is unknown (see BABYLONIA), the Bible derives it by popular etymology from the Hebrew root balal (confuse). The story was probably inspired by the high temple towers (ziggurat) in Babylonia. The origin of the literary motif of the confusion of tongues and the subsequent division and dispersal of humankind into nations all over the earth (Gn. 11.1, 6–9) and its connection in the Bible with the building of a Mesopotamian ziggurat (Gn. 11.2–5) may now be understood in the light of a new fragment of the Sumerian epic "Enmerkar and the Lord of Aratta." This was first published by S. N. Kramer (JAOS 88 [1968]: 108–111), who pointed out that the central motif of the "confounding" of tongues as a result of rivalry was the same in both versions, but that in the Hebrew version the rivalry was between God and humans, rather than god and god (as in the Sumerian). Biblical tradition succeeded in demythologizing this popular ancient Mesopotamian cosmological motif, and at the same time provided it with new didactic and moral dimensions. Talmudic comment ascribes a variety of motives to the builders of the Tower, dwelling upon the arrogance and heartlessness of the people it brands as dor ha-pelagah (the generation of secession).

TRADITION, a doctrine or rule handed down from generation to generation by word of mouth. The technical terms for tradition in Hebrew are kabbalah (that which is received) and masoret (that which is passed on); traditional custom is known as minhag*. The terms can refer to historical traditions, such as the one claiming that Amoz, father of Isaiah, and Amaziah, king of Judah, were brothers (Sot. 10b), or to traditions handed down by a teacher, as in the phrase "I have received a tradition from the mouth of Shema'yah and Avtalyon" (Pes. 66a). The most common use of the word tradition, however, refers to those ordinances of the *oral law for which no proof can be adduced from the Bible but which are regarded as of equal authority with biblical laws. These are called "halakhah of Moses from Mount Sinai" (see HALAKHAH LE-MOSHEH MI-SINAI). Thus, Eli'ezer ben Hyrcanus told R. Yosei to ignore a vote taken on a certain occasion since "I have a kabbalah from R. Yoḥanan ben Zakk'ai, who heard it from his teacher, and his teacher from his teacher, that it is a halakhah of Moses from Mount Sinai that in Ammon and Moab the poor man's title is given in the seventh year" (Yad. 4.3; Ḥag. 3b). Again, finding no biblical authority for the Jewish method of animal slaughter for food, the Talmud declares it to be a tradition (Ḥul. 28a). For the rabbis, tradition had the force of law. The phrase "halakhah of Moses from Mount Sinai" is not always to be taken literally but is used for any tradition of immemorial antiquity. The Mishnaic statement "Tradition is a fence around the Law" (Avot 3.17) refers to observances beyond the requirements of the letter of the Law that act as safeguards against infringing upon biblical law. According to Moses *Maimonides, all laws and enactments that have no biblical authority but are accepted in the Talmud without dissent belong to this class of traditional teaching.

TRANI FAMILY, family of scholars originating in Spain, who settled in Trani, Italy, from where they derived their name.

Mosheh ben Yosef di Trani (1500–1580), rabbinic authority in Erets Yisra'el; known by the acronym ha-Mabbitt. He was born in Salonika and educated in Adrianople and Safed, where he settled in 1518. At the age of twenty-one, he was recognized as a leading authority on matters relating to the sanctity of the Holy Land. He was one of the four scholars ordained by Ya'aqov *Berab in his attempt to revive *ordination. Mosheh served for fifty-four years as a member of the Safed beit din, headed a yeshivah, and sent responsa to many parts of the Jewish world. He paid particular attention to the agricultural laws in Erets Yisra'el and was inclined to take lenient positions, for example, regarding the laws of the sabbatical year. His bold decisions led him to a confrontation with Yosef *Karo, who issued a ban against those who followed Mosheh's rulings. Mosheh strongly criticized those authorities who ruled that it was not necessary to settle immediately in the land of Israel. After Karo's death, Mosheh became the religious leader of Safed Jewry. His writings include Iggeret Derekh ha-Shem, a work on ethics (Venice, 1553); Beit Elohim, a philosophical work (Venice, 1576); Qiryat Sefer, on Maimonides, distinguishing his sources between the written and the oral Law (Venice, 1551); and hundreds of responsa (Venice, 1629–1630).

Yosef ben Mosheh di Trani (1568–1639), known as Maharit; son of Mosheh ben Yosef. He was born in Safed and studied in Egypt and Safed, where he became head of the community and was sent to Constantinople as its emissary. He settled there and was appointed chief rabbi of Turkey, enacting many taqqanot. He established a yeshivah at which distinguished scholars received their training. Most of his works have been lost, but his novellae on the Talmud and his sermons on the Pentateuch were printed. Citations from his Tsurat ha-Bayit, a work on the structure of the Temple, have been preserved.

TRANSGRESSION. See SIN.

TRANSLATIONS OF THE BIBLE. See BIBLE TRANSLATIONS.

TRANSMIGRATION OF SOULS, the belief that after death the *soul enters into a new body; though known in Eastern religions, it is never encountered in biblical or Talmudic Judaism. It is mentioned for the first time in the tenth century by *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on, who reports that some "foolish" Jews held the belief. The theory reappears as an esoteric Jewish doctrine in the twelfth-century kabbalistic book Sefer ha-Bahir, which may have drawn upon earlier Jewish sources or possibly the Catharist heresy that flourished in Provence at that time. Various expressions were used in early kabbalistic literature for the concept of transmigration, but ultimately the term gilgul (revolving) became generally accepted. For the early kabbalists and for the author of the *Zohar, the transmigration of the soul, or reincarnation, was a punishment inflicted on individuals who had committed certain sins or failed to fulfill certain commandments, particularly the commandment of procreation. By assuming a new bodily existence, they would have another opportunity to make good where they had failed and to fulfill their destiny. As time went on, the concept of transmigration was extended, and three transmigrations were held to be the minimum for every individual soul. In sixteenth century *Kabbalah and later, the doctrine of transmigration assumed a prominent position. Yitshaq Luria and his disciples in Safed associated the doctrine of transmigration with the fate of Adam's soul after its "fall." Adam's soul contains within itself the souls of all, and its fall expresses its state of alienation—and of all humankind's alienation—from God. Each soul endures its own individual "exile" brought about by its own sins. Its misdeeds on earth may even bring about the reincarnation of a soul in a lower form of life, and it must continue on its transmigration until it achieves its tiqqun, that is, its restoration to its proper place in the soul of Adam. The determining of one's previous existences and the search for the proper tiqqun became an important element of folk religion in eastern Europe, especially within the Hasidic movement. A soul that is not reborn with a new body but enters and "possesses" another human being is known as a dybbuk*.

TRANSPLANTS. The halakhic permissibility of live, nonregenerative, organ donations turns on the amount of risk posed to the donor's life. In the absence of any such risk, there would not appear to be any halakhic bar to organ donation provided that the donor's consent is freely obtained. In cases where there is a small risk involved in transplantation, the donor may very well have a choice as to whether or not to donate his or her organ. Cadaver donations are approved if the purpose is the direct and immediate saving of the recipient's life, in accordance with the principle stated by R. Yehezqel Landau in his seminal responsum on autopsies in Jewish law. Modern authorities permit corneal transplants on the grounds that loss of sight constitutes a threat to human life, since a blind person may fall down a flight of stairs or into a ditch and be killed. Heart transplants present a problem in Jewish law, which defines death as the cessation of heartbeat. Since only a still-beating heart will save a recipient's life, heart transplant would be tantamount to killing the donor. In 1987 the Israeli chief rabbinate adopted the view that irreversible cessation of respiration, that is, brain-stem death, is the definitive halakhic definition of death; therefore, heart transplants are permitted in Israeli hospitals. Live donation of regenerative tissue, for example, blood and bone marrow, is permitted, and fetal transplants from spontaneously or legally aborted fetuses would also seem to be permitted under Jewish law.

TREASON. The Bible does not mention any instances of the betrayal of one's country, but it contains many instances of rebellion and regicide (e.g., 2 Sm. 18.14; 2 Kgs. 11.1). The penalty of death for disobedience to the king is based (San. 49a) upon the declaration made by the people to Joshua: "whosoever rebels against your word shall be put to death" (Jos. 1.18). Any disobedience toward the royal command is considered rebellion; the king may punish the offender in any manner considered fit, but he may not confiscate his property. Rabbinic law has transferred to the state the rights previously enjoyed by the king. In the State of Israel, wartime treason is one of the two instances in which the death penalty is applicable.

TREE OF KNOWLEDGE OF GOOD AND EVIL, one of the two trees mentioned by name, along with the tree of life, in the garden of Eden, in Genesis 2–3. According to the narrative, Adam was given permission to eat of the fruit of all the trees in the garden, excluding only the tree of knowledge of good and evil, the penalty for which was death (Gn. 2.17). The serpent, however, duped Eve into eating the fruit of the tree of knowledge, and she, in turn, gave it to Adam, who ate as well. For transgressing this divine commandment, Adam and Eve (along with the snake) were punished and expelled from the garden.

Since the tree of knowledge is unparalleled in all other biblical and extra-biblical tales and since the narrative does not define the specific nature of the knowledge obtained by the eating of its fruit, several different explanations have been suggested. One theory offers that what is meant by knowledge is moral discernment, the ability to distinguish between what is right and wrong. Others, as early as the medieval Jewish exegete Avraham *ibn Ezra, believe that knowledge refers to sexual awareness, since the first experience after eating the fruit was a consciousness of nudity and shame, followed by Adam's "knowing" Eve, that is, having sexual relations with her (Gn. 4.1). This line of thought is supported by another passage of "knowing good and evil" within a similar framework (2 Sm. 19.36). However, most scholars today interpret the verse as relating to overall knowledge (cf. 2 Sm. 14.17), which children do not have (Dt. 1.39; Is. 7.15) and the possession of which distinguishes childhood from maturity. Thus, the eating of the fruit symbolizes a rite of passage leading to a mature apprehension of the world.

TREE OF LIFE, a tree whose fruit gives immortal life to those who partake of it; a frequent mythological symbol found in Semitic and other cultures (e.g., Mesopotamian, Greek, Persian, and Indian). In the ancient Near East, the idea of a tree of life (or the bread, water, or plant of life) is quite common, appearing in the tales of the descent of Inanna to the nether world, Adapa, and Gilgamesh (where the plant of rejuvenation is ultimately stolen from the hero by a serpent). The motif is used in the biblical account of the garden of Eden, where the tree of life is mentioned alongside the tree of knowledge (Gn. 2.9). Adam's expulsion from the garden of Eden (Gn. 3.23–24) after eating from the tree of knowledge is motivated (Gn. 3.22) by the concern that he might also partake of the tree of life and thus gain immortality. In Proverbs, the tree is a metaphor for *wisdom (Prv. 3.18).

There is much difference of opinion among commentators as to the precise meaning and relationship of the two trees in the paradise story. Apocalyptic literature promises the righteous that they will partake of the tree of life after the final judgment (e.g., 1 En. 24.4, 25.4–6; 2 Esd. 8.52). In kabbalistic literature, the symbolism of the two trees, and of the tree of life in particular, is developed in mystical fashion.

TRIBES OF ISRAEL, traditionally the descendants of the twelve sons of Jacob (cf. Gn. 46.8–27; Ex. 1.1–7) by his wives, Leah and Rachel, and concubines, Bilhah and Zilpah. This is based on the popular concept of the common lineage of the tribes and nations. Modern biblical research based on anthropology and the critical approach to the biblical traditions proposes another picture.

The scheme of the twelve tribes of Israel is an artificial one, in which the number is fixed while the components might vary. Its artificiality can be deduced from the fact that the Bible also organizes other tribal groups according to twelve participant units; for example, the Arameans (Gn. 22.21–24) and Ishmaelites (Gn. 25.13–16). In Israel, the change of the status of Levi caused the split of the house of Joseph into two tribes, Ephraim and Manasseh, in order to retain the number twelve.

The study of tribal units has demonstrated that while smaller units are lineage groups, larger ones are bound together on the basis of common geographical backgrounds and interests. In ancient Israel, this can be discerned in the cases of Benjamin and Ephraim. The name Benjamin means Son of the Right (Side), the south. Benjamin was the southernmost tribe of the confederation of the sons of Rachel. The name Ephraim is unique among West Semitic proper names, but its construction is also typical of geographical names. The tribe of Gilead mentioned in the Song of Deborah (Jgs. 5.17) is likewise a geographical name.

In premonarchical Israel, the twelve tribes of Israel never acted in unison. The Pentateuchal descriptions of the twelve tribes, as well as those of the Book of Joshua, and the description of the war of the confederation of all Israel against Benjamin in the last chapters of the Book of Judges (19–20) are retrospective descriptions. The most that one could say is that some tribes joined together in times of stress, but never all of them.

It is only with the establishment of the united monarchy under King David that Israel and Judah came together under one government and were united. Israel was organized into twelve units, rooted in tribal lines, each one being responsible for the maintenance of the state revenues for one month a year. This system was reformed by King Solomon, who divided the kingdom into twelve provinces that did not always coincide with the former tribal units (1 Kgs. 4). The twelve tribes disbanded after the dissolution of the united monarchy, soon after the death of Solomon.

The schism that followed the death of Solomon ended in the secession of ten tribes (Reuben, Simeon, Dan, Naphtali, Gad, Asher, Issachar, Zebulun, Ephraim, and Manasseh), who under Jeroboam I formed the northern kingdom of Israel. Only two tribes, Judah and Benjamin (Simeon was already integrated into Judah), remained in the south. The northern kingdom lasted approximately two hundred years; it fell to the Assyrians in 721 BCE, when the majority of the Israelites were deported to Assyria (2 Kgs. 17.6). Unlike the Judeans of the southern kingdom, who survived a similar fate 135 years later, they soon assimilated. Those remaining in Israel commingled with foreign colonists and subsequently became known as *Samaritans. The loss of the ten tribes was never accepted as final by the Jews. From the time of Jeremiah, who prophesied their return (Jer. 31.4ff.), and Ezekiel, who connected their eventual return with the era of redemption (Ez. 37.16; the concept was also developed in apocalyptic literature), hope of their eventual restoration was never relinquished, although R. 'Aqiva' said they would never return (San. 10.3). Belief in their continued existence was nurtured in apocryphal books (Tobit [of the tribe of Naphtali]; 2 Esdras 13.39–50). Different sites are mentioned in the Midrash as their dwelling place (e.g., across the river *Sambatyon, under a blanket of clouds, or within the walls of Antioch), and fantastic reports regarding the lost tribes were a frequent feature of Jewish legend and folklore, particularly in periods of messianic ferment. A vivid description purporting to be of the lost tribes was given by the ninth century Jewish traveler *Eldad ha-Dani.

TRIENNIAL CYCLE, division of the weekly synagogue reading of the Torah (see QER'AT HA-TORAH) into a three-year cycle, which was the ancient Palestinian practice. The Babylonian custom of an annual cycle became the general tradition, although evidence of the triennial cycle being followed in Erets Yisra'el and Egypt exists until the twelfth century. A number of midrashim are based on a division that follows a three-year cycle. In modern times, Reform Judaism (and some Conservative synagogues) adopted a three-year cycle in order to shorten the weekly Hebrew reading. However, instead of reading the entire Torah consecutively, it divided each weekly portion into three, reading the first third one year, the second third the next year, and the third in the third year, thus maintaining a correspondence to the annual reading and to the celebration of *Simhat Torah.

TROKI, YITSHAQ BEN AVRAHAM (c.1533–1594), *Karaite scholar. Born in Troki, the oldest and most important Karaite community in Lithuania, and a physician by profession, he was the most prominent of the Karaite scholars of Troki during the sixteenth century. Yitshaq knew Latin and Polish and acquired an extensive knowledge of Christian literature, including contemporary Polish sectarian writings. This enabled him to hold theological discussions with Christian scholars from the variety of denominations and sects active in Poland at that time: Roman Catholic, Eastern Orthodox, Calvinist, Lutheran, Socinian, Arian, and so forth. Out of these came his famous apology for Judaism and critique of Christianity, Hizzuq Emunah, written at the end of his life.

The book's careful and in-depth examination of the weaknesses of Christian dogma and the inner contradictions of the New Testament, as well as its reasonable defense of Judaism, made it very popular, and it quickly circulated in manuscript form. It was first published by Johann Christoph Wagenseil with a Latin translation and extensive refutation in his Tela ignea Satanae (Altdorf, 1681). An English translation by Moses Mocatta appeared in London in 1851 (repr. New York, 1970). In the eighteenth century, Hizzuq Emunah was used by freethinkers and praised by Voltaire, but also criticized by a number of Christian authors. It has no openly Karaite characteristics, and for many years its author was mistakenly thought to be a Rabbanite.

In addition to Hizzuq Emunah, Yitshaq wrote a refutation of the Rabbanites, a work on the ten principles of faith, a commentary on the section on the laws of impurity in Eliyyahu Bashyazi's Adderet Eliyyahu (all of which remain in manuscript), as well as a number of religious hymns that entered into the Karaite prayer book.

TROP (from Gr. tropos [turn, manner, or mode]), a term that refers to the musical motives associated with graphic signs used in biblical cantillation. While these twenty-eight symbols (also known as *accents or ta'amei ha-miqra) serve a primarily grammatical and syntactical function, a series of musical systems has evolved to distinguish the chanting of various scriptural passages. Indeed, the Talmud asserts that one who merely recites the biblical text without its accompanying trop shows a disregard for the law (Meg. 32a). Different melodies or trops are utilized for Pentateuchal readings (Torah); Prophetic readings (haftarot); the Book of Esther; the megillot read on the three festivals (Song of Songs on Pesah, Ruth on Shavu'ot, Ecclesiastes on Sukkot); the Book of Lamentations; and the Pentateuchal passages read at the morning services on Ro'sh ha-Shanah and Yom Kippur. Totally different trops are utilized by Sephardi Jews and 'Adot ha-Mizrah for chanting these same books. Among some of the latter, Psalms and the Book of Job are also chanted according to particular trops.

TRUTHFULNESS (Heb. emet). In biblical and rabbinic language the term does not so much signify scientific or theological truth as it does honesty, sincerity, loyalty, or integrity. When referring to actions and judgments, it can also mean "right" and "just" (cf. Zec. 8.16); in connection with facts, it indicates that they have been authenticated or substantiated. Truthfulness is thus a practical rather than a logical concept. God is true, that is, ever faithful (cf. Jer. 10.10; Ps. 31.6), and his word, law, and precepts are true (Ps. 19.10, 119.43, 142). Truth, one of the *thirteen attributes of God (Ex. 34.6; Ps. 117.2), is stressed both in the Bible and Talmud as one of the greatest virtues. Only he "who speaks truth in his heart" shall "abide in your tabernacle and dwell in your holy mountain" (Ps. 15.2), and the daily morning prayer exhorts: "at all times let a man fear God secretly as well as publicly, acknowledge the truth, and speak the truth in his heart." The Talmudic description of a hypocrite and a liar is a person who has "one thing in his heart and another on his lips" (Pes. 113b). Rabbi Shim'on ben Gamli'el enumerates truth as the first of the three pillars upon which the continued existence of the world depends (Avot 1.1). "Truth is the seal of the Holy One, blessed be He" (Yoma 69b). Truth will ultimately triumph while falsehood will not endure (Shab. 104a), and liars are one of the four groups with whom the divine presence does not abide (Sot. 42a). Parents are bid never to break a promise to a child, lest they encourage untruthfulness in the child (Suk. 46b). The reinforcement of a statement by an oath, though at times required by law, was discouraged by the rabbis, since it tended to create a double standard of truth. In spite of the command to speak truth and the prohibition against *lying (Ex. 23.7), certain situations may present overriding demands (Yev. 65b). Thus, the Midrash adduces the difference in wording between Genesis 18.12 ("my husband is old") and verse 13 ("I am old"; which is how God repeats Sarah's statement to Abraham) as proof of the propriety of modifying a statement for the sake of domestic harmony. The rabbis in extolling *Aaron as a lover of peace explain that he was not averse to telling a white lie if peace could thereby be established or restored. The use of emet in a logical sense (e.g. "necessary truth," "eternal truth," "eternal truth," "revealed truthfulness") only appears in medieval philosophical literature.

TSADDIQ (צַדִּיק; righteous man), a term with a variety of definitions, in legal, kabbalistic, and Hasidic contexts; it is also sometimes applied to God who is "just and righteous." In legal usage it refers to one who has been found innocent in court or who is right in a dispute. In kabbalistic terminology tsaddiq is the designation of one of the ten sefirot*. A prominent folk belief was the notion of thirty-six hidden and unknown tsaddiqim (see LAMED VAV), whose humble and anonymous piety sustains the world in every generation. Whereas the Talmud uses the word hasid* for a man whose piety goes beyond that of the tsaddiq, the significance of the term was reversed in later usage. In the language of the Hasidic movement (see HASIDISM), the hasid was the devout and devoted follower of the tsaddiq (or rebbe*), the leader held to be endowed with a special charisma. The tsaddiq was not merely a spiritual guide but a mediator between the believers and God, one who it was felt possessed supernatural qualities, including the power of prayer and the ability to work miracles. Many Hasidic masters became founders of dynasties; their charisma was thought to be transmitted by inheritance. Opponents of Hasidism, as well as some scholars, ascribe the decay of the movement in the nineteenth century to the institutionalization of hereditary tsaddiqism.

TSADDOQ HA-KOHEN OF LUBLIN (1823–1900), Hasidic master and author. Educated in anti-Hasidic, Lithuanian yeshivot, he later became an adherent of Hasidism and one of the most profound Hasidic authors of the late nineteenth century. His first rebbe was the radically innovative Mordekhai Yosef Leiner of Izbica Lubelski, a leading disciple of Menahem Mendel of Kotsk. Later, he became a disciple of Yehudah Leib Eger of Lublin, before becoming a master in his own right. He stands out among Hasidic authors for the range and depth of his prolific teachings. His works reveal a mastery of Talmudic, kabbalistic, and Hasidic literature. He wrote Peri Tsaddiq (5 vols. [New York, 1901–1934]).

TSE'ENAH U-RE'ENAH, popular Yiddish miscellany written in the 1590s by Ya'aqov ben Yitshaq Ashkenazi of Janów Lubelski, Poland, who took the title from Song of Songs 3.11. His work is a paraphrase of the weekly Torah readings, haftarot, and the Five Scrolls, woven together with selections from the commentaries of Rashi and Bahya ben Asher, Midrashic legend, homilies, and other sources. Though meant for anyone unschooled in Hebrew, the work was destined to become staple reading for Jewish women in eastern Europe, familiarizing them with the Bible. The oldest surviving edition was printed in 1622; over two hundred reprints, adaptations, and translations have appeared since then.

TSHOLNT (Yi.; טשולנט), a bean-based dish traditionally eaten by Ashkenazim for Sabbath lunch. Since cooking on the Sabbath is forbidden, the tscholnt is prepared on Friday afternoon and placed in the oven to bake overnight or on a metal plate on the stove top, below which a flame is kept burning throughout the Sabbath. Various etymologies have been suggested for the word, most popularly the French chaud lent (warming, cooking slowly). Sephardim prepare a similar hot dish for the Sabbath called hamin; in North Africa the dish is called dafina.

TSIDDUQ HA-DIN (צִדּוּק הַדִּין, Justification of the Judgment), the prayer that is recited at a funeral, signifying, in particular, resigned submission to God's justice in the face of a person's death. The basis of this prayer is found in 'Avodah Zarah 18a; R. Hanina' ben Teradyon and his wife were sentenced to death by the Romans and their daughter committed to a brothel. On hearing the sentence, R. Hanina' quoted, in acceptance of the divine will, the first half of Deuteronomy 32.4, his wife completed the verse, and the daughter quoted Jeremiah 32.19. These verses are included in the Tsidduq ha-Din prayer, which originated in Talmudic times and received its final form in the geonic period. In some rites, it is recited after the coffin has been lowered into the grave.

TSIMTSUM (צִמְצוּם; contraction), in Lurianic Kabbalah (see LURIA, YITSHAQ), the process whereby God, who is all, withdraws or contracts himself sideways so as to leave a kind of primordial space or nondivine vacuum within which creation can take place. The doctrine of tsimtsum was meant to account for the possibility of creation, since the infinite being of God does not leave room for the existence of anything else. Yet even the space vacated by God during the act of tsimtsum is not devoid of the divine light. An impression of the divine remains "as the fragrance which lingers in the vial after it has been emptied of its perfume." In Lurianic Kabbalah, the notion of tsimtsum also served as an explanation for the origin of evil, as well as a theistic qualification of the pantheism inherent in the thought that all creation is included within God. TSITSIT (צִיִּצִית), fringes attached to the four corners of garments. Numbers 15:37–41 commands that a blue thread be added to the tsitsit at the four corners to remind the Israelites of the commandments and prevent them from going astray. The mnemonic and preventative roles have been a matter of speculation. Some modern scholars have suggested that the law in Numbers evolved as the theological rationalization of an originally common ornamentation. The fringes have also been explained as a sign of rank or dignity, an emblem of Israel's status as a holy nation and a kingdom of priests. Ancient Near Eastern art shows figures with fringes decorating corners or ends of seams of garments. Mesopotamian documents reveal that fringes (Akk. sissiktu) on garments were considered extensions of the person and could represent him in legal acts and magical rituals. Since modern dress rarely includes four-cornered garments, a special one (known as tsitsit, arba' kanfor [four corners], or tallit qatan [small tallit*]) is worn during the day by observant male Jews (including boys) beneath the outer clothing. In Haredi circles, the custom of wearing the tsitsit over the outer clothing is gaining ground. The fringes are attached to this four-cornered garment with a hole in the middle, through which the head is placed. A blessing is recited when putting on the tsitsit. The tsitsit consists of four long strands drawn through a small hole about one-and-a-half inches from the corner. The two parts of the strands are tied together by a double knot. The longest strand (shammash) is then wound seven, eight, eleven, and thirteen times around the other seven halves of the four threads. A double knot is made after each set of windings. The total length of the tsitsit should be not less than eleven-and-one-half inches.

TSOM. See FASTS.

TSOM GEDALYAH (צוֹם גְּדַלְיָה), fast day commemorating the assassination of Gedaliah on 3 Tishrei, the day after Ro'sh ha-Shanah (R. ha-Sh. 18b). Gedaliah ben Ahikam, a member of the Shaphan family, which had supported the prophet Jeremiah, was appointed governor of Judah by Nebuchadnezzar after the destruction of the First Temple. Following Gedaliah's murder at the hands of Ishmael son of Nethaniah, of the royal family, the remaining Jews fled to Egypt, and the last vestige of Jewish self-government in Judah came to an end (2 Kgs. 25:25; Jer. 40–1). The Bible states that the murder took place in the month of Tishrei, and later tradition dated it to the third day of that month; some authorities suggested that it took place on Ro'sh ha-Shanah but that the commemoration was postponed until after the holiday. The fast of Gedaliah is already mentioned by the prophet Zechariah (Zec. 7.5, 8.19). When Ro'sh ha-Shanah falls on Thursday and Friday, the fast is postponed to the following Sunday, 4 Tishrei. Fasting is from sunrise to sunset, and in the synagogue seliḥot are read during the Shaḥarit service (as well as before the service in some rites).

TSOREF, YEHOŠHU'A HESHEL (1633–c.1700), pietist, mystic, and a leader of the Shabbatean movement in Poland and Lithuania. Born in Vilna, he lived most of his life there but spent some time in Amsterdam and died in Kraków. He was in close contact with Shabbatean leaders in eastern Europe and in the Middle East and assembled around him a group of devoted disciples. A strict ascetic, he had frequent visions, which he recorded in his unpublished Sefer ha-Tsoref (parts are extant in manuscript). His life and work were marked by intense messianic devotion; he regarded himself as the Messiah, Son of Joseph, serving the Messiah, Son of David (Shabbetai Tsevi), whose second coming, Tsoref believed, was imminent. Tsoref's writings were based on gimatriyyah and numerical speculations, often revolving around his and Shabbetai Tsevi's names and the date of redemption.

Gershom Gerhard *Scholem suggested that Tsoref's figure and writings represent the historical element in the evolution of the legend of R. Adam Ba'al Shem, whose writings are described in Hasidic hagiography as a source of inspiration for R. Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer Ba'al Shem Tov, the founder of the Hasidic movement. This suggestion has not been proven, and many scholars doubt it. However, Tsoref's behavior, the manner of organization of his disciples, as well as the hagiographic stories told about him, contributed to the shaping of the early Hasidic movement.

TSUR MI-SHELLO (צור מן השלל; Rock from Whose Store [We Have Eaten]), hymn sung at the Sabbath table, though it contains no specific reference to the Sabbath. Tsur mi-Shello is of unknown authorship but dates from about the sixteenth century, its four stanzas corresponding to the first four paragraphs of the *Birkat ha-Mazon and, hence, usually sung immediately before it. The refrain of Tsur mi-Shello is based partly on 2 Kings 4.44.

TU BE-'AV (תּוֹבֵעַבִּי; or Hamishah 'Asar be-'Av [15 Av]), popular festival in Second Temple times. According to the Talmud, on this day eligible maidens went out in borrowed white garments (so that the poorer ones among them would not be shamed) and danced in the vineyards, and the young men present would select their wives from among them (Ta'an. 4.8). The day was probably originally a nature festival; as it was regarded as the climax of the period of solar heat, it was also the festival of the wood offering—the last day for bringing wood to the Temple altar; after this date the trees were no longer dry enough and wood hewing ceased until the spring sap began to rise six months later on *Tu bi-Shevat. The Talmud gives various other traditions for Tu be-'Av, including the anniversary of the date when the tribes were first permitted to intermarry or when the dead of Betar could be buried after the *Bar Kokhba' Revolt (Ta'an. 30b–31a). Fasting and funeral eulogies are forbidden on this day, and *Tahanun is not recited in the synagogue.

• Yigael Yadin, ed., The Temple Scroll, 3 vols. (Jerusalem, 1989), includes discussion of a Dead Sea Scroll with new references to wood offering festivals, with bibliography.

TU BI-SHEVAT (תּוֹבֵעַבִּי; 15 Shevat), also known as Ro'sh ha-Shanah la-'Ilanot (New Year for Trees), originally had no religious significance, except that according to the school of Hillel, the age of a tree for purposes of tithes and similar laws (e.g., orlah*) is reckoned from 15 *Shevat, when with the approaching end of winter the sap begins to shoot up in the trees. According to the school of Shamm'ai the date is 1 Shevat. The Talmud gives no indication of any celebration or liturgical observance connected with 15 Shevat, though certain penitential prayers are omitted and fasting is forbidden. Since the seventeenth century, partly under the influence of the kabbalists of Safed, who saw profound esoteric meaning in the verse "For man is like the tree of the field" (Dr. 20.19), a special ceremonial evolved. Among Ashkenazim, it consisted merely of eating fruit from Erets Yisra'el, but Eastern Jews observed an elaborate ritual in which fifteen different fruits were eaten to the accompaniment of appropriate readings from the Bible, Talmud, and Zohar. This was modeled on the Pesah Seder and was published in Peri 'Ets Hadar (Salonika, 1753). In the State of Israel, Tu bi-Shevat has become an arbor day marked by the ceremonial planting of trees by schoolchildren, while the occasion is also marked in Jewish schools in the Diaspora.

TWERSKY FAMILY, Hasidic dynasty. The Twerskys were one of the two (along with the Friedmanns of Ruzhin; see RUZHIN, YISRA'EL OF) leading families of Hasidic masters in the original Hasidic heartland of western Ukraine. Rabbi Mordekhai Twersky (1770–1837) inherited the modest position of his father, R. *Nahum of Chernobyl; there he established a major Hasidic court along the lines of R. *Barukh of Medzhibozh. His eight sons all became Hasidic masters, establishing themselves in Chernobyl, Korostyshev, Cherkassy, Makarov, Trisk, Tal'noye, Skvira, and Rotmistrovka. From these places they branched out to many more towns throughout the region, though the followings of most descendants were rather small. Many of the Twerskys suffered severe persecution with the establishment of the Soviet regime, and most fled the region. Several members of the Twersky family were among the first Hasidic leaders to immigrate to North America, settling in the 1920s and 1930s in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Milwaukee. The descendants of the Skvira branch have established a village in New Square ("New Skvira"), New York.

TWILIGHT. Rabbi Yosei said, "twilight is as the twinkling of the eye" (Shab. 34b); that is, that though it exists it cannot be measured. The accepted view is that twilight is the period between sunset and darkness; however, opinions differ as to whether twilight is determined by the appearance of the sky or by an amount of time. For halakhic purposes, as long as only two stars of medium magnitude are visible in the sky, it is considered twilight; the appearance of a third star marks the onset of night. The time period differs according to the latitude and the season of the year. See also DAY AND NIGHT.

UGARIT, a Canaanite city-state that grew to be the principal commercial center of northern Syria during the Late Bronze Age, located near the Mediterranean coast on the site of the present Ras Shamra, uncovered in 1929. The discovery there of a large quantity of clay tablets, most written in a thirty-letter cuneiform alphabet, has revolutionized the study of Canaanite mythology and its bearing upon biblical scholarship. The inscriptions, dating from the fifteenth to the thirteenth century, are written in a language belonging to the family of Northwest Semitic, closely resembling Aramaic and Hebrew, and have thrown light on the literary and cultural background of the Bible in general, as well as on many phrases, linguistic features, poetic structures, and mythological allusions found in biblical literature. Mythological figures with biblical associations include the god El (the chief god in the Ugaritic pantheon) and his consort Asherah (sometimes identified with Astarte), their son Baal, Anath (Baal's consort and cofighter), Yam-Nahar, Mot, and others. There are three main cycles in Canaanite mythology. The first is the Baal-Anath cycle, which contains the deeds, conflicts, and final ascendancy of the storm god Baal, son of Dagon, over his enemies, including his battle against the sea god, Yam, alluded to many times in the Bible (e.g., Is. 51.9–10). Baal's palace is on Mount Zaphon. The second cycle is the Legend of King Keret, relating the king's quest for an heir, his illness and recovery, and the revolt of his son. The last cycle is the Legend of Aqhat, who was son of the righteous king Dan'el (cf. Ez. 14.14, 14.20, 28.3), which covers his conception to his death and its ultimate consequences.

Like El, the God of Israel is regarded as the "most high" (cf. Ps. 47.3), presiding over a divine council (cf. Ps. 82). Like Baal, Israel's God is portrayed at times as a storm god and warrior who fights enemy forces. One of the minor deities in Ugarit called Shalem is the eventual origin of the name Jerusalem, literally, "the foundation of [the god] Shalem."

U-NETANNEH TOQEF (תקף תנתינ; Let Us Evoke the Solemn Holiness of This Day), name and opening words of a piyyut recited during the repetition of the Musaf 'Amidah on the *Yamim Nora'im. Its central motifs are the day of judgment, when "the great shofar is sounded" and the fate of all of God's creatures is decreed each year in heaven, and the proclamation that "repentance, prayer, and charity" can mitigate an ordained punishment. Jewish folk tradition associated U-Netanneh Toqef with the payyeta Kalonimos and legendary martyr Annon of Mainz, and with the horrors of the Crusades. Documentary evidence, however, points to a much earlier composition date, during the Byzantine period by a Jewish contemporary of the emperor Romulus. It was adopted by the Ashkenazi and Italian rites. The prayer, which describes a day of awe and terror, in which God decides "who shall live and who shall die . . . who shall perish by fire, who by water, who by the sword and who by wild beasts . . .," was regarded with ambivalence in many modern non-Orthodox congregations, some of which omitted it.

UNION OF AMERICAN HEBREW CONGREGATIONS (UAHC), a religious and educational organization dedicated to the principles of *Reform Judaism. The UAHC was founded in Cincinnati in 1873 by Isaac Mayer *Wise with an initial membership of thirty-four congregations from twenty-eight cities. Its purpose, as stated in its constitution and bylaws, is "to encourage and aid the organization and development of Jewish congregations; to promote Jewish education and enrich and intensify Jewish life; to maintain the Hebrew Union College [and] foster other activities for the perpetuation and advancement of Judaism."

The UAHC is the oldest institution of its kind in North America and represents the lay community of North American Reform Judaism. It supports the World Union for Progressive Judaism and the Association of Reform Zionists of America and Arza Canada, and participates in many communal Jewish organizations, including the Synagogue Council of America, the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, the National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council, and the Canadian Jewish Congress. It is the patron body of the *Hebrew Union College–Jewish Institute of Religion.

The UAHC's major programmatic areas include Jewish education, synagogue management, social action, youth and camping, interreligious affairs, small congregations, outreach to the unaffiliated, and outreach to non-Jewish partners in interfaith marriages. Its headquarters is in New York City.

UNION OF ORTHODOX JEWISH CONGREGATIONS OF AMERICA, body serving the North American Orthodox community in the fields of education, outreach, and social service. It was founded in 1898 and has served as a central coordinating agency for American and Canadian Orthodox congregations. The affiliated organizations include the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY), a youth movement that maintains regional centers; [®]Kashruth Certification Service, which administers a staff of over eight hundred rabbinic coordinators, kashrut supervisors, food chemists, and support personnel in certifying eighty thousand brand names, hotels, restaurants, and so on; a publishing division, producing books, journals, tapes, and videos; synagogue services, providing linkage and services to one thousand synagogues, in addition to retreats, seminars, conferences, and outreach programs; and a large number of additional services for the Jewish community in the United States, Israel, and around the world.

UNION OF ORTHODOX RABBIS OF THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA, also known as Agudath Harabonim. A rabbinical association founded in 1902 for the purpose of protecting the interests of religious Jewry and strengthening Orthodox Jewish culture in America and elsewhere. The activities of the Union include founding the Central Relief Committee for the rescue and rehabilitation of Jewry in Europe and Erets Yisra'el from 1914 through 1919, and for the restoration and preservation of yeshivot in Europe and in Erets Yisra'el. In 1915 Ezras Torah was founded to assist needy Torah scholars and their families. After World War I, the Union published and distributed an edition of the Talmud Bavli. It worked to set up and assist yeshivot in New York and in the United States at large. During World War II, it founded Vaad Hatzala, a rescue and rehabilitation agency to rescue Jews from the Holocaust. Over the years, it has consistently worked on behalf of Erets Yisra'el and Orthodox Jewry.

UNION OF SEPHARDIC CONGREGATIONS, an organization founded in 1929 in conjunction with Congregation Shearith Israel in New York, to serve the interests of the Sephardi Jewish community. The union prepares prayer books (both for daily and festival use) for Sephardi congregations, providing accurate English translations for the growing numbers of Sephardi Jews in English-speaking countries. The union also assists in finding jobs for rabbis and Hebrew teachers within the Sephardi community.

UNITED SYNAGOGUE, Orthodox synagogue organization in England, constituted by an act of Parliament in 1870. The United Synagogue (US) embraces synagogues in Greater London and certain provincial towns; these are divided into constituent, district, and associated synagogues. It is administered by a council, and according to its constitution, the British chief rabbi is its sole recognized religious authority. It maintains the London beit din and a body that supervises kashrut throughout the country. Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, as chief rabbi in 1991, initiated a revitalization of the US at the same time as its lay leaders issued a thorough study and strategic plan entitled A Time for Change.

UNITED SYNAGOGUE OF CONSERVATIVE JUDAISM, an association (formerly United Synagogue of America) of over 830 Conservative congregations in the United States and Canada. Founded in 1913 by Solomon *Schechter, it has grown steadily and was responsible for the establishment in 1957 of the *World Council of Synagogues with affiliates in Israel and several South American and European countries. The United Synagogue coordinates its programs with the *Jewish Theological Seminary of America and is a constituent member of the World Council of Synagogues. Essentially a lay body, it endeavors to secure greater participation by the laity in the conduct of Conservative Jewish education and ritual practice.

UNLEAVENED BREAD. See MATSAH.

UNTERFIRER (יִי; אֲוִנְטֶרְפִּירֶר), the man who leads the bride or bridegroom "under the wedding canopy."

The bride and bridegroom are usually led by their parents or, in their absence, by married couples, preferably closely related to them.

'UQTSIN (עֲקָצִין; Stalks), tractate in Mishnah order Tohorot, with related material in Tosefta. There is no gemara in either Talmud. The first two of the tractate's three chapters discuss the conditions under which contact with impure parts of a plant, such as stalks, roots, pits, husks, or leaves, conveys impurity to the rest of the plant. The third chapter contains a collection of diverse laws dealing with impurities associated with plant and animal derivatives.

The laws of 'uqtsin were considered a recondite field of knowledge, as evidenced by R. Me'ir and R. Natan, who plotted to replace R. Shim'on ben Gamli'el as nasi by exposing his ignorance of 'uqtsin. Another sage, aware of the plot, saved R. Shim'on embarrassment by loudly reviewing the laws of 'uqtsin in his presence, signaling R. Shim'on of the need to pay attention and fill in this gap in his knowledge (Hor. 13b). Some medieval and contemporary scholars deduce from this story that tractate 'Uqtsin was redacted more than a generation earlier than the redaction of the Mishnaic corpus.

An English translation of the tractate is in Herbert Danby's The Mishnah (London, 1933).

URBACH, EFRAIM ELIMELECH (1912–1991), Talmud and rabbinics scholar. Born in Włocławek, Poland, Urbach was ordained at the Breslau Rabbinical Seminary in 1934 and also studied at the University of Rome. In 1938 he migrated to Palestine and during World War II served as an army chaplain. From 1953 he taught agadah and rabbinic literature at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, where he became a professor in 1958, and published books and articles that dealt with many aspects of rabbinic literature. His most significant works are Ba'alei ha-Tosafot (1956), which traces the history of the tosafists, and Ḥazal: Pirquei Emunot ve-De'ot (1969; Eng. trans. The Sages: Their Concepts and Beliefs [1975]), which traces the rise to leadership of the early rabbis and the development of their thought. URIEL, the fourth of the four archangels (the others being Gabriel, *Michael, and *Raphael) who preside over the four quarters of the globe. Uriel presides over the North. Unlike the other three archangels, he is not mentioned in rabbinic literature but is frequently referred to in the Apocrypha and pseudepigrapha, from which he entered into medieval mystical literature, where he also figures as the angel of fire (ur). See also ANGELS.

USHA', SYNOD OF, early rabbinic synod held in a town in Lower Galilee, mentioned in the annals of Sen-nacherib. The place became famous during the period of the Mishnah and Talmud, most especially after the Bar Kokhba' defeat, when a group of surviving scholars gathered there (c.140 CE) to reestablish the *Sanhedrin and institute regulations known as the Enactment of Usha' (Sg. Rab. 2.5, no. 3). The main authorities at this synod were Rabbis Yehudah bar Il'ai, Neḥemyah, Me'ir, Yosei ben Ḥalafta', Shim'on bar Yoḥ'ai, Eli'ezer ben Yosei ha-Galili, and Eli'ezer ben Ya'aqov. The office of nasi* was revived, and Shim'on ben Gamli'el was appointed to the post. Rabbi Natan ha-Bavli headed the beit din (rabbinic court), and R. Me'ir acted as a senior advisor (hakham). The scholars of Usha' applied themselves particularly to the laws of ritual purity; some of them probably adopted the principles of the *Hasideans, which included eating all foods in a state of purity. Some of the enactments of the rabbis of Usha' reflected the economic situation of the period, such as the ruling that "a man must support his young children" (Y., Ket. 4.8), not an easy task in a time of poverty and hardship. A further enactment, which strengthened the position of the sages, was that "one may not excommunicate an elder" (Y., Mo'ed Q. 3.1). Some scholars believe that a number of these enactments are of a later date; namely, the end of the Severan dynasty, around 230 CE. Usha' has been identified with present-day Hushah, where remains of a splendid building, possibly a synagogue, have been uncovered.

USHPIZIN (Aram.; ܘܫܦܝܝܢ; from Lat. hospites [guests]), the custom of welcoming one of seven patriarchs or heroes of biblical history (Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, Aaron, and David) as a spiritual guest to the sukkah* on each of the seven days of Sukkot. The notion is first mentioned in the Zohar (Emor 103b–104a), the seven names serving as symbols of seven of the ten sefirot* (manifestations of God). The formula of greeting was composed in Safed in the sixteenth century by Yitshaq *Luria. Originally practiced only by the kabbalists, the custom of reciting Ushpizin became widespread in Orthodox circles, and its formula (in Aramaic) is found in many festival prayer books. It also became a custom to invite poor students to the sukkah as a symbol of the spiritual visitors.

U-VA' LE-TSIYYON (וְיָצֵא לָנוּ; "And a redeemer shall come unto Zion"), the opening phrase of one of the concluding prayers in the Shaḥarit service. It consists of Isaiah 59.20–21 and *Qedushah de-Sidra', the recitation of Isaiah 6.3 in Hebrew and Aramaic. In general parlance the Qedushah de-Sidra' came to be identified with U-Va' le-Tsiyyon. The practice of the Qedushah de-Sidra' is first mentioned in the Talmud, in tractate Sotah 49a. According to Ismar Elbogen, following a responsum of R. Natrona'i Ga'on, the origin of the Qedushah de-Sidra' is as follows: "Early in the morning, immediately after the service, Torah lessons were held. At the end of the lesson several verses from the Prophets were recited, ending with the verses of the Qedushah; as was customary in these sermons, the verses were translated into Aramaic. As the struggle for survival became increasingly harder and there was no long time for study, the lesson was reduced and eventually eliminated altogether, but the verses remained standing at the end of the morning service." The remainder of U-Va' le-Tsiyyon includes a prayer, based on verses from 1 Chronicles, Psalms, and Micah, thanking God for his continuing mercies, and a prayer for enlightenment in the Torah, made up of citations from Psalms, Jeremiah, and Isaiah. On Sabbaths and festivals, U-Va' le-Tsiyyon is recited in the Minhah service; on Yom Kippur, in the Ne'ilah service. With the exception of the first section, the prayer is also incorporated in the Saturday evening service.

VAKHNAKHT (Yi.; וַחֲנֻכָּה; watch-night), the night before the circumcision, when relatives of the baby gather in its home to recite psalms in order to ward away *Lilith and other evil spirits. In certain communities, it is customary to give the guests a feast, including bread so that the Birkat ha-Mazon could be recited, though in other communities only wine and fruit are eaten. There is a difference of opinion as to whether this meal is to be recognized as a Se'udat Mitzvah (see SE'UDAH). In the time of R. Yitshaq Luria, the custom acquired a mystic significance. R. Ya'akov Emden composed a special book of study for reading throughout the entire night. The custom is mentioned in the Talmud (San. 32b). Among Sephardi Jews, the night is called Midrash because a homily on the Bible portion of the week is given by a scholar. Various customs were observed in different communities; in Salonika, for example, the mother stayed awake all night.

VA-YEKHULLU (וַיִּכְלֻ); And They Were Finished), opening word, serving also as the name, of the concluding paragraph of the Creation account in Genesis (2.1-3, "And the heaven and the earth were finished"). The verses are recited three times on Friday evenings: during the 'Amidah; after the 'Amidah; and in the *Qiddush at home. According to the Talmud, everyone who pronounces Va-Yekhullu on the Sabbath thereby becomes God's partner in creation (Shab. 119b).

VEGETARIANISM. Although abstention from animal flesh was occasionally suggested for ascetic reasons, vegetarianism as a religious principle was never encouraged in the history of Judaism. Indeed, most of the *dietary laws deal with the specifications of permitted meats and their preparation, and the consumption of meat is considered one of the essential delights of the Sabbath and festivals. The very institution of sacrifice as the main element of cult and its connection with the consumption of meat imply a nonvegetarian culture. The biblical account (Gen. 1, 9), however, clearly implies that at the time of Creation humankind was vegetarian. Although humans were given dominion over the animal kingdom, only "every herb bearing seed . . . and every tree in which there is fruit" (Gen. 1.30) was granted to them for food. After the Deluge, the covenant with the second father of humanity, Noah, permitted "every moving thing that liveth . . . even as the green herb" (Gen. 9.3) while strictly prohibiting the consumption of *blood (Gen. 9.4). The ancient rabbis clearly regarded the killing of animals for human consumption as a privilege granted only because of our superior moral and intellectual faculties. This is expressed by the teaching of R. *Yehudah ha-Nasi' that "an 'am ha-'arets [an ignoramus] should not eat meat" (Pes. 49a) and by the rabbis' definition of a "glutton" as one who eats an inordinate measure of meat (San. 70a). "Since there is no joy without meat" (Pes. 109a), its consumption is to be avoided in times of distress or mourning. Thus, meat should not be eaten following the death of a close relative until after the funeral and customarily should also be avoided during the nine-day period of national mourning culminating in Tish'ah be-'Av; the prohibition, however, does not extend to fish. It is also customary to eat dairy foods on Shavu'ot. Isaiah's prophecy that in messianic times "the lion shall eat straw like the ox" (Is. 11.7, 65.25) has been interpreted by some commentators as meaning that even the carnivorous animals would become vegetarians; others simply understand the prophecy as a metaphor for universal peace. See also ANIMALS, TREATMENT OF.

VE-HU' RAHUM (וְהוּא רַחוּם; "And he, being merciful"), the opening words of Psalms 78.38 and a verse that occurs in the prayer book in two locations. It appears as the introduction to the weekday Ma'ariv service, dating from the late geonic period, where it is meant as a plea for forgiveness for sins committed during the day. It is also the opening of one of the *selihot, known as the long version of Ve-Hu' Rahum, recited before *Tahanun on Mondays and Thursdays (see SHENI VA-HAMISHI), which is composed mainly of biblical verses.

VENGEANCE. Different attitudes toward vengeance are expressed in various biblical, rabbinic, moral, and legal texts; any particular attitude depends partly upon historical circumstances and partly upon whether vengeance appears as a divine or a human attribute. Such verses as "Vengeance is mine and I will repay" (Dt. 32.35) and "He will avenge the blood of his servants and will render vengeance unto his adversaries" (Dt. 44) show that vengeance is regarded as a divine prerogative and is part of the system of divine retribution whereby human injustice is corrected by divine justice. As a human act, vengeance is explicitly restricted. A Torah scholar is required to wreak vengeance in order to defend the honor of heaven (Yoma' 23a); however, "you shall not avenge, nor bear any grudge against the children of your people" (Lev. 19.18). The only exception to this rule was the law of the *blood avenger, the close relative of a person who had been killed through another's negligence. Even this type of vengeance was restricted by the provision of cities of refuge where the killer could live unharmed (see ASYLUM). The difference between inflicting vengeance and bearing a grudge is explained by the Talmud: If a man asks his neighbor to lend him an article and is refused, and on the next day that neighbor asks something of him, he should not say, "As you refused me yesterday, so I refuse you today," since that would constitute vengeance. If he says, "though you refused me a favor, I will not do likewise," he is bearing a grudge (Yoma 23a). The virtue of the ma'avir 'al middotav, that is, one who forbears and suppresses natural emotions of wrath and vindictiveness, is highly praised. The Bible contains many examples of forbearance and abstinence from vengeance as well as of savage revenge, one of the most well-known instances of the latter being the massacre of the inhabitants of Shechem by Simeon and Levi, an act that was denounced by Jacob both at the time (Gen. 34.30) and on his deathbed (Gen. 49.5-7).

VIOLENCE. Jewish law recognizes that violence is a human instinct and seeks to control it. In the third and fourth centuries some rabbis opposed violence even to safeguard Jewish survival, but this was a minority view. The halakhah concentrates on limiting those circumstances that would justify violence. It condemned unwarranted forms of violence, including war for war's sake, sadism, masochism, fighting duels, or acts of vengeance. However, violence against an attacker (rodef) or informer (moser) is permitted, but the life of the rodef may not be taken if there is another way to save the person attacked (San. 74a). See also HOMICIDE; PEACE; WAR.

VIRGINITY. In the Bible, virginity is an important element in marriage and a groom's accusation that his bride is not a virgin entails serious consequences of both a financial and a legal nature (Dt. 22.13-22). The seduction or rape of a virgin carries a monetary penalty, equal in value to the "bride price" (Ex. 22.15-16), and the man is required to marry the woman he deflowered. In the case of *rape, he also forfeits his right of divorce (Dt. 22.28-29). A *high priest is required to marry a virgin (Lv. 21.13) and the Talmudic discussion of whether or not a pregnant virgin is permitted to him (Hag. 14b) provides the basis for the modern halakhic discussion of artificial insemination by a donor. Under Talmudic law, only a virgin is entitled to the full ketubbah sum of two hundred zuzim. In the Talmudic period, weddings took place on Wednesday so that a groom who discovered that his bride had lost her virginity prior to the wedding could make his claim before the beit din on Thursday morning (Ket. 1.1). The Talmud recognizes that virginity may be lost by injury (Ket. 1.7). Women taken into captivity and bondswomen are assumed to have lost their virginity, as are all widows and divorcees. In such cases, the ketubbah sum is only a hundred zuzim.

VISIONS. The experience of beholding something with the "eyes of the spirit" may be sought or induced by mystical practices or be spontaneous and unexpected. Its contents may be terrestrial events removed in space (second sight) or time (foresight, prophecy) or spiritual realities and symbols. On the highest religious level, visions are experienced as God's *revelation to the prophets. Different categories of vision are implied in Numbers 12.6-8, where a distinction is made between the manner in which God revealed himself to Moses, speaking to him "mouth to mouth, plainly and not in riddles, and he beholds the likeness of the Lord," and his appearance to other prophets to whom he was to make himself known "in a vision, I speak with him in a dream." This may mean that the message of God came to other prophets in *dreams or trancelike states, whereas Moses was in full possession of normal cognitive faculties. The Bible often records visions, many of them theophanies; with some prophets (e.g., Ezekiel, Zechariah) they are more frequent than with others. The identification of visions with prophetic experiences seems to be implied by 1 Samuel 3.1. Often the prophet received his calling in an initiatory vision (e.g., Is. 6). Visionary accounts, which often describe journeys to heaven by biblical personalities, abound in apocalyptic literature (see APOCALYPSE). According to the Talmud, most prophets beheld their visions "as in a cloudy mirror," thus accounting for a certain lack of clarity that often required verbal interpretation. Talmudic literature discusses prophetic vision but does not itself record visions. Visionary experiences were cultivated in mystical circles among the ancient rabbis, while the earliest mystical literature—*Heikhalot and Merkavah (see MA'ASEH MERKAVAH)—is devoted largely to visions of ascents to heaven and the celestial world. Many medieval writings discuss the nature of visions, although some more rationalist philosophers explained them as products of the imagination. Folkloric evidence suggests the widespread occurrence of and belief in visions (for example, in Sefer Hasidim and other works of the Hasidei Ashkenaz). Visions are frequently reported, at times in great detail, in the Zohar and subsequent kabbalistic literature. Somewhat different from visions were auditions, namely, inspired speech, when a celestial voice spoke through the human mouth (as in the cases of Yosef *Karo and Mosheh Hayyim *Luzzatto). Many Hasidic tales, some relating to the Ba'al Shem Tov, take visionary experiences for granted.

VITAL FAMILY, kabbalistic rabbis.

Hayyim Vital (1542–1620), the main disciple of R. Yitshaq *Luria in Safed. He probably was born in Safed and died in Damascus, where he spent his last years. He was ordained by his teacher Mosheh Alshekh following the reinstitution of the process of *ordination in Safed by R. Ya'aqov Berab earlier in the century. When Luria came to Safed, Vital became his closest disciple, and after Luria's death, Vital made all the other members of Luria's group sign a contract forbidding them to study and write down Luria's teachings without his presence and supervision. He dedicated his life to the writing of Luria's Kabbalah in several editions, one of the most important ones being 'Ets Hayyim (Warsaw, 1890; Tel Aviv, 1960). Vital opposed the publication of this material, and, according to tradition, some manuscripts were stolen from his home and copied when he was sick. His writings, especially 'Ets Hayyim, served as the main text of kabbalistic studies for several centuries.

He regarded himself as the Messiah, even before Luria came to Safed. For several decades, he wrote a detailed diary, collecting material that would prove his messianic destiny. The diary, published as Sefer ha-Hezyonot (Jerusalem, 1954), was known in an abbreviated form as Shivhei ha-Rahu and was printed in several editions (Ostróg, 1826; Jerusalem, 1866). It includes the author's dreams concerning his destiny, dreams that others dreamed about him, revelations by sorcerers (including Muslims) about him, but mainly the information he received from Luria concerning the history of the various parts of his soul and their transmigration from the Creation until they reached him as the soul of the Messiah.

Shemu'el ben Hayyim Vital (1598–c.1678), youngest son of Hayyim. Born in Safed, he was brought up in Damascus, where he became an authority in Talmudic studies. His main literary contribution to Lurianic Kabbalah was the reediting of his father's 'Ets Hayyim, dividing it into eight parts and adding his own annotations. In 1664 he settled in Cairo, maintaining close contacts with the wealthy head of the Jewish community, the chelebi, Refa'el Yosef. In 1666, at the onset of Shabbateanism, Vital played an active role in organizing the repentance movement led by *Natan of Gaza. Shemu'el's writings on Talmudic and kabbalistic subjects are still in manuscript.

VIZHNITZ, Hasidic dynasty established by R. Menahem Mendel of Kosov, the son of a disciple of the Ba'al Shem Tov. The name derives from the town of Vizhnitz, in the Ukraine, which served as the home of the rabbis of the dynasty. Due to ideological differences, the dynasty is divided between two grand rabbis, one in Israel and the other in Monsey, New York. Grand Rabbi Mosheh Yehoshu'a Hagar resides in Qiryat Vizhnitz, Israel, a virtually self-sufficient town south of Bene Beraq. A smaller segment of Vizhnitz Hasidim owes its allegiance to Grand Rabbi Mordkhe Hagar, who resides in the New York City area. Vizhnitz has established institutions throughout Israel and, besides New York, has a presence in London, Manchester, Antwerp, Vienna, Zurich, and Montreal.

VOCALIZATION. The Hebrew *alphabet, like other Semitic alphabets, is entirely consonantal, and for the traditional pronunciation of a biblical word it is necessary to rely on its vowel points as recorded at a rather late date by the Masoretes (see MASORAH). Early sources of the biblical text, such as the Qumran texts, are not vocalized. The main function of the vocalization was to remove doubts regarding the reading of the text when this allowed for more than one interpretation. It was also a necessary component of the Masoretic Text, since this text was sparing in its use of matres lectionis. In texts that made abundant use of matres lectionis, such as some of the Qumran scrolls, there was less need for vocalization. The earliest method used to indicate vocalization was the insertion of vowel letters in the consonantal text. This method was superseded by a full system of vocalization through punctuation. Although both Jewish and Christian traditions believed in the divine origin of vocalization, it was first introduced after the conclusion of the Talmudic period; Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on (882–942) is the first to mention it. Three main systems of vocalization were developed, sometime between 500 and 700. These are the Tiberian vocalization, with vowel points mainly below the letters, and Palestinian and Babylonian vocalization, with vowel signs above the consonants. In the course of time, one subgroup of the Tiberian system, that of Aharon ben Mosheh ben Asher (see BEN ASHER FAMILY), came to be generally accepted. As a result, this system became the basis for most manuscripts and subsequently all Bible editions, although manuscripts written in the Babylonian and Palestinian supralinear systems were also prevalent for a time in the Middle Ages. In general, Hebrew manuscripts and books are not vocalized, except for certain texts for beginners.

VOLOZHIN, town in Lithuania, seat of a famous *yeshivah established in 1803 by R. Hayyim ben Yitshaq *Volozhiner, disciple of *Eliyyahu ben Shelomoh Zalman of Vilna, the Vilna Ga'on. This was a time of bitter strife between the Hasidim and the Mitnaggedim. The Hasidim appeared to be gaining the upper hand among yeshivah students, largely as a reaction to the unpopular *pulpul method then in use. To replace this method, the Volozhin Yeshivah insisted on stressing the study of the text itself and ascertaining its true meaning. Rabbi Hayyim was succeeded by his son, Yitshaq, who, in turn, was succeeded by his son-in-law, R. Naftali Tsevi Yehudah *Berlin, under whose leadership the yeshivah rose to its greatest fame, with four hundred students. The Volozhin Yeshivah was the spiritual forerunner of the entire Lithuanian yeshivah movement, and many of its students were later involved in founding and staffing some of the other yeshivot in that country. The Russian authorities made efforts over the years to force the Volozhin Yeshivah to close, but in most cases, such closure orders were simply ignored, and the yeshivah continued to function. It was closed by the czarist government in 1879; it reopened in 1881, but was closed again in 1892, partially due to pressure upon the Russian authorities by some of the yeshivah students who had been influenced by the *Haskalah and wished to force the yeshivah to change its educational system. The ultimate reason for the closure was the yeshivah's refusal to introduce secular studies. It was reopened in 1899 but did not retain its position of eminence. It was destroyed by the Germans in World War II, when all sixty-four of its students were killed.

VOLOZHINER, HAYYIM BEN YITSHAQ (1749–1821), rabbi and educator. At age twenty-five he became the disciple of *Eliyyahu ben Shelomoh Zalman, the Vilna Ga'on, whom he eventually succeeded as spiritual leader of the *Mitnaggedim in eastern Europe. In 1773 he was appointed rabbi of Volozhin, Lithuania. Sharing the Vilna Ga'on's sentiments against Hasidism and against the technique of argumentation popular in yeshivot, R. Hayyim founded the *Volozhin Yeshivah, in 1803, in which he stressed the examination of the plain meaning of the Talmud and introduced secular subjects. The archetype for future Talmudic academies, it was later named 'Ets Hayyim in his honor. Nefesh ha-Hayyim (1824), his most important work, challenges Hasidism and emphasizes Torah li-shemah, "Torah study for its own sake."

VOWS AND OATHS, solemn affirmations (oaths) and promises to perform, or abstain from, specific actions (vows). The line separating oaths and vows in Jewish law is not always clearly drawn (cf. the opening of *Kol Nidrei: "All vows, bonds, oaths, anathemas, excommunications," etc.), particularly since swearing to do a certain thing is tantamount to a vow.

Vows (nedarim) may be divided into two categories, positive and negative. The former is a solemn undertaking or pledge to consecrate something to God or to do something in his honor; the latter, called an issar, is the voluntary abstention from an otherwise legitimate activity or enjoyment. Nedavah is the pledging or consecration of a designated gift to God; the destruction or theft of the article or the death of the consecrated animal nullifies the vow. The vow, which must be made voluntarily and in full consideration of its implications, becomes effective upon utterance, and its violation constitutes a transgression of the prohibition "he shall not profane his word" (Nm. 30.33). A neder or nedavah must be fulfilled before the *Shalosh Regalim have passed, lest the prohibition against laxity in the fulfillment of vows be infringed (Dt. 23.22). Vows were usually made in times of distress, as in the case of Jacob (Gn. 28.20–22), or as an expression of thanksgiving for favors and kindnesses received (cf. Ps. 116.16–18). Vows were also undertaken as a sign of penitence or to free oneself from severe temptation (Avot 3.17). In matters affecting the physical well-being of one's wife or the relationship between husband and wife, a husband may void the vows of his wife on the day he hears them (hafarah); he may also void the vows of his unmarried daughters (Nm. 30ff.). After careful examination of the circumstances surrounding the making of a vow, a competent beit din may nullify it and absolve the vower (hattarah). There must exist, however, reasonable grounds for such nullification. It is customary to nullify vows (except those contracted between man and man) before the advent of the High Holy Days. The Talmud's attitude toward the making of vows is generally negative: "He who makes a vow, though he fulfills it, is called wicked" (Ned. 22a) or "For sins arising from unfulfilled vows, children die" (Shab. 32b). Vows are the subject of tractate Nedarim*.

An oath taken in vain, forbidden by the Ten Commandments ("You shall not swear by my name falsely" [Lv. 19.12]), is one which attempts to deny a self-evident fact or attempts to affirm a self-evident fact or involves one in undertaking the impossible or is directed against the fulfillment of a religious precept. In each of these instances, the oath, which has no validity or effect, is punishable upon utterance. One must also bring a guilt offering, "for the Lord will not hold him guiltless who takes his name in vain" (Ex. 20.7). Taking God's name in vain is the greatest sacrilege, since the basic notion of an oath is the total submission of one's words, thoughts, deeds, in fact one's entire personality, to the judgment of God. An oath is only administered in a court of law when other evidence has proved inadequate. An oath, to be valid, may be uttered in any language, and no mention of any of the names of God need be made. An oath may, in certain circumstances, be undertaken for the purpose of strengthening one's moral character and observance or to rid one's self of bad habits, but the taking of oaths, like that of vows, is discouraged in Judaism. An exception is the practice of vowing to make a contribution to a synagogue on the occasion of being called to the reading of the Torah. This is publicly announced with a blessing for the person who has vowed (she-nadar); in Yiddish the practice became known as shnodder.

WAGES, the fee paid for *labor or service. In the Bible, the employer is strictly enjoined to pay such fees without delay upon completion of the labor or service: "The wages of a hired man shall not abide with you all night until morning" (Lv. 19.13). The Talmud explains that one hired for the day is to be paid not later than the next morning; one hired for the night, by the following evening (see Dt. 24.15). One who withholds such wages transgresses several biblical prohibitions. Crediting the laborer at a shop or bank is considered due payment, but, in order to protect the laborer against possible exploitation in the form of inferior merchandise at inflated prices, payment in kind is strictly forbidden. The terms of hire do not require witnesses or a qinyan (see ACQUISITION) in order to bind the parties. When doubt arises concerning the terms, the custom of the place and trade is to be followed. Payment of substandard wages is forbidden as part of the prohibition against oppressing the hired man (Dt. 24.14). Workers drafted by the government in times of emergency or war are to be paid fair wages, and even prisoners of war are to receive due compensation if made to work. The coming of the shemittah* (in which all debts are cancelled) does not affect wages due.

WANDERING JEW, one of the most popular themes in Christian folklore. It is expressed in numerous forms, including prose and poetry, plays, visual art, music, folktales, linguistic idioms, and even in the names of plants and birds. The theme is based on the legend of a cobbler in Jerusalem who refused Jesus a moment of rest next to the wall of his house along the road to the Crucifixion. Because of this, the cobbler was cursed with eternal wandering until Jesus' Second Coming. This oral legend was first published in 1602, in Germany, in a popular pamphlet written by an unknown author from Martin Luther's circle and entitled Kurtze Beschreibung und Er- zählung von einem Juden mit Namen Ahasverus. The legend developed from two sources in the New Testament (Jn. 18.22 and 20.22-23; see also Mt. 16.28). The Wandering Jew appears in different forms in different European traditions, ranging from a poor wanderer asking for water, whose visit means blessing; to a romantic rebel; to a demonic, inhuman figure, who causes disaster and death wherever he goes. As a symbol of the Jewish people, the Wandering Jew was the basis for antisemitic conceptions, including Nazi propaganda.

WAR. In biblical times, nations believed that their armies were led by their gods, and the Israelites, too, conceived of God as a man of war (Ex. 5.3; Is. 42.13) who led their battalions (Ps. 68.8). To symbolize the divine presence, the *Ark of the Covenant was carried onto the battlefield (Nm. 10.35-36; 1 Sm. 14.18). Because God could not be conquered, any defeat was ascribed to the faithlessness of the Israelites. The laws of war presented in Deuteronomy 20.1-21 were further developed by rabbinic exegesis (Sot. 8), the authors of which had no practical experience of warfare. Different categories of war are distinguished: milhemet hovah (obligatory war), regarded by some authorities as identical with milhemet mitsvah (war commanded by God); and milhemet reshut (permitted war). To the former category belong the wars of the extermination of the seven Canaanite nations and wars to defend the territorial integrity of Erets Yisra'el. A milhemet mitsvah could be declared by the king alone, and the various exemptions detailed in Deuteronomy 20.5-8 are suspended. To wage such a war, one could take "even the bridegroom from his chamber and the bride from her bridal canopy" (Sot. 8.7; the phrase is from Jl. 2.16 and may be hyperbolic—there is no reference in Jewish literature to women soldiers). A permitted war could be declared only by the Sanhedrin and was subject to the application of the exemptions from conscription detailed in the Torah. Various concessions, such as permission to make free use of fuel, to disregard the dietary laws, and to eat doubtfully tithed produce, were made to soldiers. A vivid account of an apocalyptic war, probably based on contemporary military experience, is contained in one of the Dead Sea Scrolls, the War Scroll*. The biblical and rabbinic laws of warfare are systematically presented in Maimonides' Hilkhot Melakhim 6-8.

In modern times, scholars debated whether Jews could serve in non-Jewish armies in wars that did not directly affect Jews. The majority decided that the principle of dina' de-malkhuta' dina'* (the laws of the country are to be observed) implied the obligation of Jews to serve in the armies of the countries of which they were citizens.

In the State of Israel, a military rabbinate issues halakhic directives concerning the religious obligations of soldiers.

WARNING. According to Talmudic law, a man could not be sentenced to capital or corporal punishment for a crime unless he had received a specific warning (hatra'ah) beforehand not to commit that crime. The object of this legislation was to ensure that a person sentenced to extreme penalties was being punished for a misdeed committed willfully and not accidentally or in ignorance. Should the judges in such cases consider that the deed had been done willfully but no special caution had been issued, the sentence was generally reduced to one of imprisonment.

WAR SCROLL, an eschatological text of the *Dead Sea Scrolls describing the battle between the armies of God and Belial. The first manuscript, 1QM (Cave 1, 1947), which is the most complete, consists of nineteen badly mutilated columns, while six other fragmentary manuscripts were found in Cave 4 in 1951. The manuscripts range in date from the first half of the first century BCE to the middle of the first century CE. The suggested date of composition ranges from the Hasmonean to the late Herodian periods (the latter appears impossible).

The War Scroll describes the final battle at the End of Days that will take place between the Sons of Light, including an army of angels led by Michael and the Qumran sect itself, and the Sons of Darkness, headed by Belial and including apostate Jews, the nations of the world as listed in Genesis 10, and the Kittim of Asshur. It is a composite document, with column 1, verses 15–19, describing the war against the Kittim, columns 2 through 9 describing a war forty years in length, and columns 10 through 14 containing miscellaneous hymns and prayers. The scroll is particularly concerned with the correct conduct of the army and the purity of the camp, leading to some definite impracticalities in conducting a war. For example, warriors are said to be between forty and fifty years of age, while baggage handlers are said to be between twenty-five and thirty. The scroll was published by Yigael Yadin in The Scroll of the War of the Sons of Light Against the Sons of Darkness (English ed. [Oxford, 1962]).

WASHING. See ABLUTION.

WATER plays an important role in biblical cosmogony and history, while the cleansing and refreshing properties of water guarantee it a prominent place both in the symbolism and in the rituals of religion. It was on the second day of Creation that God made a firmament dividing the waters above from the waters below, which he gathered into the seas and separated from the dry land, the Earth (Gn. 1.6–11). Water rights led to a conflict between Abraham and Abimelech (Gn. 21.25), while lack of water in the Sinai wilderness led the Israelites to speak against Moses (Ex. 15.22–25, 17.1–7; Nm. 20.1–13). Biblical and rabbinic law prescribe *ablutions and immersions for various occasions (see MIQVEH), for example, the washing of one's hands before (and after) meals and the ritual bath taken by married women (see NIDDAH). On the other hand, the halakhah (based on Lv. 11.38) rules that plants are not susceptible to ritual contamination until they come into contact with water. The most spectacular ceremonial use of water was at the annual rite of water *libation, preceded by the solemn drawing of the water that was held on *Sukkot against the opposition of the Sadducees, who maintained that there was no scriptural authority for the ritual (see SIMḤAT BEIT HA-SHO'EVAH). In the aggadah, water is regarded as a symbol of the Torah (e.g., Ta'an. 7a, based on Is. 55.1).

WAVE OFFERING (Heb. tenufah [elevation]). According to the Torah, a number of sacrificial offerings were required to be presented to God by means of a ritual symbolizing the transfer of ownership from the offerer to the deity. Rabbinic authorities understood the presentation ritual to consist of waving the offering back and forth (see Men. 5.6), and this became normative Jewish practice. However, the term elevation, also known from ancient times as well as from the depiction of the rite in an ancient Egyptian relief, would seem closer to the biblical usage. The most familiar such offering is the annual *omer barley sheaf offered on 16 Nisan (Lv. 23.11–14); the others are the breast of the *peace offering, given to the priest (Lv. 7.30); the *reparation offering and purification oil of the healed leper (Lv. 14.12–14); the *meal offering of the suspected adulteress (Nm. 5.25; see ORDEAL OF JEALOUSY); and certain portions of the offering of the *Nazirite (Nm. 6.20). During the Israelites' wilderness period, the metals for the building of the Tabernacle (Ex. 35.22) and a portion of the priestly consecration offering (Lv. 8.25–29) were reported to have been similarly dedicated. It is also related that the Levites were dedicated to the service of the Tabernacle as a human tenufah (Nm. 8.11ff.); presumably in this case the ritual was performed symbolically. See also TERUMAH.

WEALTH. Differences in wealth and the existence of “poverty are assumed already in the Bible as social realities that need to be mitigated by appropriate legislation and the application of social ethics. The acquisition of wealth by unjust means is among the main themes of prophetic denunciation. Wealth is a blessing from God but also a moral danger (cf. Jer. 9.22, “let not the rich man glory in his riches”), though the author of Proverbs 14.20 was realistic enough to note “the poor is hated even of his neighbor; but the rich have many friends.” The rabbis did not glorify wealth. In their moral teachings they defined as rich he “who is happy with what he has” (Avot 4.1).

WEIL, YA'AQOV BEN YEHUDAH (died c.1456), German rabbi. A student of R. Ya'aqov ben Moshe ha-Levi Molin, Weil was one of the leading halakhic authorities of his generation. He served as rabbi in Nürnberg, Augsburg, Bamberg, and Erfurt. His literary works include his volume of responsa (Venice, 1523), which he edited himself, and Hilkhot Shehitah u-Vediqah (Venice, 1549), a summary of some of the more important laws surrounding ritual slaughter, along with a brief but substantive commentary. Its selection of topics and its comparative brevity suggest that the latter volume was intended as a practical guide for the sho'het rather than as a theoretical work for legal scholars.

WEINBERG, YEHI'EL YA'AQOV (1885–1966), rabbi and halakhic authority. He was born in Lithuania, studied at the yeshivot of Mir and Slobodka, and was appointed rabbi of Pilvishki in 1907. He later moved to Germany and obtained his doctorate at the University of Giessen. He taught Talmud and became head of the Berlin Rabbinical Seminary. During the Holocaust, he was interned in several concentration camps. After the war, he settled in Montreux, Switzerland.

Weinberg became internationally known as a halakhic authority whose responsa, collected in Seridei Esh (4 vols. [1961–1969]), were highly influential among Orthodox Jews. He was particularly known for his analysis of contemporary issues in halakhah. He also published collections of his essays, in Hebrew and German, and studies in Talmudic literature.

WEISS, ISAAC HIRSCH (1815–1905), Talmudic scholar and historian. Born in Moravia, he settled in 1861 in Vienna, where from 1864 he taught at the Vienna Rabbinical Seminary. While opposing extreme Orthodoxy and Reform, he sought to combine thorough Talmudic scholarship with scientific methodology. Weiss published Sifra' (1862) and Mekhilta' (1865), and his outstanding Dor Dor ve-Dorshav (1871–1891), a five volume history of oral tradition from earliest times until after the Spanish expulsion of 1492, incorporates biographies of the main rabbis of the Talmudic period. This was a pioneering work in the critical analysis of rabbinic sources and dealt with the development of both the halakhah and aggadah. The book was frequently reprinted and was widely read, especially in eastern Europe.

WERBERMACHER, HANNAH RAKHEL (1815–c.1895), Hasidic master. Born in Vladimir, she became noted as, perhaps, the only woman to found her own Hasidic group. Possessed of an unusually refined spiritual nature, given over to ecstatic worship, she acquired a traditional rabbinic education. A mystical experience at her mother's grave left Werbermacher, after a protracted illness, spiritually transformed. She subsequently built her own beit midrash in Ludomir. Secluded in a private room, she would offer teachings and blessings to her followers from behind the closed door. She also, it seems, occasionally traveled to other towns to preach, in some cases, especially for women. Her success as a rebbe was not well received by male tsaddiqim. Mordekhai of Chernobyl expressed the view that a famous male tsaddiq's soul must have transmigrated into her. He felt that the appropriate remedy was marriage. Although she tried marriage several times, none was consummated. Nevertheless, as a married woman, her Hasidic following diminished. She spent the last years of her life in Erets Yisra'el, involved in kabbalistic endeavors.

WESTERN WALL (Heb. Kotel Ma'aravi), the western side of the supporting wall of the Temple mount constructed by Herod and in recent centuries the main site of Jewish *pilgrimage; known in the writings of Christian travelers as the Wailing Wall. The earliest layers, consisting of large blocks measuring five feet in length by one foot high (some weighing over one hundred tons), date from Herod's reconstruction of the Second Temple in the first century BCE. On top of them is a layer built during the reign of Hadrian (2d cent. CE), and above it, Arab masonry. As a surviving remnant of the Temple, the wall is mentioned in midrashim of the amoraic period; it was not destroyed and never will be because the divine presence rests there (Ex. Rab. 2.2; Lam. Rab. 1.31). It is mentioned in medieval accounts by travelers who, however, ascribed no special sanctity to it. It became a focus of prayer in the sixteenth century, and feeling for the wall deepened in the early nineteenth century when it became part of the growing national consciousness and featured in literature and art. It began to play a major role in religion and folklore starting in the early twentieth century: worshipers lit candles there and placed petitions in the cracks of the wall. The proximity of the wall to the Muslim holy site of the Haram al-Sharif led to outbursts of friction between Jews and Muslims. During the period of Jordanian rule (1948–1967), Israelis were not allowed to visit the wall and few Jews reached it. After it came under Israeli control in the 1967 Six-Day War, the Israelis expanded the narrow strip in front of the Wall, where Jews had until then been allowed to pray, into a large plaza. The area became the site of mass pilgrimages and prayers. The Orthodox rabbinate put up a fence separating men and women. The site became a favorite place for bar mitsvah celebrations of boys from both Israel and the Diaspora, army swearing-in ceremonies, and other national and religious gatherings. Since 1967 intensive excavations have been conducted along the entire length of the wall and have exposed many (now subterranean) structures. See also HOLY PLACE; TEMPLE MOUNT.

WHOLE OFFERING. See BURNT OFFERING.

WIDOW. The obligation to support the widow (often classified together with the *orphan) is a pervasive biblical theme, and the punishment of one who mistreats a widow is dire in the extreme (Ex. 22.21). A widow is permitted to marry anyone except a high priest (Lv. 21.12), provided that she does not require halitsah from her brother-in-law (see LEVIRATE MARRIAGE) and is not in breach of the prohibited relationships imposed upon her by virtue of her previous marriage. While she does not inherit from her husband, she may claim her ketubbah*, which must be paid out of his estate (Ket. 68b). A widow's right to the ketubbah lies against all her husband's assets, both movable and immovable, and also against immovable property transferred to third parties (Ket. 51a). It has been customary, since the time of Maimonides, to include a clause to this effect in the ketubbah (Laws of Marriage 16.8). The widow may, however, choose to be maintained out of her husband's estate and maintenance includes the right to occupy the matrimonial home. The heirs are entitled to receive any earnings gained by the widow, in lieu of the maintenance (Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 95.1). The widow's right to maintenance ceases upon payment of the ketubbah or upon remarriage (Ket. 54a). The Talmud records diverse customs with regard to whether or not the heirs can unilaterally decide to pay the widow her ketubbah and thereby relieve themselves of the burden of her maintenance (Ket. 52b, 54a). The halakhah was decided in favor of the widow, although it is possible to make a taqqanah for the purpose of limiting her choice in circumstances in which not to do so would give rise to an injustice (Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer, no. 118). In this respect there is a difference between the Sephardi and Ashkenazi communities in Erets Yisra'el. The former follow the Talmudic position and give the widow the right to choose between ketubbah and maintenance. The latter allow the heirs to pay her the ketubbah even if she would prefer to be maintained.

WIGS (Yi. sheitlakh; sing. sheitl). In Talmudic times, wigs were worn by women for adornment or to hide a lack of hair. The Talmud forbids the exposure of loose hair in the street by married women (even citing this as grounds for divorce), saying "the hair of a woman is unchaste" (Ber. 24a), but the rigid development of this regulation—whereby a woman shaves off her hair at marriage and thereafter never appears in public without a wig—dates only from the fifteenth century. In some Orthodox circles, married women cover their hair with wigs. See also COVERING OF THE HEAD.

Willows of the brook were required on *Sukkot for the four species. Willows growing in the vicinity of Jerusalem (at Motsa') were picked for the adornment of the altar on the feast day, and branches were carried at the haqqafot circuits. They were called hosha'not* after the responsive refrain of the ceremony. WILOWSKY, YA'AQOV DAVID, (1845–1913), rabbi, Talmudic commentator, and educator; known by the acronym Ridbaz. Born in Kobrin, Russia, Wilowsky held rabbinic posts in Izbollin (1869), Bobruisk (1876), Polotsk, Vilkomir, and Slutsk, where he established a noted yeshivah. From 1903 to 1905, Wilowsky was in the United States. In 1905 he moved to Safed, where he established a yeshivah, Torat Erets Yisra'el, and entered into controversy with R. Avraham Yitshaq Kook (see KOOK FAMILY) over the proper observance of the sabbatical year. Wilowsky wrote both responsa and works of Talmudic interpretation, notably two commentaries on the Talmud Yerushalmi. The first, modeled on Rashi's commentaries, explained the literal meaning of the text under consideration, while the second, modeled on the tosafot*, compared and contrasted the significance of the text in question with other Talmudic and halakhic texts. The commentaries were published with the text of the Jerusalem Talmud from 1898 to 1900. His other works include Migdal David (1874) and Hanah David (1876), commentary and responsa on both Talmuds; and Nimmuqei Ridbaz (1904), a commentary on the Pentateuch.

WINE (Heb. yayin). Despite the fact that the first references to wine in the Bible are connected with the drunkenness of Noah (Gn. 9.20–27) and the account of the incest committed by the two daughters of Lot with their father (Gn. 19.31–38), wine is generally praised in Jewish tradition for its wholesome qualities and its capacity to "gladden the heart of man" (Ps. 104.15). Wine was regularly used as a libation* in the sacrificial services (Nm. 28–29). Rabbinic law further amplified and expanded its ritual use. As the symbol of joy*, wine was an essential element of all festivities, for example, the Qiddush*, Havdalah*, the Seder (see FOUR CUPS), weddings, and circumcisions. In Talmudic times, it was customary to bring mourners a gift of wine, and it was said that wine was only created to comfort mourners (Eruv. 65a). Wine was granted a special blessing distinct from that of all other agricultural produce ("Blessed are you . . . who created the fruit of the vine"), and it is almost the only item of a meal which is not covered by the grace before meals (see BIRKAT HA-MOTS) but requires a separate benediction. Where the written law is compared to water, the oral law is compared to wine; this comparison extends to everything that is praiseworthy—Jerusalem, Israel, the Messiah, and the righteous. According to one rabbinic statement, the Nazirite* is regarded as a sinner for depriving himself of the legitimate pleasure of wine (Naz. 19a). Excessive drinking was encouraged on Purim* and in greater moderation on Simhat Torah*. Only overindulgence is condemned, although the rabbis taught that a teacher who drinks even a small quantity of wine must not render legal decisions because his mind is clouded (Ket. 10b). The tradition of moderation was so firmly entrenched that alcoholism was not a social problem among Jews.

Anything used in connection with pagan worship was forbidden as food, drink, or for any other purpose, nor was benefit to be derived from it. As a result of the ancient link between wine and idolatrous ritual, a strict prohibition was enforced against partaking of wine prepared by gentiles (yein nesekh [wine of libation]). The ban on drinking gentile wine, one of several prohibitions ascribed to the Keneset ha-Gedolah* and intended to limit social contact and conviviality with non-Jews (Shab. 17b), is still considered binding in rabbinic law. Although such wine may not be drunk, benefit from it (e.g., selling it) is permitted. The prohibition against yein nesekh also extends to unbottled wine that has been merely touched by a gentile, but does not include liquids not made from grapes. Kosher wine signifies wine guaranteed not to have been touched by a gentile before the bottle has been sealed. These laws have been abandoned in Conservative Judaism and were never accepted by Reform Jews.

WISDOM (Heb. hokhmah). In biblical usage wisdom is conceived of as a human characteristic, partly the result of experience and learning, but mainly a gift of God. The personification and praise of wisdom in some texts (see WISDOM LITERATURE) and its description as God's first creation, even prior to the creation of the world (cf. Prv. 8.22–32), led to its subsequent identification with the concept of Torah*. Since the Torah was conceived of as a primordial manifestation of divine wisdom, the rabbis could use the words spoken by wisdom (Prv. 8.22), "the Lord possessed me in the beginning of his way, before the works of old," as a proof text for the doctrine of the preexistence* of the Torah (Pes. 54a). Elsewhere the rabbis identify wisdom with practical intelligence and secular knowledge, for example, in the Midrashic statement (Lam. Rab. 2.17) "If a person says to you that there is wisdom among the nations, believe him; if he says there is Torah among the nations, do not believe him." The blessing to be recited upon seeing a gentile sage (extended to one whose wisdom is in the secular sphere) is "Blessed be he who has imparted his wisdom to flesh and blood" (Ber. 58b), while the blessing for seeing a Torah sage is "... who has granted from his wisdom to those who fear him." The wise man must be God-fearing ("the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom," Prov. 9.10), and the Mishnah (Avot 3.11) warns "He whose fear of sin exceeds his wisdom—his wisdom will endure, but he whose wisdom is greater than his fear of sin—his wisdom will not endure." *Rashi (in his commentary on Ex. 31.3 and elsewhere) differentiated between hokhmah and binah (understanding), the former referring to the acquisition of facts, the latter to the knowledge that is deduced from these facts by the use of the intellect. In medieval thought wisdom was considered one of the divine attributes, and in Kabbalah Hokhmah was one of the ten manifestations, or *sefirot, of the Godhead. The term also figures in the triad—wisdom, understanding, and knowledge—of Habad Hasidism. The wise scholar (talmid hakham) or sage (hakham*), titles which are still used in some communities synonymously with the title rabbi, is the ideal of Jewish education.

WISDOM LITERATURE, literature based on the praise of *wisdom as the quintessence of human perfection and virtue. One trend in wisdom literature personified wisdom as a near-divine entity, a development that linked the concept of wisdom with that of Logos. Wisdom literature, which flourished in the ancient Orient (e.g., Egypt, Mesopotamia), is represented in the Bible by the books of Proverbs, Job*, and Ecclesiastes* (as well as certain psalms). They contain counsel based upon the rational insight and practical experience of sages, as distinct from the absolute demands based on prophetic experience. Often the words of instruction are addressed to the young and couched in pragmatic terms, the main stress being on practical conduct and personal sagacity. However, in spite of its utilitarian morality, biblical wisdom literature leaves no doubt that piety and the fear of the Lord are the beginning of all wisdom (Ps. 111.10). Another outstanding feature of wisdom literature is its universalism. There is no mention of specific Jewish rituals or national interest in Proverbs, Job, or Ecclesiastes. The lessons, moreover, are addressed to the individual and not to society. The same pragmatic and humanistic tendencies combined with biblical piety are characteristic of post-biblical wisdom literature, for example, the apocryphal Wisdom of Ben Sira* and the pseudopigraphous Wisdom of Solomon*. Certain elements and literary forms of wisdom literature were developed by the exponents of the oral law in such works as Avot* and Avot de-Rabbi Natan*. All these works were written in the "wisdom tradition," which deals somewhat critically and empirically with such practical issues as the world order, the importance of learning from previous experience, the doctrine of individual retribution, and the significance of the life cycle. The three biblical books may be divided into two subgenres: didactic wisdom (Proverbs) and speculative wisdom (Job and Ecclesiastes). Proverbs includes practical instructions and wise sayings; Job is mainly a protest against the accepted "orthodox" view that the righteous and the wicked always get their just rewards; and Ecclesiastes is a much broader protest against all accepted views concerning how individuals should order their lives to make them worth living. Psalms 37.25 states, "I have been young and am now old, but I have never seen a righteous man abandoned, or his children seeking bread." Such a tenet is unacceptable to speculative wisdom because of the clear implication that all forlorn and destitute individuals must be considered sinners while all the wealthy must be deemed righteous. Such passages as Job 9.21–24 and Ecclesiastes 7.15–18 make it clear that speculative wisdom empirically rejects such an approach and considers the doctrine of individual retribution as no more than partially applicable, with many unexplainable exceptions to the rule.

WISDOM OF BEN SIRA, also known as Ecclesiasticus; an apocryphal work, written by the Jerusalemite sage and teacher whose name is given as Jesus (i.e., Joshua) the son of Sirach in the Greek texts of the Wisdom of Ben Sira but as Simeon the son of Jesus, the son of Eleazar, the son of Sira, in the Hebrew ones. Its author, who wrote between c.190 and 175 BCE, emerges as a well-to-do, self-confident man, closely connected with Jerusalem's high priestly circles and proudly loyal to his nation's ancestral traditions. His work is a book of proverbs, practical and moral maxims and counsels, and exhortations to love wisdom, similar in style and outlook to the biblical Book of Proverbs. The Wisdom of Ben Sira also contains liturgical texts, prayers, and psalm-like poems and hymns and ends with a long exposition on past leaders, from Enoch to the recently deceased high priest Simon II (*Shim'on ha-Tsaddiq). The Wisdom of Ben Sira identifies divine wisdom with the Torah and exhorts its readers to observe all of the Torah's precepts. It stresses the importance of just and prudent behavior, of charity, moderation, obedience to one's superiors, and fear of God. Although not included in the canon of the Hebrew Bible, it was well-known to the rabbis and is often quoted in the Talmud and in medieval Jewish literature. For many centuries the book was known only through the Greek translation, made by the author's grandson in 132 BCE, which was incorporated into the Septuagint, and through the sections quoted in rabbinic literature. However, large sections of the Hebrew text were discovered at the end of the nineteenth century in the Cairo Genizah, and fragments were discovered in the mid-twentieth century at Qumran and at Masada. English translations are to be found in all English editions of the Apocrypha.

WISDOM OF SOLOMON, one of the books of the Apocrypha, supposedly written by Solomon—who is never named explicitly, but whose identity is implied in several places—but, in fact, written in Greek by a philosophically minded Jew, perhaps living in Alexandria in the first century BCE or the first century CE. The work contrasts the bliss of piety with the short-lived happiness of the godless and discusses the problem of divine rewards and retribution. It also elaborates upon the nature of wisdom (personified as a woman) and describes, in the first person, the king's (i.e., Solomon's) quest for her. The Wisdom of Solomon reviews several events of the Jewish past, especially the Exodus, in order to interpret their meaning and emphasize their didactic nature. It concludes with a strongly worded attack against idolatry, especially in its Egyptian forms, including animal worship. The Wisdom of Solomon combines biblical poetry and wisdom literature with elements of popular Greek philosophy; the work as a whole reflects a fusion of the Jewish and Greek cultures in antiquity. English translations are to be found in standard versions of the Apocrypha.

WISE, ISAAC MAYER (1819–1900), American Reform leader. After immigrating to the United States from Bohemia in 1846, he officiated for eight years as a Reform rabbi in Albany and then moved to the key Reform congregation, K. K. B'nai Yeshurun, in Cincinnati, where he remained for the rest of his life. Wise was responsible for organizing the main instruments of the Reform movement, namely, the *Union of American Hebrew Congregations (1873); Hebrew Union College (1875; see HEBREW UNION COLLEGE–JEWISH INSTITUTE OF RELIGION), of which he was the first president; and the *Central Conference of American Rabbis (1889). The driving motivation behind his programs was the desire for unity in an anarchic situation. He sought to bring to American Jewry the concept of "community," embracing all sectors, and he propounded his ideas in the two weekly journals that he edited—the English-language Israelite and the German-language Deborah. He compiled the Reform prayer book Minhag America (1857; replaced in 1896 by the Union Prayer Book) and advocated shorter services, the use of English (alongside Hebrew) and the organ in the synagogue, and the Friday evening lecture service. Convinced of the profound harmony between American and Jewish ideals, he stressed the Ten Commandments under the slogan "Back to Mosaicism." He envisioned the creation of a universal faith to be pioneered by Judaism, based upon monotheism, the concept that humans are created in the image of God and are accountable to him, and the idea that Israel has been divinely chosen to convey these truths to the world. He hoped (unsuccessfully) to attract the Orthodox; this was a goal that was not unfeasible in view of his insistence that authority must be based in the Talmud as well as the Bible. His chief opponent in the Reform movement, David *Einhorn, propounded a far more radical Reform without regard to the concept of unity and was scornful of Wise's loyalty to the Talmud. However, the two men contributed to the *Pittsburgh platform, which formulated basic Reform Judaism. Wise's book Reminiscences was published in Cincinnati in 1901.

WISE, STEPHEN SAMUEL (1874–1949), American Reform rabbi, communal and Zionist leader. After studies in New York, he became rabbi of B'nai Jeshurun in 1893, and from 1900 to 1906 he served in Portland, Oregon. In 1907 he founded the Free Synagogue in New York, which allowed free speech from the pulpit, as well as free, unassigned seating to the congregation. A noted orator, Wise advocated universalist ideas and was a devoted crusader for social justice and reform, liberalism, and racial equality. At a time when the Reform movement was strongly anti-Zionist, Wise took a strong pro-Zionist stand and held office in many Zionist bodies, both in the United States and internationally. In 1922 he founded the Jewish Institute of Religion for the training of rabbis. He was its head until his death, after which it merged with the Hebrew Union College (see HEBREW UNION COLLEGE–JEWISH INSTITUTE OF RELIGION). His autobiography, Challenging Years, was published in New York in 1949.

WISSENSCHAFT DES JUDENTUMS (Ger.; Science of Judaism), a movement of critical Jewish scholarship that emerged in Germany in the early nineteenth century, which created the intellectual and institutional foundation for critical Jewish research throughout the world in subsequent generations. The first circle of university-trained Jewish scholars in Germany organized themselves in 1819 as the Verein für Kultur und Wissenschaft der Juden (Society for the Culture and Science of the Jews). This group was animated by the desire to study scientifically classical Jewish sources, uninfluenced by either traditionalist rabbis or Christian scholars. According to Verein members, the former lacked critical detachment from the sources, whereas the latter were intent on asserting the superiority of Christianity over Judaism. The efforts of Verein members to reclaim Jewish sources and to create a new scientific standard for evaluating Jewish literature and history was motivated by the question of whether, and in what form, Judaism would be viable in the modern age. Facing the challenges of their day—the struggle for civic emancipation and social integration on the one hand, and the resurgence of antisemitism on the other—the first practitioners of Wissenschaft des Judentums saw critical academic scholarship as an instrument through which the contours of Judaism could be clarified both historically and in contemporary terms.

In this formative phase, the scope of intellectual labor was vast. Isaak Markus Jost undertook a nine-volume history of the Jews from antiquity to the modern age. Leopold Zunz, who became one of the towering figures of modern Jewish scholarship, researched Jewish literature, focusing especially on the homiletic and liturgical genres central to synagogue life. For some of Zunz's colleagues, the social pressure and anxiety proved too much to bear. Eduard Gans, a brilliant legal historian who served as president of the Verein, converted to Protestantism in order to receive a university appointment, a prospect otherwise denied to Jews. The refusal of universities to recognize Jewish studies as a legitimate academic field caused the scholars of Wissenschaft des Judentums to seek an alternative and more stable institutional home for their activities. This need gave rise to the new rabbinical seminaries that developed in Germany, which also reflected the diverse interpretations of Judaism in nineteenth-century Germany: the conservative Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums in Berlin in 1872 and the Orthodox Berlin Rabbinical Seminary founded by Ezzriel Hildesheimer in 1873. The founding director of the Breslau Rabbinical Seminary was Zacharias Frankel, whose seminal Darkhei ha-Mishnah explored the historical development of the oral law. Frankel's colleague in Breslau, Heinrich Graetz, was perhaps the most significant Jewish scholar in Germany during the nineteenth century; beginning in 1854, he commenced publication of his monumental eleven-volume history of the Jews. Frankel and Graetz combined traditional reverence and a new critical spirit in forging a positive-historical Judaism, which stood in opposition to emerging Reform Judaism, whose most important representative was the rabbi and scholar Abraham Geiger. Geiger, who spent the last years of his life teaching at the Hochschule in Berlin, was a prolific author, whose historical inquiries into ancient and medieval Jewish history and literature gave shape to the view that Judaism was constantly evolving. Meanwhile, at the Berlin Rabbinical Seminary, Orthodox scholars such as David Tsevi Hoffmann and Abraham Berliner sought to effect their own balance of critical scholarship and traditional belief.

The use of modern scholarly tools to articulate or refine Jewish identity was not confined to Germany. The most prominent current of non-German scholars was dispersed throughout Italy, Galicia, and Russia but was united by an attachment to Hebrew as a scholarly language. These scholars of Hakhmat Yisra'el (Hebrew for Wissenschaft des Judentums), including Shemu'el David Luzzatto, Nahman Krochmal, and Shelomoh Yehudah Leib Rapoport, engaged in a wide range of philological, historical, and philosophical work. They did not face the same partisan battles over denominational affiliation as their German colleagues. However, they constantly negotiated between the demands of tradition and their critical scholarly sensibilities. During the nineteenth century, other circles of critical Jewish scholars, supported by learned societies and journals, emerged in France, England, and Hungary. See also JEWISH STUDIES.

WITCHCRAFT. Different kinds of witchcraft were practiced among the ancient Israelites and their neighbors; the variety is reflected by the biblical vocabulary, which mentions diviners, soothsayers, enchanters, charmers, consultants of ghosts, and necromancers (Dt. 18.10–11). All contact with witchcraft and its practitioners was forbidden by the Bible, which demands man's wholehearted allegiance to God (Dt. 18.13): "You shall not suffer a witch to live" (Ex. 22.17). The verse is preceded by the enumeration of the penalties for sexual offenses (Ex. 22.15) and followed by the denunciation of unnatural vice and idolatry (Ex. 22.18–19). Saul is reported to have exterminated all witches, though in his hour of despair, he consulted one (1 Sm. 28.7). An inclination to witchcraft is ascribed to women in numerous Talmudic passages, and according to one tradition, Shim'on ben Shetah hanged eighty alleged witches in one day in Ascalon (San. 6.4). The use of certain magic formulas for healing the sick was considered acceptable by the rabbis. Medieval authorities were divided in their views on witchcraft: some believed it was illusion; others believed in its use and in its connection with the demonic powers. WITNESS. Each individual enjoys a presumption of trustworthiness, and his *evidence, therefore, is acceptable without substantiation by oath. Two witnesses were necessary for a conviction (Dr. 19.15), although there were a number of exceptions. Every man is obliged to appear before the court and deliver any relevant testimony in his knowledge. A witness who has given false testimony becomes a rasha' (wicked one) and forfeits his trustworthiness as a witness in future cases until such time as his veracity is reestablished. The law that a rasha' is ineligible as a witness (San. 27a) is derived from the verse "put not your hand with the wicked to be an unrighteous witness" (Ex. 23.1). The rasha' is further defined as one who intentionally violates a prohibition punishable by lashes or one who unlawfully takes money or property belonging to another; the violator may be reinstated after repentance, the thief after the restoration of the unlawfully acquired property to its owner. A general reservation on grounds akin to the second instance disqualifies those engaged in certain disreputable occupations, such as the professional gambler. Traditional law disqualifies the following (with certain exceptions) from acting as witnesses: women, slaves, relatives, minors, the insane, the deaf, and the blind (Maimonides, Hilkhot 'Eduyyot 9.1). No one can testify against himself. See also 'EDUYOT; FALSE WITNESS.

Wolfson's The Philosophy of Spinoza (2 vols. [1934]) analyzed the thought of Baruch *Spinoza and its roots, which brought him to the influence of *Philo on Spinoza. In Philo: Foundations of Religious Philosophy in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam (2 vols. [1947]), Wolfson resuscitated Philo's role as the founder of religious philosophy in Judaism with a major impact on Christianity and Islam. Wolfson unified Philo's thought into a philosophical system, which, he argued, was the basis of dominant philosophy in European thought until Spinoza.

WOMEN. Two differing narratives of the *creation of humanity reflect the dialectical position regarding women throughout the tradition, in both law and sociology of the community. These are: "And God created Adam (humankind) in his image . . . male and female he created them" (Gn. 1.27); "And God caused consciousness to fall upon the man . . . and from one of the ribs that he had taken from the man, he formed a woman . . . and the man spoke [saying] . . . this one shall be called woman [ishah] for out of man [ish] she was taken" (Gn. 2.21-23). On the one hand, women are considered equal to men in their very essence; on the other hand, women are derivative, the very power of naming woman vested in man.

In biblical understanding, woman was created to serve as a helpmeet to her husband (Gn. 2.20). Yet the Bible offers a romantic version of marriage—"Therefore shall a man leave his father and mother and cling to his wife and they shall become as one flesh" (Gn. 1.24)—reverberating with themes of intimacy, fidelity, interdependence, and eternal love. Great value was placed on the Jewish wife. Her virtues were extolled in the classic paean of praise, the *Eshet Hayil (Prov 31.10-31), and the Talmud states, "Whoever lives without a wife lives without well-being, blessing, a home, Torah, protection and security, without peace" (Yev. 62b). A man was enjoined by the rabbis "to love his wife as himself and honor her more than himself." On the verse "All that Sarah tells you listen to her voice" (Gn. 21.12), the rabbis of the Talmud comment, "If your wife is small, bend down and whisper in her ear," which is interpreted as take counsel with her in all matters and follow her advice (B. M. 59a).

Though polygyny was permitted, monogamous marriages seem to have been the ideal relationship (see *MONOGAMY), as the stories of fractious relations between multiple wives attest (Sarah and Hagar [Gn. 21], Rachel and Leah [Gn. 29-30], Hannah and Peninnah [1 Sm. 1]). The law of *levirate marriage (Dr. 25.5-10), which obligated an unmarried man to marry his deceased brother's childless widow, ensured continuity of the line of the dead brother, but it also offered a childless widow a chance at motherhood (Gn. 38, Tamar and Judah). Though there is hardly any record of polygyny in Talmudic times, it nevertheless was not formally banned until the tenth century, when R. Gershom ben Yehudah issued a taqqanah. As in many other areas, Jewish laws of marriage were influenced by the surrounding culture. The ban against polygyny was operative among Jews who lived in Christian Europe, where celibacy was the ideal, but not among Sephardi Jews, whose Islamic neighbors counted multiple wives as a sign of affluence. Polygyny was finally universally outlawed in 1951 by the Israeli rabbinate. Bearing children was the measure of success for a woman; failure to do so was traumatic (Gn. 16; Gn. 30; 1 Sm. 1). In fact, barrenness into ten years of marriage constituted valid reason for divorce.

Women were ritually passive in the construction and dissolution of a *marriage. The Torah tradition interchangeably used the words acquire and sanctified when speaking of marriage. (The traditional marriage and divorce ceremonies reflect this male initiative, with the man reciting the formula and the woman remaining silent.) Yet, it was clearly not a matter of acquiring or discarding property at will. Even a bondswoman (one given in marriage in lieu of her father's debt) was accorded the full rights of a free woman in marriage. If her husband/master tired of her, he could not pass her along to another man but rather was obliged to set her free, with full cancellation of the debt she represented (Ex. 21). Moreover, as the story of Rebekah indicates, women were given considerable latitude in determining whom they wished to marry and whether they wanted to leave their parents' home for that of a stranger. Indeed, building on the Rebekah text, the rabbis rule that a young girl may not be given in marriage until she grows up and says "I want to marry this one."

The divorce laws of the Torah and Talmud exemplify the dialectic. A man could divorce a woman if he found something unseemly ('ervat davar) in her (Dt. 24.1), and the rabbinic debate on what constitutes 'ervat davar gives him wide latitude (Git. 9.10). She, on the other hand, can sue for divorce in the rabbinic courts, but she cannot grant the divorce (Git 20a; B. B. 168a). If the husband is unwilling or unable to grant her a divorce, she can be rendered an agunah*, a woman chained to an absentee or recalcitrant husband.

Within this hierarchical framework, many protections were built in for the wife: in contrast to the irrevocable oral divorce extant in the ancient Near East, the Torah required a writ of divorce, which served as a delaying tactic and offered a measure of communal oversight. Moreover, the woman was entitled to alimony. The ketubbah* (marriage contract), a creation of the Second Temple period, protected her during the marriage and after its demise (Ket. 4.4, 51a). The get process (writ of divorce) became more exacting and was virtually taken over by the rabbinic courts. Though women were otherwise not entitled to serve as witnesses in the religious courts of law, the rabbis allowed a woman to testify regarding the death of her husband, so as not to render her an 'agunah (Yev. 93b, 114b-116).

Additionally, women's grounds for divorce were expanded. Ancient Judaism recognized a woman's sexual needs ('onah) and made her conjugal rights a fixed obligation of her husband, along with food and clothing (Ex. 21.7-11). The frequency of a husband's obligation to his wife was stipulated in the Talmud, based on his profession and the amount of time it required him to be away (Ket. 61b-62b). Failure to meet her needs for sexual satisfaction entitled her to sue for divorce. Impotence was a legitimate ground, and burden of proof rested upon the husband (Yev. 65a-b).

Still, divorce was considered a man's prerogative. Until the tenth century, when forcible divorce was formally outlawed by Rabbenu Gershom, a woman could be divorced against her will. The theory is that the husband is the one who created the bond, and therefore he must be the one to sever it (Qid. 56.9b). The principle that a man may not be coerced into giving a get still obtains in Jewish law.

In ancient Israel, women were markedly underrepresented in leadership roles, and in the extensive biblical genealogies, daughters are hardly mentioned. The few biblical women who did reach great heights are praised and are even attributed in later rabbinic tradition with special powers of prophecy despite their differing roles as judges, queens, and matriarchs. The term nevi'ah (prophetess) is applied by the rabbis of the Talmud to five biblical women—Miriam, Deborah, the wife of Isaiah, Huldah, and Noadiah. Additionally, a total of twenty-three prophetesses are listed by the sages, including Sarah, Hannah, Abigail, and Esther (Midrash Tadshe' 21).

The language of the Torah is addressed to men. However, the lessons and laws of the Torah clearly included women: with a handful of exceptions, all negative commandments (you shall not) and most affirmative ones were binding upon women. Women were called to the revelation at Sinai and were included in the mitsvah of Haqhel*, the public reading and reacceptance of the Torah every seven years. Jewish women entered the covenantal community at birth and entered Jewish maturity at age twelve, but in both instances, without benefit of formal communal ceremony parallel to those created for men (circumcision and bar mitsvah).

Women could take vows, although under certain conditions a father or husband could annul these vows (Nm. 30.4-9). Women could bring sacrifices to the Temple, which they did for special occasions of gratitude or supplication. Women often accompanied their husbands to Jerusalem for the pilgrimage festivals. A special area was set aside for women in the Temple courtyard.

As tradition developed, certain mitsvot, such as the study of Torah and community prayer, became institutionalized, leading to women's exemption if not exclusion from two central aspects of Jewish life. The Talmud rules that women were not obligated in the daily study of Torah (Qid. 29b). The famous dictum of R. Eli'ezer, "He who teaches his daughter Torah, it is as if he has taught her trivial things" (Sot. 20a), was accepted as the standard rather than the more inclusive statement of Ben 'Azzai, "A man must teach his daughter Torah." Some exceptional women did study, particularly Beruryah*, who achieved great reputation as a scholar and teacher. During medieval and early modern times, women in Europe studied Torah from the Tse'enah u-Re'enah*, a work of commentary and homilies in the Yiddish language.

Women's liturgical lives were shaped by the Talmudic principle of exemption from time-bound positive commandments (Qid. 1.7). In truth, the principle was characterized by far more exceptions to the rule than inclusions—that is, women were obligated to many of the time-bound positive commandments, but the very principle tended to diminish women's participation even in areas where the obligation did exist, such as daily prayer. On the other hand, certain women excelled in prayer. The rabbis state that Hannah's prayer (1 Sm. 1) became the model for the 'Amidah, the focal point of the daily prayer service. Women in medieval and early times recited special thinus*, some of which they composed themselves.

Financially, women enjoyed full protection and rights under the law, with the exception of inheritance*.

Women could acquire and sell property, enter into contracts, be litigants or dependents. The statement "Nowadays it is commonplace for women to engage in business" appears in many responsa of the medieval period. A woman could go to work and keep her own earnings if she wished, trading that for the reimbursement to her husband for food. Still, the husband was obliged to pay for clothing, shelter, household help, and child care.

The inheritance laws reflect the hierarchy, though in reality certain adjustments often were made in favor of wives and daughters. The Torah enjoins the community to take care of orphans and widows (Ex. 22.21). The Biblical protest of the daughters of *Zelophehad established the principle of direct inheritance to daughters in the event that there were no male heirs (Nm. 27). Talmudic law legislated that "if the inheritance was too small to maintain both sons and daughters, the daughters would inherit the whole estate and the sons must go begging from door to door" (B. B. 139 b). Wives and daughters functioned as creditors to the estate and had prior claim over heirs. Moreover, men were enjoined to "grant sufficient gifts to one's children, especially to one's daughter" (B. B. 141 a). Technically, a wife could be assigned an estate as a "gift" rather than an inheritance. Medieval Jewish law further extended inheritance rights to women. Still, inheritance law often worked to the disadvantage of females and was based on the presumption that women were dependent on men.

As the revenge of the *rape of Dinah testifies, the honor of the Jewish woman was carefully guarded (Gn. 34). Yet some aspects of the laws reflect the notion that a woman's sexuality was the property of her husband. Rape was a punishable crime, but the penalty was much stiffer if the victim was a married woman (Dt. 22.23-29). As the tradition developed, penalties against rape were intensified and included psychological pain as well. Progressively striking the cruel notion of victim complicity, the Talmud taught that a woman's subjective testimony was sufficient to incriminate the offender (Ket. 51b; Y., Sot).

High value was placed upon the female virtues of modesty, chastity, virginity, and purity. The standard ketubah allowed for alimony payments twice as large for virgins as for nonvirgins. Protective confinement in the family home, particularly for unmarried women, was considered desirable, as the psalmist's phrase cogently suggests: "the honor of the king's daughter is within" (Ps. 45.14). Not surprisingly, that very phrase accompanied many of the laws exempting women from roles in the public sector, such as the courts, the synagogue, and the house of study.

Chastity in marriage and purity of family relations were also of great importance. One of the three "women's mitsvot" is niddah* (the other two being nerot [candle lighting] and hallah [separation and consecration of a piece of dough during baking]). During a woman's menses and for seven days thereafter, no marital relations were permitted. Though abstinence fell equally upon men and women, it was a woman's primary responsibility to mark the time and to immerse herself in the ritual bath at the conclusion of the niddah period (see MENSTRUATION).

There are statements in Jewish literature both of contempt for women, such as "Women are greedy, eavesdroppers, lazy and envious" (Ned. 31b) or "... light-minded" (Shab. 33b), and of praise, such as "The Holy One granted women greater understanding than men" (Nid. 45b) and "The continued existence of the world depends more on women than on men" (Pesiqta' de-Rav Kahana 9.1). As one would expect, these strong statements are used selectively by defenders or critics of the tradition.

As Judaism entered the modern period, the community organized itself along denominational lines. The tradition underwent reinterpretation in many areas, particularly by the liberal communities. One hundred and fifty years ago, Reform Judaism created religious schools in which boys and girls studied in mixed classes and, through the ceremony of confirmation, celebrated graduation together. Reform replaced separate seating for men and women in the synagogue, long a feature of Jewish life, with mixed seating, enabling families to sit together. Early in the twentieth century, the Conservative movement established throughout the United States a network of youth groups and summer camps that offered new educational and religious opportunities for girls, while in 1922 Mordecai Kaplan, a Conservative rabbi who later founded Reconstructionist Judaism, instituted the public, religious celebration of a girl's reaching her religious majority, thus becoming a bat mitsvah. In the Orthodox community, new institutions of Torah study for women were created, such as the *Beth Jacob schools in Poland in the early 1900s and the coeducational elementary day schools of modern Orthodoxy that proliferated in the United States. By the 1950s, numerous Jewish educational institutions offered training programs, and female Hebrew teachers were no longer the exception. Also in the 1950s, the rabbinic law arm of the Conservative movement concluded that women could be called up for honors associated with the reading of the Torah.

By the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, Jewish women found a new voice and presence in synagogue and communal settings. In the United States, sisterhoods, established in Orthodox, Reform, and Conservative congregations and later coordinated on a national level, engaged women in educational, religious, and philanthropic activities, while the National Council for Jewish Women, founded in 1893, sought to unite Jewish women of different social and religious backgrounds through similar endeavors. Hadassah, the women's Zionist organization co-founded and led by Henrietta Szold in 1912, Jewish Ladies' Aid societies established throughout England and the United States, and Bertha Pappenheim's Jewish feminist organization, the Jüdischer Frauenbund, created in 1904 to seek greater political, economic, and social rights for Jewish women in Germany and in the Jewish community, were but three of the many organizations that successfully enabled Jewish women to work together for practical change.

Yet even greater changes regarding women in Judaism came as a result of the broad social movement of *feminism. In the mid-1960s, a group of young women from the Conservative movement called themselves Ezrat Nashim (Women's Gallery) and presented an agenda to the Conservative leadership. Within a decade, all of the items were in place. Women were accorded full ritual participation in areas heretofore closed to them, providing their communities sanctioned it. In 1972 Reform Judaism ordained the first woman, R. Sally J. Preisand, after seriously considering the issue of women's ordination for more than fifty years; within a decade, Conservative and Reconstructionist Judaism followed suit. By 1990 the number of female applicants to non-Orthodox rabbinic schools was equal to that of men. Women were also accepted to cantorial schools and hired by congregations.

Increasingly in ritual life, women participate in areas from which they were exempt for centuries. By the mid-1990s, some women were donning tallit and tefillin in daily prayer, reciting the Mourner's Qaddish, and reading from the Torah. The phenomenon of bat mitsvah, revolutionary in the 1920s, was now common practice, even in the Orthodox community (albeit not patterned there directly after the bar mitsvah). In the liberal denominations, the adult bat mitsvah is becoming ever more popular, as are women's Seders and new month celebrations. New ceremonies and blessings are being created to celebrate women's life-cycle events. Healing rituals are being formulated for conditions or events such as infertility, miscarriage, or rape. Prayer books are being reissued with attention to gender-inclusive language.

In Orthodoxy, the pattern has been to proceed with caution, lest any aspect of halakhah be violated. Still, much is happening: women's tefillah (prayer) groups meet, in which women lead the service and read from the Torah, with minimal differentiation from the traditional service. Activist groups on behalf of the 'agunah have grown in influence. Birth ceremonies are being developed, and female participation in wedding ceremonies is growing. There has been a virtual explosion of women's study groups, especially for Talmud study, which was closed to women for almost two millennia. The creation of institutions of higher learning to support women's new sacred yearnings has grown apace.

None of the modernizing tendencies made inroads on Jewish communities in Muslim lands. However, in Israel, a new openness has begun to appear in certain 'Adot ha-Mizrah circles, especially among the younger generations.

WOMEN'S PRAYERS. According to halakhah, women are obligated to pray but not to recite all of the same time-bound liturgical prayers as men (Ber. 20a-b; Shulhan 'Arukh, Oraḥ Hayyim 106.2). This differentiation in level of obligation meant that, in traditional Judaism, women did not count as one of a minyan* for congregational prayer and could not lead worship. When they did attend congregational services, women sat in a separate section of the synagogue. Thus, women's prayer came to be understood as essentially private. Nonetheless, in Ashkenazi congregations from the Middle Ages forward, a relatively learned woman would sometimes act as precentor (zogerqa*), leading the other women in prayer. In addition, women recited and sometimes composed private prayers in the vernacular languages, such as Yiddish and Ladino; such prayers were transmitted orally or were written down (see TSE'ENAH U-RE'ENAH) or published.

In the latter half of the twentieth century, the restrictions on women's participation in congregational prayer have been challenged and gradually lifted. Even among Orthodox Jews there are groups of women who meet separately for prayer, although not constituting themselves fully as a minyan. Since 1973, Conservative congregations have been permitted to count women in the minyan, although not all of them do so. Women are counted in the minyan and may lead public prayer in Reform and Reconstructionist congregations. There has been little parallel to these developments among Sephardim and 'Adot ha-Mizrah.

Current issues with regard to women's prayer include the degree to which women's experiences and religious concerns should shape the reformulation of the liturgy; the use of female God-language and imagery in prayer; and the creation of new prayers and rituals specifically for women either for private or public use. WOOD OFFERING. According to Leviticus 9.24, the fire on the sacrificial altar in the Tabernacle, which was first ignited by divine fire, was to be kept burning at all times and never to be extinguished. For this to occur, the priest was commanded to feed wood to the fire every morning (Lv. 6.5). No details are given as to how this wood was to be provided, and no information exists concerning the wood supply in First Temple times; it may have been a royal responsibility. The Book of Nehemiah (10.35, 13.31) first refers to a regular qurban ha-'etsim (wood offering), which was to be supplied by the priests, Levites, and families at appointed times as determined by lot. As reflected in rabbinic law, in Second Temple times the wood offering became a sacrifice in its own right, performed with elaborate ritual and commemorated, even after the destruction of the Temple, by each family on the date on which it had previously contributed wood for the altar. Tu be-'Av was designated as the day on which the public at large supplied the wood offering (Ta'an. 4.5; Tam. 2.3; T., Ta'an. 3.5, 4.7–8; Ta'an 12a, 28a; Men. 20b). The wood offering is also known from the practices of the Qumran community (Temple Scroll 23–25).

WORLD COUNCIL OF SYNAGOGUES, the international organization of congregations and institutions affiliated with the *Conservative/Masorti movement throughout the world. The World Council of Synagogues was founded in 1957 by lay and professional leaders of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism. Its mission was to extend the North American-based Conservative movement around the world and to develop and support new congregations and institutions. The institution has close ties to Seminario Rabínico Latinoamericano in Buenos Aires and its over eighty congregations throughout Latin America. In England, the World Council of Synagogues helped to form the Assembly of Masorti Synagogues, with its seven congregations. There are also congregations in Israel, France, Sweden, and South Africa, and a Teachers' Institute in Hungary affiliated with the World Council of Synagogues.

WORLD UNION FOR PROGRESSIVE JUDAISM, founded in London in 1926 as the international body of Reform, Liberal, Progressive, and Reconstructionist Jews; since 1973 its international headquarters has been in Jerusalem. The World Union membership encompasses over one and a half million Jews in more than thirty countries. In Israel, the World Union for Progressive Judaism has established synagogue-community centers, settlements, schools, and a World Education Center in Jerusalem. The newest centers of activity are in eastern and central Europe. In the former Soviet Union, many new congregations and leadership training programs have been established. The World Union publishes prayer books and liturgical and educational materials in various languages, helps recruit rabbinic and professional leaders, and assists new congregations throughout the world.

WRITTEN LAW. The primary source of halakhah* is the *Torah, which consists of the written law (Torah she-bi-khetav) and the *oral law (Torah she-be-'al peh). The written law, which is basically the Pentateuch, is also known as de-orayta' (Aram; from the Torah) law, a term which denotes the highest normative legal category in the halakhic hierarchy. Law which is not in the de-orayta' category is termed de-rabbanan, that is, rabbinic law, and is of a less binding nature. The superior position of de-orayta' law emerges in cases which will be resolved strictly only if the law at stake is de-orayta'. If the law involved is merely de-rabbanan, then it will be decided leniently. Another issue in which the superiority of de-orayta' is manifest is the priority of a de-orayta' lien on an estate over a de-rabbanan charge (Y., Git. 5.1). It is generally accepted that the de-orayta' category includes many more laws than those specifically stated in the Pentateuch, but the precise definition of this category is a matter of dispute. According to Maimonides, only those laws which are either mentioned in scripture, or are specifically designated by the Talmud as de-orayta', even if they are derived from scripture on the basis of rabbinic interpretation, are to be included in this category (Sefer ha-Mitsvot, Second Principle). Nahmanides, however, argues that all laws derived by virtue of the application of the traditional hermeneutical principles (see HERMENEUTICS) possess de-orayta' status, unless the Talmud specifically relegates them to the category of de-rabbanan (Hassagot ha-Ramban, Sefer ha-Mitsvot, Second Principle). Regardless of the outcome of this debate, the combination of de-orayta' law with a restrictive approach to its definition constitutes one of the most potent halakhic instruments for ensuring the continual development of the law and its adaptation to changing circumstances.

YA'ALEH (יָאֲלֵה; Let [Our Prayer] Ascend), piyyut recited in the Ashkenazi and Italian rites after the 'Amidah in the *Yom Kippur evening service. Of unknown authorship, Ya'aleh consists of eight three-line stanzas, each having three words to a line, the middle word forming a reverse alphabetical acrostic, with alef repeated three times; each line in each stanza commences with ya'aleh (may it ascend), ve-yavo' (and may it come), and ve-yera'eh (and may it appear), respectively. The three verbs are taken from the *Ya'aleh ve-Yavo' prayers. Ya'aleh is a plea to God to accept the congregation's Yom Kippur supplications.

YA'ALEH VE-YAVO' (יָאֲלֵה וְיָבוֹא; May [Remembrance] Rise and Come [Before You]), a prayer recited in each 'Amidah on new moons and festivals and in the Birkat ha-Mazon on those occasions. In ancient times it was also recited in the Musaf service, but this is no longer the case. Specific mention is made of the festival, a practice that dates from tannaitic times, and the prayer asks God to remember the Jewish people and grant them redemption on his special holy days.

YA'AQOV BEN ASHER (c.1270-1340), codifier; author of the Arba'ah Turim; known as Ba'al ha-Turim. Born in Germany, he immigrated to Toledo, Spain, together with his father, *Asher ben Yehi'el, and his brothers in 1303. A pietist who refused to accept an appointment as rabbi, Ya'aqov remained in dire poverty throughout his life. His great code, the Arba'ah Turim (the first complete edition of which was published in Pieve di Sacco in 1475), was directed toward bridging the gulf between the Franco-German and Spanish schools of Jewish law. His sources include the two Talmuds, geonic literature, and later commentators and codifiers, especially his father. Unlike Maimonides in the Mishneh Torah, Ya'aqov quotes all his sources and cites the opinions upon which his decisions (generally following those of his father) are based. Omitting those branches of halakhah that had become obsolete with the destruction of the Temple, the work follows an original arrangement that subsequently became classic. The four Turim (rows or parts) are Orah Hayyim, dealing with the daily duties of man, including blessings, prayers, the Sabbath, and festivals; Yoreh De'ah, embracing ritual law, including dietary regulations, vows, and mourning; Even ha-'Ezer, dealing with family laws, marriage, and divorce; and Hoshen Mishpat, on civil law. This work rapidly became the standard code of Jewish law and was the basis for Yosef Karo's Shulhan 'Arukh*. Ya'aqov also wrote a lengthy commentary to the Pentateuch, only a small section of which was printed (Zólkiew, 1806).

YA'AQOV BEN ME'IR TAM (1100-1171), Talmudic commentator, rabbinic authority, and communal leader; referred to as Rabbenu (Our Master) Tam. He was born in Ramerupt, France, where his father, Me'ir ben Shemu'el, Rashi's son-in-law, and his brother, Shemu'el ben Me'ir, were his primary teachers.

Rabbenu Tam was one of the founders of the tosafistic school of Talmud commentary (see TOSAFOT), which harmonized contradictions in the Talmud, criticized and improved upon Rashi's Talmud commentary, and continued Rashi's work of providing short explanations of Talmudic terms and passages. Rabbenu Tam's incisive questions and answers about Talmudic textual problems and law appear regularly in tosafot to the Talmud Bavli.

His reputation as a legal scholar traveled far beyond France. Avraham *ibn Daud, the Spanish chronicler of the sages, mentioned Rabbenu Tam in his Sefer ha-Qabbalah, but not Rashi. Rabbenu Tam's work is also cited by R. Zerahyah ha-Levi, a Provençal critic. He also received questions from students throughout France and from the Italian communities of Bari and Otranto.

Rabbenu Tam was an extremely independent individual with an interest in commanding Jewish communal affairs. He arrogated to his beit din the title of "the generation's [most] significant court," and he is known for communal enactments improving Jewish family life, education, and women's status. His sharp criticism of opponents exhibited itself in his controversies with Meshullam of Melun and Efrayim of Regensburg.

Tam's best-known work is Sefer ha-Yashar (Vienna, 1811). It contained both novellae and responsa, and its main purpose was to resolve Talmudic textual problems without resorting to emendations of the received text. Even the best editions show considerable corruption of Rabbenu Tam's original work, and all present editions of Sefer ha-Yashar are fragments collected from it.

YA'AQOV BEN YA'AQOV MOSHEH OF LISSA (c.1760-1832), Polish halakhist. Before traveling to Lissa (Leszno), he served as rabbi of a few other Polish communities. While in Lissa, his renown as a great scholar continued to spread, and many talented students traveled there to study under him. He is best known for his halakhic works, in particular Havvat Da'at and Netivot ha-Mishpat. The latter, which in large measure is directed against R. Aryeh Leib ha-Kohen's Ketsot ha-Hoshen, is one of the classic commentaries on Hoshen Mishpat, the fourth order of the Shulhan 'Arukh. Ya'aqov also published Talmudic novellae, biblical commentaries, and responsa.

YA'AQOV YITSHAQ, HA-HOZEH MI-LUBLIN (1745–1815), renowned Hasidic master, who was among the founders of the Polish Hasidic movement; known as the Seer of Lublin. He formulated the spiritual and social innovations of Polish Hasidism. His teachings consolidated the dual nature of the tsaddiq*, defining imperative religious and mystical personal characteristics alongside the existential material demands of his congregation. His major works, Zikkaron Zot (Warsaw, 1869) and Zot Zikkaron (Lwów, 1851), depict the two principal dialectical components in religious life: tradition and innovation, or law and ecstasy. Law relates to normative traditional order, while ecstasy relates to new introspective mystical interpretation. Together these elements form the concealed and revealed realities of all existence and the dual fundamentals of religious worship. He wrote Divrei Emet (Zólkiew, 1830). YA'AQOV YITSHAQ OF PRZYSUCHA (1766–1814), Hasidic master, known as ha-Yehudi ha-Qadosh (the Holy Jew). A spiritual perfectionist from his youth, he studied with Aryeh Leib Harif in Przedsbórz and Opatów and later under David Tevele at the yeshivah of Leszno. He was attracted to Hasidism by two tsaddiqim, Moshe Leib of Sasov and David of Lelów. However, his most important master was Ya'aqov Yitshaq, ha-Hoze' mi-Lublin. He became the Seer's closest disciple and served as a spiritual guide in the Seer's court, at that time the most prominent Hasidic center in Poland. Toward the end of his life, he grew disenchanted with the Seer's emphasis on magic and concern for the material well-being of the masses, which was then typical of Polish Hasidism. He broke away from his master and founded his own school of Hasidism in Przysucha, which was strongly opposed by the Seer and his remaining followers. The "Pshishkah" school emphasized an individualistic quest for spiritual perfection. It served the needs of an elite rather than the masses. Study of Talmud and scholarship received renewed emphasis. Sincerity in worship was more highly valued than external conformance to halakhah—the rules governing times for prayer were often breached in the interest of spiritual readiness. His leading disciple and successor was *Simhah Bunem of Przysucha; other major disciples included Menahem Mendel of Kotsk, Hanokh of Aleksandrów, Yitshaq of Warka, and Yissakhar Ber of Radoszyce.

YA'AQOV YOSEF HA-KOHEN OF POLONNOYE (died c.1782), Hasidic author. A noted rabbi and preacher, R. Ya'aqov Yosef was the chief literary disciple of Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer *Ba'al Shem Tov and a key theoretician of early Hasidism. He served as rabbi in Shargorod, Raszaków, Nemirov, and finally in Polonnoye. His works which show great erudition and interpretive skill, include Toledot Ya'aqov Yosef (Korets, 1780; the first printed Hasidic book), Ben Porat Yosef (Korets, 1781), Tsofnat Pa'neah (Korets, 1782), and Ketonet Passim (Lwów, 1866). In the course of these homilies, he frequently quotes the Ba'al Shem Tov, often referring to him simply as "my teacher." His writings provide several hundred such quotations from the Ba'al Shem Tov and are the major source for his teachings. Rabbi Ya'aqov Yosef was an active social critic; many of his homilies are directed against the wealthy and the learned elite. Sometimes he also accused the populace of leading their teachers astray. In contrast to these negative examples, he proposed a link between the tsaddiq*—sometimes also called talmid hakham*—with the masses, for a new type of spiritually dominated Jewish community. Rabbi Ya'aqov Yosef was known as a stern and demanding teacher, who did not attract disciples. He opposed the selection of R. *Dov Ber of Mezhibezh as successor to his teacher, perhaps having hoped to fill that role himself.

YAD. See TORAH ORNAMENTS.

YADAYIM (יָדַיִם; Hands), tractate in Mishnah order Tohorot, with related material in Tosefta. There is no gemara in either Talmud. In biblical law a person, unlike food, for example, may contract impurity only through contact with a primary source of defilement, in which case impurity of the "first derivative" devolves upon the entire person. An early rabbinic enactment, attributed by the Talmud to King Solomon (Eruv. 21b), created a state of impurity applying to the hands alone, when they come into contact with a "first derivative" of impurity. Accordingly the rabbis also created a special form of purification for hands—the ritual washing of the hands. Yadayim discusses the laws pertaining to this special form of purity and impurity. According to the Talmud (Hul. 106a), these laws, applying mostly to priests, whose staple diet consisted of sanctified foods, served as a model for the practice of washing one's hands before any meal containing bread.

Paradoxically, the rabbis ruled that hands that had come into contact with scrolls of sacred biblical texts were defiled. Yadayim's treatment of the laws relating to this enactment includes discussion of central themes in rabbinic law, such as the nature of the legal thinking associated with rabbinic enactments and the canonical status of certain problematic biblical books, such as Ecclesiastes and Song of Songs. The Sadducees objected to regarding contact with biblical scrolls as defiling the hands, believing it absurd that "the books of Holy Writ defile the hands, while the books of Homer do not defile the hands" (Yad. 4.6). Yoḥanan ben Zakk'ai offered the Pharisaic response: "the greater the degree to which something is cherished, the greater its connection to impurity" (Yad. 4.6).

An English translation of the tractate appears in Herbert Danby's The Mishnah (London, 1933).

YAHID VE-RABBIM (יָחִיד וְרַבִּים; the individual and the many), a fundamental principle of community government, which states that legislation enacted by majority decision is legally binding on all members of the community, including those in the minority who were opposed to it. Although the Talmudic sources that serve as a basis for communal legislative authority contain no reference to this issue, the sages readily accepted the principle of majority rule as a necessary corollary to the authority of the community to legislate, since the alternative doctrine of unanimous consent, espoused by R. Ya'aqov ben Me'ir *Tam (12th cent.), would in effect have made community government a practical impossibility. The question thus arose whether majority decisions would be binding upon the minority even where the minority was absent during the deliberations leading up to the vote, in light of the principle of judicial procedure that the majority decision would not be binding in such a case. The rule ultimately established was that majority legislation would be binding in any event, since to hold otherwise would effectively grant the minority a veto through the simple expedient of absenting themselves from the deliberations.

YALQUT (יָלְקוּט; compilation), title given to several Midrashic compilations. The most well-known are Yalqut Shim'oni* (13th cent.), Yalqut Makhiri* (date and identity of author not established), and Yalqut Re'uveni* (17th cent.).

—DANIEL SPERBER

YALQUT MAKHIRI, one of several medieval Midrashic anthologies arranged in biblical verse order. The following extant portions of this particular yalqut (anthology) have been published: Isaiah (J. Z. Kahana-Spira, 1893), Minor Prophets (A. J. Greenup, 1909–1913, 1924–1925; J. Z. Lauterbach, 1936), Psalms (S. Buber, 1899), and Proverbs (L. Grünhut, 1902; Y. S. Spiegel, 1985). Yalqut Makhiri was compiled by Makhir ben Abba' Mari, probably in Spain in the fourteenth century. Makhir often quoted his sources by name, some of which are no longer extant elsewhere. He appears not to have modified them in his quotations. Thus, Makhir's introductions at the beginning of his yalqut to Isaiah and Psalms and the fact that the Yalqut Makhiri seems to preserve relatively rare Sephardi versions of the texts quoted make this work valuable for reconstructing the evolution and dispersion of rabbinic, particularly agadic, traditions and for text criticism of earlier Midrashic literature.

YALQUT RE'UVENI, an anthology of homiletic and mystical commentaries to the Torah arranged in order of the weekly portions and modeled after the earlier Midrashic anthology, the Yalqut Shim'oni*. Its author was the seventeenth-century kabbalist, Re'uven ben Hoschke. The work is particularly valuable for its quotations from kabbalistic compositions over the preceding five hundred years, many of which are no longer extant. It was published in two parts: part one, arranged in alphabetical order (Prague, 1660); and part two, following the order of the Torah (Wilmsdorf, 1681).

YALQUT SHIM'ONI, Midrashic thesaurus to the Bible, in which halakhic and aggadic passages of the Talmud and Midrashic works—over ten thousand in number—are arranged in biblical order. The first part of the anthology relates to the Pentateuch, the other to the remaining biblical books. Besides serving as a useful handbook for homiletic purposes, the Yalqut Shim'oni has considerably aided comparative and critical evaluation of Midrashic material. Of the fifty sources quoted and attributed, several are no longer extant, such as Sifrei Zuta, Midrash Esfah, Midrash Avkir, Midrash Tadshe, and Devarim Zuta. The work is attributed to R. Shim'on ha-Darshan of Frankfurt (c.13th cent.), about whose identity there are conflicting views. The first edition of the section on the Pentateuch (Salonika, 1526) contains an important addendum, Qunteres Aḥaron, which includes numerous aggadic passages from the Talmud Yerushalmi.

YAMIM NORA'IM (יָמֵי נֹרָאִים; Days of Awe), the Ten Days of Repentance (see 'ASERET YEMEI TESHUVAH). The Bible does not connect the festival of the first day of the seventh month (*Ro'sh ha-Shanah) with the solemn fast of *Yom Kippur, which is observed on the tenth. The Talmud, however, regards Ro'sh ha-Shanah as the beginning and Yom Kippur as the end of a period of self-examination and judgment. The term Yamim Nora'im is first found in Sefer Maharil by Ya'aqov ben Mosheh ha-Levi *Molin (14th cent.).

YANN'AI (3d cent.), Palestinian amora'. He was known as Rabbah (the Great) or Sabba' (the Elder) to distinguish him from his grandson, dubbed R. Yann'ai Ze'ira' (the Lesser). It is not always possible to distinguish R. Yann'ai Rabbah from later amora'im called Yann'ai without a patronymic. He studied with R. Ḥiyya', who foresaw his future prominence as a leader (Y., Dem. 7.1, 26a). As a first generation amora', he was an important student of R. Yehudah ha-Nasi'. His own most prominent students were R. Yoḥanan and Reish Laqish. While it seems that he resided for a time in Sepphoris, he eventually established an academy in Akbara in Upper Galilee ('A. Z. 30a). A prosperous vineyard and orchard owner, his generosity exceeded his wealth (Mo'ed. Q. 12b), and during a time of oppressive taxation, he permitted farmers to sow their fields during the shemittah year (San. 26a). Among his best-known teachings are the following: a person should not put himself in danger and depend on miraculous intervention (Shab. 32a); and he who studies without the fear of God is like someone who makes a door before constructing the building (Shab. 31b).

YANN'AI (6th cent.), *payyetaṇ in Erets Yisra'el. He is considered the earliest author of synagogal poetry to sign his name in his compositions acrostically (see ACROSTICS), an arrangement found earlier in Christian and Samaritan liturgy. He wrote Maḥazor Yann'ai, a cycle of some 167 poetic embellishments for the *Amidah, connecting the most important prayer of the Sabbath Shaḥarit service with the content of the weekly Torah reading (see QER'AT HA-TORAH) and its treatment in Midrashic tradition, following the *triennial cycle common in Byzantine Erets Yisra'el. Maḥazor Yann'ai and some of Yann'ai's compositions for other occasions were highly esteemed and copied for centuries for liturgical use; numerous copies were found in the Cairo Genizah. However, they were almost lost when the Babylonian Torah-reading cycle replaced the triennial cycle, and payyetaṇic creativity was applied elsewhere. The literary heritage of Yann'ai is a major source for knowledge of the concepts, beliefs, and literature of the sixth-century synagogue.

YAQNEHAZ (יָאֲנֵהָז), acrostic abbreviation of the words yayin (wine), *Qiddush (Sanctification), ner (light), *Havdalah (Separation), and zeman (time; namely, the *She-Heḥeyanu blessing, referred to in rabbinic parlance as Birkat ha-Zeman). The abbreviation served as a mnemonic aid for the correct sequence of benedictions in the Qiddush recited on the eve of a festival that coincides with the conclusion of the Sabbath. The word yaqnehaz sounds similar to the German jagd den Has (hunt the hare), and the fanciful suggestion has been made that this may be the origin of the hare-hunting scenes—a well-known folkloristic motif—that appear in many illustrated Pesah Haggadot.

YAVNEH, town in Erets Yisra'el near Ashdod; the first significant Jewish settlement there dates from the reign of Alexander Yannai (103–76 BCE). The Romans, during the First Jewish Revolt (66–70 CE), established a refugee camp in Yavneh. Since it was a predominantly pagan town, the Romans' hope may have been that the Jews would assimilate with the local population. Around the year 68 CE, R. *Yoḥanan ben Zakk'ai interceded with Vespasian for permission to go to Yavneh and organize an academy there. This request was granted, and Yoḥanan was able to receive the scholars who subsequently fled from Jerusalem in 70. At a meeting held in a vineyard, he declared the Yavneh academy the successor to the Jerusalem *Sanhedrin, and the academy became known as the Vineyard of Yavneh (Kerem be-Yavneh). In the course of the next six decades, following the destruction of the Temple, the sages at Yavneh evolved the model of Judaism that came to be accepted as normative. At Yavneh, the canon of the Bible was finally determined. In 132 under Hadrian's rule, the Roman governor—fearing the authority established by the academy at Yavneh—moved the school to Lydda. After the Bar Kokhba' Revolt, attempts to return the Sanhedrin to Yavneh failed.

YEB (Gr. Elephantine), an island in the Nile, opposite Aswan in Upper Egypt. During the Persian period (after 525 BCE) it was the southern frontier fortress of the empire (Est. 1.1), and Yeb and Swen (Aswan) became the military and administrative centers of regiments made up of different ethnic groups under senior Persian or Babylonian officers. Among these groups was a Jewish community that traced its origins to before the Persian conquest.

During the 1890s, documents later known as the Elephantine papyri were discovered. Written in Aramaic, they were published by A. E. Cowley in 1923 and a second collection edited by E. G. Kraeling appeared in 1953. Recently, B. Porten and A. Yardeni have produced an updated publication. The contents of the papyri afford an insight into the social structure, legal customs and religious beliefs of this early Jewish Diaspora. The Jewish garrison maintained its own temple, with its altar, sacrificial system, and priesthood, while remaining in communication with the religious authorities in Jerusalem. Of particular interest among its documents are the Aramaic versions of the "Wisdom of Ahiqar" and the Behistun inscription of Darius I. Of importance for Jewish history are three archives: The Woman Mibtahiah (451–410), with personal papers tracing three generations through deeds of gifts in property, marriage and inheritance that offer insight into the legal status of Jewish women in this community; The Temple Servitor Ananiah (451–402), with eleven documents reflecting the status, property and family of this functionary of the local Temple; and The Community Leader Jedaniah (419–406), which includes a letter encouraging the Jews to observe Pesah according to the Torah, reports of the antagonism of the Egyptian priests of Khnub leading to the destruction of the Jewish Temple, and copies of petitions to the leaders of the Jewish community in Jerusalem, dated 407 BCE, asking for help in reconstructing the Temple. The last texts, which mention Johanan the high priest of the Jerusalem Temple and the sons of Sanballat, governor of Samaria, are important for the reconstruction of the chronology of the period of Ezra and Nehemiah a generation earlier.

YEDID NEFESH (יְדִיד נֶפֶשׁ; Devoted Friend), liturgical poem by the Safed kabbalist El'azar ben Mosheh *Azikri, published in his Sefer Haredim (1601). Teachings of the Lurianic Kabbalah are reflected in this piyyut's yearning for God, the initial letters of the four stanzas making up the Tetragrammaton (see GOD, NAMES OF). Yedid Nefesh is often sung before *Qabbalat Shabbat and at the Sabbath afternoon *Se'udah Shelisit (see ZEMIROT). Various textual errors have been corrected in recent traditional prayer books.

YEFET BEN 'ALI (10th cent.), *Karaites scholar and exegete; known in Arabic as Abu 'Ali Hasan ibn 'Ali al-Lawi al-Basri. He was born in Basra, Iraq, but emigrated to Jerusalem to join the *Avelei Tsiyyon. Few details are known of his life, but he was quickly recognized as a scholar and authority because of his writings, particularly his Bible commentaries, which cover the entire Bible and provide, for the most part, a literalist explication of the text, as well as a translation into Arabic. He often made use of the work of his Karaite predecessors but also added original interpretations of his own. In his commentaries, he vigorously attacked Sa'adyah Ga'on, often quoting Sa'adyah's words word for word. Some of Yefet's commentaries were translated into Hebrew, making them available to Karaites outside the Arabic world. His commentaries were used by Rabbanite commentators, such as Avraham ibn Ezra. Yefet's commentaries on Hosea, Nahum, Song of Songs, Ruth, and Daniel have been published (as well as individual chapters of other books), while the rest remain in manuscript. In addition, Yefet wrote a code of Karaite law, Sefer ha-Mitsvot, manuscripts of which have been recently identified. Sahl ben Matsliah mentions a polemic against Sa'adyah Ga'on written by Yefet, but this may be a reference to the polemical section in his Sefer ha-Mitsvot. Yefet also wrote polemics against Christianity and Islam.

YEHAREG VE-'AL YA'AVOR (יִהְיֶה וְאֵל יָאָוֹר), areas of law where one should sacrifice one's life rather than violate the provisions of law. This principle applies to idol worship, sexual violations, and murder (San. 74a). The general rule is found in the Shulhan 'Arukh (Yoreh De'ah 157.1). With the three exceptions of idolatry, sexual violations, and murder, if one is told to violate a commandment of the Torah or be killed, and the violation is in private, the commandment can be violated. A person may choose *martyrdom if the coercer intends to destroy the Jewish faith. If the action occurs in public, one must lose one's life rather than violate any Jewish law, but only if the coercer intends to destroy the faith. If it is a time of intense anti-Jewish feeling, one should not even transgress in matters of Jewish custom, but should rather die. Some authorities maintain that one may violate commandments if doing so occurs through inaction rather than action (such as in the case of rape); others disagree. Some authorities rule that in any situation where one need not lose one's life, one must not. Others rule that martyrdom is sometimes permissible but not mandatory. According to nearly all authorities, one need not ever sacrifice one's life to fulfill positive commandments; thus, yehareg ve-'al ya'avur is limited to violating negative commandments.

YEHI'EL BEN YOSEF OF PARIS (died 1268), Talmudic commentator, rabbinic authority, and communal leader. He was born in Meaux. His primary teacher was R. Yehudah ben Yitsḥaq upon whose death, he became head of the Paris Talmudic academy. While no separate collection of Yehi'el's tosafot* exists, they are cited by other commentators, especially his students. His contemporary, Yitsḥaq ben Mosheh of Vienna, the codifier, sought and received his responses on Jewish legal questions. It appears Yehi'el also wrote a tract on Jewish law (no longer extant).

Yehi'el of Paris was a major participant in the Disputation of *Paris, in which he defended the Talmud against papal claims that it contained anti-Christian views and contradicted the Bible. However, he and his colleagues failed to rescue the Talmud; manuscripts of it were burned in Paris in 1242.

Yehi'el of Paris and many of his students left Paris in the face of anti-Jewish pressure and established an academy in Erets Yisra'el, in Acre (c.1259), where he died.

YEHI'EL MIKHA'EL OF ZLOCZÓW (c.1726–1781), early Hasidic master in Galicia. The son of Yitsḥaq of Drogobych, a member of the rabbinical court in Brody, Yehi'el Mikha'el was a disciple of the Ba'al Shem Tov and later accepted the authority of Dov Ber of Mezritch. One of the most prominent Hasidic leaders in the Brody region, Yehi'el Mikha'el was the target of anti-Hasidic protests. Although he did not produce any works, he had many outstanding disciples, including Ya'aqov Yitsḥaq, ha-Hozeh mi-Lublin (the Seer of Lublin), Avraham Yehoshu'a Heschel of Opatów, Meshullam Feibush of Zbarazh, Mordekhai of Neskiz, and Hayyim Tirer of Czernowitz. All of Yehi'el Mikha'el's five sons were Hasidic masters, the most famous being Ze'ev

Wolf of Zbarazh and Yitsḥaq of Radziwiłłów. A collection of Yehi'el Mikha'el's teachings appeared posthumously as Mayim Rabbim (Warsaw, 1899; repr. as Sheloshah Sefarim Niftalim: Mayim Rabbim [Brooklyn, N.Y., 1979]). Famous for his extreme dedication to spiritual life, he taught a rigorous asceticism that required abstaining from sensual desires. The goal was directly to cleave to and ultimately become indistinguishable from the Ein Sof, the most ineffable essence of God. According to Hasidic accounts, Yehi'el Mikha'el died in a state of ecstatic union on a Shabbat afternoon.

YEHONATAN BEN DAVID HA-KOHEN OF LUNEL (c.1135–1210), Provençal rabbi and leading scholar of Lunel following the death of R. Meshullam ben Ya'aqov of Lunel. He was a student of R. Avraham ben David of Posquières and wrote the first commentary to the Alfasi code (see ALFASI, YITSḤAQ), including a comprehensive explication of the Mishnah in which he abridged Rashi's commentary to the Talmud and added Provençal interpretations. His correspondence with Moses *Maimonides, among the most poignant in Hebrew literature, resulted in strong bonds of friendship and mutual admiration between the two scholars; Maimonides sent him and his colleagues copies of his Mishneh Torah and Guide of the Perplexed. Through the offices of Aharon ben Meshullam of Lunel, Yehonatan defended Maimonides' position on the resurrection against Me'ir Abulafia. Yehonatan was among the leaders of the three hundred French and English rabbis who emigrated in 1210 to Erets Yisra'el, where he died.

YEHOSHU'A BEN HANANYAH (1st–2d cent.), tanna'; one of the five pupils of R. *Yohanan ben Zakk'ai, by whom he was ordained. From his teacher, Yehoshu'a ben Hananyah learned Merkavah mysticism (Ḥag. 14b) (see MA'ASEH MERKAVAH). He served in the Levitical choir in the Temple before its destruction in 70 CE and must have been at least thirty years old to fill that office. Together with R. *Eli'ezer ben Hurqanos he smuggled R. Yohanan ben Zakk'ai out of the besieged Jerusalem in a coffin to the Roman camp (Git. 56a). Following the fall of Jerusalem, Yehoshu'a founded and headed a beit din in Peqi'in, north of Yavneh, but after the death of Yohanan ben Zakk'ai served as av beit din in the court of Rabbi Gamli'el in Yavneh. Yehoshu'a knew many languages and was renowned for his wisdom. He is said to have accompanied Gamli'el on a mission to Rome, where he discussed religious questions with leading non-Jews, reputedly including the emperor Hadrian. A lover of peace, Yehoshu'a accepted a fundamental ruling of R. Gamli'el on the dating of Yom Kippur, despite his profound disagreement, but when Gamli'el publicly humiliated him in the Sanhedrin, Gamli'el was deposed for his arrogance. When the two men were eventually reconciled, Yehoshu'a insisted upon R. Gamli'el's reinstatement (Ber. 28a). Yehoshu'a lived to an old age and was still alive when Hadrian visited Palestine in 130. According to the Midrash, Yehoshu'a once restrained the people from rebelling against Rome after the emperor refused to honor his pledge to rebuild the Temple (Gn. Rab. 64). Yehoshu'a's halakhic views are often quoted in the Talmud. He tended toward leniency, permitting, for example, the conversion of Ammonites, and objected to excessive asceticism and mourning over the destruction of the Temple (B. B. 60b). One of his best-known aphorisms was "The evil eye, the evil inclination, and hatred of mankind drive a man out of the world" (Avot 2.16).

YEHOSHU'A BEN LEVI (3d cent.), amora'; head of the Lydda academy and leader of the Jewish community in Palestine. He engaged in halakhic discussions with R. *Yohanan bar Nappaha' and *Shim'on ben Laqish, and many of Yehoshu'a ben Levi's decisions were accepted as halakhah. He also instituted many rules regulating the synagogue service. Yehoshu'a was an outstanding agadist and was himself the subject of miraculous tales (some depicting him as the companion of Elijah). Legend has it that Yehoshu'a did not actually die but entered paradise during his lifetime (Ket. 77b), after a struggle with the angel of death (Ma'aseh de-Rabbi Yehoshu'a ben Levi and Seder Gan 'Eden). Yehoshu'a believed that the study of the Torah not only transforms the spirit but also protects the body (Eruv. 54a), and therefore he was not afraid to mingle with people who had contagious diseases (Ket. 77b). He stressed ethical behavior and, above all, humility (A. Z. 20b).

YEHOSHU'A BEN PERAHYAH (1st cent.), tanna'; *nasi' of the Sanhedrin. Together with Nitti'ai the Arbelite, he constituted one of the *zugot (pairs) who transmitted the *oral law. Only one halakhah is quoted in his name. According to a legend reported in Sotah 47a, Yehoshu'a had a disciple who went astray. Yehoshu'a rejected him completely, casting him out with his own two hands, and this disciple then became an active heretic. According to some ancient readings, this disciple was Jesus, but chronologically this is extremely unlikely, since Yehoshu'a lived some two generations before the time of Jesus. Yehoshu'a's favorite maxim was "Provide yourself a teacher; get a companion [for study] and judge all men on the scale of merit" (Avot 1.6).

YEHUDAH BAR IL'AI (2d cent.), tanna' generally referred to simply as R. Yehudah; one of the five most renowned disciples of R. 'Aqiva'. He was the teacher of R. *Yehudah ha-Nasi', who later incorporated in the Mishnah many of the traditions he had received from Yehudah. After the Hadrianic persecutions following the failure of the Bar Kokhba' Revolt (see BAR KOKHBA', SHIM'ON), Yehudah, who had been ordained by R. *Yehudah ben Bava', helped to establish the "academy at Usha' in Lower Galilee (his birthplace). Yehudah taught halakhic *Midrash. The *Sifra' is based on his teachings and follows the tradition of R. 'Aqiva' (San. 6a). In conflicts of opinion between himself and his colleagues, R. Me'ir and R. Shim'on bar Yo'hai, Yehudah's decisions were followed. He became a leading spokesman for the Jewish community (Shab. 33b) and was greatly revered for his humility and saintliness. He also was respected by the Roman authorities. More than six hundred of his rulings have been incorporated into the Mishnah, and with the exception of Qinnim, there is not a tractate in which his name does not appear. He was an active agadist, working in partnership but not necessarily in agreement with R. Neḥemyah; Genesis Rabbah* alone mentions about two hundred homiletical disagreements between them. While he greatly encouraged the study of Torah, Yehudah also advocated working for one's livelihood (Ned. 49b), insisting that parents teach their children a trade (Qid. 29a), though one's occupation should always be secondary to Torah studies (Ber. 35b).

YEHUDAH BAR YEHEZQEL (died 291), Babylonian amora'. A pupil of *Rav and *Shemu'el, he meticulously preserved their teachings, and hundreds of their halakhot are quoted in the Talmud in his name. Yehudah founded the academy at *Pumbedita, which functioned for almost eight hundred years. The type of Talmudic dialectics that he developed in Pumbedita became standard. His prayer was a combination of careful preparation, deep devotion, and spontaneity (R. ha-Sh. 35a) and his piety and devotion (Shab. 118b) were such that his petitions were always answered (Ta'an. 24b). One of his most famous sayings is that "The Lord only created the world so that people should fear him" (Shab. 31b).

YEHUDAH BEN BARZILLAI AL-BARGELONI (12th cent.), leading Spanish halakhist; author of numerous halakhic treatises, including Sefer ha-Ittim, on the laws of the Sabbath and festivals. He followed the tradition of R. Shemu'el ha-Nagid, often quoting his last great work, Hilkhata' Gavruta'. Besides his halakhic work, Yehudah wrote the most extensive commentary on Sefer Yetsirah* (Berlin, 1885) in the Middle Ages. In fact, his is a supercommentary on Sa'adyah Ga'on's commentary on the ancient treatise, comparing it to other early commentaries and to the Talmudic and Midrashic traditions concerning creation. The author's main purpose was to resolve the differences between the account of creation in Sefer Yetsirah and those found in Talmudic traditions, and to prove that Sa'adyah's philosophical and scientific views expressed in his commentary were in conformity with rabbinic tradition. This was especially difficult in regard to Sa'adyah's views on revelation; Sa'adyah denied any possibility of revelation of a divine entity and insisted that what the prophets had seen was a created angel, the kavod or shekhinah, that serves as a sign that verifies the divine content of the prophetic message. Yehudah supported this view and tried to confirm it by a detailed exegesis of rabbinic statements concerning revelation. He quotes dozens of treatises from late antiquity and the early Middle Ages, some of them unknown from any other source. He used the old translation of Sa'adyah's philosophical works that originated in Byzantium in the late eleventh century; his quotations were very often the only source for this work for medieval authors.

YEHUDAH BEN BAVA' (2d cent.), tanna'; one of the *Ten Martyrs. He disputed many halakhic subjects with R. *Aqiva ben Yosef. The most noteworthy halakhah of Yehudah ben Bava' was the decision that only one witness was required to testify to a man's death in order to permit his widow to remarry. He was famed for his piety, and according to the rabbis, wherever it said "it happened that a certain hasid [pious man] . . ." did so and so, this referred to Yehudah (B. Q. 103b). During the Hadrianic persecutions (late 130s), when the Romans forbade the teaching of the Torah, Yehudah ordained several outstanding pupils of R. 'Aqiva' (including R. *Me'ir and R. *Shim'on bar Yoḥ'ai), thereby ensuring the continuity of tradition. Caught by the Romans in the act of ordaining students, he bid his disciples to escape and himself suffered martyrdom.

YEHUDAH BEN KALONIMOS OF SPEYER (died c.1199), German halakhist and member of the beit din (rabbinic court) of Speyer. His major literary work is the Talmudic lexicon Yihusei Tanna'im ve-'Amora'im, which, because of its great length, did not achieve widespread circulation and has survived only in manuscript fragments. The book is a compilation of the sayings of every Talmudic sage, along with a commentary that critically analyzes textual variants and explains difficult terminology and halakhic subject matter. Yehudah's remarks on the aggadic passages of the Talmud indicate that he was heavily influenced by the spirit of martyrology that permeated the teachings of the Ḥasidei Ashkenaz.

YEHUDAH BEN SHEMU'EL HE-ḤASID (died 1217), Talmudic scholar and mystic and one of the leading personalities in the movement known as the Ḥasidei Ashkenaz. His reputation for asceticism and saintliness made him the subject of many legends. The ethical work Sefer Ḥasidim has been ascribed to him; in fact it is a composite work, containing writings of Yehudah, his father Shemu'el, and his pupil El'azar ben Yehudah of Worms. Yehudah is also credited with the authorship of Shir ha-Kavod. Although his mystical teachings were primarily ethical and devotional, they also contained theosophical doctrines as well as elements of folk religion. His stress on Bible study and devout prayer rather than Talmudic scholarship had popular appeal, and he advised those who knew no Hebrew to pray in any language they understood.

During the persecution of the Pharisees by King Alexander Yannai, Yehudah fled to Alexandria, where he remained until Shim'on ben Shetaḥ brought him back to Jerusalem. YEHUDAH HA-KOHEN (c.975–1050), rabbinic scholar, legal authority. He lived in Mainz and studied at the academy of R. Gershom ben Yehudah, eventually becoming one of its heads. He should not be confused with R. Yehudah ben Me'ir ha-Kohen, a teacher of R. Gershom, who was better known as R. Leontin. Rabbi Yehudah had three sons, all of whom were involved in aspects of Talmudic study or the composition of liturgical poetry. He himself was associated with the study of mystical teachings in chains of tradition preserved by the Hasidei Askhenaz.

Rabbi Yehudah issued his halakhic rulings with confidence, disagreeing on occasion with his colleagues in Mainz. He is one of two signatories to a well-known responsum to the community of Troyes, which formulated the prerogative of the majority in matters of communal government. His major (and only extant) work is Sefer ha-Dinim, a collection of his responsa on a variety of topics, both practical and theoretical. Rabbi Yehudah also collected a number of his predecessors' responsa. A unified text of Sefer ha-Dinim has not been preserved, but it is possible to reconstruct much of the work from citations found in the writings of subsequent Ashkenazi halakhists and from manuscript passages.

A physician by profession, he is known for his Hebrew poetry and his theological prose work the Kuzari, written in Arabic (first Hebrew edition, Fano, 1506). Upon completion of this last work he set out for the Holy Land, spending some time in Alexandria and visiting Tyre and Damascus en route. According to legend he was killed by an Arab horseman while reciting his famous "Elegy for Zion" before the gates of Jerusalem, but documents discovered in the Cairo *Genizah indicate that he died in Egypt and never reached Erets Yisra'el.

Yehudah ha-Levi was one of the leading Hebrew poets of the Middle Ages. Like his friend Mosheh *ibn Ezra, he applied the forms and conventions of Arabic poetry, such as rhyme and meter, to classical Hebrew. The body of his poetry falls under three main headings: secular (including songs of love, wine, and friendship), religious, and national. Much of his religious verse, marked by an intense and at times mystical love of God, has found its way into Jewish liturgy, as have some of his national poems. The profound yearning for Zion that characterizes his national poetry is based on his belief that life in exile is by definition incomplete and that only in Zion can full communion with God be achieved. The Kuzari—the only major Jewish classic written in Platonic dialogue form—uses as its setting the historical conversion to Judaism of the king of the *Khazars and is cast in the form of a conversation between that king and a rabbi. Unlike other medieval Jewish philosophers, Yehudah aimed not to reconcile Judaism with current philosophical thought, but rather to demonstrate the intrinsic inadequacy of philosophy and the superiority of revelation. His attack on philosophy, however, itself makes use of philosophical arguments, and he is concerned with showing that faith can be expounded philosophically. Rational proofs can be misleading and revelation is a source of higher and surer truth than can be attained rationally; yet there is, he maintains, nothing in the Bible that contradicts reason. The Jewish religion is therefore not irrational but suprarational. The exist-tence of God cannot be proved philosophically; neither does it require such proof. God is known through his revelation and through his manifestation in Jewish history, and long before Pascal, he emphasized the difference between the "God of Abraham" (i.e., of living experience and history) and the "God of Aristotle" (i.e., an abstract philosophical principle, such as a first cause). His philosophy of history and of the contact between God and man culminates in his doctrine of prophecy. Prophecy is both the mission and the ground of the spiritual superiority of Israel, which is conceived as "the heart of the nations"—the intermediary between God and the world. The prophet is the highest type of human being and receives his inspiration directly from God, while the prophetic gift is given only to the Jewish people, and only in Erets Yisra'el. Ha-Levi's view of the Jewish people as a spiritually superior race was not shared by other philosophers. However, he showed more concern for the historical and national character of Jewish existence than any other medieval philosopher.

YEHUDAH HA-NASI' (c.135–220), patriarch (*nasi') of Palestinian Jewry. Descendant of *Hillel and son and successor of *Shim'on ben Gamli'el, Yehudah ha-Nasi' belonged to the most distinguished family of his time. He lived most of his life in Galilee and was in office for fifty years, presiding over his Sanhedrin in *Beit She'arim and later in Sepphoris. A towering personality, he combined wisdom, learning, dignity, statesmanship, and wealth. His crowning achievement was the redaction of the *Mishnah, and though scholars differ as to the precise principles according to which he organized this codex, it undoubtedly served both as a textbook for the study of the oral law and as the first comprehensive code of rabbinic law (halakhah). Previous attempts at compilation had been made by R. 'Aqiva', R. Me'ir, and R. Natan, among others, but they were uncoordinated and contained great diversities and lacunae. Yehudah's objective was a unified compilation that would serve as the central legal instrument for Judaism and take the place of the academy, which could no longer coordinate all the scattered Jewries. He secured the cooperation of all scholars and determined a unified text, to which finishing touches were applied by his son and successor, Gamli'el III. Yehudah decided which traditions were worthy of preservation; his views were accepted, even when they differed from those of his colleagues. According to one tradition (Qid. 72b), Yehudah was born on the day R. 'Aqiva' died; this is not merely a chronological speculation but also implies that the tremendous task of systematizing the oral law to which 'Aqiva' had devoted his life was continued and completed by Yehudah. Yehudah was the last of the *tanna'im; his successors, the amora'im, used his compilation as the basis for their studies, out of which eventually emerged the two *Talmuds. He appears to have had a close relationship with the Roman authorities and most especially with a prominent official called Antoninus (whose exact identity has not been determined), which stood him in good stead as the leading representative of the Palestinian Jewish community. During his period of office, the country enjoyed comparative tranquility, and he worked for the religious and economic welfare of the Jewish community.

YEHUDAH HASID HA-LEVI (1660–1701), kabbalist and messianic enthusiast in Poland, where he was close to Shabbatean circles. A popular preacher whose homilies stressed the importance of repentance and good deeds, he founded a holy society called the Hasidim (the Pious) that devoted itself to prayer and penitence in the hope of hastening the messianic redemption. Believing that this event was imminent and that *Shabbetai Tsevi would reappear in 1706, Yehudah and his followers (purported to number 1,300, of whom 500 died en route) set out for Erets Yisra'el, arriving in 1700 after an adventurous journey. They bought land in Jerusalem, where the Hurvah synagogue in the name of Yehudah Hasid was built 150 years later. Yehudah died a few days after arriving in Jerusalem, and the group—persecuted by local Jews who, correctly, suspected their messianic fervor to be of Shabbatean inspiration—soon broke up, many of its members returning to Europe and some converting to Christianity and Islam.

YEHUDAH LIVA' BEN BETSAL'EL (c.1520–1609), also known as Maharal of Prague; legal authority, mystic, communal leader, and legendary creator of the *golem. It is likely that Yehudah Liva' (Löw) was an autodidact, as he never identifies his teachers. He served as chief rabbi of Moravia; of Poznań, Poland, his birthplace; and of Prague. In legend, he is known as the creator of the *golem, a man-like creature brought into existence through the employment of magical techniques. Few Jewish legends have had as strong an influence on Western culture as the legend of the golem. The grave of Yehudah Liva' in Prague continues today to be a major tourist attraction.

Yehudah Liva' was one of the most prolific and profound Ashkenazi authors. His voluminous writings cover almost two thousand printed pages. Besides a lengthy commentary to the Pentateuch, an extensive commentary to sections of the Talmud, and legal responsa, he also composed a never-completed series of volumes on the theological meaning of the Jewish holy days. Some of his writings have been lost.

Yehudah Liva' is often correctly credited with "revealing the concealed" that is, making Jewish mystical teachings available to the nonspecialist. Though not presented systematically, his writings nonetheless offer a complete and pervasive theological system. He deals with virtually every major theological issue, and emphasizes the metaphysical and the social distinctiveness of the Jewish people. His theological views serve as a conceptual foundation both for his understanding of Jewish law and for his program for the spiritual, social, and intellectual reformation of Jewish life. This plan was predicated upon his harsh critique of many aspects of contemporary life, but especially that of the rabbinic leadership, and the goals and curricula of Jewish education. Yehudah Liva' was a vocal opponent of the tendency, current in his times, to codify Jewish law. He also attacked those of his contemporaries who, in his view, attempted to introduce "foreign"—especially philosophical and historiographical—elements into faith. His writings offer a creative and constructive alternative to the "abuses" that he identified. While largely rejected during his lifetime, his theological approach, and his program for social and religious reform, found considerable resonance in future generations, especially within Hasidism in nineteenth-century Poland. His works can be found in Gur Aryeh (commentary on the Pentateuch), five volumes (Bene Beraq, 1972), and Kol Sifrei ha-Maharal mi-Prag (collected writings), twelve volumes (New York, 1969).

YEHUDA'I BEN NAHMAN GA'ON, most influential head of the *academy of *Sura from 757 to 760; he trained in the academy of *Pumbedita. He is the earliest *ga'on whose responsa have been transmitted in significant numbers (several dozen) and is considered to have been a landmark figure, although the reasons are somewhat obscure (see PIRQOI BEN BABOI). A number of anonymous halakhic codes (including Halakhot Gedolot* and Halakhot Qetsuvot*) were attributed to him in the medieval period; an earlier code known as Halakhot Pesuqot* was attributed to him during the geonic period, but this attribution, and others, is questionable. Some medieval authors attributed to him Talmudic passages that they believed to be interpolated, but there is no evidence to support the theory that he emended the Talmudic text.

YELAMMEDENU (יְלַמְּדֵנוּ), abbreviated form of the expression yelammedenu rabbenu, "let our master teach us," normally used to introduce the opening question of the halakhic proem typical of Tanhuma'-Yelammedenu midrashim. Since this expression is usually found at the beginning of the composite homilies that make up this kind of Midrashic literature, yelammedenu was used, particularly in medieval quotations, as one of the names for Midrashic works of this type. This led some scholars to search for a supposedly lost, early work by this name. See TANHUMA: YELAMMEDENU.

YEQUM PURQAN (Aram; יְקוּם פּוּרְקָן; May Salvation Be Granted), name of two Aramaic prayers recited in the Ashkenazi ritual on Sabbaths after the reading of the Torah. One prayer is in behalf of rabbis and teachers in Erets Yisra'el and Babylonia and dates from the geonic period; the other prayer is in behalf of the congregation. Only the second prayer is in the Conservative prayer book, and both have been removed from the Reform prayer book.

YERUHAM BEN MESHULLAM (c.1290–1350), Talmudist and legal authority. He was born in Provence, but following the expulsion of Jews from many regions of France in 1306, he wandered through various locales, ultimately settling in Toledo, Spain, where he studied with R. Asher ben Yehi'el. Yeruham gathered material for his first work, Sefer Mesharim, on matters of financial and commercial law, from various sections of the Talmud, Maimonides, and elsewhere. As the result of a request by his colleagues that he do the same for those areas of Jewish law that are applicable to daily life, he composed a second work, Toledot Adam ve-Havvah (Constantinople, 1517), which was arranged according to the life cycle and divided into two parts: "Adam," from birth to marriage; and "Eve," from marriage to death. Yeruham cites the opinions of scholars in northern France, Provence, and Spain, and in many cases preserved material that was otherwise lost.

Yeruham's work was eclipsed to a large degree by the Arba'ah Turim of his contemporary, R. Ya'aqov ben Asher. Yosef Karo cites Yeruham extensively, however, in his Beit Yosef.

YESHIVAH (יְשִׁיבָה; sitting), the oldest institution for higher learning in Judaism, primarily devoted to study of the Talmud. The first yeshivot outside Erets Yisra'el and Babylonia (see ACADEMIES) were founded in the geonic period, notably in North Africa, where there were centers of learning from the eighth century in Fez, Tlemcen, and Kairouan. There were also important yeshivot in Damascus and Aleppo in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. A yeshivah in Lucena, Spain, is mentioned in the ninth century, with concrete information from Spain from the tenth century. Yeshivot were widespread throughout the country, and in the fifteenth century every community rabbi was obligated to establish one.

In southern France, yeshivot were first founded about the tenth century (in Narbonne), and soon there were many others. Unlike the Babylonian yeshivot, which were considered final arbiters in matters of halakhah, the later yeshivot enjoyed little such authority and concentrated on study. In the twelfth century, yeshivot proliferated in northern France, largely under the guidance of Rashi, his pupils, and his descendants and spread from there to the Rhineland communities and then throughout Germany. After the destruction of the Rhineland communities, in 1348, Austria became an important center, in particular the yeshivah in Vienna. Ya'aqov *Pollak (15th–16th cent.), who studied in Nuremberg, was responsible for introducing yeshivot to eastern Europe, founding one in Kraków where he introduced the pilpul* system. The yeshivot in Prague and Bohemia flourished from the end of the fifteenth century.

After the expulsion from Spain in 1492, important yeshivot were established in the new Sephardi centers. They were initially supported by local philanthropists but later taken over by the communities. The best known were founded in Erets Yisra'el (Jerusalem and Safed, later Hebron), Constantinople, and Salonika.

In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, eastern Europe was the great yeshivah center. The yeshivah heads were at the center of communal life and the yeshivah itself was the main institution in the community, which supported the students. At first the yeshivot in eastern Europe often consisted of no more than a select number of students. The first large-scale modern yeshivah, in *Volozhin, opened its doors in 1803. This was followed by various noted yeshivot throughout eastern and central Europe, especially in Lithuania. Among the best known were those in *Slobodka, *Tels, *Mir, and Pressburg in Hungary. They were characterized by an intensive program that was dedicated almost exclusively to the study of Talmud and its commentators, with an emphasis on conceptual analysis and a search for underlying legal principles. The yeshivot were not involved in reaching decisions in matters of Jewish law, and the study was highly theoretical. In the latter part of the nineteenth century some yeshivot also stressed the development of the highest standards of personal morality and the study of ethical texts (see MUSAR MOVEMENT). Not until shortly before World War II was a major yeshivah, *Yeshivat Hakhmei Lublin, opened in Poland. The European yeshivot were all destroyed in the Holocaust, although survivors reestablished some of them in the United States and Israel.

Today yeshivot are found in various countries. The State of Israel has tens of thousands of students in its yeshivot (including its high-school yeshivot)—the highest such population in history. Most of the yeshivot are in Jerusalem and Bene Beraq. The Israeli yeshivot can be divided into three broad categories: the Lithuanian, which are direct descendants of the east European yeshivot and include the Hebron, Ponevezh, Slobodka, Mir, and Brisk yeshivot; the Hasidic yeshivot, which are generally linked to specific dynasties; and the Religious-Zionist, of which the best known is the Merkaz ha-Rav in Jerusalem. The last include the hesder yeshivot, which combine broad religious studies, including Bible and Jewish thought in addition to Talmud, with terms of service in the Israeli army. Leading American yeshivot include: *Yeshiva University in New York, which combines a university education with a comprehensive religious studies curriculum; the Ner Israel Rabbinical College of Baltimore; Yeshivah Torah Vodaath of New York; the Telshe Yeshivah of Cleveland; and the Rabbi Aaron Kotler Institute for Advanced Studies in Lakewood, New Jersey. YESHIVAT HAKHMEI LUBLIN, yeshivah founded by R. Me'ir *Shapira' in Lublin, Poland, in 1930. Unlike the other Polish yeshivot, which were often centered upon a particular dynamic individual or were located within the confines of a local synagogue or beit midrash, this yeshivah was founded as an educational institution in its own right, with its own premises, constructed specifically to house the yeshivah. With its large Talmudic library, dormitories, dining facilities, and lecture halls, it served as a model for yeshivot throughout the world and soon assumed the status of the paramount Torah institution in all of Poland. It came to an end in 1939 during the German invasion of Poland. The building currently houses a hospital.

YESHIVA UNIVERSITY, educational institution located in New York City. Founded in 1886, it has grown from a small school for boys on Manhattan's Lower East Side to a multifaceted university. Today it comprises seventeen schools, divisions, and affiliates located on three campuses in Manhattan and one in the Bronx.

Yeshiva University offers undergraduate programs in liberal arts and sciences, business, and Jewish studies; and graduate and professional programs in medicine and biomedical science, law, social work, psychology, Jewish studies, and Jewish education and administration. The total university enrollment is approximately 5,200, with roughly equal numbers of men and women. One thousand additional students attend the affiliated Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary and its associated branches.

Yeshiva University is an independent institution chartered by the state of New York and accredited by the Commission on Higher Education of the Middle States Association of Colleges and Schools and by various specialized professional organizations.

YESHU'A BEN YEHUDAH (11th cent.), *Karaitic scholar and exegete; known in Arabic as Abu al-Faraj Furqan ibn Asad. He lived in Jerusalem and was the last renowned and influential scholar of the Karaite golden age there. He studied with Levi ben Yefet and Yosef ben Avraham Basir and, like them, adopted the highly rationalistic Kalam theology. After Basir's death, Yeshu'a assumed a central teaching and leadership role in the community and had extensive relationships with the Karaite community in Egypt and with Rabbanites.

Yeshu'a's major work was his "long" commentary on the Book of Leviticus and the Ten Commandments. This is a very large work, the extent of which is still not clear due to the state of the manuscripts. It treats a wide variety of legal and exegetical topics in an exhaustive manner, and in it Yeshu'a quotes extensively from his Karaite predecessors and rabbinic literature. A wealthy Egyptian Karaite convinced Yeshu'a to write a shorter commentary on the entire Torah for his son's education. In 1054 Yeshu'a began to compose this "short" commentary, also quite a lengthy work, which includes a translation of the Torah and a commentary on grammatical, theological, ethical, and legal matters. His other works include Kitab al-Tawriah, a work on legal theory and polemical topics, such as the eternal nature of the Torah and the impossibility of its abrogation; and a work on forbidden sexual relationships, translated into Hebrew as Sefer ha-Yashar (edited by I. Markon [Saint Petersburg, 1908]). In this work he opposed the then accepted catenary theory of forbidden marriage, which greatly restricted the number of possible marriage partners in the small Karaite community. His position eventually became the accepted one. He also wrote Be-Re'shit Rabbah, a Hebrew translation of a philosophical commentary on the first two sections of Genesis.

YETSER HA-RA' AND YETSER HA-TOV (יֵצֶר הָרָע; יֵצֶר הַטוֹב; the evil inclination and the good inclination), man's impulse to do evil and his impulse to do good, often depicted as being in conflict with each other. The Bible refers to the "inclination of man's heart, which is evil from his youth" (Gn. 8.21; cf. Gn. 6.5), but the Talmud complements this by positing the existence of an opposing instinct within man that draws him toward the good. The rabbis taught that the evil inclination could be disciplined and pressed into the service of God and interpreted the commandment to love God "with all your heart" (Dt. 6.5) as meaning with both the good and evil inclinations (Sifrei on Dt. 32). According to another rabbinic statement, God created both the evil inclination (i.e., human nature with its desires and passions) and the Torah, which contains the antidote to master the evil inclination (Qid. 30b). The identification of the good inclination with Torah resulted in the view that the evil inclination was with man from his birth, whereas the good inclination came to him at bar mitsvah*, that is, with his full acceptance of Torah. The rabbinic doctrine of the two inclinations was clearly intended to substitute a psychological *dualism, the inner struggle between good and evil, for the cosmic dualism of other systems, in which the forces of light battle the forces of darkness. The more radically dualistic view, in which the *yetser hara*¹ is identified with *Satan or with demonic forces in general, came to the fore in the *Kabbalah. See also GOOD AND EVIL.

YETSIV PITGAM (יְצִיב פִּתְגָּם); Firm Stands the Word [of God]), Aramaic hymn chanted in some Ashkenazi congregations outside Israel after the first verse of the haftarah* on the second day of *Shavu'ot. It is a short poem of fifteen lines, the initial letters giving the name of the author as Ya'aqov ben Me'ir ha-Levi, who has been identified by some scholars with R. *Ya'aqov ben Me'ir Tam (1100–1171). A tradition holds that Crusaders broke into his house on the second day of Shavu'ot and he was nearly killed.

There is no reference to Shavu'ot in the hymn, but it is in the form of a reshut (introductory prayer), depicting the Sinaitic revelation (commemorated on Shavu'ot) and praying for the welfare of the Jewish people.

YEVAMAH. See LEVIRATE MARRIAGE.

YEVAMOT (יְבָמוֹת; Levirates), tractate in Mishnah order Nashim, containing sixteen chapters, with related material in Tosefta¹ and in both Talmuds. It deals with the laws of levirate marriage (Dt. 25.5ff.), in which the brother of a man who dies childless is required to marry his widow in order to provide an heir for him. Yevamot examines in detail the status of levirate marriages in cases where the widow is a relative of the levirate brother, or is otherwise prohibited from marrying him. The tractate opens with a list of fifteen close relatives, which were the subject of a dispute between Beit Hillel and Beit Shamm'ai. If the brother and widow are related to each other—independently of the marriage to the late brother—through one of these relationships (e.g., daughter, granddaughter, maternal aunt), which would prohibit their marriage to one another for reasons of incest, Beit Hillel sees the levirate relationship as being automatically nullified and extends the nullification even to other widows of the deceased brother. Beit Shamm'ai demurs, regarding all nonrelated wives as subject to the levirate marriage. The Mishnah notes that Beit Hillel and Beit Shamm'ai sought arrangements whereby these disputes would not prevent the followers of each school from intermingling and intermarrying with each other (Yev. 1.4).

Many of the laws discussed in Yevamot stem from the rabbinic understanding of the unique status of a levirate marriage. Even prior to the formal entry into a levirate marriage, the brother and widow have a quasi-marital relationship that has several legal ramifications. Accordingly, biblical law did not require any ceremonial act of betrothal prior to consummation of the marriage. However the rabbis instituted an act of betrothal, the ramifications of which are discussed in detail in Yevamot. The laws of levirate marriages in Yevamot serve as a backdrop for discussion of many basic laws related to marriage, such as prohibited marriage partners and their legal status; the legal effects of permitted and prohibited marriages, including property rights, the laws of inheritance, and the right of a priest's wife to eat terumah (heave offering); and marriage to a minor or a deaf-mute. A central topic of Yevamot is the problematic case of a woman whose husband went abroad and never returned. The rabbis sought to be lenient in such cases, suspending many of the normal rules of evidence in order to enable such a woman to remarry.

The Babylonian tractate was translated into English by I. W. Slotki in the Soncino Talmud (London, 1936).

YIDDISH, the language of Ashkenazi Jewry (see ASHKENAZIM). Yiddish originated about a thousand years ago in the Rhine and Danube basins, in a process of fusion between a majority Germanic component (from East Central German and Bavarian city dialects) and a minority Semitic component (from post-Biblical Hebrew and Aramaic). Migrations eastward, spurred by the *Crusades and other violence in central Europe, and encouraged by benevolent Lithuanian and Polish kings, resulted in the rise of Eastern Yiddish in the Slavic and Baltic lands. The older Western Yiddish (in Germany, Alsace, Holland, and adjacent areas) became the basis of the literary standard that accompanied the initiation of Yiddish printing in the sixteenth century. By the end of the eighteenth century, the western dialects were in decline, as a consequence of creeping Germanization and the anti-Yiddish campaign of Moses *Mendelssohn's "Berlin Enlightenment." In nineteenth-century eastern Europe, in contrast, the proponents of modernization ultimately contributed to the rise of modern Yiddish literature. In the twentieth century, Yiddish literature had major centers in interwar Poland, the Soviet Union, and New York City. Nearly all the leading authors grew up in a religious environment and broke away to join one of the secularist or revolutionary movements.

Yiddish suffered the devastating blow of the Holocaust, whose six million Jewish victims were nearly all native Yiddish speakers. Stalin's repression of Yiddish culture in the Soviet Union, the dominance of Hebrew in Palestine/Israel, and massive voluntary linguistic assimilation in western countries, have drastically reduced the number of Yiddish speakers. Yiddish continues to thrive among many Hasidic groups, however. In addition, there are small groups of nonreligious adherents of the language, who pursue it as a spoken language and as a focus of literary, cultural or scholarly activity.

Prior to the Haskalah, Yiddish was the language of religious Jews, and reflected the worldview and lifestyle of traditional Ashkenazi Jewry. It stood in a harmonious, complementary relationship with two nonspeaking languages inherited from the ancient Near East: *Hebrew and *Aramaic. A special Yiddish translation language, used for sacred texts, was known as 'Ivri taytsh. The oldest (known) Yiddish sentence was penned in 1272, in a festival *prayer book. From then until the end of the sixteenth century, Yiddish often filled the secular gap left by Hebrew and Aramaic; Old Yiddish literature fused ancient Jewish motifs with European genres (see MLOKHIM BUKH; SHMUEL BUKH) and adapted European works (such as the King Arthur cycle and Ducus Horant). From around 1600 onward, works steeped in Jewish religious and moral values, intended for the masses, prevailed. Among the most successful were the Mayse Bukh (Basel, 1602), collections of pietistic mini-tales (see MA'ASEH BOOK), and the Tse'nah u-Re'enh* (apparently first published in the 1590s), an interweaving of the Pentateuch and weekly readings from the Prophets with traditional homiletic and moralistic interpretation; the latter has gone through hundreds of editions and lives on in Hasidic communities. The movement for the sanctity of Yiddish includes the pro-Yiddish pronouncements of kabbalist Yehi'el Mikhal *Epstein (died 1706); the hundred-year saga of the Zohar in Yiddish (finally published in 1711); and the traditionalist campaign of the Hatam Sofer (see SOFER FAMILY) whose influence on many Hasidic groups remains strong. The classic Hasidic movement itself, from the eighteenth century onward, raised Yiddish to a level of explicit sanctity as a corollary of its emphasis on direct communication with God and the exalted role of ordinary individuals. Since the Holocaust, those who maintain the sanctity of Yiddish see it as loshn ha-kdoyshim (language of the martyrs).

YIGDAL (יגדל); Magnified and Praised Be the Living God), hymn sung at the conclusion of Sabbath and festival evening services; among Ashkenazim, it is also recited before the daily morning service. It is based on Maimonides' *Thirteen Principles of Faith (each line treating one of the principles). The Sephardi and Eastern version has a fourteenth, concluding line (a later addition), which reads: "These are the Thirteen Principles . . ." It was not accepted by Yitshaq *Luria and the Safed kabbalists who were dissatisfied with the formulation of the Thirteen Principles, and it is not found in the Hasidic prayer book. The authorship of Yigdal has been assigned to Daniyye'l ben Yehudah of Rome (14th cent.).

YIHUD (יְהוּד; seclusion [with a woman]). A man and a strange woman are not to be alone together in a secluded place (Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer, no. 22). Seclusion is defined as the absence of any possibility of disturbance by other people; if such a possibility does exist then the prohibition does not apply. Yihud is suspended in the case of a man, if his wife is at home, and in the case of a woman, if her husband is in town. The presence of a child also suspends the prohibition. Different rules are applicable by night and in situations in which the moral standards of the residents of a particular dwelling are lax. Yihud between a bride and groom is an important element of the marriage ceremony and takes place after the ceremony in a room specifically designated as "the yihud room" (Rema, Even ha-'Ezer 55.1).

YIHUS. See YUHASIN.

YIMMAH SHEMA (ימח שמו; "May his name be blotted out"), an execratory appellation added to the mention of the name of an inveterate enemy of the Jewish people. Its origin is attributed to the commandment in Deuteronomy 25.19 to "blot out the memory of Amalek" (see AMALEKITES), and the phrase is sometimes therefore extended to yimmaḥ shemo ve-zikhro, "May his name and memory be blotted out." A *Purim custom was to write the name of *Haman (traditionally descended from the Amalekites) on a stone or piece of wood and then hit it until the name was defaced. In the Middle Ages, Christian anti-Jewish polemicists alleged that the imprecation applied to Jesus because the initials of the fuller version spelled yeshu (Heb. for Jesus).

YIRMIYAHU BEN ABBA' (4th cent.), Palestinian amora', often simply called Yirmiyahu. He is to be distinguished from the earlier Babylonian amora' of the same name who is often referred to as Yirmiyahu, without patronymic, in the Talmud Yerushalmi. While still a young man he emigrated from Babylonia to Tiberias, in Erets Yisra'el, where he studied with R. Ze'ira' I, himself a Babylonian emigré (e.g., Ta'an. 7a; Shab. 10a). He eventually succeeded R. Ze'ira' as head of the Tiberias academy. Known for both his spiritual devotion (e.g., Y., Ber. 1.8, 3d) and academic precision (cf. B. B. 23b), he became one of the leading sages of his generation, influential also in community affairs. He is mentioned frequently in both halakhic and aggadic contexts in both Talmuds, although his primary work was in halakhah (cf. Y., Ma'as. 3.10, 51a; Shab. 63a). His teachings were transmitted to Babylonia by the 'naḥotei (Pes. 60b) and were highly regarded there, although the fact that he did not think highly of the Babylonian sages (cf. Men. 52a; San. 24a) was known to them (Ket. 75a). Among his Midrashic teachings are: "a gentile who observes the Torah is like a high priest" (B. Q. 38a, with ref. to 2 Sm. 7.19; Is. 26.2; Ps. 118.20, 33.1, 125.4); and "physical labor is more precious than the merits of the fathers" (Gn. Rab. 74.10, to Gn. 31.42). His dying request was to be placed on his side by the road, clothed and with a staff in hand, that he might be ready when the Messiah came (Y., Kil. 9.3, 32b; Gn. Rab. 100.2).

YISHMA'E'L BEN ELISHA' (2d cent.), tanna' who lived in Kefar 'Aziz in southern Judea (Kil. 6.4). Prominent in both halakhic and aggadic Midrash, he is responsible for the Mekhilta de-Rabbi Yishma'e'l to Exodus*, parts of Sifrei to Numbers and Deuteronomy*, and for the famous school of halakhah that bore his name, De-Vei Rabbi Yishma'e'l. He formulated the thirteen hermeneutical rules (see HERMENEUTICS) "by means of which the Torah is to be expounded," but these are, in fact, an amplification of the seven rules previously promulgated by Hillel* and known as the Baraiyta' shel Rabbi Yishma'e'l or Baraiyta' shel Shelosh 'Esreh Middot, which opens the Sifra* and was incorporated into the readings in the first part of Shaharit. Yishma'e'l's work was largely devoted to the formulation of categories, classifications, and rules in connection with both biblical exposition and the oral law. Yishma'e'l formulated the principles that "the Bible speaks in ordinary language" (Ker. 11a) and that the order of biblical passages is not necessarily chronological. His approach was rational and avoided extremes in the interpretation of biblical verses. Although his name is listed among the Ten Martyrs* killed after the Bar Kokhba' Revolt (see BAR KOKHBA'; SHIM'ON), it is unlikely that he lived until that time. Many mystical compositions were anachronistically ascribed to him.

YISRA'EL BEN SHABBETAI HAPSTEIN KOZIENICE (1733–1814), Hasidic master, author, and preacher. Along with Ya'akov Yitshaq, ha-Ḥozeh mi-Lublin, Yisra'el, the Maggid of Kozienice, was one of the first highly influential Hasidic leaders in Poland. His teachers, Shemu'el Shmelke Horowitz of Nikolsburg, Elimelekh of Lyzhansk, and Levi Yitshaq of Berdichev, were disciples of Dov Ber of Mezhibezh. A prolific author, Yisra'el's writings deal with halakhah (Beit Yisra'el), Kabbalah (Or Yisra'el), as well as Hasidism ('Avodat Yisra'el [Jerusalem, 1988]). He was also a popular tsaddiq, revered for his ecstatic worship and therapeutic amulets. He represented the Jews before the Polish nobility in Warsaw.

YISRA'EL BEN SHEMU'EL ASHKENAZI OF SHKLOV (c.1770–1839), Talmudist. A pupil of Eliyyahu ben Shelomoh Zalman (the Vilna Ga'on), he was the preacher in Shklov (Belorussia) for twelve years and co-editor of the Ga'on's glosses on the Shulḥan 'Arukh. In 1809 Yisra'el went to Erets Yisra'el and settled in Safed, where he founded a yeshivah and headed the community of perushim (separatists; so called because they did not belong to the Hasidic community in Safed, which had been extant since 1757). He led the community through many difficult crises (plagues, Arab attacks, earthquakes) and in 1837 went to Jerusalem and founded another congregation of perushim. His major work is Pe'at ha-Shulḥan (Safed, 1836), a codification of the rabbinic laws dealing with residence in the Holy Land (which had been omitted by Yosef Karo* in his code).

YISRA'EL ME'IR HA-KOHN (1838–1933), rabbi and author; known after the title of his first book as the Ḥafets Ḥayyim. He was born in Lithuania, studied in Vilna, and settled, upon his marriage, in the town of Raduń, where he lived for the rest of his life and whose yeshivah he supported both materially and spiritually.

Though he never possessed any official rabbinical title or position, the Ḥafets Ḥayyim was one of the most important and influential figures in Orthodox Judaism of the nineteenth century. His first book, Ḥafets Ḥayyim (Vilna, 1873), is devoted to the centrality of the Torah's laws concerning the prohibition against lashon ha-ra' (slander) for Jewish life. It was a theme he returned to continually throughout his life. His greatest work, entitled Mishnah Berurah (6 vols. [1894–1907]), is an extensive commentary on Yosef Karo's Shulḥan 'Arukh, Oraḥ Ḥayyim, dealing with the laws of everyday Jewish life. Mishnah Berurah became an extraordinarily successful and authoritative guide to halakhic life for many Orthodox Jews.

His other major works include Maḥaneh Yisra'el (1881), on the halakhic and ethical problems faced by Jews serving in the army; Ahavat Heseḏ (1888), on charity; and Niddeḥei Yisra'el (1894), a halakhic guide and moral exhortation to Jews emigrating from eastern Europe to the West not to abandon Jewish tradition.

He was a founder and great supporter of the Orthodox Jewish organization Agudat Israel, both in Poland and on the international scene. He was also instrumental in raising funds for the yeshivot of Poland between World Wars I and II.

YITSHAQ BEN ABBA' MARI (c.1120–1190), Provençal scholar. He studied under his father and at age seventeen composed a work on the dietary laws. While visiting Barcelona, he wrote a commentary to chapter four of tractate Menahot, which deals with the laws of tsitsit, mezuzah, and tefillin. His major work is the encyclopedic Sefer ha-Ittur. The first part deals with various laws for composing legal documents and offers examples of each one; Marseilles was an international port and these documents were useful among Jewish traders. The second part deals with ritual law. He extensively utilized geonic sources together with later Spanish and Franco-German ones. He corresponded with his relative Avraham ben David of Posquières and Ya'aqov ben Me'ir Tam. He also wrote a short treatise on the Alfasi code entitled Me'ah She'arim.

YITSHAQ BEN ASHER (died c.1133), Talmudist and student of Rashi; considered the first of the German tosafists; known as Riva of Speyer. His tosafot are cited by later scholars such as R. Yehudah ben Kalonimos of Speyer, R. Yitshaq ben Moshe of Vienna, and R. Mordekhai ben Hillel. A respected legal authority whose opinion was sought from far and near, he was confident in his judgments and did not shrink from defending them before such critics as R. Ya'aqov ben Me'ir Tam. His students include the prominent tosafists R. Eli'ezer ben Natan of Mainz, R. Yitshaq ben Mordekhai, and R. Efrayim of Regensburg.

YITSHAQ BEN ASHER HA-LEVI (11th–12th cent.), rabbinic scholar, tosafist, legal authority; known by the acronym Riba. He studied with Rashi and lived in Speyer. He was the first German tosafist, compiling tosafot to most tractates of the Talmud. Only portions have survived, however, in later tosafot collections. His tosafot reached Rabbenu Tam in Ramerupt, through their mutual student, R. Yitshaq ben Mordekhai (Ribam); he also composed treatises on usury and on several Talmudic tractates.

He was referred to as ha-Qadosh (the Holy One, or the Martyr), perhaps reflecting his overall piety as well as the manner of his death. According to a later Italian rabbinic text (Sefer Recanati), Riba died after fasting on Yom Kippur against the advice of his physicians. According to the commentary on Sefer Yetsirah attributed to R. Sa'adyah Ga'on (but actually composed in northern France in the 12th cent.), Yitshaq and his students attempted to create a *golem.

YITSHAQ BEN MOSHEH OF VIENNA (c.1180–1250), halakhic authority; known as Or Zaru'a after his major work. In his youth, he traveled widely and studied with such scholars as R. Eli'ezer ben Yo'el ha-Levi of Bonn, R. Yehudah ben Yitshaq of Paris, and R. Yehudah ben Shemu'el he-Hasid of Regensburg. R. Me'ir ben Barukh of Rothenburg was his student. Yitshaq incorporated the halakhic teachings of his French and German masters into his work, Or Zaru'a. It is a valuable collection of halakhic material, historical data, and information concerning Jewish religious customs and observance. The compendium remained very much a work in progress; Yitshaq himself continued to add supplements to it, and his son, Hayyim ben Yitshaq of Vienna, and students carried on this process after his death. Hayyim also wrote an abbreviated version of the Or Zaru'a, which is frequently cited by R. Yisra'el of Krems in his notes to the work of R. Asher ben Yehiel.

YITSHAQ BEN SHEMU'EL OF ACRE (c.1250–1340), kabbalist. Several of his works, both on theoretical Kabbalah and on mystical, prophetic, and trance-like experiences, have been preserved and contain valuable references to otherwise unknown kabbalistic writings and authors. He journeyed from Palestine via Italy to Spain, where he met many of the leading kabbalists. He also investigated the authenticity of the Zohar and questioned the son of *Moshe de León on the subject. Yitshaq was an outstanding exponent of mystical thought and contemplative practice, and his works are an important source for modern research on Kabbalah.

YITSHAQ BEN SHEMU'EL OF DAMPIERRE (died c.1185), rabbinic scholar, tosafist, legal authority; known by his acronym as Ri, Ri ha-Zaqen, or Ri of Dampierre. He and his uncle and teacher, *Ya'aqov ben Me'ir Tam (Rabbenu Tam), formed the core of the northern French tosafists, and Ri's name appears constantly in *tosafot collections, although few, if any, of his original tosafot have survived. (The tosafot printed in tractate Qiddushin under the name Perush Ri ha-Zaqen were written not by Yitshaq but by the Provençal scholar Avraham ben Yitshaq of Montpellier.) An account in the introduction to R. Menaḥem ben Aharon ben Zerah's Tsedah la-Derekh, which suggests that sixty students studied with Yitshaq at one time and that each was responsible for a particular tractate, cannot be verified and is, in all likelihood, an exaggeration. It does, however, reflect the centrality of both Yitshaq and Rabbenu Tam (who is described similarly in the introduction to R. Shelomoh Luria's Yam shel Shelomoh) to the compilation of the tosafot. Yitshaq was known for his piety, and there is evidence of his involvement in mystical studies.

YITSHAQ BEN SHESHET PERFET (1326–1408), Spanish halakhic authority who spent his last years in Algiers; known by the acronym Ribash. He lived in Barcelona, Saragossa, and Valencia, before fleeing Spain as a result of the 1391 anti-Jewish riots. In Algiers he was appointed *dayyan. Many queries were addressed to him, and his responsa (Constantinople, 1546) were noted for their clarity and erudition. A strict legalist, he warned against the study of philosophy and, even more, Kabbalah. He was also the author of Talmudic commentaries and piyyutim. His tomb near Algiers became a center of pilgrimage for North African Jews.

YITSHAQ BEN YA'AQOV OF CASTILE (13th cent.), Spanish kabbalist. Following in the footsteps of their father, Ya'aqov ha-Kohen, Yitshaq, together with his brother Ya'aqov, formed one of the most important schools of kabbalists in thirteenth-century Spain. His treatises influenced R. Mosheh de León, author of the Zohar, who derived from them some of the central ideas of the Zohar, especially concerning the nature of evil and the messianic redemption. Rabbi Yitshaq's most important work is the treatise Ma'amar 'al ha-'Atsilut ha-Sema'it, written about 1260, which is the earliest statement of a dualistic concept of the celestial realm in kabbalistic literature. According to the author, before the Creation there existed a Satanic realm that caused previous attempts by God to create the world to fail; in this world there is a constant struggle between the powers of goodness, which are on the right side, and the Satanic powers, led by Samael and Lilith, on the left side. The divine emanation on the right has a parallel in the evil system of spiritual powers on the left, which is responsible for all evil, including leprosy and other earthly maladies, and all demons are subservient to it. The concluding part of the treatise is dedicated to an apocalyptic description of the last battle between the powers of evil and the Messiah, presenting for the first time a kabbalistic concept of messianic redemption. Rabbi Yitshaq's work on this subject was followed by a treatise by his disciple R. Mosheh of Burgos, 'Amud ha-Sema'it, which presents a similar system of diabolic powers.

YITSHAQ BEN YOSEF OF CORBEIL (died 1280), rabbinic scholar, tosafist, and codifier; known as Semaq, the initials of his main work, Sefer Mitsvot Qatan. He was the son-in-law of R. Yehiel ben Yosef of Paris. His halakhic compendium, Sefer Mitsvot Qatan (Constantinople, 1510) achieved wide popularity and was praised by French and German scholars, such as R. Me'ir ben Barukh of Rothenburg. Sefer Mitsvot Qatan was based on R. *Mosheh ben Ya'aqov of Coucy's Sefer Mitsvot Gadol but was written in much briefer form. Rabbi Yitshaq divided his work into seven pillars, which corresponded to the seven days of the week, creating a format so that people could review it weekly. Sefer Mitsvot Qatan became an important source for subsequent decisors and was used heavily in Aharon ben Ya'aqov ha-Kohen of Lunel's Orehot Hayyim and the parallel Kol Bo. A number of glosses were added to Sefer Mitsvot Qatan, including those by R. Perets of Corbeil and R. Mosheh of Zurich, which contained selections from a number of French and German works. Rabbi Yitshaq was known for his great piety and is referred to in a number of texts as He-Ḥasid. Rabbi Yitshaq also authored a series of legal decisions (pesaḳim), some of which are still in manuscript.

YITSHAQ NAPPAHA' (c.250–300), Palestinian amora', possibly a grandson of the tanna' of the same name (c.140–180). He was a member of R. Yoḥanan's academy and a colleague of R. Yoḥanan's great disciples R. Ammi and R. Assi. Probably toward the end of the third century, he went to Babylonia, where he is mentioned in the company of its leading authorities, such as R. Naḥman bar Ya'aqov. He was expert in both halakhah* (law) and aggadah* (homiletics) (B. Q. 50b), but felt that in his time, which was one of great hardship, poverty, and privation in Palestine, people had more need of homiletic comfort than legalistic education (Soferim 16.4). One of his famous aphorisms is "If a person tells you: 'I have toiled in search and have not found,' believe him not; 'I have not toiled in search and have found,' believe him" (Meg. 6b). He expressed himself strongly against asceticism, saying, "Is not that which the Torah has forbidden sufficient, yet you wish to forbid yet more upon yourself" (Y., Ned. 9.1).

YITSHAQ SAGGI NAHOR (c.1160–1235), kabbalist, known as "the Pious" (he-Ḥasid); son of R. *Avraham ben David of Posquières. Many sayings by him or attributed to him are found in early kabbalistic works in Provence and especially in the writings of the kabbalists of Gerona. According to traditions preserved by the kabbalists, he was born blind (the term saggi nahor [much light] is a euphemism for blind), yet his writings include intense color symbolism. The one treatise of his to have survived, probably in the original form, is his commentary on the Sefer Yetsirah*, a detailed study of the process of creation, presented as the emanation of the sefirot* from their hidden source within the Godhead. The symbolism used by R. Yitshaq to describe the sefirot became the standard terminology of the Kabbalah for several centuries, and many of the central ideas that characterize the Kabbalah are first found in this treatise. Rabbi Yitshaq probably wrote at a later date than the composition of Sefer ha-Bahir*, the earliest kabbalistic work known, yet his symbolism is not dependent on that work. However, despite some similarities, it cannot be established that the terminology used by R. Yitshaq is based on the Sefer ha-Bahir. Rabbi Yitshaq insisted that the Kabbalah be taught in secret and that books of kabbalistic speculation should not be committed to writing. When he heard that scholars in Gerona (probably R. Ezra and R. 'Azri'el) were writing books of Kabbalah, he sent an angry letter to the scholars of Gerona, addressed to R. Yonah ben Avraham Gerondi and R. Moses Nahmanides, demanding that such activity be discontinued. He sent his nephew, R. Asher ben David, to Gerona as his personal emissary to teach and direct the activities of the kabbalists in that city.

YIZKOR (יִזְכֹּר; May [God] Remember), synagogue service in which prayers are offered in memory of the dead and for their repose. It is customarily conducted in the Ashkenazi rite on the last days of the *Shalosh Regalim and *Yom Kippur. The traditional service consists of brief prayers in which the names of the deceased are mentioned, martyrs are remembered, and *El Male' Raḥamim, a supplication on behalf of the departed, is solemnly chanted. It is now usual to recall Holocaust victims and deceased members of the congregation. In Israel, mention is made of fallen soldiers. Traditionally,

Yizkor follows the reading of the Torah, before the scrolls are returned to the ark. In some synagogues, the Yom Kippur memorial service may be held in the afternoon, and it may be augmented by meditations, appropriate prayers, and a sermon. A formal memorial service is seldom conducted in Sephardi communities, although Congregation Shearith Israel of New York holds one after Kol Nidrei on the eve of Yom Kippur. It has become a custom, probably of superstitious origin, for those who have not lost a close relative to leave the synagogue during the recitation of Yizkor. This, however, is now discouraged by many rabbis.

YOHANAN BAR NAPPAḤA' (fl. c.240–279), generally known just as R. Yoḥanan; the most outstanding of the Palestinian amora'im. His life was fraught with hardships. Born into a well-to-do family, he had to sell his various estates to support himself so that he could study the Torah. Legend has it that he had ten sons, all of whom died in tragic circumstances during his lifetime. Nonetheless, his courage and persistence enabled him to become a brilliant halakhist and aggadist, who taught in his native Sepphoris and later in Tiberias, where his pupils included distinguished rabbis who laid the foundation for the Talmud Yerushalmi. Yoḥanan was involved in many halakhic discussions with his brother-in-law *Shim'on ben Laqish, and the two profoundly analyzed the Mishnah. After the death of *Rav and *Shemu'el, Yoḥanan was regarded as the outstanding rabbinical authority; his decisions and views were respected in Babylonia, and he was frequently quoted in the Talmud Bavli. He placed personal integrity above brilliance and knowledge and ruled that one may not study under a great scholar who was morally flawed (Hag. 15b). He believed that true understanding of the Torah was to be found among the humble and righteous (Sot. 21b; Shab. 114a), and in opposition to some of his scholarly colleagues, he held prayer to be of equal importance with Torah studies (Ber. 21a).

YOHANAN BEN ZAKK'AI (1st cent.), tanna' from Erets Yisra'el, responsible for reconstituting Jewish religious authority after the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE, and first of the Mishnaic scholars following the period of the pairs (zugot*), named in Avot 1. He is described in Avot 2.8 as a student of both Hillel and Shamm'ai; other sources relate that "Hillel had eighty pairs of disciples . . . the youngest (or least) among them was Yoḥanan ben Zakk'ai" (Suk. 28a). Some sources imply that he was a kohen, though, unlike most of the priestly class, he was not a supporter of zealotry. He was both a teacher (Avot 2.8 mentions five outstanding disciples whom he taught) and a leader of the Pharisaic party, representing the Pharisees in various debates with the Sadducees over the authority of the oral law and particulars of halakhah.

The most famous stories about Yoĥanan relate how he managed to escape from Jerusalem during the Roman siege (68–70) in a coffin carried by his disciples (according to the best-known version in Git. 56ab) in order to meet with Vespasian, the Roman commander. He is said to have foretold to Vespasian that he would become emperor; when this indeed happened, Vespasian offered to grant him a request, and Yoĥanan asked that Vespasian spare *Yavneh and its scholars. This request was granted, enabling him after the destruction of the Temple to establish a center of learning and spiritual leadership in Yavneh (near present-day Ashdod), which passed regulations (taqqanot) and helped define Judaism apart from a Temple. Under Yoĥanan's leadership, key decisions were made regarding the adaptation of the synagogue and its liturgy to incorporate elements of the cult previously confined to Jerusalem; the hegemony of the rabbis—heirs, as it were, to the Pharisees—was greatly strengthened. After R. Gamli'el was appointed nasi' at Yavneh, Yoĥanan moved to Beror Ĥayil in southern Israel, where he remained until his death.

YOĤANAN HA-SANDELAR (2d cent.), Palestinian tanna'. Along with R. *El'azar ben Shammu'a, he was among the last five disciples of R. 'Aqiva' (Yev., 62b; Gn. Rab. 61.3). When R. 'Aqiva' was imprisoned by the Romans, R. Yoĥanan was sent by the sages to consult with him on a halakhic question, which he did under the guise of a peddler, subtly posing his question, to which R. 'Aqiva' responded as Yoĥanan stood outside the prison (Yev. 104b; Y., Yev. 12.5, 12d). The epithet ha-Sandelar refers either to his profession (cobbler, although according to others he was a stonemason, from sandalkhōn [gems]) or to his Alexandrian origins. He is listed among the sages who gathered in Beit Rimmon after the Hadrianic persecutions subsided (Y., Ĥag. 3.1, 78d) and is mentioned in halakhic discussions in the Mishnah and baraitot. His adage on the permanence of only those assemblies that are for the sake of heaven is found in Avot 4.11. He also said that "dwelling in Erets Yisra'el is equivalent to keeping all the commandments of the Torah" (Sifrei on Dt. 80).

YOLEDET (יולדת; woman who has given birth). The Bible specifies that a yoledet is treated as a niddah (see MENSTRUATION), but the period of impurity varies in accordance with the sex of her offspring (Lv. 12.1–8). It lasts for seven days after the birth of a boy but fourteen days after the birth of a girl. Under biblical law, a further period of "pure blood" of thirty-three days applies in the case of a male child and sixty-six in that of a female. During this period, a woman is permitted to her husband but may not enter the Temple. In the geonic period, it became the custom for all women after childbirth to treat any discharge during the period of "pure blood" as regular menstrual blood and to fulfill all the requirements of the laws of niddah prior to engaging in sexual relations with their husbands (Maimonides, Laws of Forbidden Relations 11.6–7). A more stringent custom is found in the Baraiyta' de-Niddah, a work attributed to the tannaitic period but probably of a much later date and of a distinctly ascetic and, in some instances, almost heretical character. According to this work, a woman is to be treated as a niddah for forty days after the birth of a boy and eighty days after that of a girl. Maimonides is highly critical of this custom and regards it as the "way of heretics" (Laws of Forbidden Relations 11.15). It is to be found in Karaite works ('Anan, Sefer ha-Mitsvot, no. 19). Maimonides' criticism was echoed in the eighteenth century by R. Yehezqel Landau, who felt that its observance could lead to the commission of serious halakhic offenses as a result of the overlong period of abstinence involved (Resp. Noda' bi-Yehudah, Yoreh De'ah, no. 54). The commentators on the Shulĥan 'Arukh, however, maintain that a person who wishes to follow this custom may do so provided that no claim is made that it has any basis in halakhah (Turei Zahav, Yoreh De'ah 194.3; Sifte Kohen, Yoreh De'ah 194.1). It is customary for a woman after childbirth to say the *Birkat ha-Gomel blessing in the presence of a minyan. The focus of classical Jewish *abortion law is the woman in labor whose life is threatened by complications in the birth process (Ohal. 7.6).

YOMA' (Aram.; יוֹמָא'; The Day [of Atonement]), tractate in Mishnah order Mo'ed, originally known as Kippurim, with related material in Tosefta' and in both Talmuds. Seven of its eight chapters deal with laws concerning Yom Kippur, focusing primarily on elaborating the sacrificial service for the day outlined in Leviticus 16. The entire service on this day was performed by the high priest, who was sequestered in a special chamber within the Temple for seven days preceding Yom Kippur, in order to prepare himself for the solemn and uplifting responsibility that awaited him. The service itself centered on the high priest's entry into the Holy of Holies, forbidden every other day of the year, with the blood of two sin offerings, one that purified the Temple of the sins of the high priest and his family, and one that purified the Temple of the sins of the people. The entry into the Holy of Holies required an incense offering, occasioning a dispute between the Pharisees and the Sadducees about whether the incense needed to be placed on the fire before entering or after.

Another unique feature of the Yom Kippur service was the scapegoat, which was sent to the wilderness, where it was pushed off a cliff to atone for the sins of Israel. The eighth chapter of Yoma' discusses the laws of fasting and repentance connected with Yom Kippur. Despite the solemn character of most of the laws associated with the holiday, it was regarded as a festive day (Ta'an. 4.8) due to the joy resulting from the forgiveness of sins. The pericope that concludes the description of the sacrificial service (Yoma' 7.4) describes the celebration that the high priest made for his friends when he emerged safely from the Holy of Holies. In the concluding pericope of the tractate, R. 'Aqiva' exults: "Happy are you, Israel. Before whom are you purified and who purifies you? Your Father in Heaven!"

The Babylonian tractate was translated into English by Isidore Epstein in the Soncino Talmud (London, 1938).

YOM HA-'ATSMA'UT (יום העצמאות); [Israel] Independence Day), the anniversary of the proclamation of Israel's independence on 5 Iyyar 5708 (1948). It was declared a religious holiday by the chief rabbinate, which formulated a special order of prayer for the evening and morning services, now incorporated in many Israeli and Diaspora prayer books. Separate Yom ha-'Atsma'ut prayer books have also been produced, similar to those in use for the biblical festivals. The Yom ha-'Atsma'ut service includes *Hallel and a special haftarah (Is. 10.32–11.12) but deliberately excludes the accompanying benedictions and the She-Heḥeyanu blessing, which would have elevated Independence Day to the status of the post-Pentateuchal festivals of Hanukkah and Purim. The chief rabbinate suspended such post-Talmudic customs as the mourning restrictions of the *'Omer period, as well as the Monday and Thursday fasts (see SHENI VE-ḤAMISHI) following Pesah, if one of them falls on that day. The halakhic reasoning was that while there was no doubt as to the religious obligation to celebrate the occasion, the recital of Talmudically ordained benedictions would constitute "an innovation after a lapse of two thousand years requiring an Orthodox rabbinic consensus," which was not forthcoming. However, the religious kibbutz movement and individual rabbis who share the Religious Zionist theology of R. Avraham Yitzhaq Kook (see KOOK FAMILY), more intensely advocated on the emergence of the State of Israel by his son R. Tsevi Yehudah Kook, demonstratively recite these benedictions. Ḥaredim, represented in Israel by *Agudat Israel, regard Yom ha-'Atsma'ut as a purely secular holiday, raising the flag of the state of Israel on their public institutions as prescribed by law, but carefully refraining from giving it any religious expression. The *Neturei Qarta', for whom the establishment of a "heretical" Jewish state represented a blasphemous anticipation of the divinely operated messianic redemption, proclaim Yom ha-'Atsma'ut a day of mourning and lamentation and display black flags outside their homes. By Knesset statute, if the holiday falls on Friday or Saturday, the celebration is moved to the preceding Thursday to avoid desecration of the Sabbath. The day before Yom ha-'Atsma'ut is Yom ha-Zikkaron (Memorial Day), which is marked by prayers for those who died defending Israel, and services are held at military cemeteries.

YOM HA-DIN (יום הדין), day on which mankind will be judged by God (or one of his appointed) at the end of days (aharit ha-yamim). The biblical idea of *reward and punishment in this world was paralleled by the concept of the *Day of the Lord, the day upon which Israel would be exalted and her foes delivered up to divine justice. This predominantly nationalistic idea was transformed by the prophets (particularly *Amos), who proclaimed that on Yom ha-Din all evildoers would be judged, including those among the people of Israel, whose punishment would be exile. Once the nation was purged of its sinful dross, the *remnant of Israel, the upright and righteous, would return to the land (ingathering of the *exiles) and enjoy a long and prosperous life. These hopes of return are emphatically expressed by the post-exilic prophets, particularly Haggai and Zechariah, who believed that the reestablishment of the Jewish community in Jerusalem and the rebuilding of the Temple heralded the dawn of the messianic era. When this hope was not fulfilled, the notion of the final Yom ha-Din was transformed—it had not yet occurred but would happen only at the end of days.

Yom ha-Din became a major feature of apocalyptic literature. Not only would it witness the judgment of Israel, but the judgment of mankind and the cosmos as a whole; even the wicked angels would be called to account. Later apocalyptic literature assumed that the *resurrection of the dead would occur before Yom ha-Din, so that the dead might also be judged. There is a wide divergence of views regarding Yom ha-Din in pseudepigraphous and tannaitic literature. On that great and terrible day, either God himself or his anointed *Messiah will judge the entire world and declare its fate. In earlier apocalyptic literature, the eschatological Yom ha-Din was identified with "messianic woes," the period of trial and tribulation preceding the advent of the Messiah. In later apocalyptic works (Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch, the Fourth Book of Esdras), the view is expressed that the messianic age is merely a transitional period between this world and a new era, described as the "world to come" (see 'OLAM HA-ZEH AND 'OLAM HA-BA'). The distinction between the messianic age and the world to come is also made in tannaitic and later rabbinic literature (see ESCHATOLOGY).

Yom ha-Din is also a name for *Ro'sh ha-Shanah, the day on which, according to tradition (R. ha-Sh. 1.2; T., R. ha-Sh. 1.13), all humankind is judged by God. The decisions about each person's fate are sealed on Yom Kippur.

YOM KIPPUR (יִום כִּפּוּר; Day of Atonement), the most solemn occasion of the Jewish calendar, falling on 10 Tishrei; the only fast day never postponed, even if it falls on a Sabbath. Although strictly observed from sunset as a twenty-five-hour fast (see FASTS) in accordance with the biblical injunction "and you shall afflict yourselves," it formally belongs to the category of festivals (see HAGGIM). The biblical commandment regulating its observance (Lv. 23.26–32) indicates no link with the holiday observed a few days earlier on 1 Tishrei (*Ro'sh ha-Shanah), but at an early period the two were linked in the framework of the *Aseret Yemei Teshuvah. The concept was that on Ro'sh ha-Shanah the fate of every individual for the coming year is decreed, and on Yom Kippur it is sealed. An unfavorable decree can be averted by repentance, prayer, and charity. The rabbis insist that a worshiper's contrite behavior on Yom Kippur itself will not effect forgiveness unless it is accompanied by sincere *repentance (Yoma 8.8–9; tractate Yoma* is entirely devoted to Yom Kippur). During Temple times, Yom Kippur was the occasion for an elaborate sacrificial ceremony based on Leviticus 16. This consisted of two parts. The first was the sacrificial service in the Temple, at which the *high priest pronounced the threefold confession of sins on behalf of himself, the priests, and all Israel. The climax came when, clothed in white linen, he entered the Holy of Holies (the one occasion during the year when this was permitted) to sprinkle the blood of the sacrifice there and to offer incense. The second part of the ceremony consisted of hurling the scapegoat that "shall bear upon him all their iniquities"—that is, to which the sins of the community had been symbolically transferred—to its death in the wilderness (see AZAZEL). There is no historical source material concerning the observance of Yom Kippur in First Temple times, but there is much material depicting celebration of the day during the Second Temple period (e.g., Ben Sira 50, which describes the celebration during the high priesthood of Shim'on, son of Onias, c.200 BCE; and the Mishnah tractate Yoma). A Mishnaic statement that Yom Kippur was one of the happiest days in Israel, when maidens danced in the vineyards, has been found puzzling in view of the solemn nature of the day; one suggestion is that the celebration of the young people was connected with the feast that the high priest made for his friends when he emerged safely from the Holy of Holies (Yoma 7.4). Today the ancient sacrifice is commemorated by the Avodah service, an elaborate poetical description of the Temple ceremony included in the Musaf service. Kaparat was once widespread and is still practiced in certain communities. At one time, in some communities, male congregants would submit to a whipping in the synagogue as a symbolic punishment for their sins. The rabbis insist that while one's proper observance of Yom Kippur can serve to atone for transgressions against God, sins committed against others require their forgiveness prior to the day. The *festival prayer is divided into five services, the first of which is the evening service (Ma'ariv), preceded in most rites by the recitation of *Kol Nidrei; hence, Yom Kippur eve has come to be known as Kol Nidrei. The services on the day itself include the morning (Shaḥarit), the additional (Musaf), the afternoon (Minḥah), and the concluding service (*Ne'ilah). Five mortifications are prescribed for the day: abstention from food, drink, marital intercourse, anointing with oil, and wearing leather shoes. All Sabbath work prohibitions are in effect on Yom Kippur. The prayers of the day stress confession of sins and supplications for forgiveness. Like all congregational prayers, they are couched in the plural, confession and forgiveness being sought on behalf of "the whole congregation of Israel" (Nm. 25.26). The formulas of confession include one that is composed of alphabetically arranged synonyms for transgression (*Ashamnu) and a longer alphabetical list enumerating a comprehensive catalog of sins (*Al Hē't). With one possible exception, all of the sins listed appertain to the moral and ethical aspects of Judaism and not to Jewish observance.

Many worshipers remain in the synagogue for the entire day (some Orthodox Jews for the entire twenty-five hours), and the four services, with their many additional hymns, litanies, and confessions, are designed so that prayer should continue throughout the day. The morning Torah reading relates to the sacrificial rituals of Yom Kippur in the ancient Temple (Lv. 16; Nm. 29.7–11), while the haftarah (Is. 57.14–58.14) emphasizes the spirit of devotion and penitence without which the ritual is worthless. The Torah is read again at the afternoon service (Lv. 18, devoted to forbidden marriages), followed by the recitation of the Book of Jonah, with its message of divine forgiveness for genuine repentance. Some Reform congregations have chosen alternative readings for Yom Kippur. The dominating theme of the Ne'ilah service is that the Day of Judgment is coming to an end and the divine verdict is about to be sealed. Ne'ilah concludes with the declaration of God's unity, the sounding of the *shofar, and the prayer La-Shanah ha-Ba'ah bi-Yerushalayim (in Israel, Jerusalem Rebuilt). The tallit is worn during all five services. In many Ashkenazi congregations it was customary for a man to wear a kitel* during services; this custom is no longer extensively practiced, although white is the predominant color in the synagogue. The traditional greeting on Yom Kippur is gemar ḥatimah tovaḥ, "A propitious final sealing [of the divine judgment]."

YOM KIPPUR QATAN (יִום כִּפּוּר קָטָן; Minor Day of Atonement), observance of the day preceding the new moon as a period of atonement and fasting. Tikkun Yom Kippur Qatan, a special order of service (including selihot and Psalms), was drawn up to be recited at midnight and at the afternoon service (first printed in Natan Nata' Hannover's Sha'arei Tsiyyon [1662]). The custom, which originated with the sixteenth-century kabbalists in Safed (which they related to the aggadah that Israel had to make atonement to God for making the moon smaller [Hul. 60b]), is now not widely observed.

In addition to his rabbinic expertise, he studied philosophy and logic. He is best known for Hiddushei ha-Ritba', novellae on most Talmudic tractates; commentaries on the Haggadah of Pesah and the halakhic compendium of Yitshaq Alfasi; and a philosophic treatise, Sefer ha-Zikkaron, in which he attacked Nahmanides' strictures on Maimonides' theology.

YOM TOV LIPMANN. See MUELHAUSEN, YOM TOV LIPMANN.

YOM TOV SHENI SHE' GALUYTOT (י"ב חג), term used for the additional day of festivals celebrated outside Erets Yisra'el. The fixing of the *calendar originally depended on the verbal testimony of witnesses who came to the *Sanhedrin in Jerusalem to assert that they had seen the new moon. Messengers were then sent out to announce the fact, but as they could not reach the Diaspora communities speedily, these communities were in doubt as to which of two days was the first of the month, and consequently as to which day marked the actual beginning of the festival in question. As a precaution, two days were observed at the beginning and end of Pesah and Sukkot and on Shavu'ot. A second Seder was kept at the beginning of Pesah, while at the end of Sukkot the extra (ninth) day was also observed as Simhat Torah. Since Ro'sh ha-Shanah falls on the first day of the month, this information could not be passed on in time even in Erets Yisra'el, and this festival alone was, and still is, celebrated for two days there also. Strictly speaking, Yom Kippur also should be observed for two days, but this custom was dispensed with; nevertheless, some pietists in the Middle Ages observed a two-day fast, despite rabbinical disapproval of the custom as being injurious to health. Doubt regarding the second day was ignored with respect to the counting of the 'Omer. By the fourth century the question was raised as to why the observance of a second day of festivals should be continued since the calendar had already been fixed by astronomical calculation; the answer was that established custom and tradition should not be lightly discarded (Beits. 4b), and this ruling was sent to Babylonia by the authorities of Erets Yisra'el. Reform Judaism has abolished second day observances in the Diaspora, but some Reform congregations maintain two-day celebrations nevertheless. The Conservative movement has left the decision to each individual congregation.

YOM YERUSHALAYIM (יום ירושלים; Jerusalem Day), the anniversary of the Israeli capture of the Old City of Jerusalem in the 1967 Six-Day War, which falls on 28 Iyyar. Officially recognized as an optional public holiday (yom behirah), the Israeli chief rabbinate ruled that, unlike on *Yom ha-'Atsma'ut, the whole Hallel be recited with the accompanying benediction to mark the regaining of access to Israel's holiest shrine, the *Western Wall. The central event is a mass thanksgiving assembly at the Western Wall, which resumed its status as the major pilgrimage site for Jews, including many *Haredim.

YONAH (4th cent.), Palestinian amora'. His name is intimately associated with that of his colleague R. Yosei, his business associate in the production of wine and close friend, with whom he visited the sick and attended weddings and funerals. After R. 'Ammi moved his academy to Caesarea (c.350), the two became co-leaders of the Tiberias academy and "Sanhedrin" (R. Yonah was succeeded by his son Mani II). Their halakhic discussions are found in every tractate of the Talmud Yerushalmi, while the Talmud Bavli singles out R. Yonah as a praiseworthy and saintly Palestinian sage (Ta'an. 23b; for the most famous example of his charity, see Y., Pe'ah 8.9, 21b). Rabbi Yonah studied with R. Yirmiyahu, R. Ze'ira', and R. Il'ai and was responsible for the development and fixing of basic principles of Talmudic interpretation (cf., Y., Pe'ah 1.1, 15a). In contrast to R. Yosei, R. Yonah's treatment of tannaitic sources often preferred the text of the Tosefta' to that of the Mishnah.

YONAH BEN AVRAHAM GERONDI (c.1200–1263) Spanish halakhist and ethicist; also known as Yonah the Pious. A relative of Nahmanides, Yonah remained in close contact with Nahmanides all of his life. He studied in France, where he became a zealous partisan in the campaign against the works of Maimonides. However, he later repented and, according to a popular but unlikely tradition, planned a pilgrimage to Maimonides' tomb. Yonah returned to Gerona and lived there and in Barcelona. He then set out for Erets Yisra'el but on passing through Toledo acceded to the request of the community to remain there and establish a rabbinic academy, which he headed until his death. He was noted for his ascetic and moralistic tracts with their stress on social ethics, and he condemned the widespread custom of concubinage. Many of his works display his halakhic skills. These include Bible, Mishnah, and Talmud commentaries and a commentary on Yitshaq Alfasi's digest of tractate Berakhot.

YONATAN BEN 'UZZI'EL (1st cent.), tanna' known as the most outstanding of *Hillel's eighty pupils. Although no halakhot have been preserved in his name, many of his opinions probably formed the basis for the rulings of Beit Hillel (see BEIT HILLEL AND BEIT SHAMM'AI). The Talmud attributes to him a targum* of the Prophets, but the one commonly known by his name dates in its present form from much later (4th–5th cent. Babylonia). A targum on the Pentateuch (named by scholars Targum *Pseudo-Jonathan) has also been attributed to Yonatan, but it dates from the third or fourth century, and the ascription appears erroneous. YORTSAYT (Yi; יוֹרְטַיִת; anniversary), the anniversary (based on the Hebrew calendar) of the death of a relative for whom *mourning is enjoined. During the Talmudic period, this anniversary was commemorated by a voluntary fast (Ned. 12a). In addition it was customary to visit the grave on that day (Rashi on Yev. 122a). In the course of time, and especially during the late Middle Ages, customs appertaining to the yortsayt were regulated. Fasting on the yortsayt has fallen largely into abeyance. The mourner observes the day by lighting a candle to burn for the full twenty-four hours (adduced from the verse "the soul of man is the lamp of the Lord"; Prov. 20:27) and by reciting *Qaddish at the daily services. Hasidim regard the yortsayt of their great rabbis not as an occasion for sorrow but as an occasion for celebration, since it marks the anniversary of the translation of the soul to higher spheres to receive its reward; it is celebrated by the omission of supplicatory prayers, as on all semifestivals, and even by dancing. This custom is frowned upon by the Mitnaggedim. However the traditional anniversary of the death of R. *Shim'on bar Yoh'ai on *Lag ba-'Omer has been celebrated since the sixteenth century as a popular festival, particularly at his tomb in Meron. It is also customary to permit a person observing yortsayt to lead the congregational prayer and to be called to the reading of the Torah. Sephardim in particular attach great value to reading the haftarah* on the Sabbath preceding the yortsayt for one's parents. The term yortsayt was first used by the fifteenth century rabbi Moshe *Mintz. Among Sephardim the yortsayt is called nahalah, meldado, or annos.

YOSEF BEN HYYA' (died 333), Babylonian amora'. He was given the title of "Sinai" (Hor. 13b) because of his encyclopedic knowledge of traditional law. He headed the Pumbedita academy after the death of his colleague Rabbah, with whom he frequently engaged in halakhic debates, recorded hundreds of times in the Talmuds; in Sanhedrin 17b the two are called "the amora'im of Pumbedita." He was known for both his aggadic and halakhic acumen, and specialized in biblical interpretation and translation; the *Targum to Chronicles, called the Targum of Rabbi Yosef, is traditionally attributed to him. Known for his great humility (Ber. 64a; Pes. 113b) and careful piety (Pes. 107a), the Talmud recounts that he became blind and forgot all his Torah learning, both, apparently, due to a severe illness, but Abbaye and Rava', his principal students, retaught him (Eruv. 10a; Men. 99b). It is said that when he died, so many mourners came to attend his funeral that the bridge over the Euphrates cracked (Mo'ed Q. 25b). He taught that he who scorned the sages was a heretic (San. 99b) and that it was of greater merit to engage in Torah study than to perform mitsvot (Sot. 21a). He played a role in the development of Merkavah mysticism (Hag. 13a). For some of his proverbial sayings, see Ketubbot 104a and Gittin 45a.

YOSEF BEN YITSHAQ BEKHOR SHOR (12th cent.), biblical commentator whose name, Bekhor Shor (Firstborn Bull) is derived from the description of the biblical Joseph in Deuteronomy 33:17. The author of liturgical poems (piyyutim) and of legal questions addressed to *Ya'aqov ben Me'ir Tam, Bekhor Shor is best known for his commentaries on the Torah and on Psalms. His commentaries on other biblical books seem to have been lost. Following in the footsteps of R. Shemu'el ben Me'ir (Rashbam), Bekhor Shor endeavored to delineate large literary units within the scriptures, to explain the contextual meaning of many legal texts not in accordance with their treatment in rabbinical literature, and to show that the primary meaning of various biblical verses undermines the Christological interpretations imposed upon them by Christian theologians. The implication is that the scientific study of Hebrew scriptures proves that the natural and logical continuation of them is Judaism and not Christianity. Other characteristic features of Bekhor Shor's exegesis are his examination of the motives of characters in biblical narrative, his attempt to provide a rational basis for the divine commandments, his attack upon the allegorization of the commandments, and his extensive discussion of the legal implications of various biblical laws.

YOSEF HAYYIM BEN ELIYYAHU AL-HAKHAM (1833–1909), rabbinical authority in Baghdad. He was a popular and influential preacher at a time when the Baghdad community was reattaining a position of influence, which had lapsed in the geonic period. His comprehensive literary output consisted of seventy books ranging from the five-volume Ben Yehoiada (1898–1904) on Talmudic aggadah to Huggei Nashim on Jewish law concerning women, and he was the first Jewish religious leader to assert that a girl should celebrate a bat mitsvah*. His responsa, Rav Pe'alim (1901–1912), reflected the struggle within the Baghdad community between the sages and the wealthy leadership. His volume of homilies, Ben Ish Hai (1898; Jerusalem, 1957), is still studied, and some of the two hundred piyyutim that he composed entered the Baghdad liturgy.

YOSEI BEN HALAFTA' (2d cent.), called Rabbi Yosei in the Mishnah and baraitot; Palestinian tanna; one of the five famous pupils of R. *Aqiva' ben Yosef. He was forced to flee during the Hadrianic persecutions but eventually settled at Sepphoris in Lower Galilee, where he headed the academy. His halakhic preeminence and the respect in which he was held by R. *Yehudah ha-Nasi' and R. *Shim'on ben Gamli'el led to his views being accepted in legal disputations (Eruv. 46b), and, indeed, he is mentioned more than three hundred times in the Mishnah and Tosefta*'. He is the first scholar of whom it is said that he was privileged to have *Elijah the Prophet reveal himself to him (San. 113a). He frequently engaged in polemics on matters of belief with non-Jews. His original philosophical beliefs included his view that God bears no relationship to space or time: "God is the place of the world and the world is not his place" (Gn. Rab. 68.9). He opposed the view that men were judged on *Ro'sh ha-Shanah, stating that men are judged daily (T., R. ha-Sh. 1.13). He further thought that the shekhinah*, the divine countenance, thrice daily mourns the destruction of the Temple but takes comfort in the prayers and praises of the synagogue (Ber. 3a).

YOSEI BEN YO'EZER (2d cent. BCE), scholar from Zeredah in southern Samaria; president of the Sanhedrin; disciple of Antigonus of Sokho. Together with Yosei ben Yohanan, he constituted the first of the five "pairs" (zugot). He was a kohen (priest), belonged to the party of the *Hasideans, and strongly opposed the Hellenists. Rabbinic tradition has it that in his time the first ha-lakhic controversy arose, as to whether or not one places one's hands on an animal sacrificed during a festival, a controversy that continued for many generations. Regarding the laws of purity and *impurity, Yosei ben Yo'ezer tended to be lenient. According to legend, his nephew was the Hellenized high priest Alcimus, who persecuted the Hasideans and executed Yosei ben Yo'ezer in a cruel manner.

YOSEI BEN YOSEI (4th or 5th cent.), the first well-known liturgical poet (payyetan) of Erets Yisra'el. Nothing is known of his life. Some of his piyyutim (see PIYYUT) have been incorporated into the Sephardi liturgy for Yom Kippur (e.g., Azkir Gevurot—a picturesque portrayal of the Temple ritual of that day) and Ro'sh ha-Shanah (Ahalelah Elohai Ashirah 'Uzzo—about the majesty of the Creator). His compositions are alphabetic, with rhythmic pattern and occasional alliteration, but lack rhyme or meter.

YOTSER (יֹצֵר), the first of the two *benedictions preceding the *Shema' in the morning service, so called because it opens with the words "Blessed . . . who forms [yotser] light and creates darkness. . . ." Its theme is praise to God for creation and for renewing it and restoring light to the earth every morning. The quotation from Isaiah 45.7, with its mention of creation and also of God's power to bring darkness, was meant as a polemical rejection of dualistic beliefs in two separate deities of light and darkness (Ber. 11b). In its present form, Yotser contains the alphabetic hymn probably originating in early mystic circles, El Barukh, a poetic description of the angelic praise of God, "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord . . ." (see QEDUSHAH). Brief piyyutim are inserted into Yotser, especially on the Sabbath (e.g., El Adon) and festivals; these are generally known as yotserot. Before the conclusion of the blessing, some rites (but not the Sephardi) insert a messianic petition: "Cause a new light to shine upon Zion"; however, some authorities in geonic times opposed this on the grounds that the subject of the benediction is the physical light of creation and not the spiritual light of redemption. The term yotser is loosely applied to all the extra hymns that were introduced into the morning service (the general tendency in recent times is to omit these accretions).

YOVEL (יובל; jubilee), the year of release that occurs at the end of the cycle of seven sabbatical years (see SHEMITAH) once every fifty years. The laws concerning cultivation of the land and produce during the sabbatical year apply to the jubilee as well, but the main function of the jubilee is to complement the laws of redemption, which stipulate that Israelites who have been reduced to servitude must be permitted to buy back their freedom and that those who have been forced to sell their property must be given ample opportunity to regain possession of it; further, that one whose kinsman has been forced into such straits must assist him to extricate himself. The jubilee provides the ultimate remedy: every fifty years all land that has not yet been redeemed reverts to its original owners, and any slaves who have not yet earned their freedom become free. The jubilee and all of the provisions pertaining to it are found in Leviticus 25. The jubilee began on Ro'sh ha-Shanah and its arrival was proclaimed by the sounding of horns on Yom Kippur. The English word jubilee is derived from the Hebrew word yovel, which may mean ram (R. ha-Sh. 26a). The land release preserves the ancient, tribal division of the land of Canaan among the Israelites. The aim seems to have been to prevent a few individuals, families, or tribes from accumulating large portions of land, thereby depriving many of an independent means of livelihood. The Bible provides a theological rationale: Erets Yisra'el is God's possession; the Israelites are merely his tenants and cannot conduct permanent real estate transactions on his property (Lv. 25.23). The release of Israelite slaves is similarly explained: "For it is to me that the Israelites are slaves; they are my servants, whom I freed from the land of Egypt" (Lv. 25.55); thus they cannot become permanent slaves of each other. The practical implications are spelled out clearly. The price paid, either for a piece of land or an Israelite slave, was to be calculated in accord with the number of years remaining until the next jubilee.

According to the law in Leviticus 25.8–10, the jubilee is the fiftieth year, which means it follows the seventh sabbatical year rather than coinciding with it; rabbinic opinion, however, was divided on this question (Ned. 61a). It is not known whether the jubilee was ever observed in actual practice, although some similar institutions did exist in the ancient Near East. In particular, the biblical injunction "you shall proclaim freedom [de-ror] throughout the land" (Lv. 25.10) recalls the release of slaves in Mesopotamia, called anduraru. There is no mention of the jubilee in biblical history during First Temple times, and according to the rabbis it was not observed in the Second Temple period at all ('Arakh. 32b). There are, however, indications that a fifty-year cycle was employed in the calendar in ancient times; traditions of calculating the jubilees survived beyond the biblical period.

YUDGHAN. See MESSIAH.

YUHASIN (יִחוּסִין; pedigrees), the legal consequence of a person's lineage relating, in particular, to marital status. The child of a regular married couple is permitted to marry any Jew (Qid. 69a). In such cases, status is determined by paternity; thus, the son of a priest and an Israelite will be a priest, and one born to a priest's daughter and an Israelite will be an Israelite (Nm. 1.2, 18; Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 8.1). In the case of a valid prohibited marriage, status is determined by the "tainted" parent. Hence, the child of a mamzer* and a regular Jew will be a mamzer (Qid. 66b) and the child of a priest and a divorcee will be a halal, that is, unfit to serve as a priest (Qid. 66b, 77a). A female halal is not permitted to be married to a priest (Qid. 77a). Children born out of wedlock suffer no legal impediments under Jewish law and the only legal issue of significance is the establishment of their paternity. Upon the establishment of paternity, the normal rules of yuhasin apply. Where only one parent is Jewish, the halakhah is that the child's status is determined in accordance with the matrilineal principle. Hence, the child of a Jewish mother and a non-Jewish father is a Jew with the sole proviso that a female may not marry a priest. The offspring of a Jewish father and a non-Jewish mother is non-Jewish and may only enter the community of Israel by means of conversion to Judaism. Reform Judaism in the United States, however, now accepts such a child as a Jew if raised as a Jew.

ZACUTO, MOSHEH (c.1610–1697), kabbalist and poet. He studied in his native Amsterdam and in Posen (Poland), and later he moved to Verona and Venice, where he edited kabbalistic books, including Zohar Hadash (1658). In 1666 he supported the messianic claims of *Shabbetai Tsevi. While he favored the Shabbatean emphasis on repentance, he strongly opposed the liturgical reforms practiced by the Shabbateans. Although some of his favorite disciples, such as Benyamin ha-Kohen and Avraham Rovigo, remained loyal Shabbatean believers, Zacuto turned his back on Shabbateanism after Shabbetai Tsevi's apostasy. In 1673 he became rabbi in Mantua; he never realized his desire to settle in the Holy Land. Besides his literary activities as a poet and a kabbalist, his main contribution was the introduction of Lurianic liturgical practices into Italian synagogues. He wrote the first biblical drama in Hebrew literature, Yesod 'Olam (1874).

ZADDIK, YOSEF BEN YA'AQOV IBN (c.1070–1149), Spanish poet, philosopher, and Talmudist. In 1138 he was appointed dayyan of Cordova, along with Maimon ben Yosef. He composed several liturgical poems and a work on ethics. He is best known for his introduction to philosophy, Sefer ha-'Olam ha-Qatan (edited by A. Jellinek, 1854; edited by S. Horowitz, 1903). Written in Arabic in answer to a student's questions concerning the meaning of certain philosophical terms, it was later translated into Hebrew, possibly by Nahum ha-Ma'arabi. His central thesis is that the human being is a "microcosm" ('olam qatan) of the universe—both physical and metaphysical—and the study of human beings will yield the truths of cosmology and theology. Zaddik's approach is Neoplatonic, with some Mu'tazili (see KALAM) and Aristotelian elements. The work is composed of four parts. The first is a presentation of Aristotelian physics and deals with definitions. The second is a study of human beings, based on the concept of the microcosm. The third examines theology, notably God's unity and his attributes, in the manner of the Kalam Bab al-Tawhid. The fourth division is a vindication of God's justice in the manner of the Kalam Bab al-Adl.

ZADOK (Heb. Tsadoq), priest; descendant of Eleazar, son of Aaron (1 Chr. 5.30–34). He sided with David against Absalom (2 Sm. 19.12) and anointed Solomon as king against his rival Adonijah, who was banished

(1 Kgs. 1.32–40). The descendants of Zadok ruled as *high priests until the time of the Hasmoneans. The sons of Zadok are also mentioned in the Dead Sea Scrolls (Zadokite fragments), where the reference is to the ancient priestly family. It has been suggested that the name *Sadducees is derived from Zadok.

ZADOKITES, descendants of *Zadok, one of David's high priests in Jerusalem (2 Sm. 15.24–37), who remained the dominant priestly family in Jerusalem until the Babylonian exile (586 BCE). After the return from exile, the Zadokites regained control of the high priesthood and retained that office until the deposition and murder of Onias III in the early second century BCE (2 Mc. 4.33–34).

In Ezekiel's program for the restoration of the Temple, the Zadokites are considered the only legitimate priests (Ez. 44.15–31). In postexilic literature, the Zadokites appear most prominently in the sectarian texts of the Dead Sea Scrolls. For example, in the Rule of the Community, authority in the community is given to "the priests, the sons of Zadok" (5.2b–3a). This emphasis on priestly authority and particularly the importance of the Zadokite priests indicates a possible area of dissension between the Qumran group and the Temple authorities, led by the non-Zadokite Hasmoneans.

ZAQEN MAMRE' (זקן ממרא, elder rebel), a member of the Sanhedrin who refused to concede the correctness of the majority opinion and continued to rule that his own approach—a minority opinion—was correct and should be followed. He was liable for the death penalty for that conduct. However, the elder rebel was not liable for the death penalty if he merely affirmed the correctness of his own opinion on an intellectual basis but declined to seek that it be considered normative and be practiced. There is a dispute as to whether such conduct is completely permissible or merely not liable to the death penalty.

ZAVIM (זבים; Persons with Impure Discharge), tractate in Mishnah order Tohorot, with related material in Tosefta'. There is no gemara' in either Talmud. Its five chapters deal with the laws concerning men and women who are rendered impure due to genital discharge (Lv. 15). Both normal, healthy discharges and abnormal, unhealthy discharges render one impure, but normal discharges, namely male seminal emissions and female menstruation, create less severe types of impurity than abnormal discharges. Zavim elaborates the differences among these forms of impurity and their ramifications. With the exception of a man with normal seminal emissions, furniture or implements designed for sitting on or reclining in become primary sources of impurity (i.e., possessing the power to defile others) when a zav has sat on or reclined in them. This law renders the issue of social intercourse and contact between a zav and an undefiled person highly problematic, a matter that is discussed quite extensively in Zavim. The tractate concludes with a presentation of the stages of transmission of various forms of defilement.

An English translation of the tractate is in Herbert Danby's The Mishnah (London, 1933).

ZAYIN BA'ADAR (7 Adar), the traditional date of *Moses' birth and death (Qid. 38a; Meg. 13b). In earlier generations 7 Adar was observed as a solemn day of fasting and prayer. The following day was a day of celebration, which, in medieval Egypt, even took on the character of a carnival day. A special tiqqun (anthology of readings) for the day was compiled in 1654 by R. Shemu'el Aboab of Venice, comprising selections from the Bible, Mishnah, Midrash, and Zohar.

In recent times the hevrah qaddisha*' (burial society) in each community observes the date by using the first part of the day as a time for fasting, reflection, and self-examination. Visits are made to cemeteries, where petitions are offered for forgiveness from the deceased in case proper respect was not shown at the time of their burial. In the evening there is a festive meal, with appropriate Torah lessons. The occasion is also used for admitting new members to the hevrah qaddisha'. The silver cups used by the burial societies for the 7 Adar banquet are often outstanding examples of ritual art.

In modern Israel, 7 Adar is designated as a memorial day for Israeli soldiers killed in war and whose last resting place is unknown.

ZEALOTS, a term applied to a sect that existed during the last decades of the Second Temple period, who rejected the Roman dominion without compromise. *Josephus, the main source for Jewish history of this period, states that a *census the Romans conducted in Judea in 6 CE generated strong opposition from some Jewish circles, led by Judah of Gamala and Zadok the Pharisee, who, partly for religious reasons (cf. 2 Sm. 24), objected to this attempt to count the Jewish population. Their opposition led to the creation of a "fourth philosophy" (in addition to the *Pharisees, *Sadducees, and *Essenes), whose followers are described by Josephus as similar in everything to the Pharisees, except for their invincible passion for liberty and their insistence that God alone was their leader and master. This movement, whose adherents combined a violent anti-Roman stance with strong messianic expectations, seems to have split into several subgroups, among which Josephus names the Zealots (the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew qanna'im, "the ones zealous [for God]") and the Sicarii (from sica, the Latin word for dagger, their favorite weapon). Their activities ranged from guerrilla warfare against Roman soldiers and officials to political assassinations of their Jewish opponents. The various groups of Zealots were deeply involved in the Great Revolt of 66–73 and perished, in Jerusalem and on Masada, when the messianic salvation they were hoping for failed to materialize.

The concept of zeal for the Torah was a rabbinical ideal exemplified by Phinehas (Nm. 25.6–13), who was praised as "zealot, son of a zealot."

ZEBULUN (Heb. Zevulun), the sixth son born to Leah and Jacob and the eponymous ancestor of the tribe whose territory was located in southern Galilee and the Jezreel Valley. In giving Zebulun his name, Leah played on the assonance of the roots z b d (gift) and z b l (dwell), saying, "God has given me a choice gift (zebadni . . . zebed); this time my husband will dwell with me" (Gn. 30.19–20). The tribe of Zebulun extended from the Mediterranean Sea to Mount Tabor in the east, and included such prominent sites as Jokneam, Nahalal, Shimron, Hannathon and Bethlehem of Galilee (Jos. 19.10–16). The tribe answered Deborah's call to arms against Sisera (Jgs. 5.14, 15.18) and supported Gideon in his war against the Midianites (Jgs. 6:35). Two minor judges—Ibzan from Bethlehem and Elon the Zebulunite—came from this tribe (Jgs. 12:8–12). From the reference in Jacob's blessing (Gn. 49.13), "Zebulun shall dwell by the seashore; he shall be a haven for ships and his flank shall rest on Sidon," it may be concluded that the tribal territory extended to the Mediterranean, perhaps along the Kishon River bordering the Sidonian colony at Acco, and included a subjugated Canaanite populace (Jgs. 1.30–31). In the second and third centuries, the main Torah academies of *Beit She'arim and Sepphoris were in the former territory of Zebulun. The later aggadah emphasizes the close relationship between Zebulun and his brother and neighbor *Issachar, a paradigm of the wealthy merchant brother supporting the scholarly brother in pursuing his studies undisturbed by the demands of making a living.

ZECHARIAH (Heb. Zekharyah; 6th cent. BCE), prophet and priest in the kingdom of Judah; son of Berechiah and grandson of Iddo. Like his contemporary, the prophet *Haggai, Zechariah called upon the postexilic Jewish community to rebuild the Temple in Jerusalem (cf. Ezr. 5.1). He proclaimed that the Temple of Solomon was destroyed because of the evil deeds of past generations but that repentance would help future generations avoid similar catastrophes. The core of his message appears in a series of eight visions. These emphasize the dual leadership of the community: the royal figure *Zerubbabel, son of Shealtiel, and the high priest Joshua, son of Jehozadak. Zechariah projects a future day when all nations will recognize the sanctity of God, Jerusalem, and the Jewish people.

The Book of Zechariah is the eleventh book of the Minor Prophets. Traditionally Zechariah is considered to be the author of the Book of Zechariah, but many modern scholars attribute to him only the first eight chapters, which can be dated to 520–518 BCE. Basing their views upon differences in form and references to the Greeks in later parts of the book, these scholars suggest Zechariah contains the work of at least two and possibly three prophets. The visions of Zechariah in chapters 1–8 are an example of early apocalyptic literature, in which God reveals to Zechariah his purposes in the building of the Second Temple. The second part of Zechariah (chaps. 9–14) is written in a totally different and obscure style, with strong eschatological content. The portrayal of the king of Jerusalem and the downfall of Israel's enemies in Zechariah 9–11 is identified as the work of a second prophet, often called Deutero-Zechariah. The work of this prophet is often dated to the late Persian or Hellenistic period (4th cent. BCE) because of its references to the Greeks and a possible depiction of Alexander the Great's advance through the Phoenician-Israelite region. Deutero-Zechariah speaks of the punishment of neighboring peoples and the eventual redemption of Israel. The description of the final apocalyptic battle on "the Day of the Lord" in Zechariah 12–14 is attributed to a third prophet called Trito-Zechariah. Chapters 12–14 are dated to the Hellenistic period and portray an apocalyptic scenario of judgment against the nations and the restoration of Jerusalem.

ZE'IRA', the name of two scholars (referred to in Babylonian sources as Zera') born in Babylonia, who studied in Babylonian academies and then immigrated to Palestine, where they spent the latter part of their lives. On occasion, the two scholars are described as arguing with one another (e.g., Men. 40b).

The earlier Ze'ira' was a rabbi who went to Palestine within the lifetime of R. Yoḥanan bar Nappāḥa' (died 279) and probably died around 300 CE. The more famous of the two, he was primarily a man of halakhah. He belittled the importance of Midrash and referred to works of aggadah as "books of magic" (sifrei qosemim). He was well known for his piety (Ḥul. 122a) and his asceticism, and often fasted to protect himself from the fires of hell (B. M. 85a).

The latter Ze'ira' was a rabbi who lived in the first half of the fourth century CE and was a candidate to head the academy in Pumbedita. However, Abbaye, his colleague, received the position.

ZEKHER LA-HURBAN (זִכְרֵי לְהַרְבָּן; a reminder of the destruction [of the Second Temple]), customs and regulations that entered Jewish usage intended to serve as reminders of the tragedy of the Temple's destruction. These were instituted for a number of reasons: to perpetuate the sorrow of the tragedy; to keep mourning within bounds and prevent its excess; to moderate expressions of joy at a time when the Temple lay in ruins and the people were scattered in exile; and to keep alive the memory of the Temple and its service. After the destruction of the First Temple, four fasts were instituted to commemorate the event and the events leading up to it (see FASTS); observance of the fasts was strengthened after the destruction of the Second Temple. As a sign of mourning for the Second Temple, the custom arose of reciting Psalm 137 ("By the waters of Babylon . . .") before the Birkat ha-Mazon on weekdays, and appropriate references to the destruction of the Temple were introduced into prayers. Instrumental music and singing were forbidden on joyful occasions. The rabbis decreed that Jews should leave one square cubit of one wall unpainted in their homes. When preparing a festive meal, one item was to be omitted in order to make the feast incomplete. Similarly, when adorning herself with her jewelry, a woman was to leave off one piece as a symbol of the national sorrow (B. B. 60b). While most of these customs have lapsed, a bridegroom occasionally will place a small quantity of ash under his hat during the wedding ceremony as a reminder that even in a moment of personal joy he is to recall his people's sorrow. For the same reason, it is customary for a groom to break a glass underfoot at the end of the wedding ceremony.

ZEKHER LI-YETSI'AT MITSRAYIM (זִכְרֵי לְיִצְיַת מִצְרַיִם; a memorial of the Exodus from Egypt), ordinances and customs connected to the memory of the *Exodus from Egypt. The Bible links many of its laws to the Exodus (Lv. 19.34, 25.38, 26.13; Nm. 15.41). The first of the Ten Commandments lays down the basis for all the other laws with its proclamation, "I am the Lord your God who brought you out of the land of Egypt" (Ex. 20.2). The liturgy explicitly designates the Sabbath and every festival as "a memorial of the Exodus from Egypt," and the rabbis taught that the Exodus is to be remembered for all time—even to the days of the Messiah (Ber. 1.5). The Exodus was seen as the pivotal event in Jewish history, and all that followed—the revelation at Sinai, the giving of the commandments, and the possession of the Promised Land—ensued from the Exodus. The Pesah eve service (the Seder) is devoted to the recollection of the wonders of the event, and the commandment to relate it to one's children is emphasized with the statement, "whoever amplifies the description of the Exodus is praiseworthy."

ZEKHOR BERIT (זְכוֹר בְּרִית); "Remember the covenant"), opening words of a number of poems but mainly refers to a penitential hymn composed by R. *Gershom ben Yehudah (960–1028) and recited in the Ashkenazi ritual *Selihot on the day before Ro'sh ha-Shanah. It is recited with the ark open and is so highly regarded that the Selihot service of that day is commonly referred to as Zekhor Berit. It is also recited in the Ashkenazi rite during the concluding service on Yom Kippur.

ZEKHUT AVOT (זְכוּת אֲבוֹת; merits of the fathers). The traditional doctrine of *merits emphasizes that the pious deeds of parents secure blessings for their descendants as well. This receives expression in the *Ten Commandments, in which God "shows kindness to the thousandth generation of those who love me and keep my commandments" (Ex. 20.6). Rabbinic aggadah and liturgical texts accord a unique place in this respect to the lasting merit of the *patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (recalled by Moses in pleading with God after the sin of the *golden calf [Ex. 32.13]), although the view was also expressed that even their merits were not limitless (Shab. 55a). Rabbenu *Ya'akov ben Me'ir Tam held that even if the merits of the patriarchs could be exhausted, God's covenant with them was unbounded. Judaism thus insists on "original merit" rather than original sin. In the Middle Ages, the notion developed that the merits of children (a pious life, prayer) can also benefit their departed parents.

ZELOPHEHAD, DAUGHTERS OF. Zelophehad was an Israelite of the tribe of Manasseh in the time of Moses. He died in the desert, leaving no male offspring, but five daughters: Mahlah, Noah, Hoglah, Milcah, and Tirzah. The daughters presented their case before Moses and the elders for the right to inherit their father's portion (Nm. 27). The divine decision was that "The plea of Zelophehad's daughters is just," and they were granted a hereditary holding among their father's kinsmen. When the decision was challenged by the kinsmen (Nm. 36), Moses clarified the intent of God's decision in that the daughters had to marry within the tribe of Manasseh. These decisions became legal precedents in the laws of inheritance of territory.

The Samaria ostraca, discovered in 1908–1910 and dating from the early eighth century BCE, indicates that certain Manassite clans, residing north of Shechem, were called by matronymics referring to the daughters Noah and Hoglah.

ZEMIROT (זִמְרוֹת; songs), the term used by Sephardi-Eastern and Italian Jews to denote the passages of song that introduce the morning prayers, which are equivalent to the *Pesuqei de-Zimra' of the Ashkenazi prayer book; in the Ashkenazi tradition, the term that refers to the two dozen or more joyous table hymns that may be sung during or after the Sabbath meals. The singing of zemirot, a familiar custom by 1105 (Siddur Rashi; Mahazor Vitry), was influenced by Lurianic Kabbalah and Hasidism. As their Hebrew or Aramaic titles indicate, these zemirot emphasize the rewards of Sabbath observance, give praise to God, and create a sense of well-being at the family table. Some are by famous poets; others by unknown authors. Included in the group for Sabbath eve are Kol Meqaddesh, Shevi'i, Menuḥah ve-Simḥah, Mah Yedidut Menuḥatekh, *Yah Ribbon 'Olam (by *Yisra'el ben Mosheh Najara), Yom Zeh le-Yisra'el (by *Yitshaq Luria), and *Tsur mi-Shello (prelude to *Birkat ha-Mazon). Two additional zemirot are Tsame'ah Nafshi (by Avraham *ibn Ezra) and Shalom Lekha Yom ha-Shevi'i (by *Yehudah ha-Levi). A second group, for the Sabbath midday meal, includes Barukh El 'Elyon, Yom Zeh Mekhubbad, Yom Shabbaton (by Yehudah ha-Levi), Shimru Shabbetotai, Ki Eshmerah Shabbat (by Avraham ibn Ezra), and Deror Yiqra' (by Dunash ben Labrat). Mizmor le-David (Ps. 23) and *Yedid Nefesh (by El'azar ben Mosheh Azikri) usually accompany *Se'udah Shelishit. Finally, at the Sabbath's termination, *Ha-Mavdil, Eliyahu ha-Navi' (linking the prophet Elijah with Israel's messianic redemption), and Amar Adonai le-Ya'akov are widely sung. Ashkenazim have a particularly wide range of tunes for their zemirot. Not all of these hymns figure in the more voluminous Sephardi-Eastern repertoire, which also has zemirot in the vernacular, such as Arabic and Persian. Special booklets (birkonim) have been published containing the best-known examples of zemirot.

ZEPHANIAH (Heb. Tsefanyah; 7th cent. BCE), prophet in the kingdom of Judah during the reign of King Josiah (639–609); son of Cushi, grandson of Gedaliah, great-grandson of Amariah, and great-great-grandson of Hezekiah (possibly the king of that name). Zephaniah supported Josiah's (to whom he may have been related) program of religious reform and national restoration, condemned those who identified with pagan perspectives, and called for judgment against Josiah's enemies. These included Assyria and Cush (Egypt), the major powers who opposed Josiah, and Philistia and Moab, countries into which Josiah hoped to expand.

The Book of Zephaniah is the ninth book of the Minor Prophets. It is cast in the form of an exhortation to the people to support the king's reforms and has two basic parts. The first oracle (1.2–18) announces the coming of the "Day of the Lord," which will bring a cataclysm upon the people of Judah for their religious syncretism. Zephaniah's description of this judgment day is one of the most detailed in the entire Bible. The second oracle (chaps. 2–3) is an exhortation to seek the Lord, calling on heathen nations to repent for opposing Josiah, together with a scenario of judgment and restoration for Jerusalem and Israel. Zephaniah was greatly influenced by the prophecies of Isaiah. Fragments from the Book of Zephaniah have been found at Qumran.

ZERAHYAH BEN YITSHAQ HA-LEVI GERONDI (c.1115–1186), rabbinical scholar. He was born in Gerona, Spain, and immigrated to Narbonne, in southern France. There he studied under R. Mosheh ben Yosef and R. Avraham ben Yitshaq of Narbonne. Afterwards he moved to Lunel to study under the patronage of R. Meshullam ben Ya'aqov of Lunel. He engaged in a lifelong controversy with Avraham ben David of Posquières. Their literary quarrels stemmed from basic differences in personality, cultural background, and approaches to source material. Zerahyah wrote a commentary to Mishnah tractate Qinnim, which included a critique of Avraham ben David's commentary; Sela' ha-Mahloqet, a critique of Avraham ben David's Ba'alei Nefesh; and Divrei Rivot, which recorded the exchange of letters between himself and Avraham ben David over the interpretation of a Talmudic passage. His Sefer ha-Ma'or, completed in the 1180s, was a synthesis of novellae to the Talmud and a criticism of Yitshaq Alfasi's code (published in 1552 in the Venice edition of the Talmud). His critique of the Alfasi code was comprehensive and systematic and offered alternative interpretations to Talmudic passages. In his commentaries to the Talmud, Zerahyah introduced the tosafot system, betraying the strong influence of R. Ya'aqov ben Me'ir Tam. He also wrote a short treatise on the laws of ritual slaughter; responsa; religious poems (collected and published under the title Shirat ha-Ma'or, Jerusalem, 1984); and Sefer ha-Tsava', describing the methodology of the Talmud and the exact definitions of its terms.

ZERA'IM (זְרָאִים; Seeds), first order of the Mishnah, ten of whose eleven tractates deal with laws governing agricultural work and produce. These are Pe'ah*, Dema'i*, Kil'ayim*, Shevi'it*, Terumot*, Ma'asrot*, Ma'aser Sheni*, Hallah*, Orlah*, and Bikkurim*. Its first tractate, Berakhot*, deals with benedictions and prayers. ZERUBBABEL, a scion of the Davidic line who served as governor of Judah under the Persian ruler Darius I for at least the years 521–516 BCE. Apparently, in the second year of the reign of Darius I, Zerubbabel was appointed governor of the small province of Yehud (Judah). Along with Joshua ben Jozadak (the grandson of the last high priest of the First Temple) and the prophets Haggai* and Zechariah*, Zerubbabel led a multitude of exiles, numbering about forty-four thousand people, back to Judah (Ezr. 2). Encouraged by the prophets, Zerubbabel was able to overcome the economic and political obstacles, as well as the popular apathy, facing the project of restoring the Temple; the restoration was completed by Pesah 516 BCE. After this date, there is no record of Zerubbabel; the usual hypothesis is that he was removed from office after encouraging messianic hopes placed in him by Haggai (2.20ff.) and Zechariah (4.6, 6.12). However, the long genealogy (1 Chr. 3.19ff.) of his descendants, extending down to the time of the Chronicler (c.400–380 BCE) indicates that the family thrived. Furthermore, regarding his three children—Meshullam, Hananiah, and Shelomith—a horde of seals and bullae from the end of the sixth century BCE mention a governor by the name of Hanan(ia)h and another by the name of Elnathan the husband of a Shelomith. This suggests that the Persian policy continued to be one of appointing a descendant of King Jehoiachin, particularly from Zerubbabel's immediate family, as governor of the province of Yehud.

ZEVAHIM (זֵבָחִים; Animal Sacrifices), tractate in Mishnah order Qodashim, with related material in Tosefta' and in the Talmud Bavli. It discusses the laws governing animal and bird sacrifices. A central theme of Zevahim is the requirement of proper sacrificial intent during the four central procedures of an animal or fowl offering: slaughtering, receiving blood in a sacred vessel, bringing the blood to the altar, and sprinkling of the blood on the altar. This emphasis on the importance of proper intent and on the capacity of improper intent to disqualify the sacrifice is typically rabbinic and is absent from the biblical discussion of sacrificial law (Lv. 1–7).

Zevahim further outlines the differences among kinds of sacrifices as regards sprinkling of the blood and the method of consumption of the sacrifice on the altar, by the priests, and by the owner of the sacrifice together with his fellows. The tractate closes with a survey of the places where the sanctuary was established, culminating with the Temple in Jerusalem.

ZIKHRONO LI-VERAKHAH (זִכְרוֹנוֹ לְבִרְכָּה; "May his memory be for a blessing"), honorific phrase added to the mention of the name of a person held in fond and pious remembrance. It derives from the verse "The memory of the righteous is a blessing, but the name of the wicked shall rot" (Prv. 10.7). It is the custom when writing the name of the deceased in Hebrew to add the initial letters of the two words zikhrono li-verakhah. The phrase zakhur la-tov, "May he be remembered for good," is also used—this form is regularly used when speaking about *Elijah—and occurs several times in the Talmud.

ZIKHRONOT (זִכְרוֹנוֹת; Remembrances), the second of three sections of the additional service 'Amidah on Ro'sh ha-Shanah, the other two being *Malkhuyot and *Shofarot. Each consists of ten appropriate biblical verses, with an introductory paragraph and a concluding blessing. The ten verses in the Zikhronot refer to God as "remembering" (his mercies, his covenant, etc.). After their recital, the *shofar is sounded.

ZIMRA, DAVID BEN SHELOMOH IBN AVI. See DAVID BEN SHELOMOH IBN AVI ZIMRA.

ZION, originally a Jebusite hill fortress in southern *Jerusalem conquered by David (2 Sm. 5.6–9) and named the City of David. As the city expanded to the north, Zion also denoted the site of the Temple. The exact location of Zion is a matter of dispute. Already during the Second Temple period various views were held as to the exact location of the biblical Mount Zion. Josephus identified it with the western hill or upper city of Jerusalem. The hill sloping down to Gei Ben Hinnom (southwest of the present Old City wall) has been identified with Mount Zion for over one thousand years, though scholars agree that the original Zion is actually elsewhere. The identification of the present Mount Zion is of ancient Christian tradition (the site of the Last Supper; later also that of the "Dormition" of Mary); since the Crusader period, the Tomb of David (see DAVID, TOMB OF) has been located on the hill, and the tradition has been adopted by Jews. Mount Zion became a Jewish pilgrimage site, particularly for Jews from Muslim lands (notably between 1948 and 1967, when the Western Wall—then under Jordanian rule—was closed to Israelis). Modern scholarship favors the so-called Ophel—the hill of the Temple mount—as the true position.

In the language of the Prophets and Psalms (and in later rabbinic, homiletical, and liturgical usage), Zion was synonymous with Jerusalem. The Prophets speak of Zion to refer to the entire Jewish kingdom (Is. 1.27) or the people of Israel (Zec. 2.14). In the image of a forsaken spouse, Zion symbolized the fate of the Jewish people in distress (Is. 49.14), while in prophecies of redemption, Zion is depicted as the mother of a reborn Israel (Is. 66.8). By a further extension of meaning, Zion came to denote the messianic City of God (Is. 60.14). The concept of Zion became charged with an intense religious and eschatological current, fed by the prophetic vision of Zion as the divine seat from which the word of God was to issue forth for the salvation of all mankind (Is. 2.3) and as the source of justice and righteousness (Is. 33.5). Zion has been a symbol of Jewish restoration throughout the ages (see ZIONISM). It is frequently mentioned in the liturgy (where prayers are usually for a "return to Zion") and personified—both in poetry and Midrashic legend—as a virgin, mother, or widow in mourning (cf. Lam. 1.11). Yehudah ha-Levi's famous elegies addressed to Zion are known as Zionides.

ZIONISM. The return of the Jewish people to its own land (shivat Tsiyyon), poetically called *Zion, is deeply ingrained in Jewish religious thought. The dream of the exiles in Babylonia to return home, expressed in Psalms and the Book of Ezekiel, can be seen as an early manifestation of this idea, and after the destruction of the Second *Temple, it became imprinted in all forms of religious expression. Jews turned toward Jerusalem in prayer; their prayers contained appeals to God to return his people to their land (often associated with the rebuilding of the Temple); their festivals remained linked to the agricultural cycle of the Land of Israel; and their poems and art frequently turned to Zion. They developed folk customs, such as leaving a portion of a wall unpainted in memory of Zion or the breaking of a glass by the bridegroom at his wedding as a sign of mourning for the destruction of *Jerusalem. Messianism was inspired by the longing for the return to Zion, and the first action of the *Messiah was not to establish universal peace (that would come later) but to restore the Jews to their land. Halakhah ruled that a spouse who refused to accompany his or her partner to Israel deserved to be divorced (Maimonides, Hilkhot Ishut 13). The very air of the Land of Israel was said to make a person wise (B. B. 158b), and many mitsvot could be observed solely in Erets Yisra'el. Some Jews in the Diaspora asked to be interred in Israel after their death, while it was customary to be buried with a sack of earth from the Holy Land.

Modern Zionism emerged at the end of the nineteenth century as a political movement with mostly secular leadership, but its roots were religious and historical. The movement called for political, socioeconomic, demographic, and cultural normalization. Among religious Jews, only a small minority initially embraced Zionism. Most Orthodox Jews (some of whom organized themselves in the *Agudat Israel movement) believed that the Jews would return to their own land only under divine auspices and that human attempts to "hasten the end" were sinful. The ideological wickedness was compounded by the secular leadership of the movement. They therefore took an extreme stance against the Zionist movement, which they saw as a rebellion against the sovereignty of God, although they continued to maintain the hope for a return to Zion in messianic times. Those Orthodox Jews who supported Zionism established the Mizrahi party within the World Zionist Organization (see RELIGIOUS PARTIES IN ISRAEL; RELIGIOUS ZIONISM). Their outstanding ideologist was Avraham Yits'haq Kook (see KOOK FAMILY), who saw Zionism as a movement of redemption and of total Jewish renaissance. In western Europe and North America, the Reform movement (see REFORM JUDAISM) also opposed Zionism. Committed to a universalistic ideology, they held that the Jewish mission was to bring a moral message to the world at large, and the concept of a return to Zion was retrogressive. They excluded prayers for a return to Zion from their liturgy. *Conservative Judaism, and later *Reconstructionism, fully supported the Zionist movement.

The Holocaust virtually silenced opposition to Zionism. The Orthodox masses in eastern Europe had been killed, and their survivors had gone to the United States and Israel. They accepted de facto the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948, although they continued to refuse to participate in the World Zionist Organization. Certain groups, notably followers of the *Satmar rebbe, continue to refuse to recognize the State of Israel. The Reform movement began to abandon its anti-Zionism in the 1930s (see COLUMBUS PLATFORM) and eventually became an integral element of the World Zionist Organization. See also EMANCIPATION; ISRAEL, STATE OF, JEWISH RELIGIOUS LIFE IN; ISRAEL, STATE OF, THEOLOGICAL ASPECTS.

ZODIAC, an imaginary broad celestial belt within which ancient astronomers visualized the sun, moon, and planets as passing. It was divided into twelve equal parts, each of which was given a sign representing a zodiacal constellation. These were represented (both in the ancient Near East and in China) by mostly animal signs, hence the Greek term zōdiakos kyklos (circle of animals). The signs of the zodiac in Hebrew are Taleh (Aries), Shor (Taurus), Te'omim (Gemini), Sartan (Cancer), Aryeh (Leo), Betulah (Virgo), Mo'znayim (Libra), 'Aqrav (Scorpio), Qeshet (Sagittarius), Gedi (Capricorn), Deli (Aquarius), and Dagim (Pisces). The concept of the zodiac seems to have originated in Mesopotamia, from where it passed to Greek astronomy. It was the Greek Hellenistic version that influenced Jewish ideas and imagery on the subject. The signs are listed in the Hebrew calendar as corresponding to the twelve months of the year, beginning with Nisan. The first Jewish source to mention the twelve signs in their present form is Sefer Yetsirah*, in which they also correspond to the twelve organs of the human body. The relationship of the twelve tribes to the zodiacal signs has also been noted (Yalqut Shim'oni, Nm. 418). The origin of the signs is unknown; rabbis interpreted them symbolically, thus Mo'znayim (Libra) is the sign of Tishrei, the month of judgment.

The zodiac was a favorite theme in Jewish art and was prominent in the decoration of Palestinian synagogues from the fourth to the sixth century. The pattern includes not only the twelve signs but also Helios, the sun god, who is praised by name in the magical work Sefer ha-Razim (edited by Mordecai Margulies [Jerusalem, 1966], pp. 12–13) as an angel. The presence of the zodiac patterns on the floors of synagogues diminished their sanctity and prevented any tendency to regard them as objects of worship. Pictures of the zodiac are also to be found in medieval illuminated manuscripts, in prayer books, on marriage documents, and on kabbalistic scrolls of invocation. In more recent times, they reappeared in the decorations of Polish wooden synagogues. See also ASTROLOGY.

ZOHAR, recognized by kabbalists since the fourteenth century as the most important work of mystical teaching; in some circles the book has achieved a sanctity only less than that of the Bible. The Zohar is composed of several literary units, not all by the same author. The largest section, the Zohar proper, consists of a mystical commentary on parts of the Bible, delivered in the form of discussions by a group of second-century rabbis and scholars in Palestine led by *Shim'on bar Yoh'ai. Most of their reflections and exchanges deal with the inner, esoteric meaning of scripture. Other sections of the Zohar, like the Idra' Rabba' and the Idra' Zuta' also depict scenes in the life of Shim'on bar Yoh'ai and his disciples. These sections are in Aramaic. Another section, the Midrash ha-Ne'eman, is written partly in Hebrew and attempts a more straightforward mystical interpretation of biblical passages. The Ra'aya Meheimana' is a kabbalistic interpretation of the commandments and prohibitions in the Torah. The Raza' de-Razin contains material on physiognomy and chiromancy. These and other parts of the Zohar are characterized by an enthusiastic style, theosophical speculation, and mythological imagery. Traditional kabbalists ascribe all or most of these books to the authorship of Shim'on bar Yoh'ai and his contemporaries. Modern scholarship (notably by Gershom Gerhard *Scholem) has shown that the main part of the Zohar was written toward the end of the thirteenth century by *Mosheh de León, a Castilian kabbalist who died in 1305. Some parts of the Zohar were written shortly afterward and added to the main work.

The Zohar has been described as a mixture of theosophic theology, mystical psychology and anthropology, myth, and poetry. Old gnostic doctrines, mystical traditions, theurgies, popular superstitions, and mythological motifs dwell side by side with echoes of Neoplatonic and Aristotelian philosophic theories about the nature of the cosmos and about the relationship between a transcendent God and a finite world. The manner in which the inscrutable mystery of the Godhead, the *Ein Sof (literally the infinite, but actually signifying the hidden, mystical, divine nothingness), manifests itself in the divine creative process is one of the Zohar's major themes. The doctrine of the *sefirot is the kabbalistic answer to this problem. The sefirot are the ten stages of the divine world through which God descends, from the innermost recesses of his concealment down to his manifestation in the *Shekhinah. The Shekhinah—the last of the sefirot—is also the heavenly archetype of the community of Israel. When the contrasting forces of the life divine (e.g., grace and stern judgment) are harmoniously balanced, the Shekhinah (conceived in female imagery) is united with the upper (male) sefirot and the abundance of divine life flows harmoniously into the world. There is a markedly erotic quality to the description of the holy union of the male and female aspects of the deity. When there is a defect in the proper conjunction of the upper sefirot, disorder, chaos, and evil result. The problem of evil occupies a large place in the Zohar. At times, evil is described as a negative but powerful and even demonic reality, resulting from the ascendancy of certain divine qualities (e.g., destructive judgment) over others (e.g., pure grace). The central doctrine of the Zohar is that the harmonious union of the divine life is brought about as well as rent by human action (i.e., by a religious life, good works, and mystical meditations; and by sins and improper thought, respectively). The Torah, for the Zohar, is an essential key to the mysteries of the divine processes. For the kabbalist, it is an actual manifestation of the divine. Hence, the author of the Zohar is less interested in the literal meaning of the historical events described in the Bible than in the theosophical mysteries that are their inner, and therefore more real, meaning. The basic premise of the Zohar is that there exists a complete correspondence between the lower and upper worlds. Consequently a quickening from below can arouse a quickening above. Hence, deeds and prayers have cosmic significance. The Zohar was first printed simultaneously in Cremona (1559–1560) and Mantua (1558–1560). The latter was the basis for later printings. It has been translated into several languages including English (by Harry Sperling and Maurice Simon, 5 vols. [London, 1931–1934]).

ZOKHRENU LE-HAYYIM (זכרנו לחיים; "Remember us for life"), opening words of a sentence interpolated in the first benediction of the 'Amidah throughout the *Aseret Yemei Teshuvah. Its plea for God to "inscribe us in the Book of Life" is based on the Talmudic concept of heavenly ledgers in which are recorded every person's fate at this season (R. ha-Sh. 16b). The theme recurs in other High Holy Days' supplications, notably *Avinu Malkenu and *U-Netanneh Toqef. —GABRIEL A. SIVAN

ZUGOT (זוגות; pairs), the term applied to the leading scholars of the five generations following the Men of the *Keneset ha-Gedolah and preceding the tanna'im (see TANNA'), spanning the period of approximately 200 BCE to 70 CE. They are listed in pairs in Avot 1, and, according to tradition, the first was president (nasi') and the second head of the court (av beit din). The five pairs are *Yosei ben Yo'ezer and Yosei ben Yoḥanan; *Yehoshu'a ben Peraḥyah and Nitt'ai the Arbelite; *Yehudah ben Tabb'ai and *Shim'on ben Shetaḥ; *Shema'yah and *Avtalyon; and *Hillel and *Shamm'ai. There is a historiographic symmetry between the three early periods, that of the zugot, the tanna'im, and the amora'im (see AMORA'), each of which is divided into five generations (cf. Sefer ha- Kabbalah, edited by Gerson Cohen [Philadelphia, 1967], pp. 172, 207 et seq.).

ZUNZ, LEOPOLD (1794–1886), German scholar; founder of the modern scientific study of Judaism, *Wissenschaft des Judentums. He studied at the University of Berlin and in 1819 was among the founders of the Verein für Kultur und Wissenschaft der Juden, a pioneer group that sought to place research into Hebrew literature on a scientific basis. In 1823 he became editor of the Society's Zeitschrift für die Wissenschaft des Judentums, in which he published some of his early works, including a biography of Rashi. Zunz was the first to employ consistently modern methods of historical and literary research in his study of Jewish works. His purpose was to elucidate the inner relations and mutual influences of various strands of Jewish thought with a wealth of historical and philosophical detail in order to demonstrate their continuity. From 1841 to 1850, he directed the newly opened Berlin Jewish Teachers' Seminary.

In his advocacy of Wissenschaft des Judentums, he criticized the state of Jewish studies and was the first to lay out a detailed program that covered the historical study of Hebrew literature and culture, including liturgy, law, ethics, and education. His stress on the need for Jewish statistics foreshadowed the sociological and demographic studies of the twentieth century. He also initiated the use of new types of sources such as community registers and inscriptions on tombstones. His goal was to have Jewish studies accepted in German academic circles.

On religious issues, he was guided by the conviction that true reform must preserve the essential vitality of historic Judaism, which is an original, growing force. His best-known work, Gottesdienstlichen Vorträge der Ju- den (1832), traced the historical evolution of the Jewish sermon and showed that preaching in the vernacular was not a modern innovation—which had been forbidden in Prussian law—but an ancient custom. A law forbidding Jews to use German first names moved him to write Namen der Juden (1837), a history of Jewish names, which showed that even in ancient times Jews commonly took first names from their surroundings. His trilogy Die synagogale Poesie des Mittelalters (1855), Der Ritus des synagogalen Gottesdienstes (1859), and Literaturgeschichte der synagogalen Poesie (1865) surveyed a thousand years of Jewish religious poetry, listing six thousand poems and over one thousand Jewish poets.

ZUSYA OF HANIPOLI (died 1800), Hasidic master. He and his brother R. *Elimelekh of Lyzhansk were both members of the circle of R. *Dov Ber of Mezhibezh. Hasidic legend depicts Zusya and his brother traveling the roads together in a voluntary state of exile, symbolizing the exile of the *shekhinah. Zusya is often depicted as a holy fool, victimized and degraded in the eyes of others but cheerily carrying on his devoted service to God as though he had never known suffering at all. Unlike most of the Mezhibezh circle, he did not write a book of his teachings. Legend has it that when the Maggid of Mezhibezh began to speak, quoting a verse that opened with "The Lord spoke to Moses, saying," Zusya became so excited at the notion of God's speaking that he had to be ejected from the room. Thus, he knew no teachings. This may be a way of saying that his charismatic personality, rather than specific knowledge or teachings, was what made him a master. A collection of sayings attributed to him is called Menorat Zahav (Warsaw, 1902).
